GINDES. Vid. Gyndes.

GIR, a river of Africa, composed of three arms or branches, two of which are represented as furnishing its sources The eastern one of these is called Dyr or Muselad, and runs north west into the lake Fittre, which together with some neighbouring lakes appear to have been known as the Chelonides Paludes, and to have been considered as the lakes in which the Gir was finally lost. The western source of the river is conjectured to have represented the Gesu, which loses itself in the great lake Tchad, the ancient Libya Palus, and its further course to be pointed out by the rivers Sharp and Feyth, the latter of which joins the lake Pittro. Besides these two arms the Gir was said to have been connected with a third, the course of which was apparently separated for a space of three degrees by an intervening chain of mountains, but is stated to have found its way through them by a subterraneous channel, and disappeared in the Nubæ Palus possibly the Bahr Heimad. Upon the western arm of the Gir, stood Gira Metropolis, supposed to be the same with Old Bonne the former metropolis of Bornou. Claudian. in Pr Cons. Stilich 1, 251.

GISCO, son of Himilcon the Carthaginian general, was banished from his country by the influence of his enemies. He was afterwards recalled, and empowered by the Carthaginians to punish, in what manner he pleased, those who had occasioned his banishment. He was satisfied to see them prostrate on the ground, and to place his foot on their neck, showing that independance and forgiveness are two of the most brilliant virtues of a great mind. He was made a general soon after, in Sicily, against the Corinthians, about 309 years before the Christian era; and by his success and intrepidity, he obliged the enemies of his country to sue for peace.

GLADIATORII LUDI, combats originally exhibited on the grave of deceased persons at Rome. They were first introduced at Rome by the Bruti, upon the death of their father, A. U. C. 488. It was supposed that the ghosts of the dead were rendered propitious by human blood, therefore, at funerals, it was usual to murder slaves in cool blood. In succeeding ages, it was reckoned less cruel to oblige them to kill one another like men, than to slaughter them like brutes, therefore the barbarity was covered by the specious show of pleasure, and voluntary combat. Originally captives, criminals, or disobedient slaves, were trained up for combat, but when the diversion became more frequent, and was exhibited on the smallest occasion, to procure esteem and popularity, many of the Roman citizens enlisted themselves among the gladiators, and Nero, at one show, exhibited no less than 400 senators and 600 knights. The people were treated with these combats, not only by the great and opulent, but the very priests had their ludi pontificales, and ludi sacerdotales. It is supposed that there were no more than three pair of gladiators exhibited by the Bruti. Their numbers, however, increased with the luxury and power of the city; and the gladiators became so formidable, that Spartacus, one of their body, had courage to take up arms, and the success to defeat the Roman armies, only with a train of his fellow-sufferers. The more prudent of the Romans were sensible of the dangers which threatened the state, by keeping such a number of desperate men in arms, and therefore many salutary laws were proposed to limit their number, as well as to settle the time in which the show could be exhibited with safety and convenience. Under the emperors, not only senators and knights, but even women engaged among the gladiators, and seemed to forget the inferiority of their sex. When there were to be any shows, hand bills were circulated to give notice to the people, and to mention the place, number, time, and every circumstance requisite to be known. When they were first brought upon the arena, they walked round the place with great pomp and solemnity, and after that they were matched in equal pairs with great nicety. They first had a skirmish with wooden files, called rudes or arma lusoria. After this the effective weapons, such as swords, daggers, &c. called arma decretoria, were given them, and the signal for the engagement was given by the sound of a trumpet. As they had all previously sworn to fight till death, or suffer death in the most excruciating torments, the fight was bloody and obstinate, and when one signified his submission by surrendering his arms, the victor was not permitted to grant him his life, without the leave and approbation of the multitude. This was done by clenching the fingers of both hands between each other, and holding the thumbs upright close together, or by bending back their thumbs. The first of these was called pollicem premere, and signified the wish of the people to spare the life of the conquered. The other sign, called pollicem vertere, signified their disapprobation, and ordered the victor to put his antagonist to death. The victor was generally rewarded with a palm, and other expressive marks of the people's favour. He was most commonly presented with a pileus and rudis. When one of the combatants received a remarkable wound, the people exclaimed habet, and expressed their exultation by shouts. The combats of gladiators were sometimes different, either in weapons or dress, whence they were generally distinguished into the following orders. The secutores were armed with a sword and buckler, to keep off the net of their antagonists, the retiarii. These last endeavoured to throw their net over the head of their antagonist, and in that manner to entangle him, and prevent him from striking. If this did not succeed, they betook themselves to flight. Their dress was a short coat, with a hat tied under the chin with a broad ribbon. They bore a trident in their left hand. The threces, originally Thracians, were armed with a falchion, and small round shield. The myrmillones, called also Galli, from their Gallic dress, were much the same as the secutores. They were, like them, armed with a sword, and on the top of the head-piece, they wore the figure of a fish embossed, called μορμυρος, whence their name. The hoplomachi were completely armed from head to foot, as their name implies. The Samnites, armed after the manner of the Samnites, wore a large shield broad at the top, and growing more narrow at the bottom, more conveniently to defend the upper parts of the body. The essedarii, generally fought from the essedum, or chariot used by the ancient Gauls and Britons. The andabatæ, dimachæri, fought on horseback, with a helmet that covered and defended their faces and eyes. Hence andabatarum more pugnare, is to fight blindfolded. The meridiani, engaged in the afternoon. The postulatitii, were men of great skill and experience, and such as were generally produced by the emperors. The fiscales were maintained out of the emperor's treasury, fiscus. The dimachæri fought with two swords in their hands, whence their name. After these cruel exhibitions had been continued for the amusement of the Roman populace, they were abolished by Constantine the Great, near 600 years after their first institution. They were, however, revived under the reign of Constantius and his two successors, but Honorius for ever put an end to these cruel barbarities.

GLANUM, a town of Gaul, now St Remi, in Provence.

GLAPHYRA and GLAPHYRE, a daughter of Archelaus the high priest of Bellona in Cappadocia, celebrated for her beauty and intrigues. She obtained the kingdom of Cappadocia for her two sons from M. Antony, whom she corrupted by defiling the bed of her husband. This amour of Antony with Glaphyra, highly displeased his wife Fulvia, who wished Augustus to avenge his infidelity, by receiving from her the same favours which Glaphyra received from Antony.——Her grand-daughter bore the same name. She was a daughter of Archelaus king of Cappadocia, and married Alexander, a son of Herod, by whom she had two sons. After the death of Alexander, she married her brother-in-law Archelaus.

GLAPHYRUS, an infamous adulterer. Juv. 6, 77.

GLAUCIA, a surname of the Servilian family Cic. Orat. 3, 41. 2, 64.——Caius, a prætor put to death by the consuls Marius and Valerius. Cic. Rab. 7. Cat. 3, 5.

GLAUCIPPUS, a Greek who wrote a treatise concerning the sacred rites observed at Athens.

GLAUCOPIS, a surname of Minerva, from the blueness of her eyes. Homer—Hesiod

GLAUCUS, a son of Hippolochus, the son of Bellerophon. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and had the simplicity to exchange his golden suit of armour with Diomedes for an iron one, whence came the proverb of Glauci et Diomedis permutatio, to express a foolish purchase. He behaved with much courage, and was killed by Ajax. Virg. Æn. 6, 483.—Martial, 9, ep 96.—Hom. Il. 6, 119. 12, 309. 16, 492 17, 140.——A fisherman of Anthedon in Bœotia, son of Neptune and Naïs, or according to others of Polybius the son of Mercury. As he was fishing, he observed that all the fishes which he laid on the grass received fresh vigour as they touched the ground, and immediately escaped from him by leaping into the sea. He attributed the cause of it to the grass, and by tasting it, he found himself suddenly moved with a desire of living in the sea. Upon this he leaped into the water, and was made a sea deity by Oceanus and Tethys, at the request of the gods. After this transformation he became enamoured of the Nereid Scylla, whose ingratitude was severely punished by Circe. (Vid. Scylla.) He is represented like the other sea deities with a long beard, dishevelled hair, and shaggy eyebrows, and with the tail of a fish. He received the gift of prophecy from Apollo, and according to some accounts he was the interpreter of Nereus. He assisted the Argonauts in their expedition, and foretold them that Hercules, and the two sons of Leda, would one day receive immortal honours. The fable of his metamorphoses has been explained by some authors, who observe that he was an excellent diver, who was devoured by fishes as he was swimming in the sea. Ovid. Met. 13, 905, &c.—Hygin. fab. 199.—Athen. 7. 12.—Apollon. 1.—Diod. 4.—Aristot de Rep. Del. · Paus. 9, 22.——A son of Sisyphus king of Corinth, by Merope the daughter of Atlas, born at Potniæ, a village of Bœotia. He prevented his mares from having any commerce with the stallions, in the expectation that they would become swifter in running, upon which Venus inspired the mares with such fury, that they tore his body to pieces as he returned from the games which Adrastus had celebrated in honour of his father. He was buried at Potniæ. Hygin. fab. 250.—Virg G 3, 267.—Apollod. 1 et 2.——A son of Minos the 2d, and Pasiphae, who was smothered in a cask of honey. His father, ignorant of his fate, consulted the oracle to know where he was, and received for answer, that the soothsayer who best described him an ox, which was of three different colours among his flocks, would best give him intelligence of his son's situation. Polyidus was found superior to all the other soothsayers, and was commanded by the king to find the young prince. When he had found him, Minos confined him with the dead body, and told him that he never would restore him his liberty if he did not restore his son to life. Polyidus was struck with the king's severity, but while he stood in astonishment, a serpent suddenly came towards the body and touched it. Polyidus killed the serpent, and immediately a second came, who seeing the other without motion or signs of life, disappeared, and soon after returned with a certain herb in his mouth. This herb he laid on the body of the dead serpent, which was immediately restored to life. Polyidus, who had attentively considered what passed, seized the herb, and with it he rubbed the body of the dead prince, who was instantly raised to life. Minos received Glaucus with gratitude, but he refused to restore Polyidus to liberty, before he taught his son the art of divination and prophecy. He consented with great reluctance; and when he was at last permitted to return to Argolis, his native country, he desired his pupil to spit in his mouth. Glaucus willingly consented, and from that moment he forgot all the knowledge of divination and healing, which he had received from the instructions of Polyidus. Hyginus ascribes the recovery of Glaucus to Æsculapius. Apollod. 2, 3.—Hygin. 136 et 251, &c.——A son of Epytus, who succeeded his father on the throne of Messenia, about ten centuries before the Augustan age. He introduced the worship of Jupiter among the Dorians, and was the first who offered sacrifices to Machaon the son of Æsculapius. Paus. 4, 3.——A son of Antenor, killed by Agamemnon. Dictys. Cret. 4, 22.——An Argonaut, the only one of the crew who was not wounded in a battle against the Tyrrhenians. Athen. 7, 12.——A son of Imbrasus, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn 12, 343.——A son of Hippolytus, whose descendants reigned in Ionia.——An athlete of Eubœa, son of Demylus, and descended from Glaucus of Anthedon. Paus. 6, 9.——A physician, exposed on a cross, because Hephæstion died while under his care. Plut in Alex.——A river of Achaia, now the Iauka.——A river of Pontus, now the Tekoradasi.——A river of Lycia, falling into the Sinus Glaucus. It is now the Men

GLAUCUS SINUS, a gulf of Lycia, now the gulf of Macri. It was also called Sinus Telmissicus, from the city Telmissus, which stood at the head of it.

GLAUCIAS, a king of Illyricum, who educated Pyrrhus.

GLICON. Vid. Glycon.

GLISSAS, a town of Boeotia, with a small river in the neighbourhood. Paus. 9, 19.

GLOTA, a river of Britain, now the Clyde, running past Lanark, Glasgow, and Renfrew, into the Glota Æstuarium, or Firth of Clyde. It is noted for its falls, the scenery round which is singularly romantic GLYCERA, a beautiful woman, celebrated by Horace, 1, od 19, 30.

GLYCERIUM, a harlot of Thespis, who presented her countrymen with the painting of Cupid, which Praxiteles had given her.—The mistress of Pamphilus in Terence's Andria.

GLYCON, a man remarkable for his strength. Horat. Ep. 1, 1, 30 ——A physician who attended Pansa, and was accused of poisoning his patron's wound Suet Aug 11.—— A sculptor of Athens, to whose superior execution it is said that the moderns are indebted for the long-admired statue of the Farnese Hercules.

GNATIA, a town of Apulia, about thirty miles from Brundusium, badly supplied with water. Horat 1, Sat 1, 5

GNIDUS Vid Cnidus

GNOSSIS and GNOSSIA, an epithet given to Ariadne, because she lived, or was born at Gnossus The crown which she received from Bacchus, and which was made a constellation, is called Gnossa Stella. Virg. G. 1, 222.

GNOSSUS, a famous city of Crete, the residence of king Minos. It was originally called Ceratus, from the neighbouring stream, and it boasted to possess the tomb where the remains of Jupiter had been deposited. The name of Gnossa tellus, is often applied to the whole island. Virg. Æn. 6, 23.—Strab 10.—Homer Il. 2, 153.

GONUSSA, a town of Sicyon Paus.

GORDIÆI, mountains in Armenia, where the Tigris rises.

GORDIANUS, M. ANTONIUS AFRICANUS, a son of Metius Marcellus, descended from Trajan, by his mother's side, and from the Gracchi by the side of his father. In the greatest affluence, he cultivated learning, and was an example of piety and virtue. He applied himself to the study of poetry, and composed a poem in thirty books upon the virtues of Titus, Antoninus, and M. Aurelius. He was such an advocate for good breeding and politeness, that he never sat down in the presence of his father in law, Annius Severus, who paid him daily visits, before he was promoted to the prætorship. He was some time after elected consul, and went to take the government of Africa, in the capacity of proconsul. After he had attained his 80th year, in the greatest splendour and domestic tranquillity, he was roused from his peaceful occupations by the tyrannical reign of the Maximini, and proclaimed emperor by the rebellious troops of his province He long declined to accept the imperial purple, but the threats of immediate death granted his compliance. Maximinus marched against him with the greatest indignation; and Gordian sent his son, with whom he shared the imperial dignity to oppose the enemy. Young Gordian was killed, and the father, worn out with age, and grown desperate on account of his misfortunes, strangled himself at Carthage, before he had been six weeks at the head of the empire, A D 236. He was universally lamented by the army and people.—— M. Antonius Africanus, son of Gordianus, was instructed by Serenus Sammoticus, who left him his library, which consisted of 62,000 volumes. His enlightened understanding, and his peaceful disposition, recommended him to the favour of the emperor Heliogabalus. He was made prefect of Rome, and afterwards consul, by the emperor Alexander Severus. He passed into Africa, in the character of lieutenant to his father, who had obtained that province, and seven years after, he was elected emperor in conjunction with him. He marched against the partisans of Maximinus, his antagonist in Mauritania, and was killed in a bloody battle on the 25th of June, A. D. 236, after a reign of about six weeks. He was of an amiable disposition, but has been justly blamed by his biographers, on account of his lascivious propensities, which reduced him to the weakness and infirmities of old age, though he was but in his 46th year at the time of his death.——M. Antonius Pius, grandson to the first Gordian, was but twelve years old when he was honoured with the title of Cæsar. He was proclaimed emperor in the 16th year of his age, and his election was attended with universal marks of approbation. In the 18th year of his age, he married Furia Sabina Tranquillina, daughter of Misitheus, a man celebrated for his eloquence and public virtues. Misitheus was entrusted with the most important offices of the state by his son-in-law; and his administration proved how deserving he was of the confidence and affection of his imperial master. He corrected the various abuses which prevailed in the state, and restored the ancient discipline among the soldiers. By his prudence and political sagacity, all the chief towns in the empire were stored with provisions, which could maintain the emperor and a large army during fifteen days upon any emergency. Gordian was not less active than his father-in law; and when Sapor, the king of Persia had invaded the Roman provinces in the east, he boldly marched to meet him, and in his way defeated a large body of Goths, in Mœsia. He conquered Sapor, and took many flourishing cities in the east, from his adversary. In this success the senate decreed him a triumph, and saluted Misitheus as the guardian of the republic. Gordian was assassinated in the east, A. D. 244, by the means of Philip, who had succeeded to the virtuous Misitheus, and who usurped the sovereign power by murdering a warlike and amiable prince. The senate, sensible of his merit, honoured him with a most splendid funeral on the confines of Persia, and ordered that the descendants of the Gordians should ever be free, at Rome, from all the heavy taxes and burdens of the state. During the reign of Gordianus, there was an uncommon eclipse of the sun, in which the stars appeared in the middle of the day.

GORDIUM, a city of Galatia in Asia Minor, on the river Sangarius, a little to the east of Pessinus. It is celebrated as the scene of Alexander's exploit in cutting the Gordian knot. (Vid. Gordius.) In the time of Strabo it had sunk into the condition of a mere village, but after the defeat of the Galatians by the consul Manlius on the neighbouring mountain Olympus, it was again raised to the rank of a city by a Galatian prince, who called it Juliopolis. Justin 11, 7.—Liv. 38, 18.—Curt 3, 1.

GORDIUS, a Phrygian, who, though originally a peasant, was raised to the throne. During a sedition, the Phrygians consulted the oracle, and were told that all their troubles would cease as soon as they chose for their king, the first man they met going to the temple of Jupiter, mounted on a chariot. Gordius was the object of their choice, and he immediately consecrated his chariot in the temple of Jupiter. The knot which tied the yoke to the draught tree, was made in such an artful manner, that the ends of the cord could not be perceived. From this circumstance, a report was soon spread, that the empire of Asia was promised by the oracle to him that could untie the Gordian knot. Alexander, in his conquest of Asia, passed by Gordium; and as he wished to leave nothing undone, which might inspire his soldiers with courage, and make his enemies believe that he was born to conquer Asia, he cut the knot with his sword; and from that circumstance asserted that the oracle was really fulfilled, and that his claims to universal empire were fully justified. Justin. 11, 7.—Curt. 3, 1.—Arrian. 1.——A tyrant of Corinth. Aristot.

GORGÆSUS, a man who received divine honours at Phera in Messenia. Paus 4, 30.

GORGE, a daughter of Œneus, king of Calydon, by Althæa, daughter of Thestius. She with Dejanira were the only two daughters of Œneus not changed into birds by Diana, at the death of Meleager. She married Andremon, by whom she had Thoas, who headed the Heraclidæ, when they made an attempt upon Peloponnesus. Her tomb was seen at Amphissa in Locris. Paus. 10, 38.—Apollod. 1, et 2.—Ovid Met. 8, 542.——One of the Danaides. Apollod. 2, 1.

GORGIAS, surnamed Leontinus, from Leontium in Sicily, was a learned orator and sophist, who flourished in the fifth century B. C. He was a disciple of Empedocles, and is reckoned one of the earliest writers on rhetoric. He displayed his eloquence at the Olympic and Pythian games, and made such an impression that a golden statue was erected in his honour at Delphi. He was one of the first who introduced numbers into prose, and who treated of common places, and showed the use of them for the invention of arguments; and on this account Plato gave the name of Gorgias to his elegant dialogue on this subject, which is still extant. Gorgias lived to his 108th year, and died B. C. 400. Paus. 6, 17.—Cic. in Orat. 22, &c. de Sen 15. in Brut. 15.—Quintil. 3 et 12.——An officer of Antiochus Epiphanes.——A Macedonian, forced to war with Amyntas. &c. Curt. 7, 1.

GORGO, the wife of Leonidas, king of Sparta, &c.——The name of the ship which carried Perseus, after he had conquered Medusa.——The capital of the Chorasmii. Now Urgheng.

GORGŌNES, three celebrated sisters, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whose names were Sthenō, Euryale, and Medusa, all immortal, except Medusa. According to the mythologists, their hairs were entwined with serpents, their hands were of brass, their wings of the colour of gold, their body was covered with impenetrable scales, and their teeth were as long as the tusks of a wild boar, and they turned to stones all those on whom they fixed their eyes. Medusa alone had serpents in her hair, according to Ovid, and this proceeded from the resentment of Minerva, in whose temple Medusa had gratified the passion of Neptune, who was enamoured of the beautiful colour of her locks, which the goddess changed into serpents. Æschylus says, that they had only one tooth and one eye between them, of which they had the use, each in her turn, and accordingly it was at the time that they were exchanging the eye, that Perseus attacked them, and cut off Medusa's head. According to some authors, Perseus, when he went to the conquest of the Gorgons, was armed with an instrument like a sickle by Mercury, and provided with a looking-glass by Minerva, besides winged shoes, and a helmet of Pluto, which rendered all objects clearly visible and open to the view, while the person who wore it remained totally invisible. With weapons like these, Perseus obtained an easy victory, and after his conquest, returned his arms to the different deities, whose favours and assistance he had so recently experienced. The head of Medusa remained in his hands, and after he had finished all his laborious expeditions, he gave it to Minerva, who placed it on her ægis, with which she turned into stones all such as fixed their eyes upon it. It is said, that after the conquest of the Gorgons, Perseus took his flight in the air towards Æthiopia; and that the drops of blood which fell to the ground from Medusa's head were changed into serpents, which have ever since infested the sandy deserts of Libya. The horse Pegasus also arose from the blood of Medusa, as well as Chrysaor with his golden sword. The residence of the Gorgons was beyond the ocean towards the west, according to Hesiod. Æschylus makes them inhabit the eastern parts of Scythia; and Ovid, as the most received opinion, supports that they lived in the inland parts of Libya, near the lake of Triton, or the gardens of the Hesperides. Diodorus and others explain the fable of the Gorgons, by supposing that they were a warlike race of women near the Amazons, whom Perseus, with the help of a large army, totally destroyed. *Hesiod. GORGONIA, a surname of Pallas, because Perseus, armed with her shield, had conquered the Gorgon, who had polluted her temple with Neptune.

GORGONIUS, a man ridiculed by Horace for his ill smell. Horat. Sat. 1, 2, 27.

GORGOPHŒNE, a daughter of Perseus and Andromeda, who married Perieres king of Messenia, by whom she had Aphareus and Leucippus. After the death of Perieres, she married Œbalus, who made her mother of Icarius and Tyndarus. She is the first whom the mythologists mention as having had a second husband. Paus. 4, 2 — Apollod. 1, 2 et 3.——One of the Danaides. Apollod. 2, 1

GORGOPHONUS, a son of Electryon and Anaxo. Apollod. 2, 4.

GORGOPHORA, a surname of Minerva, from her ægis, on which was the head of the Gorgon Medusa. Cic.

GORGUS, the son of Aristomenes the Messenian. He was married, when young, to a virgin, by his father, who had experienced the greatest kindnesses from her humanity, and had been enabled to conquer seven Cretans who had attempted his life, &c. Paus 4, 19 ——A son of Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum ——A man whose knowledge of metals proved very serviceable to Alexander, &c.

GORGYTHION, a son of Priam, killed by Teucer. Homer. Il 8.

GORTUÆ, a people of Rubœa, who fought with the Medes at the battle of Arbela. Curt. 4, 12.

GORTYN, or GORTYNA, a city of Crete, situate on the banks of the river Lethæus, about ninety stadia from the Libyan sea. According to the Arcadian traditions, it had been founded by Gortys, the son of Tegeates; a fact which was, however, denied by the Cretans, who affirmed that Gortys was the son of Rhadamanthus. Apollo was especially revered here, whence he is sometimes called Gortynius. Jupiter was also worshipped in this place under the title of Hecatomphonius. The site of this ancient city is now called Metropoli. Homer. Il 2, 646 Od 3, 293 — Strab. 10.—Paus 5, 1.——A town of Arcadia, near the river Gortynius, and south-east of Heræa. It was celebrated for a temple dedicated to Æsculapius. Its site is now called Methcolo Castro. Paus 8, 28.—Plin. 4, 12.—Lucan. 6, 214. 7, 214. — Virg. Æn. 11, 772.

GOTHI, a warlike nation of Europe, which became divided into two great branches, the Teutonic or German and the Scandinavian. They are supposed to be referred to by the navigator Pytheas under the name of Guttones, who inhabited the estuary of the Vistula, and traded with the Teutones, their neighbours. The specimen of their language which has been preserved, proves that, conformably to their own traditions, they were nearly allied to the northern tribes of the German family. They have been confounded, however, by ancient and modern writers, with the Thracian Getæ, and with the Celtæ. In the time of the Romans, they had become divided into two great nations, the Visigothæ or Western Goths, and the Ostrogothæ or Eastern Goths. The latter, under Theodoric, towards the close of the fifth century, overran the greater part of Italy, and maintained their dominion till A. D. 553, when they were finally subdued by the general of Justinian. The Visigoths settled in Spain, in the time of Honorius, where they founded a kingdom which lasted till it was overthrown by the Saracens. Their name is supposed to be derived from gode, tall, or goten, good. Tacit. Germ. 2, &c.

GRACCHUS, Titus Sempron. a master of horse to the dictator Junius, after the battle of Cannæ. As consul, Gracchus conducted himself with great bravery and prudence. He took the camp of the Campanians, and obliged Annibal to raise the siege of Cumæ. After distinguishing himself in Lucania, and defeating a body of Carthaginians under Hanno, he at last was taken in an ambuscade, where he fell bravely fighting. C. Nep. 23, 5.—Liv. 22, 57. 23, 32, &c.——T. Sempronius, son of Publius and father of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, twice consul and once censor, was distinguished by his integrity as well as his prudence and superior ability both in the senate and in the field of the armies. In his praetorship he killed a successful war against the Celtiberians in Sylia whom at his return he triumphed, and, as they before were equally prosperous against the Poeni. His services to the republic were rewarded by Quinctius embassy which he undertook into Asia, other illustrious the power and the intrigues of Antiochus dashed with Eumenes. He married Sempronia, sister of Scipio some Cornelia, of the family of the Scipios, a woman of great virtue, piety, and learning, and by her he had twelve children, who all died before the age of puberty except two sons, Tiberius and Caius, and a daughter who married the younger Africanus. Liv. 38, 57, &c.—*Val. (Vid. Agraria.) of the means of violence, his proposition passed a law, and he was appointed commissioner his father in-law Appius Claudius and his brother Caius, to make an equal division of lands among the people, that no one should possess more than 500 acres of land. The rich Attalus, which were left to the Roman people will, were distributed without opposition Tiberius enjoyed the triumph of his success enterprise, when he was assassinated midst of his adherents by P. Nasica, who populace were all unanimous to re-elect serve the office of tribune the following Not less than 300 people were slain in the tunate sedition, and the virulence of whom pears in its darkest colours when it is observed that they all fell with clubs or stones, and not by any military weapons. The bodies of the slain, were thrown into the Tiber, and Caius in vain attempted to pay his brother the honours of a public funeral. The untimely fate of this champion of liberty has drawn upon his character reflections severe and unmanly. That he aspired to sovereignty may certainly be denied, and it is more probable that an invincible love of popularity suggested the great and salutary measures which he proposed; so that Appian has justly observed that he was actuated by the best intentions, but prosecuted his design too violently. Cic. C. The death of Tiberius checked, for a while, the friendship of the people; and Caius for some years lived in liberary retirement. His abilities and great virtues were, however, afterwards displayed in Sicily as quæstor to the consul Orestes, but in the popular office of tribune, his endeavours to repress the exorbitant power of the senate, and to raise the people to greater consequence in the state, created those violent dissensions, and that turbulence of faction which had proved so fatal to Tiberius. He supported the cause of the people with more vehemence, but less moderation than his brother; and his success served only to awaken ambition, and animate his resentment against the nobles. With the privileges of a tribune, he became the arbiter of the republic, and the patricians with contempt. This beheld the ruin of Caius. During his absence, his enemies, by secret machinations and open intrigues, undermined his interest; the tumult which accompanied the promulgation of his laws after his return, he made the temple of Diana, and, unwilling to sacrifice either himself or his adherents to popular fury, he proposed terms of accommodation. These were rejected by the arts of Opimius the consul, and Caius, now abandoned and grown desperate, ordered his slave Eplerates to kill him, B.C. 121, about ten years after the death of Tiberius. The head of the unfortunate tribune was cut off and carried to Opimius by Septimulcius, who received as a reward its weight in gold. Not less than 3000 of his adherents, it is said, perished in this unhappy quarrel, and their bodies were plunged into the Tiber. Though prejudice and resentment thus dishonoured the services of the Gracchi, yet, their name was celebrated, and their memory held in the highest esteem by the gratitude of the people. Statues were erected to them, they were worshipped as gods, and their virtuous mother considered herself the happiest of the Roman matrons in having brought forth such illustrious sons. Caius has been accused of having stained his hands in the blood of Scipio Africanus the younger, who was found murdered in his bed. Plut. in vitâ.—Liv. 33. Dio. 1, 26. Vin. 4, 24. Off. 2, 21. GRADIVUS, a surname of Mars among the Romans, perhaps from gradatim, brandishing a spear. Though he had a temple without the walls of Rome, and though Numa had established the Salii in his honour, yet his favourite residence was supposed to be among the fierce and savage Thracians and Getæ, over whom he particularly presided. *Virg. GRÆÆ, winged monsters, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto. They were two in number, and received their name from the whiteness of their hair, which was long and bushy, and which served them like a veil for a covering to their head and their back. According to some authors, they had but one eye and one tooth between them both, which they reciprocally lent to each other; and from this circumstance, probably, they have been confounded with the Gorgons. Æschyl. in Prom. act. 4.—Apollod. 2.—*Hesiod. GRÆCI, the inhabitants of Greece. Vid. Graia.

GRÆCIA, a celebrated country of Europe, bounded on the west by the Ionian sea, south by the Mediterranean sea, east by the Ægean, and north by Thrace and Dalmatia. It is generally divided into four large provinces; Macedonia, Epirus, Achaia or Hellas, and Peloponnesus. This country has been reckoned superior to every other part of the earth, on account of the salubrity of the air, the temperature of the climate, the fertility of the soil, and above all, the fame, learning, and arts of its inhabitants. The Greeks have severally been called Achæans, Argians, Danai, Dolopes, Hellenians, Ionians, Myrmidons, and Pelasgians. The most celebrated of their cities were Athens, Sparta, Argos, Corinth, Thebes, Sicyon, Mycenæ, Delphi, Trœzene, Salamis, Megara, Pylos, Orchomenos, and Eleusis, &c. Their chief rivers were the Peneus, the Eurotas, the Alpheus, the Achelous, the Ilissus; and their mountains were Pindus, Œta, Olympus, Cithæron, Helicon, Parnassus, &c., where not only the nymphs and the muses, but the gods themselves, designed to fix their residence. The inhabitants, whose history is darkened in its primitive ages with fabulous accounts and traditions, maintained that they were the original inhabitants of the country, and born from the earth where they dwelt; and they heard with contempt the probable conjectures, which traced their origin among the first inhabitants of Asia, and the colonies of Egypt. In the first periods of their history, the Greeks were governed by monarchs; and there were as many kings as there were cities. The monarchical power gradually decreased; the love of liberty established the republican government; and no part of Greece, except Macedonia, remained in the hands of an absolute sovereign. The expedition of the Argonauts first rendered the Greeks respectable among their neighbours; and in the succeeding age, the wars of Thebes and Troy gave opportunity to their heroes and demigods to display their valour in the field of battle. The simplicity of the ancient Greeks rendered them virtuous; and the establishment of the Olympic games in particular, where the noble reward of the conqueror was a laurel crown, contributed to their aggrandizement, and made them ambitious of fame, and not the slaves of riches. The austerity of their laws, and the education of their youth, particularly at Lacedæmon, rendered them brave and active, insensible to bodily pain, fearless and intrepid in the time of danger. The celebrated battles of Marathon, Thermopylæ, Salamis, Platæa, and Mycale, sufficiently show what superiority the courage of a little army can obtain over millions of undisciplined barbarians. After many signal victories over the Persians, they became elated with their success; and when they found no one able to dispute their power abroad, they turned their arms one against the other, and leagued with foreign states to destroy the most flourishing of their cities. The Messenian and Peloponnesian wars are examples of the dreadful calamities which arise from civil discord and long prosperity; and the success with which the gold and the sword of Philip and of his son corrupted and enslaved Greece, fatally proved that when a nation becomes indolent and dissipated at home, it ceases to be respectable in the eyes of the neighbouring states. The annals of Greece, however, abound with singular proofs of heroism and resolution. The bold retreat of the ten thousand, who had assisted Cyrus against his brother Artaxerxes, reminded their countrymen of their superiority over all other nations; and taught Alexander, that the conquest of the east might be effected with a handful of Grecian soldiers While the Greeks rendered themselves so illustrious by their military exploits, the arts and sciences were assisted by conquest, and received fresh lustre from the application and industry of their professors. The labours of the learned were received with admiration, and the merit of a composition was determined by the applause or disapprobation of a multitude Their generals were orators, and eloquence seemed to be so nearly connected with the military profession, that he was despised by his soldiers who could not address them upon any emergency with a spirited and well delivered oration The learning, as well as the virtues of Socrates, procured him a name, and the writings of Aristotle have, perhaps, gained him a more lasting fame than all the conquests and trophies of his royal pupil. Such were the occupations and accomplishments of the Greeks, their language became almost universal, and their country was the receptacle of the youths of the neighbouring states, where they imbibed the principles of liberty and moral virtue The Greeks planted several colonies, and totally peopled the western coasts of Asia Minor. This country, under the name of Asiatic Greece, contained the provinces of Æolis, Ionia, Caria, Doris, and the neighbouring islands, and the famous cities of Ephesus, Smyrna, Miletus, Colophon, Halicarnassus, Cnidus, Cumæ, &c, and though occasionally groaning under the yoke of Persian slavery, yet it became powerful and respectable, and in imitating the virtues and the arts of its parent state, contributed to rescue, in the lapse of ages, the more eastern inhabitants from the oppression of their princes and their satraps. In the southern parts of Italy, there were also many settlements made, and the country received from its Greek inhabitants the name of Magna Græcia. For some time Greece submitted to the yoke of Alexander and his successors, and at last, after a spirited though ineffectual struggle in the Achæan league, it fell under the power of Rome, and became one of its dependant provinces governed by a proconsul.

GRÆCIA MAGNA, a name given to the southern part of Italy, comprehending Apulia, Messapia or Iapygia, called also Calabria, Lucania, and the country of the Brutii. It derived the name of Græcia from the number of Greek colonies which migrated thither at different periods, and the epithet Magna, or Great, from mere ostentation, according to Pliny The Greeks who settled here were principally Dorians, and the emigration is said to have taken place at a very early period, about 1055 B. GRATIANUS, a Roman emperor, son of Valentinian I., born at Sirmium in Pannonia, A. D. 359 He was raised to the throne, though only eight years old, and after he had reigned for some time conjointly with his father, he became sole emperor in the seventeenth year of his age. He soon after took, as his imperial colleague, Theodosius, whom he appointed over the eastern parts of the empire. His courage in the field was as remarkable as his love of learning, and fondness of philosophy He slaughtered 30,000 Germans in a battle, and supported the tottering state by his prudence and intrepidity. His enmity to the Pagan superstition of his subjects proved his ruin, and Maximinus, who undertook the defence of the worship of Jupiter and of all the gods, was joined by an infinite number of discontented Romans, and met Gratian near Paris in Gaul Gratian was forsaken by his troops in the field of battle, and was murdered by the rebels, A. D 383, in the twenty-fourth year of his age ——A Roman soldier, invested with the imperial purple by the rebellious army in Britain, in opposition to Honorius He was assassinated four months after, by those very troops to whom he owed his elevation A. D. 407.

GRATION, a giant killed by Diana.

GRATIUS FALISCUS, a Latin poet, supposed to have been contemporary with Ovid, by whom he is once mentioned. He was author of a poem entitled "Cynegeticon," or the Art of [illegible] with Dogs, the style of which is deemed pure, but destitute of elevation The best edition is that of Wernsdorff, in the Poetæ Latinæ Minores. Ovid Pont. 4, 16, 34.

GRAVII, a people of Spain Ital 3, 366.

GRAVISCÆ, now Ermno de St Augustino, a maritime town of Etruria, which assisted Æneas against Turnus. The air was unwholesome, on account of the marshes and stagnant waters in its neighbourhood. Virg. Æn. 10, 184.—Liv. 40, 29. 41, 16

GRAVIUS, a Roman knight of Puteoli, killed at Dyrrachium, &c. Cæs Bell. Civ.

GREGORIUS, called Thaumaturgus, was born at Neo Cæsarea, in Pontus, of [illegible] parents, on whose death he embraced the Christian religion. He became bishop of Neo Cæsarea, in which capacity he drew up a creed, and canon of faith. He died A. D 265 Many miracles are ascribed to him, which accounts for his surname of Thaumaturgus. His works, besides the panegyric on Origen, comprise a paraphrase on the Ecclesiastes, and a canonical epistle. They were published together at Paris, 1626, folio.——Nazianzen, surnamed the Divine, was bishop of Constantinople, which he resigned on its being disputed. His writings rival those of the most celebrated orators of Greece, in eloquence, sublimity, and variety. His sermons are more for philosophers than common hearers, but replete with seriousness and devotion Erasmus said, that he was afraid to translate his works, from the apprehension of not transfusing into another language the smartness and acumen of his style and the stateliness and happy diction of the whole He died A. D. 389 The best edition is that of the Benedictins, the first volume of which, in fol., was published at Paris, 1778 ——A bishop of Nyssa, author of the Nicene creed. His style is represented as allegorical and affected; and he has been accused of mixing philosophy too much with theology. His writings consist of commentaries on scripture, moral discourses, sermons on mysteries, dogmatical treatises, panegyrics on saints; the best edition of which, is that of Morell, 2 vols fol., Paris, 1615. The bishop died, A. D. 396 ——Another Christian writer, whose works were edited by the Benedictins, in 4 vols fol., Paris, 1705.

GRINNES, a people among the Batavians. Tacit. Hist. 5, 20.

GROSPHUS, a man distinguished as much for his probity as his riches, to whom Horace addressed Od. 2, 16.

GRUDII, a people tributary to the Nervii, supposed to have inhabited the country near Tournay or Bruges in Flanders. Cæs. G. 5, 38.

GRYLLUS, a son of Xenophon, who killed Epaminondas, and was himself slain, at the battle of Mantinea, B. C. 363. His father was offering a sacrifice when he received the news of his death, and he threw down the garland which was on his head; but he replaced it when he heard that the enemy's general had fallen by his hands; and he observed, that his death ought to be celebrated with every demonstration of joy rather than of lamentation. Aristot.—Paus. 8, 11, &c. ——One of the companions of Ulysses, changed into a swine by Circe. It is said that he refused to be restored to his human shape, and preferred the opulence and inactivity of this squalid animal. Plut. Brut. Anim.

GRYNEUS, one of the Centaurs, who fought against the Lapithæ, and was killed with the horns of a stag, after he had crushed to pieces Broteus and Orion with a ponderous altar. Ovid. Met. 12, 260.

GYGÆUS, a lake of Lydia, forty stadia from Sardis. Propert. 3, 11, 18.

GYGE, a maid of Parysatis.

GYGES or GYES, a son of Cœlus and Terra, represented as having fifty heads and a hundred hands. He, with his brothers, made war against the gods, and he was afterwards punished in Tartarus. Hesiod, however, mentions that Jupiter solicited his assistance against the Titans, and that by his means he confined them in Tartarus. Hesiod. Th. 148.—Horat. Od 2, 14, 14.—Ovid. Trist. 4, 7, 19.——A Lydian, to whom Candaules, king of the country, showed his wife naked. The queen was so incensed at this instance of imprudence and infirmity in her husband, that she ordered Gyges, either to prepare for death himself, or to murder Candaules. He chose the latter, and married the queen, and ascended the vacant throne, about 718 years before the Christian era. He was the first of the Mermnadæ, who reigned in Lydia. He reigned thirty-eight years, and distinguished himself by the immense presents which he made to the oracle of Delphi According to Plato, Gyges descended into a chasm of the earth, where he found a brazen horse, whose sides he opened, and saw within the body the carcase of a man of uncommon size, from whose finger he took a famous brazen ring This ring, when put on his finger, rendered him invisible; and by means of its virtue, he introduced himself to the queen, murdered her husband and married her, and usurped the crown of Lydia. Herod. 1, 8.—*Plat. GYLIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian, sent B. C 414, by his countrymen to assist Syracuse, against the Athenians. He obtained a celebrated victory over Nicias and Demosthenes, the enemy's generals, and obliged them to surrender. He accompanied Lysander, in his expedition against Athens, and was present at the taking of that celebrated town. After the fall of Athens, he was intrusted by the conqueror with the money which had been taken in the plunder, which amounted to 1500 talents. As he conveyed it to Sparta, he had the meanness to unsew the bottom of the bags which contained it, and secreted about 300 talents. His theft was discovered, and to avoid the punishment which he deserved, he fled from his country, and by this act of meanness, tarnished the glory of his victorious actions. Tibull. 4, 1, 199. —Plut. in Nicia.——An Arcadian in the Rutulian war. *Virg. GYMNASIUM, a place among the Greeks, where all the public exercises were performed, and where not only wrestlers and dancers exhibited, but also philosophers, poets, and rhetoricians repeated their compositions. The room was high and spacious, and could contain many thousands of spectators. The laborious exercises of the Gymnasium were running, leaping, throwing the quoit, wrestling, and boxing, which was called by the Greeks, πανκράτιον, and by the Romans, quinquertia. In riding, the athlete led a horse, on which he sometimes was mounted, conducting another by the bridle, and jumping from the one upon the other. Whoever came first to the goal, and jumped with the greatest agility, obtained the prize. In running a-foot, the athletes were sometimes armed, and he who came first was declared victorious. Leaping was a useful exercise, its primary object was to teach the soldiers to jump over ditches, and to pass over eminences during a siege, or in the field of battle. In throwing the quoit, the prize was adjudged to him who threw it farthest. The quoits were made either with wood, stone, or metal. The wrestlers employed all their dexterity to bring their adversary to the ground, and the boxers had their hands armed with gauntlets, called also cestus. Their blows were dangerous, and often ended in the death of one of the combatants. In wrestling and boxing, the athletes were often naked, whence the word Gymnasium, γυμνὸς, nudus. They anointed themselves with oil to brace their limbs, and to render their bodies slippery, and more difficult to be grasped. Plin. 2, ep. 17.—C. Nep. 20, 5.

GYMNIAS, now Gomasour, a town of Armenia, passed by the 10,000 in their retreat Xenoph. Anab. 4.

GYMNOSOPHISTÆ, a certain sect of philosophers in India, who, according to some, placed their summum bonum in pleasure, and their summum malum in pain. They lived naked, as their name implies, and for thirty-seven years they exposed themselves in the open air, to the heat of the sun, the inclemency of the seasons, and the coldness of the night. They were often seen in the fields fixing their eyes full upon the disc of the sun from the time of its rising till the hour of its setting. Sometimes they stood whole days upon one foot in burning sand without moving, or showing any concern for what surrounded them. Alexander was astonished at the sight of a sect of men who seemed to despise bodily pain, and who inured themselves to suffer the greatest tortures without uttering a groan, or expressing any marks of fear. The conqueror condescended to visit them, and his astonishment was increased when he saw one of them ascend a burning pile with firmness and unconcern, to avoid the infirmities of old age, and stand upright on one leg and unmoved, whilst the flames surrounded him on every side. (Vid. Calanus.) The Brachmans were a branch of the sect of the Gymnosophistæ. (Vid. Brachmanes.) Strab. 15, &c.—Plin. 7, 2.—Cic. Tusc. 5.—Lucan. 3, 240.—Curt. 8, 9.—Dion.

GYNÆCEAS, a woman said to have been the wife of Faunus, and the mother of Bacchus and of Midas.

GYNÆCOTHŒNAS, a name of Mars at Tegea, on account of a sacrifice offered by the women without the assistance of the men, who were not permitted to appear at this religious ceremony. Paus. 8, 48.

GYNDES, a river of Assyria, falling into the Tigris When Cyrus marched against Babylon, his army was stopped by this river, in which one of his favourite horses was drowned. This so irritated the monarch that he ordered the river to be divided into 360 channels by his soldiers, so that it might for ever afterwards be forded knee deep. The Gyndes, at the present day, has assumed its ancient course, and is called Zendeh by the Persians, and Kara-Sou, or the Black river, by the Turks. Its entrance into the Tigris is termed Feum-el-Saleh, or the river of peace. Herod. 1, 189 et 202.

GYTHEUM, a sea-port town of Laconia, at the mouth of the Eurotas, in Peloponnesus, built by Hercules and Apollo, who had there desisted from their quarrels. The inhabitants were called Gytheatæ. Cic. Offic. 3, 11.

GYZANTES, a people of Africa, near the Zanœces, who cultivated bees and made a great quantity of honey. Herodotus says, that they painted themselves with vermilion, and ate apes, which were abundant on their mountains.

H

HABIS, an illegitimate son of the daughter of Gargaris, king of the Cunetes in Spain, by an unknown person. His grandfather was so incensed at the dishonour of his daughter, that he ordered the child to be exposed in the woods. The goats of the desert fed him with their milk, and the shepherds brought him to the palace, where Gargaris, still unappeased, commanded him to be thrown to hungry swine, but he was uninjured. Afterwards, he was precipitated into the sea by the same cruel orders, and miraculously carried by the waves to the shore. When grown up, he was dragged before the monarch, whose vengeance now had yielded to pity, and he was adopted as successor to a throne to which the gods by such supernatural interference seemed to have destined him. At king of Spain, Habis distinguished himself by his benevolence, his subjects were made happy, salutary laws were enacted, and with subordination, agriculture and plenty flourished in the country. Justin. 44, 4.

HÆMONIA. Vid. Æmonia.

HÆMUS, a chain of mountains forming the northern boundary of Thrace, and separating it from Mœsia. This chain was erroneously said to be so lofty, that from its summit the Euxine and the Adriatic, the Danube and the Alps, could be at once seen. It was fabled to have obtained its name from Hæmus, son of Boreas and Orithyia, who married Rhodope, and was changed into this mountain for aspiring to divine honours. Its modern name is Emineh Dagh, or Balkan. Strab. 7.—Plin. 4, 11.—Ovid. Met. 6, 87.—Liv. 40, 22.——A stage player. Juv. 3, 99.

HÆNA, SEXTIL, a poet of Corduba in Spain. He came to Rome where he distinguished himself as a writer more by his genius than his learning. He had composed a poem in praise of Cicero, which he repeated in the house of Messala Corvinus, in the presence of a few select friends, in the number of whom was Asinius Pollio, who abruptly left the company on pretence of being offended with the poet's flattery to the deceased orator in this line,

Seneca.—Quintil.

HAGES, a brother of king Porus who opposed Alexander, &c. Curt. 8, 5 et 14 ——One of Alexander's flatterers ——A man of Cyzicus, killed by Pollux. Flacc. 3, 191.

HALÆSUS, and HALESUS, a son of Agamemnon, by Briseis or Clytemnestra. Some authors say that he conspired with Ægysthus against his father, for which he was deservedly banished; but others maintain that far from embracing so unnatural a part, he was so afflicted at the misfortune of his family that he left Peloponnesus and returned into Italy. Here he settled on mount Masicus in Campania, where he built Falisci, and afterwards assisted Turnus against Æneas. He was killed by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 7, 24. 10. 352.—Ovid. Am. 3, 15, 32.

HALCYÓNE. Vid. Alcyone.

HALENTUM, a town at the north of Sicily. Cic. Verr. 3, 43. 4, 23.

HALES, a river of Asia Minor, flowing near the city of Colophon. It was noted for the coldness of its waters. Plin. 5, 29.

HALESA, a town of Sicily. Cic. Verr. 2, 7. Fam. 13, 32.

HALESIUS, a mountain and river near Ætna, where Proserpine was gathering flowers when she was carried away by Pluto. Colum

HALIA, one of the Nereides. Apollod.——A festival at Rhodes in honour of the sun.

HALIACMON, a river of Macedonia, rising in the Canalovian mountains, and falling into the Sinus Thermaicus, or Gulf of Salonica. According to Cæsar, it formed the boundary between Macedonia and Thessaly. It is now called the Indje Mourn. Cæs. B. C. 3, 36.—Plin. 31, 2.—Herod. 7, 127.

HALIARTUS, a son of Thersander, said to have founded the city of Haliartus in Bœotia. He was adopted by Athamus, but did not succeed him, [illegible] gave up the throne willingly to Presbon, grandson of this prince Paus. 9, 34.——A city of Bœotia on the southern shore of the Lacus Copais, and north-west of Thebes. It was destroyed by the Romans in the war with Perseus, king of Macedon, upon which occasion its inhabitants were sold, and their territories given to the Athenians. Its remains lie just below the village of Mazi, on the road from Thebes to Lebadea. Strab. 9.—Liv. 42, 63.—Polyb. 36, 18.

HALICARNASSUS, the capital of Caria, situate on the northern shore of the Sinus Ceramicus. It was founded by a colony from Troezene, in Argolis, and its first name was Zephyria. It was the residence of the kings of Caria, to one of whom, Mausolus, his queen Artemisia raised such a splendid tomb, that it came to be looked upon as one of the seven wonders of the world, and finally suggested a name for sepulchral memorials of any magnitude. According to Scylax, Halicarnassus had two harbours, which were protected by the little island named Arconnesus. This city is memorable for the long siege it maintained against Alexander, under the skilful command of Memnon, the general of Darius. It was taken and sacked by the conqueror, but afterwards rebuilt, and became one of the most flourishing Greek cities along the Asiatic coast of the Ægean. It was the birth-place of Herodotus, Dionysius, and Heraclitus the poet. Its remains are situated at Boudroun. Herod 7, 99.—Strab. 14.—Mela, 1, 16.—Liv. 33, 20. 37, 16 et 16.

HALICYÆ, a town of Sicily, between Eutella and Lilybæum. It is now Salemi. Plin. 3, 8.—Dionl. 14.

HALIEIS, a district of Argolis, so called apparently from the fisheries established along the coast, and lying between Hermione and cape Scyllæum. Thucyd. 2, 56. 4, 45.

HALIMEDE, a Nereid.

HALIRRHOTIUS, a son of Neptune and Eurytе, who ravished Alcippe, daughter of Mars, because she slighted his addresses. This violence offended Mars, and he killed the ravisher. Neptune cited Mars to appear before the tribunal of justice to answer for the murder of his son. The cause was tried at Athens, in a place which has been called from thence Areopagus, (Ἄρης, Mars, and πάγος, hill,) and the murderer was acquitted. Apollod. 3, 14.—Paus 1, 21.

HALITHERSUS, an old man, who foretold to Penelope's suitors the return of Ulysses, and their own destruction. Homer. Od. 2, 157 17, 68 24, 450.

HALIUS, a son of Alcinous, famous for his skill in dancing. Homer. Od. 8, 120 et 370.—— A Trojan, who came with Æneas into Italy, where he was killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, 767.

HALIZÓNES, a people of Paphlagonia. Strab. 14.

HALMUS, a son of Sisyphus, father to Chrysogone. He reigned in Orchomenos. Paus. 9, 35.

HALMYDESSUS, or SALMYDESSUS, a city of Thrace, on the coast of the Euxine sea, below the promontory of Thynias. It is now Midjeh. Mela, 2, 2.

HALOCRÁTES, a son of Hercules and Olympias Apollod.

HALÓNE, an island of Propontis, opposite Cyzicus. Plin. 5, 31.

HALONNÉSUS, a small island at the opening of the Sinus Thermaicus, and north-east of Scopelos. It was at one time inhabited by women alone, who, having murdered all the men, continued to defend themselves against an invasion. It is now named Chelidromi. Mela, 2, 7.

HALOTIA, a festival in Tegea. Paus.

HALÓTUS, a eunuch, who used to taste the meat of Claudius. He poisoned the emperor's food by order of Agrippina. Tacit. Ann. 2, 66.

HALYÆTUS, a man changed into a bird of the same name. Ovid. Met. 3, 176.

HALYATTES. Vid. Alyattes.

HALYCUS, now the Platani, a river at the south of Sicily.

HALYS, now the Kizil-Irmak, a river of Asia Minor, rising in the angle formed by the junction of the mountains Anti-Taurus and Paryadres, and after a westerly and then northerly course of 370 miles, through the provinces of Cappadocia, Galatia, and Paphlagonia, falling into the Euxine a little to the west of Amisus. It is said to have received its name from the Greek word ἅλς, owing to its waters having a salt and bitter taste. It is famous for the defeat of Croesus, the Lydian monarch, of whose dominions it formed for a long time the eastern boundary, and who was tempted to cross it by the ambiguity of an oracle. (Vid. Croesus.) There is another branch of the Halys, which rises considerably farther south in mount Taurus, flowing past Tyana and Garsaura, and joining the main river near the borders of Galatia. Herod 1, 73.—Strab. 12.—Plin. 6, 2.—Cic. de Div. 2, 56.—Lucan. 3, 272.——A man of Cyzicus, killed by Pollux. Val. Fl 3, 157.

HALYZIA, a town of Epirus near the Achelous, where the Athenians obtained a naval victory over the Lacedæmonians.

HAMADRYĂDES, nymphs who lived in the country, and presided over trees, with which they were said to live and die. The word is derived from ἅμα, simul, and δρῦς, quercus. Virg. Ecl. 10.—Ovid Met. 1, 547.

HAMÆ, a town of Campania near Cumæ. Liv. 23, 25.

HAMILCAR, the name of some celebrated generals of Carthage. Vid. Amilcar.

HANNĪBAL Vid. Annibal.

HANNO. Vid. Anno.

HARCALO, a man famous for his knowledge of poisonous herbs, &c. He touched the most venomous serpents and reptiles without receiving the smallest injury. Sil. 1, 406.

HARMATELIA, a town of the Brachmanes in India, taken by Alexander. Diod. 17.

HARMILLUS, an infamous debauchee. Juv. 10, 224.

HARMODĬUS, an Athenian, who, together with Aristogiton, became the cause of the overthrow of the Pisistratidæ. (Vid. Aristogiton.) The Athenians, to reward the patriotism of these illustrious citizens, made a law that no one should ever bear the name of Aristogiton and Harmodius. Herod. 5, 55.—Plin. 34, 8.—Senec. Ir. 2, 25.

HARMONĬA, or HERMIONEA (Vid Hermione,) a daughter of Mars and Venus, who married Cadmus. It is said, that Vulcan, to avenge the infidelity of her mother, made her a present of a vestment dyed in all sorts of crimes, which, in some measure, inspired all the children of Cadmus with wickedness and impiety. Fasc. 9, 16, &c.

HARMONIDES, a Trojan beloved by Minerva. He built the ships in which Paris carried away Helen. Homer. Il. 5.

HARPAGUS, a general of Cyrus. He conquered Asia Minor after he had revolted from Astyages, who had cruelly forced him to eat the flesh of his son, because he had disobeyed his orders in not putting to death the infant Cyrus. Herod. 1, 108.—Justin. 1, 5 et 6

HARPALICE. Vid. Harpalyce.

HARPALION, a son of Pylæmenes king of Paphlagonia, who assisted Priam during the Trojan war, and was killed by Merion. Homer. Il. 13, 643.

HARPĂLUS, a man entrusted with the treasures of Babylon by Alexander. His hopes that Alexander would perish in his expedition, rendered him dissipated, negligent, and vicious. When he heard that the conqueror was returning with great resentment, he fled to Athens, where, with his money, he corrupted the orators, among whom was Demosthenes. When brought to justice, he escaped with impunity to Crete, where he was at last assassinated by Thimbron, B.C. 325. Plut. in Phoc.—Diod. 17.——A robber who scorned the gods. Cic. de Nat. D. 3.——A celebrated astronomer of Greece, 480 years B.C. He corrected the cycle of eight years, invented by Cleostratus, and increased it to nine, in which he supposed that the sun and moon returned to the same point. Meton afterwards altered this cycle to nineteen years, now called the "Golden Number."

HARPALYCE, the daughter of Harpalycus, king of Thrace. Her mother died when she was but a child, and her father fed her with the milk of cows and mares, and inured her early to sustain the fatigues of hunting. When her father's kingdom was invaded by Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, she repelled and defeated the enemy with manly courage. The death of her father, which happened soon after in a sedition, rendered her disconsolate; she fled the society of mankind, and lived in the forests upon plunder and rapine. Every attempt to secure her proved fruitless, till her great swiftness was overcome by intercepting her with a net. After her death the people of the country disputed their respective right to the possessions which she had acquired by rapine, and they soon after appeased her manes, by proper oblations on her tomb. Virg. Æn. 1, 321.—Hygin. fab. 193 et 252.——A beautiful virgin, daughter of Clymenus and Epicaste of Argos. Her father became enamoured of her, and gained her confidence, and enjoyed her company by means of her nurse, who introduced him as a stranger. Some time after she married Alastor; but the father's passion became more violent and incontrollable in his daughter's absence, and he murdered her husband to bring her back to Argos. Harpalyce, inconsolable for the death of her husband, and ashamed of her father's passion, which was then made public, resolved to revenge her wrongs. She killed her younger brother, or, according to some, the fruit of her incest, and served it before her father. She begged the gods to remove her from the world, and she was changed into an owl, and Clymenus killed himself. Hygin fab. 253. &c.—Parthen. in Erot. 13.——A mistress of Iphiclus, son of Thestius. She died through despair on seeing herself despised by her lover. This mournful story was composed in poetry, in the form of a dialogue called Harpalyce. Athen. 14.

HARPALYCUS, one of the companions of Æneas, killed by Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, 67.——The father of Harpalyce, king of part of Thrace.

HARPĂSUS, a river of Caria. Liv. 38, 13.

HARPEDOPHŌNUS, a surname of Mercury and of Perseus, because they were represented armed with the harpe, an instrument by which Argus and Medusa perished. Lucan. 9, 663 et 676.—Ovid. Met. 5, 69.

HARPOCRĀTES, a divinity supposed to be the same as Orus the son of Isis, among the Egyptians, and considered as the god of silence. He is represented as holding one of his fingers on his mouth, with a hat on his head, as the symbol of liberty, and clothed with a wolf skin, bespangled with eyes and ears to intimate that every thing may be heard and seen, but that the mysteries of religion and philosophy ought never to be revealed to the people. Sometimes he appears upon the flower of the lotus, with his finger still on his mouth. The peach-tree was particularly consecrated to him. The Romans placed his statues at the entrance of their temples. Harpocratem reddere became proverbial to imply silence and secrecy Catull. 75.—Varro de L. L. 4, 10.—Ovid. Met. 9, 691.

HARPOCRATION, a Platonic philosopher of Argos, from whom Stobæus compiled his eclogues.——A sophist, called also Ælius.——Valerius, a rhetorician of Alexandria, who flourished A. D. 360. He was the author of a Lexicon, derived principally from the ten Attic orators, and entitled, on that account, Λεξεις των δεκα ῥητορων. It is a very useful work. The latest edition is that published at Leipsic, in 1824, 2 vols. 8vo, by an anonymous editor.——Another, surnamed Caius.

HARPYIÆ, winged monsters, who had the face of a woman, the body of a vulture, and had their feet and fingers armed with sharp claws They were three in number, Aello, Ocypete, and Celeno, daughters of Neptune and Terra, or, according to others, of Thaumas and Electra. They were sent by Juno to plunder the tables of Phineus, whence they were driven to the islands called Strophades by Zethes and Calais. They emitted an intectious smell, and spoiled whatever they touched by their filth and excrements. They plundered Æneas during his voyage towards Italy, and predicted many of the calamities which attended him. According to Damm, the term Harpyia (Ἁρπυια) signifies properly a violent wind, carrying off what is exposed to its fury; in other words, a furious whirlwind: hence the fable of the harpies. To the vivid imagination of the Greek, the terrors of the storm were intimately associated with the idea of powerful and active demons directing its fury. The names given to the Harpies indicate this, viz. Harpyiæ, from ἁρπάζειν, Ocypeta rapid, Celeno, obscurity, and Aello, a storm. With Homer, the Harpies are goddesses, who carry off persons suddenly, unseen and unheard. Penelope, in her prayer to Diana, represents them as goddesses of the storm-winds, who dwell in the vicinity of the Furies, on the borders of Oceanus, near the opening that leads to the world of spirits. The mixed form commonly assigned them was the addition of a later age Virg. Æn. 3, 212. 6, 289.—Hesiod. Theog. 265.—Homer. Od. 1, 241. 14, 371. 2, &c. &c.

HARUDES, a people of Germany. Cæs. G. 1, 31.

HARUSPEX, a soothsayer at Rome, who drew omens by consulting the entrails of beasts that were sacrificed. He received the name of Aruspex, ab aris aspiciendis, and that of Extispex, ab exta inspiciendis. The order of Aruspices was first established at Rome by Romulus, and the first Haruspices were Tuscans by origin, as they were particularly famous in that branch of divination. They had received all their knowledge from a boy named Tages, who, as was commonly reported, sprang from a clod of earth. (Vid. Tages.) They were originally three, but the Roman senate yearly sent six noble youths, or, according to others, twelve, to Etruria, to be instructed in all the mysteries of the art. The office of the Haruspices consisted in observing these four particulars: the beast before it was sacrificed; its entrails; the flames which consumed the sacrifice; and the flour, frankincense, &c., which was used. If the beast was led up to the altar with difficulty, if it escaped from the conductor's hands, roared when it received the blow or died in agonies, the omen was unfortunate. But, on the contrary, if it followed without compulsion, received the blow without resistance, and died without groaning, and after much effusion of blood, the Haruspex foretold prosperity. When the body of the victim was opened, each part was scrupulously examined. If any thing was wanting, if it had a double liver, or a lean heart, the omen was unfortunate. If the entrails fell from the hands of the Haruspex, or seemed besmeared with too much blood, or if no heart appeared, as for instance it happened in the two victims which J. Cæsar offered a little before his death, the omen was equally unlucky. When the flame was quickly kindled, and when it violently consumed the sacrifice, and arose pure and bright, and like a pyramid, without any paleness, smoke, sparkling, or crackling, the omen was favourable. But the contrary augury was drawn, when the fire was kindled with difficulty, and was extinguished before the sacrifice was totally consumed, or when it rolled in circles round the victim with intermediate spaces between the flames. In regard to the frankincense, meal, water, and wine, if there was any deficiency in the quantity, if the colour was different, or the quality was changed, or if any thing was done with irregularity, it was deemed inauspicious. This custom of consulting the entrails of victims did not originate in Tuscany, but it was in use among the Chaldeans, Greeks, Egyptians, &c., and the more enlightened part of mankind well knew how to render it subservient to their wishes or tyranny. Agesilaus, when in Egypt, raised the drooping spirits of his soldiers by a superstitious artifice He secretly wrote in his hand the word νικη, victory, in large characters, and holding the entrails of a victim in his hand till the impression was communicated to the flesh, he showed it to the soldiers, and animated them by observing, that the gods signified their approaching victories even by marking it in the body of the sacrificed animals. Cic. de Div.

HASDRUBAL. Vid Asdrubal.

Q. HATERIUS, a patrician and orator at Rome under the first emperors. He died in the 90th year of his age. Tacit. Ann. 4, 61.——Agrippa, a senator in the age of Tiberius, hated by the tyrant for his independence. Tacit Ann. 6, 4.——Antonius, a dissipated senator, whose extravagance was supported by Nero. Id 13, 34.

HAUSTANES, a man who conspired with Bessus against Darius, &c. Curt. 8, 5.

HEBDÔLE. Vid Ebdome.

HEBE, a daughter of Jupiter and Juno. According to some she was the daughter of Juno only, who conceived her after eating lettuces. As she was fair, and always in the bloom of youth, she was called the goddess of youth, and made by her mother cup-bearer to all the gods. She was dismissed from her office by Jupiter, because she fell down in an indecent posture as she was pouring nectar to the gods at a grand Festival, and Ganymedes, the favourite of Jupiter, succeeded her as cup-bearer. She was employed by her mother to prepare her chariot, and to harness her peacocks whenever requisite. When Hercules was raised to the rank of a god, he was reconciled to Juno by marrying her daughter Hebe, by whom he had two sons, Alexiares and Anicetus As Hebe had the power of restoring gods and men to the vigour of youth, she, at the instance of her husband, performed that kind office to Iolas his friend. Hebe was worshipped at Sicyon, under the name of Dia, and at Rome under the name of Juventas. She is represented as a young virgin crowned with flowers, and arrayed in a variegated garment. Paus. 1, 19. 2, 12.—Ovid. Met. 9, 400. Fast. 6, 76. - Apollod. 1, 3. 2, 7.

HEBESUS, a Rutulian, killed in the night by Euryalus. Virg. Æn. 9, 344.

HEBRUS, now the Maritza, a river of Thrace, rising in the valleys between mount Hæmus and Rhodope, and falling by two mouths into the Ægean sea, nearly opposite the island of Samothrace. It was supposed to roll its waters upon golden sands. According to the ancient mythologists, after Orpheus had been torn in pieces by the Thracian Bacchantes, his head and lyre were cast into the Hebrus, and, being carried down that river to the sea, were borne by the waves to Methymna, in the island of Lesbos. The Methymneans buried the head of the unfortunate bard, and suspended the lyre in the temple of Apollo. Mela, 2, 2.—Strab. 7.—Virg. G. 4, 463. Æn. 12, 331.—Ovid. Met. 11, 50.——A youth of Lipara, beloved by Neobule. Horat Od. 3, 12. ——A man of Cyzicus, killed by Pollux. Flacc. 3, 149.——A friend of Æneas, son of Dolichaon, killed by Mezentius in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 10, 698.

HECAERGOS, a surname applied to Apollo and Diana, and expressive of the distance to which the rays of the luminaries over which they preside are darted.

HECALE, a poor old woman who kindly received Theseus as he was going against the bull of Marathon, or, according to others, against the Sarmatians. She died before his return, and the hero honoured her memory with the institution of a festival sacred to Jupiter, which she herself had vowed to the god. Her poverty and her great age became proverbial. Ovid. de Rem Am. 747.—Plin. 22, 22.—Plut. in Thes.——A town of Attica.

HECALESIA, a festival in honour of Jupiter of Hecale, instituted by Theseus, or in commemoration of the kindness of Hecale, which Theseus had experienced when he went against the bull of Marathon, &c.

HECAMEDE, a daughter of Arsinous, who fell to the lot of Nestor after the plunder of Tenedos by the Greeks. Homer. Il. 11, 623.

HECATÆ FANUM, a celebrated temple sacred to Hecate, near Stratonicea in Caria. Strab. 14.

HECATÆUS, an historian of Miletus, born 549 years before Christ, in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. Herod. 2, 143.——A native of Abdera, who accompanied Alexander the Great into Asia. He was a disciple of Pyrrho, the head of the sceptic school. He wrote a work on the antiquities of the Jews, cited under the title of Περὶ Ἰουδαίων βιβλίων, by Origen, and under that of Ἰουδαίων Ἱστορία, by Eusebius.——A native of Teos, supposed to have flourished about the ninetieth Olympiad ——A native of Crete, who wrote Περὶ Νόστων, "On the wanderings of the Grecian chieftains returning from Troy."

HECATE, a daughter of Perses and Asteria, the same as Proserpine or Diana. She was called Luna in heaven, Diana on earth, and Hecate or Proserpine in hell, whence her name of Dea triformis, bicorpor, tricaput. She was supposed to preside over magic and enchantments, and was generally represented like a woman with three heads, that of a horse, a dog, or a boar; and sometimes she appeared with three different bodies, and three different faces with only one neck. Dogs, lambs, and honey, were generally offered to her, especially in highways and cross roads, whence she obtained the name of Trivia. Her power was extended over heaven, the earth, sea, and hell; and to her, kings and nations supposed themselves indebted for their prosperity. Ovid. Met. 7, 94.—Hesiod. Theog. 410, &c.—Horat. Od. 3, 22.—Paus 2, 22.—Virg. Æn. 4, 511.

HECATESIA, a yearly festival observed by the Stratonicensians in honour of Hecate. The Athenians paid also particular worship to this goddess, who was deemed the patroness of families and of children. From this circumstance, the statues of the goddess were erected before the doors of the houses, and upon every new moon a public supper was always provided at the expense of the richest people, and set in the streets, where the poorest of the citizens were permitted to retire and feast upon it, while they reported that Hecate had devoured it. This supper was served up in a place where three ways met, in allusion to the triple nature of the goddess. There were also expiatory offerings to supplicate the goddess to remove whatever evils might impend on the head of the public, &c.

HECATO, a native of Rhodes, pupil to Panætius. He wrote on the duties of man, &c. Cic. Off. 3, 15.

HECATOMBŒUS, a surname given to Jupiter, Neptune, and Apollo, as likewise that of Hecatombœa to Juno, because Hecatombs were particularly offered to their divinity. The festival in honour of Juno was celebrated on the first of July, whence that month was called Hecatombœon.

HECATOMBOIA, a festival celebrated in honour of Juno by the Argians, and by the Æginensians, who were a colony from Argos. It derived its name from ἑκατόμβη, which signifies a sacrifice of an hundred oxen; it being usual on the first day of this solemnity to offer so many to Juno, the remains of which were distributed among the citizens. There were also public games first instituted by Archinus, a king of Argos, in which the prizes were a brazen shield and a crown of myrtle. There was likewise an annual sacrifice called by this name in Laconia, and offered for the preservation of the hundred cities which once flourished in that country.

HECATOMPHONIA, from ἑκατὸν, centum, and φονεύω, occido, a solemn sacrifice offered by the Messenians to Jupiter, when any of them had killed one hundred enemies. Paus. 4, 16.—Ælian.

HECATOMPOLIS, an epithet applied to Crete, from the hundred cities which it once contained. The same epithet was also given to Laconia.

HECATOMPYLOS, an epithet applied to Thebes in Egypt, on account of its hundred gates. Ammian. 22, 16.——The capital of Parthia, and royal residence of the Arsacidæ, situated in the district of Comisene. It is now called Damghan. Ptol. 6, 5.—Strab. 11.—Plin. 6, 15 et 25.

HECATONNESI, several small islands between Lesbos and the continent of Europe. Strabo reckons twenty, and observes that the name of Hecatonnesi was applied to the group, from Hecatus, or Apollo, the deity most revered throughout the adjoining country. Herodotus, however, writes the name Ἑκατὸν Νῆσοι, as if it was formed from the numerical adjective; and this derivation is more simple and probable than that of Strabo. The modern appellation of these islands is Musco-nisi. Strab. 13.—Herod. 1, 151.

HECTOR, son of king Priam and Hecuba, was the most valiant of all the Trojan chiefs that fought against the Greeks. He married Andromache the daughter of Eetion, by whom he had Astyanax. He was appointed captain of all the Trojan forces, when Troy was besieged by the Greeks; and the valour with which he behaved, showed how well qualified he was to discharge that important office. He engaged with the bravest of the Greeks, and, according to Hyginus, no less than thirty-one of the most valiant of the enemy perished by his hand. When Achilles had driven back the Trojans towards the city, Hector, too great to fly, waited the approach of his enemy near the Scean gate, though his father and mother, with tears in their eyes, blamed his rashness, and entreated him to retire. The sight of Achilles terrified him, and he fled before him in the plain. The Greek pursued to the source of the Scamander, and making a signal to his troops not to molest him in his career of victory, he attacked his enemy, and perceiving an unprotected part in his cuirass, he directed his spear with powerful aim to the vulnerable spot. Jupiter held, says Homer, in his hand the immortal balance which was to decide the destinies of Hector and of Troy; the fate of Achilles preponderates, and the son of Priam receives the fatal blow. The fallen hero was not only spoiled of his arms, but the conqueror, with a barbarity peculiar to the times, pierced his feet, and with a thong tied him to his chariot, and with insulting triumph drove himself three times round the tomb of Patroclus, whilst the dishonoured head of Hector was dragged in the dust. The body, though it had received the grossest insult, was yet preserved by the gods from putrefaction and from a mangled appearance, till it was ransomed by old Priam, and the Trojans obtained from the Greeks a truce of some days to pay the last offices to the greatest of their leaders. The Thebans boasted in the age of the geographer Pausanias, that they had the ashes of Hector preserved in an urn, by order of an oracle; which promised them undisturbed felicity if they were in possession of that hero's remains. The epithet of Hectoreus is applied by the poets to the Trojans, as best expressive of valour and intrepidity. Homer. Il. 2, 3, 6, 8, 10, 11, 12, &c.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Ovid. Met 12 et 13.—Dictys Cret.—Dares Phryg.—Hygin. fab. 90 et 112.—Paus. 3 et 9, 14.—Quintil. Smyrn. 1 et 3. A son of Parmenio poisoned in the Nile. Alexander honoured his funerals with a magnificent funeral. Curt. 4, 5. 6, 9.

HECUBA, daughter of Dymas a Phrygian prince, or, according to others, of Cisseus, a Thracian king, was the second wife of Priam king of Troy, and proved the chastest of women, and the most tender and unfortunate of mothers. When she was pregnant of Paris, she dreamed that she had brought into the world a burning torch which had reduced her husband's palace and all Troy to ashes. So alarming a dream was explained by the soothsayers, who declared that the son whom she should bring into the world would prove the ruin of his country. When Paris was born she exposed him on mount Ida to avert the calamities which threatened her family; but her attempts to destroy him were fruitless, and the prediction of the soothsayers was fulfilled. (Vid. Paris.) During the Trojan war she saw the greatest part of her children perish by the hands of the enemy, and like a mother she confessed her grief by her tears and lamentations, particularly at the death of Hector her eldest son. When Troy was taken, Hecuba, as one of the captives, fell to the lot of Ulysses, a man whom she hated for his perfidy and avarice, and she embarked with the conquerors for Greece. The Greeks landed in the Thracian Chersonesus, to load with fresh honours the grave of Achilles. During their stay she hero's ghost appeared to them and demanded to ensure the safety of their return, the sacrifice of Polyxena, Hecuba's daughter. They complied, and Polyxena was torn from her mother to be sacrificed. Hecuba was inconsolable, and her grief was still more increased at the sight of the body of her son Polydorus washed on the shore, who had been recommended by his father to the care and humanity of Polymnestor king of the country. (Vid. Polydorus.) She determined to revenge the death of her son, and with the greatest indignation went to the house of his murderer and tore his eyes, and attempted to deprive him of his life. She was hindered from executing her bloody purpose, by the arrival of some Thracians, and she fled with the female companions of her captivity. She was pursued, and when she ran after the stones that were thrown at her, she found herself suddenly changed into a bitch, and when she attempted to speak, found that she could only bark. After this metamorphosis, she threw herself into the sea, according to Hyginus, and that place was, from that circumstance, called Cyneum. (Vid. Cynosema.) Hecuba had a great number of children by Priam, among whom were Hector, Paris, Delphobus, Pammon, Helenus, Polites, Antiphon, Hipponous, Polydorus, Troilus, and among the daughters, Creusa, Ilione, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. *Homer. HEDYMELES, an admired musician in Domitian's age. The word signifies sweet music. Juv. 6, 381.

HEGELOCHUS, a general of 6000 Athenians sent to Mantinea to stop the progress of Epaminondas. Diod. 15.——An Egyptian general who flourished B. C. 128.

HEGEMON, a Thasian poet in the age of Alcibiades. He wrote a poem called Gigantomachia, besides other works. Ælian. V. H. 4, 11.——Another poet who wrote a poem on the battle of Leuctra, &c. Ælian. V. H. 8, 11.

HEGESIANAX, an historian of Alexandria, who wrote an account of the Trojan war.

HEGESIAS, a tyrant of Ephesus under the patronage of Alexander. Polyæn. 6.——A philosopher of Cyrene, who so eloquently convinced his auditors of their failings and follies, and persuaded them that there were no dangers after death, that many were guilty of suicide. Ptolemy forbade him to continue his doctrines. Cic. Tusc. 1, 34.——A native of Magnesia, who wrote an historical work on the companions in arms of Alexander the Great. His style was loaded with puerile accounts, and betrayed a total want of taste. He wrote also some discourses, which are lost. The ancients regarded him as the parent of that species of eloquence denominated the Asiatic, and which had taken the place of the simple and the elegant Attic. Dion Hal. de Struct. Oral. 18.—Cic. Orat. 67, 69. Brut. 83.

HEGESILOCHUS, one of the chief magistrates of Rhodes in the reign of Alexander and his father Philip.——Another, native of Rhodes, 171 years before the Christian era He engaged his countrymen to prepare a fleet of forty ships to assist the Romans against Perseus king of Macedonia.

HEGESINUS, a philosopher of Pergamus, of the second academy. He flourished B. C. 193.

HEGESIPPUS, an historian who wrote on the antiquities of Pallene, a peninsula of Thrace, where Æneas was supposed to have taken refuge after the capture of Troy. He made the Trojan chief to have ended his days here. Dion. Hal. Ant. Rom. 1, 49 et 72 ——A comic poet, a native of Tarentum, surnamed Crobylus (Κρωβύλος), or "Toupee," from his peculiar manner of wearing his hair. His pieces have not reached us; we have eight epigrams ascribed to him, which are remarkable for their simplicity.——An ecclesiastical historian, who died at Rome about A. D. 180. He wrote a history of the church from the beginning of the Christian era to his own time; but only some fragments of it are extant in Eusebius.

HEGESIPYLE, a daughter of Olorus king of Thrace, who married Miltiades, and became mother of Cimon Plut.

HEGESISTRATUS, an Ephesian who consulted the oracle to know in what particular place he should fix his residence. He was directed to settle where he found peasants dancing with crowns of olive. This was in Asia, where he founded Elea, &c.

HEGESTORIDES, a Thasian, who, upon seeing his country besieged by the Athenians, and a law forbidding any one on pain of death to speak of peace, went to the market-place with a rope about his neck, and boldly told his countrymen to treat him as they pleased, provided they saved the city from the calamities which the continuation of the war seemed to threaten The Thasians were awakened, the law was abrogated, and Hegetorides pardoned, &c. Polyæn 2.

HELENA, the most beautiful woman of her age, sprung from one of the eggs which Leda, the wife of king Tyndarus, brought forth after her amour with Jupiter metamorphosed into a swan. (Vid. Leda.) According to some authors, Helen was daughter of Nemesis by Jupiter, and Leda was only her nurse; and to reconcile this variety of opinions some imagine that Nemesis and Leda are the same persons. Her beauty was so universally admired, even in her infancy, that Theseus, with his friend Pirithous, carried her away before she had attained her tenth year, and concealed her at Aphidnæ, under the care of his mother Æthra. Her brothers, Castor and Pollux, recovered her by force of arms, and she returned safe and unpolluted to Sparta, her native country. There existed, however, a tradition recorded by Pausanias, that Helen was of nubile years when carried away by Theseus, and that she had a daughter by her ravisher, who was entrusted to the care of Clytemnestra. This violence offered to her virtue did not in the least diminish, but it rather augmented, her fame, and her hand was eagerly solicited by the young princes of Greece. The most celebrated of her suitors were Ulysses, son of Laertes, Antilochus, son of Nestor, Sthenelus, son of Capaneus, Diomedes, son of Tydeus, Amphilochus, son of Cteatus, Meges, son of Phileus, Agapenor, son of Anceus, Thalpius, son of Eurytus, Menestheus, son of Peteus, Schedius, son of Epistrophus, Polyxenus, son of Agasthenes, Amphilochus, son of Amphiaraus, Ascalaphus and Ialmus, sons of the god Mars, Ajax, son of Oileus, Eumelus, son of Admetus, Polypœtes, son of Pirithous, Elphenor, son of Chalcodon, Podalirius and Machaon, sons of Æsculapius, Leonteus, son of Coronus, Philoctetes, son of Pœan, Protesilaus, son of Iphiclus, Eurypilus, son of Evemon, Ajax and Teucer, sons of Telamon, Patroclus, son of Menœtius, Menelaus, son of Atreus, Thoas, Idomeneus, and Merion. Tyndarus was rather alarmed than pleased at the sight of such a number of illustrious princes who eagerly solicited each to become his son-in-law. He knew that he could not prefer one without displeasing all the rest, and from this perplexity he was at last liberated by the artifice of Ulysses, who began to be already known in Greece by his prudence and sagacity. This prince, who clearly saw that his pretensions to Helen would not probably meet with success in opposition to so many rivals, proposed to extricate Tyndarus from all his difficulties, if he would promise him his niece Penelope in marriage. Tyndarus consented, and Ulysses advised the king to bind, by a solemn oath, all the suitors, that they would approve of the uninfluenced choice which Helen should make of one among them; and engage to unite together to defend her person and character, if ever any attempts were made to ravish her from the arms of her husband. The advice of Ulysses was followed, the princes consented, and Helen fixed her choice upon Menelaus and married him. Hermione was the early fruit of this union, which continued for three years with mutual happiness. After this, Paris, son of Priam king of Troy, came to Lacedæmon on pretence of sacrificing to Apollo. He was kindly received by Menelaus, but shamefully abused his favours, and in his absence in Crete, he corrupted the fidelity of his wife Helen, and persuaded her to follow him to Troy, B. C. 1193. At his return, Menelaus, highly sensible of the injury which he had received, assembled the Grecian princes, and reminded the sons of their solemn promises. They resolved to make war against the Trojans; but they previously sent ambassadors to Priam to demand the restitution of Helen. The influence of Paris at his father's court prevented the restoration, and the Greeks returned home without receiving the satisfaction which they required. Soon after their return, their combined forces assembled, and sailed for the coast of Asia. The behaviour of Helen during the Trojan war is not clearly known. Some assert that she had willingly followed Paris, and that she warmly supported the cause of the Trojans; while others believe that she always sighed after her husband, and cursed the day in which she had proved faithless to his bed. Homer represents her as in the last instance, and some have added that she often betrayed the schemes and resolutions of the Trojans, and secretly favoured the cause of Greece.

When Paris was killed in the ninth year of the war, she voluntarily married Deiphobus, one of Priam's sons, and when Troy was taken she made no scruple to betray him, and to introduce the Greeks into his chamber, to ingratiate herself with Menelaus. She returned to Sparta, and the love of Menelaus forgave the errors which she had committed. Some however say that she obtained her life even with difficulty from her husband, whose resentment she had kindled by her infidelity. After she had lived for some years at Sparta, Menelaus died, and she was driven away from Peloponnesus by Megapenthes and Nicostratus, the illegitimate sons of her husband, and she retired to Rhodes, where at that time Polyxo, a native of Argos, reigned over the country. Polyxo remembered that her widowhood originated in Helen, and that her husband Tlepolemus had been killed in the Trojan war, which had been caused by the debaucheries of Helen, therefore she meditated revenge. While Helen retired one day to bathe in the river, Polyxo disguised her attendants in the habits of Furies and sent them with orders to murder her enemy. Helen was tied to a tree and strangled, and her misfortunes were afterwards remembered, and the crimes of Polyxo expiated by the temple which the Rhodians raised to Helen Dendritus, or tied to a tree. There is a tradition mentioned by Herodotus, which says that Paris was driven, as he returned from Sparta, upon the coast of Egypt, where Proteus, king of the country, expelled him from his dominions for his ingratitude to Menelaus, and confined Helen. From that circumstance, therefore, Priam informed the Grecian ambassadors that neither Helen nor her possessions were in Troy, but in the hands of the king of Egypt. In spite of this assertion the Greeks besieged the town and took it after ten years' siege, and Menelaus by visiting Egypt, as he returned home, recovered Helen at the court of Proteus, and was convinced that the Trojan war had been undertaken upon very unjust and unpardonable grounds. Helen was honoured after death as a goddess, and the Spartans built her a temple at Therapne, which had the power of giving beauty to all the deformed women that entered it. Helen, according to some, was carried into the island of Leuce after death, where she married Achilles, who had been one of her warmest admirers.—The age of Helen has been a matter of deep inquiry among the chronologists. If she was born of the same eggs as Castor and Pollux, who accompanied the Argonauts, in their expedition against Colchis, about thirty-five years before the Trojan war, according to some, she was no less than sixty years old when Troy was reduced to ashes, supposing that her brothers were only fifteen when they embarked with the Argonauts. But she is represented by Homer so incomparably beautiful during the siege of Troy, that though seen at a distance she influenced the counsellors of Priam by the brightness of her charms; therefore we must suppose with others, that her beauty remained long undiminished, and was extinguished only at her death. Paus. 3, 19, &c.—Apollod. 3, 10, &c.—*Hygin. As she was going to be married, because the lot had fallen upon her, an eagle came and carried away the knife of the priest, upon which she was released, and the barbarous custom of offering human victims was abolished.—A daughter of the emperor Constantine who married Julian.—The mother of Constantine. She was born at Drepanum in Bithynia, where she was engaged in the obscure employment of inn-keeeper. Constantius Chlorus saw, and loved her, but his marriage with her was some time after followed by a divorce, when he was elevated to the imperial dignity. After the accession of her son to the purple, Helena was drawn from her obscurity, and merited the high rank which she held in the empire by the liberality of her conduct, the humanity of her character, and the virtues of her private and public life. She died in her eightieth year, A. D. 328.—An island in the Ægean, north-east of Sunium, and opposite to Thoricos. It received its name from the circumstance of Paris's having landed on it, as was said, in company with Helena, when they were fleeing from Sparta. Strabo, who follows Artemidorus, conceived it was the Cranae of Homer. Pliny calls it Macris. The modern name is Macronnus. Strab, 9 et 10.—Homer. Il. 3, 444.—Plin. 4, 20.

HELENIA, a festival in Laconia, in honour of Helen, who received there divine honours. It was celebrated by virgins riding upon mules, or in chariots made of reeds and rushes.

HELENOR, a Lydian prince who accompanied Æneas to Italy, and was killed by the Rutulians. His mother's name was Licymnia Virg. Æn. 9, 544, &c.

HELENUS, a celebrated soothsayer, son of Priam and Hecuba, greatly respected by all the Trojans. When Deiphobus was given in marriage to Helen in preference to himself, he resolved to leave his country, and he retired to mount Ida, where Ulysses took him prisoner by the advice of Calchas. As he was well acquainted with futurity, the Greeks made use of prayers, threats, and promises, to induce him to reveal the secrets of the Trojans, and either the fear of death or gratification of resentment, seduced him to disclose to the enemies of his country, that Troy could not be taken whilst it was in possession of the Palladium, nor before Philoctetes came from his retreat at Lemnos, and assisted to support the siege. After the ruin of his country, he fell to the share of Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, and saved his life by warning him to avoid the dangerous tempest which in reality proved fatal to all those who set out. This endeared him to Pyrrhus, and he received from his hand Andromache the widow of his brother Hector, by whom he had a son called Cestrinus. This marriage, according to some, was consummated after the death of Pyrrhus, who lived with Andromache as his wife. Helenus was the only one of Priam's sons who survived the ruin of his country. After the death of Pyrrhus, he reigned over part of Epirus, which he called Chaonia in memory of his brother Chaon, whom he had inadvertently killed. Helenus received Æneas as he voyaged towards Italy, and foretold him some of the calamities which attended his fleet. The manner in which he received the gift of prophecy is doubtful. HELERNI LUCUS, a place near Rome. Ovid. Fast. 6, 105.

HELES or HALES, a river of Lucania near Velia. Cic. ad Att. 16, 7. Fam. 7, 20.

HELIADES, the daughters of the sun and Clymene. They were three in number, Lampetie, Phaetusa, and Lampethusa; or seven, according to Hyginus, Merope, Helie, Ægle, Lampetie, Phœbe, Ætheria, and Dioxippe. They were so afflicted at the death of their brother Phaeton, (Vid. Phaeton,) that they were changed by the gods into poplars, and their tears into precious amber, on the banks of the river Po. Ovid. Met. 2, 340.—Hygin. fab. 154.——The first inhabitants of Rhodes. This island being covered with mud when the world was first created, was warmed by the cherishing beams of the sun, and from thence sprang seven men, who were called Heliades, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡλίου from the sun. The eldest of these, called Ochimus, married Hegetoria, one of the nymphs of the island, and his brothers fled from the country for having put to death, through jealousy, one of their number. Diod. 5.

HELIASTÆ, a name given to the judges of the most numerous tribunal at Athens. Of all the courts which took cognizance of civil affairs, the Ἡλιαία was the most celebrated and frequented. It derived its name, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁλίζεσθαι, from the thronging of the people; or, according to others, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡλίου, from the sun, because it was an open place, and exposed to the sun's rays. The judges who sat in this court were at least fifty, but generally two or five hundred. When causes of importance were to be tried, it was customary to summon all the judges of the other courts. Sometimes one thousand were called in, and then two courts were joined, sometimes fifteen hundred or two thousand, and then three or four courts met; and the number of the Heliasts has been sometimes increased by this means to six thousand. They took cognizance of affairs of the highest importance. They were summoned by the Thesmothetæ, before whom they took a solemn oath, which is preserved in the oration of Demosthenes against Timocrates. They sat from sunrise to sunset. Pollux, 8, 11.

HELICAON, a Trojan prince, son of Antenor. He married Laodice, the daughter of Priam, whose form Iris assumed to inform Helen of the state of the rival armies before Troy. Helicaon was wounded in a night engagement, but his life was spared by Ulysses, who remembered the hospitality which he had received from his father Antenor. Homer. Il 2, 123.

HELICE, a star near the north pole, generally called Ursa Major. It is supposed to receive its name from the town of Helice, of which Callisto, who was changed into the Great Bear, was an inhabitant. Lucan. 2, 527.——A city of Achaia, situate on the shore of the Sinus Corinthiacus, near Bura. It was celebrated for the worship of Neptune, thence surnamed Heliconius, and as being the place where the Ionians when in possession of Achaia held their general council. It was destroyed by a prodigious influx of the sea, caused by a violent earthquake, B.C. 373. It was said that some vestiges of the submerged city were to be seen long after the fearful event took place. Herod. 1, 46.—Paus. 7, 24.—Strab. 8.—Ovid. Met. 15, 293.——A daughter of Silenus, king of Ægiale, who married Ion son of Xuthus. Paus. 7, 24.——A daughter of Lycaon, king of Arcadia.

HELICON, now Palæovouni or Zagora, a mountain in Bœotia, on the borders of Phocis, sacred to Apollo and the Muses, who were thence called Heliconiades. It was famous for the pureness of its air, the abundance of its waters, its fertile valleys, the coolness of its shades, and the beauty of the venerable trees which clothed its sides. On its summit was the grove of the Muses, adorned with several statues; and hard by were the fountain Aganippe, the source of the small river Permessus, and Hippocrene, or the horse's fountain, which burst forth from the ground when struck by the horse Pegasus. Here too was the fountain Hedonacon, where Narcissus, becoming enamoured of his own reflection, and thinking it the nymph of the place, was drowned. Strab. 9.—Paus. 9, 28, &c.—Ovid Met 2, 219.—Virg. Æn. 7, 641. 10, 163. Georg. 3, 11 et 291.——A river of Macedonia, which ran near Dium, and after having pursued a course of 25 stadia, lost itself under ground for the space of 25 stadia, and on its re appearance assumed the name of Baphyrus. It is now called the Mauro nero. Paus. 9, 30.——A river of Sicily, falling into the Tyrrhene sea, opposite the Lipari isles.

HELICONIADES, a name given to the Muses because they lived upon mount Helicon, which was sacred to them.

HELICONIS, a daughter of Thespius. Apollod.

HELIODORUS, one of the favourites of Seleucus Philopator, king of Syria. He attempted to plunder the temple of the Jews, about, 176 years before Christ, by order of his master, &c.——A Greek poet, sixteen hexameters of whose are cited by Stobæus, containing a description of that part of Campania situate between the Lucrine lake and Puteoli, and where Cicero had a country residence.——An Athenian physician, of whom Galen makes mention, and who also wrote a didactic poem, under the title of Ἀνολυτικά, "Justification," of which Galen cites seven hexametors.——A rhetorician, surnamed the Arabian, contemporary with Philostratus.——A mathematician of Larissa, in the reign of Tiberius, author of a treatise on optics, of which some fragments are extant.——A famous sophist, born at Emessa in Phœnicia in the age of Theodosius, and made bishop of Trica in Thessaly. He is particularly known for his romance in ten books, called Æthiopica, or the history of the loves of Theagenes and Charicles. Some suppose that the author of the Æthiopica was not the bishop of Trica. The best edition of this entertaining work is that of Coray, 2 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1804.

HELIOGABALUS, a deity among the Phœnicians.——M. Aurelius Antoninus, a Roman emperor, son of Varius Marcellus, called Heliogabalus, because he had been priest of that divinity in Phœnicia. After the death of Macrinus, he was invested with the imperial purple, and the senate, however unwilling to submit to a youth only fourteen years of age, approved of his election, and bestowed upon him the title of Augustus. Heliogabalus made his grandmother Mœsa, and his mother Semias, his colleagues on the throne; and to bestow more dignity upon the sex, he chose a senate of women, over which his mother presided, and prescribed all the modes and fashions which prevailed in the empire. Rome however soon displayed a scene of cruelty and debauchery; the imperial palace was full of prostitution, and the most infamous of the populace became the favourites of the prince. He raised his horse to the honours of the consulship, and obliged his subjects to pay adoration to the god Heliogabalus, which was no other than a large black stone, whose figure resembled that of a cone. To this ridiculous deity temples were raised at Rome, and the altars of the gods plundered to deck those of the new divinity. In the midst of his extravagances, Heliogabalus married four wives, and not satisfied with following the plain laws of nature, he professed himself to be a woman, and gave himself up to one of his officers, called Hierocles. In this ridiculous farce he suffered the greatest indignities from his pretended husband without dissatisfaction, and Hierocles, by stooping to infamy, became the most powerful of the favourites, and enriched himself by selling favours and offices to the people. Such licentiousness soon displeased the populace, and Heliogabalus, unable to appease the seditions of his soldiers, whom his rapacity and debaucheries had irritated, hid himself in the filth and excrements of the camp, where he was found in the arms of his mother. His head was severed from his body, the 10th of March, A. D. 222, in the 18th year of his age, after a reign of three years, nine months, and four days. He was succeeded by Alexander Severus. His cruelties were as conspicuous as his licentiousness. He burdened his subjects with the most oppressive taxes, his halls were covered with carpets of gold and silver tissue, and his mats were made with the down of hares, and with the soft feathers which were found under the wings of partridges. He was fond of covering his shoes with precious stones, to draw the admiration of the people as he walked along the streets, and he was the first Roman who ever wore a dress of silk. He often invited the most common of the people to share his banquets, and made them sit down on large bellows full of wind, which, by suddenly emptying themselves, threw the guests on the ground, and left them a prey to wild beasts. He often tied some of his favourites on a large wheel, and was particularly delighted to see them whirled round like Ixions, and sometimes suspended in the air, or sunk beneath the water.

HELIOPOLIS, a city of Egypt, situate a little to the east of the apex of the Delta, not far from the present Cairo. It was called Heliopolis by the Greeks, and Bethshemesh by the Hebrews, both of which names, as well as its Egyptian one of On, imply the city or house of the sun. The inhabitants of this city are represented by Herodotus as the wisest of the Egyptians; and here Moses resided, and received that education which made him "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians." But, notwithstanding its being the seat of the sciences, such were its egregious idolatries, that it was named Aven, or Beth-Aven "the house of vanity," or idolatry by the Jews. A village standing on part of its site, at the present day, is called Matarieh; while the spring of excellent water, or fountain of the sun, which is supposed to have given rise to the city, is still called Ain Shems, or fountain of the Sun, by the Arabs. This is one of the most ancient cities of the world of which any distinct vestige can now be traced. It was visited eighteen hundred and fifty years ago by Strabo, whose description proves it to have been nearly as desolate then as now. Most of the ruins of this once famous city, described by that geographer, are buried in the accumulation of the soil; but that which marks its site, and is, perhaps, the most ancient work at this time existing in the world, is a perfect shaft is a column of red granite, 70 feet high, and covered with hieroglyphics. Strab. 17.—Reland. 2, 3.——A city of Syria, south-west of Emesa, on the opposite side of the Orontes. It was celebrated for its temple of the sun, said to have been built by Antoninus Pius. Its modern name is Baalbec. Plin. 5, 22.

HELLE, a daughter of Athamas and Nephele, sister to Phryxus. She fled from her father's house, with her brother, to avoid the cruel oppression of her mother-in-law, Ino. According to some accounts, she was carried through the air on a golden ram, which her mother had received from Neptune, and in her passage she became giddy, and fell from her seat into that part of the sea which from her received the name of Hellespont. Others say that she was carried on a cloud, or rather upon a ship, from which she fell into the sea and was drowned. HELLEN, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, reigned in Phthiotis about 1495 years before the Christian era, and gave the name of Hellenians to his subjects. He had by his wife Orseis, three sons; Æolus, Dorus, and Xuthus, who gave their names to the three different nations known under the name of Æolians, Dorians, and Ionians. These last derive their name from Ion, son of Xuthus, and from the difference either of expression, or pronunciation in their respective languages, arose the different dialects well known in the Greek language. Paus. 8, 20. 7, 1.—Dod 5.

HELLENES, a name first given to the subjects of Hellen, but afterwards a general appellation for the people of Greece. The word occurs only once in Homer (Il. 2, 684), and is used not as a generic, but as a specific name for the inhabitants of that part of Thessaly called Hellas.

HELLESPONTIAS, a wind blowing from the north-east. Plin. 2, 47.

HELLESPONTUS, a narrow strait between the

Thracian Chersonesus in Europe and the district Dardania in Asia, which received its name from Helle, who was drowned there in her voyage to Colchis. (Vid. Helle.) The narrowness and length of this channel, together with the sinuosities of its shores, and the rapid and powerful current which is constantly flowing through them, are sufficient reasons to justify Homer in the epithets of πλατὺς, broad, and ἀπείρων, boundless, which he applies to it, if we regard the epithets as bestowed upon what might be viewed rather as a mighty river than a winding arm of the sea. The Hellespont is celebrated for the love and death of Leander. (Vid. Hero, and Leander.) It is famed also for the bridge of boats thrown across it by Xerxes, from Sestus to Abydus, which was no sooner completed than it was rent in pieces and utterly destroyed by a great tempest. When Xerxes heard of this, he was so enraged, that he ordered three hundred lashes to be inflicted on the Hellespont, a pair of fetters to be thrown into it, and executioners to brand it with marks of ignominy. Moreover, he commanded those who had the inflicting of the lashes, to harangue the Hellespont in a set speech, by which the sea was informed that Xerxes, its master, condemned it to that punishment for having injured him without a cause, and that the king of the Persians would pass over it, whether it consented or not. But the vengeance of this silly monarch was not finally appeased till all those who had presided over the construction of the bridge had been put to death. The length of the Hellespont, from the Ægean sea to Callipolis on the shores of the Propontis, is 33 miles, and its narrowest breadth about seven stadia. Its modern name, Channel of the Dardanelles, was first used by the Greeks of the middle ages, who derived it from the district of Dardania, but it is rendered more familiar by the two castles, called The Dardanelles, built by Mahomet IV. A.D. 1657, a little to the south of Sestus and Abydus. Homer Il. 2, 86. 94, 98 et 845. —Lucan. 2, 672.—*Juv. HELLOPIA, a district of Fulcœa, in which Histiæa was situated. Strab. 10

HELLOTIA, two festivals, one of which was observed in Crete, in honour of Europa, whose bones were then carried in solemn procession with a myrtle garland no less than twenty cubits in circumference, called ἁλλῶτις. The other festival was celebrated in Corinth with games and races, where young men entered the lists, and generally ran with burning torches in their hands. It was instituted in honour of Minerva, surnamed Hellotis ἀπὸ τοῦ ἕλους, from a certain pond of Marathon, where one of her statues was erected, or ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁλεῖν τὸν ἵππον τὸν Πήγασον, because by her assistance Bellerophon took and managed the horse Pegasus, which was the original cause of the institution of the festival. Others derive the name from Hellotis, a Corinthian woman, from the following circumstance: when the Dorians and the Heraclidæ invaded Peloponnesus, they took and burned Corinth; the inhabitants, and particularly the women, escaped by flight, except Hellotis and her sister Eurytome, who took shelter in Minerva's temple, relying for safety upon the sanctity of the place. When this was known, the Dorians set fire to the temple, and the two sisters perished in the flames. This wanton cruelty was followed by a dreadful plague; and the Dorians, to alleviate the misfortunes which they suffered, were directed by the oracle to appease the manes of the two sisters, and therefore they raised a new temple to the goddess Minerva and established, the festivals, which bore the name of one of the unfortunate women.

HELNES, an ancient king of Arcadia, &c. Polyæn. 1.

HELORIS, a general of the people of Rhegium, sent to besiege Messana, which Dionysius the tyrant defended. He fell in battle, and his troops were defeated. Diod. 14

HELORUS, a river of Sicily, near the southern extremity of the inland, now the Abisso. It is mentioned by several of the ancient poets, on account of the remarkably fertile country through which it flows. Silius Italicus gives it the epithet of clamosus, referring either to the noise of its waters in the numerous caverns found along its banks, or to the laments occasioned by its inundations of the neighbourhood. Virg. Æn. 3, 699. Ovid. Fast 4, 467, &c.—Sil. Ital. 14, 270. ——A town of Sicily, near the mouth of the river Helorus. Its ruins are called Muri Veci.

HELOS, a place of Arcadia. Paus. 8, 36 ——A town of Laconia, taken and destroyed by the Lacedæmonians under Agis III., of the race of the Heraclidæ, because they refused to pay the tribute which was imposed upon them. The Lacedæmonians carried their resentment so far, that, not satisfied with the ruin of the city, they reduced the inhabitants to the lowest and most miserable slavery, and made a law which forbade their masters either to give them their liberty, or to sell them in any other country. To complete their infamy, all the slaves of the state and the prisoners of war were called by the disgraceful appellation of Helotæ. Not only the servile offices in which they were employed denoted their misery and slavery, but they were obliged to wear peculiar garments, which exposed them to greater contempt and ridicule. They never were instructed in the liberal arts, and their cruel masters often obliged them to drink to excess, to show the freeborn citizens of Sparta the beastliness and disgrace of intoxication. They once every year received a number of stripes, that by this wanton flagellation they might recollect that they were born and died slaves. The Spartans even declared war against them; but Plutarch, who, from interested motives, endeavours to palliate the guilt and cruelty of the people of Lacedæmon, declares that it was because they had assisted the Messenians in their war against Sparta, after it had been overthrown by a violent earthquake. This earthquake was supposed by all the Greeks to be a punishment from heaven for the cruelties which the Lacedæmonians had exercised against the Helots. In the Peloponnesian war, these miserable slaves behaved with uncommon bravery, and were rewarded with their liberty by the Lacedæmonians, and appeared in the temples and at public shows crowned with garlands, and with every mark of festivity and triumph This exultation did not continue long, and the sudden disappearance of these two thousand manumitted slaves was attributed to the inhumanity of the Lacedæmonians. Thucyd. 4.—Pollux. 3, 8.—Strab 8.—Plut. in Lyc. &c.—Aristot Polit. 2.—Paus Lacon. &c.

HELOTES and HELŌTES, the public slaves of Sparta, &c Vid Helos

HELVETIA, a vestal virgin, struck dead with lightning in Trajan's reign.

HELVETII, an ancient nation of Gaul, conquered by J. Cæsar. Their country was bounded on the north and east by the Rhenus, on the west by mount Jura, and on the south by the Rhodanus and the Lacus Lemanus. It corresponded generally to the present Suntzerland, but was contained within narrower limits. Cæs. Bell. G. 1, &c — Tacit. Hist. 1. 67 et 69.

HELVIA, the mother of Cicero.

HELVIDIA, the name of a Roman family.

HELVII, a people of Gaul, north of the Arecomi, on the western side of the Rhodanus. Their capital was called Alba Augusta, now Viviers. Their country answers to the modern Vivarez. Plin. 3, 4

HELVILLUM, a town of Umbria, supposed to be the same as Sullium, now Sigillo. Plin. 3, 14.

HELVINA, a fountain of Aquinum, where Ceres had a temple. Juv 3, 320.

HELVIUS CINNA proposed a law, which however was not passed, to permit Cæsar to marry whatever woman he chose. Suet. in Cæs. 52.—— A poet. Vid. Cinna.

HELYMUS and PANOPES, two hunters at the court of Acestes in Sicily. Virg. Æn 5, 73, &c.

HEMATHION, a son of Aurora and Cephalus, or Tithonus. Apollod. 3.

HEMITHEA, a daughter of Cycnus and Procleа She was so attached to her brother Tenes, that she refused to abandon him when his father Cycnus exposed him on the sea. They were carried by the wind to Tenedos, where Hemithea long enjoyed tranquillity, till Achilles, captivated by her charms, offered her violence She was rescued from his embrace by her brother Tenes, who was instantly slaughtered by the offended hero. Hemithea could not have been rescued from the attempts of Achilles, had not the earth opened and swallowed her after she had fervently entreated the assistance of the gods. (Vid. Tenes) Paus. 10, 14.— Diod. 4.

HEMON. Vid Hæmon.

HEMUS. Vid. Hæmus.

HENETI, a people of Paphlagonia in Asia Minor, who, having lost their leader in the Trojan war, migrated to the north of Italy under the command of Antenor, the Trojan prince, and having expelled the Euganei, the original inhabitants of the country, settled in Venetia. Hom. Il. 2, 851.— Liv. 1, 1.— Virg. Æn 1, 242.— Ovid Fast. 4, 78.— Str. Ital 8, 601.

HENIOCHI, a people of Asiatic Sarmatia, near Colchis, descended from Amphytus and Telethusa, the charioteers (ἡνίοχοι) of Castor and Pollux, and thence called Lacedæmonii. Mela, 1, 21.— Paterc. 2, 40 — Flacc. 3, 270. 6, 42.

HEPHÆSTIA, now Cochino; the capital town of Lemnos. Herod. 6, 140.——A festival in honour of Vulcan (Ἡφαιστεῖα) at Athens. There was then a race with torches between three young men. Each in his turn ran a race with a lighted torch in his hand, and whoever could carry it to the end of the course before it was extinguished, obtained the prize. They delivered it one to the other after they finished their course, and from that circumstance we see many allusions in ancient authors who compare the vicissitudes of human affairs to this delivering of the torch; particularly in these lines of Lucretius 2:

Inque brevi spatio mutantur sæcla animantum,
Et quasi cursores vitai lampada tradunt

HEPHÆSTIADES, a name applied to the Lipari isles as sacred to Vulcan.

HEPHÆSTION, a Greek grammarian of Alexandria in the reign of the emperor Verus. There remains of his compositions, a treatise entitled Enchiridion de Metris et Poemate, the best edition of which is that of Gaisford, Oxon, 1810, 8vo ——A native of Thebes, whose age is uncertain. He wrote on astrological subjects.——A Macedonian famous for his intimacy with Alexander. He accompanied the conqueror in his Asiatic conquests, and was so faithful and attached to him, that Alexander often observed that Craterus was the friend of the king, but Hephæstion the friend of Alexander. He died at Ecbatana 325 years before the Christian era, according to some, from excess of drinking, or eating. Alexander was so inconsolable at the death of this faithful subject, that he shed tears at the intelligence, and ordered the sacred fire to be extinguished, which was never done but at the death of a Persian monarch. The physician who attended Hephæstion in his illness, was accused of negligence, and by the king's order inhumanly put to death, and the public games were interrupted. The body was intrusted to the care of Perdiccas, and honoured with the most magnificent funeral at Babylon. Hephæstion was so like the king in features and stature, that he was often saluted by the name of Alexander. Curt — Arrian 7, &c — Plut in Alex — Athan. V 11 7, 8.

HEPHÆSTIUM, a name given to a region in the extremity of Lycia near Phaselis, from which fire issued when a burning torch was applied to the surface. This was owing to the naphtha, with which the soil was impregnated. Senec ep. 79 — Plin. 2, 106.

HEPTAPHŌNOS, a portico, which received this name, because the voice was re-echoed seven times in it. Plin 36, 15

HEPTAPŌLIS, a country of Egypt, which contained seven cities

HEPTAPYLOS, a surname of Thebes in Bœotia, from its seven gates.

HERA, the name of Juno among the Greeks ——A town of Sicily, called also Hybla. Cic ad Attic. 2, 1

HERACLEA, a name given to more than forty towns in Europe, Asia, Africa, and the islands of the Mediterranean. They are supposed to have derived this appellation from the Greek name of Hercules, Ἡρακλῆς, and to have been either built in honour of him, or placed under his protection. The most famous of these places were—— A city of Lucania, situate between the Aciris and Siris. It was built by the Tarentini after the destruction of the ancient city of Siris, which stood at the mouth of the latter river, B. C. 428. This city is rendered remarkable in history, as having been the seat of the general council of the Greek colonies Antiquaries seem agreed in fixing its site at Policoro. Strab. 6.— Diod Sic. 12, 36 ——Minoa, a city of Sicily, on the southern coast, north-east of Agrigentum, at the mouth of the river Halycus. It was founded by Minos when he pursued Dædalus hither, and was subsequently called Heraclea, from Hercules, after his victory over Eryx. Some authorities make the original name to have been Macara, and Minos to have been not the founder, but the conqueror of the place. Mela, 2, 7 — Liv. 34, 35.— Cic. de Jur. Sic. 50.— Polyb. 1, 25 —Diod Sic. 10, 11.——Lyncestis, a city of Macedonia, at the foot of the Candavian mountains, on the confines of Illyria. Its ruins still retain the name of Erekli. Cæs. B Civ. 3, 79 ——Sintica, the chief town of the Sinti, in Thrace. Demetrius, the son of Philip, was imprisoned and murdered here. Liv. 40, 24 45, 28. ——Trachinia, a city of Thessaly, founded by the Lacedæmonians, and a colony from Trachin, about 426 B. C, in the sixth year of the Peloponnesian war. It was distant about sixty stadia from Thermopylæ, and twenty from the sea. Jason, tyrant of Pheræ, took possession of this city at one period, and caused the walls to be pulled down Heraclea, however, again rose from its ruins, and became a flourishing city under the Ætolians, who sometimes held their general council within its walls. It was taken by the Roman consul, Acilius Glabrio, after a long and obstinate siege. Sir W. Gell observed the vestiges of this city on a high hill, on the foot of mount Œta Thucyd. 3, 92.— Xen. Hist. Gr 6, 4, 27.— Liv. 37, 24.— Plin. 4, 7 ——Pontica, a city on the coast of Bithynia, about twelve stadia from the river Lycus. It was founded by the Megareans, who were joined by some Bœotians from Tanagra. It was celebrated for its naval power, and its consequence among the Asiatic states. It is now Erekli.——A city of Ionia, near mount Latmus, 100 stadia from Pyrrha, and rather more from Miletus. It had a port on the Sinus Latmicus. Its site answers nearly to that of the village of Ouyk Bajk Strab. 14.——or Heracleopolis Magna, a city of Egypt, in the Heracleotic nome, remarkable for the adoration which was paid there to the ichneumon. Strab. 17.—or Heracleopolis Parva, city of Egypt, southwest of Pelusium, within the limits of the Delta.

HERACLEIA, a festival at Athens, celebrated every fifth year, in honour of Hercules. The Thisbians and Thebans in Bœotia observed a festival of the same name, in which they offered apples to the god. This custom of offering apples arose from this: It was always usual to offer sheep, but the overflowing of the river Asopus prevented the votaries of the god from observing it with the ancient ceremony, and as the word μῆλον, signifies both an apple and a sheep, some youths, acquainted with the ambiguity of the word, offered apples to the god, with much sport and festivity. To represent the sheep, they raised an apple upon four sticks as the legs, and two more were placed at the top to represent the horns of the victim. Hercules was delighted with the ingenuity of the youths, and the festivals were ever continued with the offering of apples Pollux. 8, 9 There was also a festival at Sicyon in honour of Hercules. It continued two days, the first was called ὑποστασις, the second πρόπλοια.—— At a festival of the same name at Cos, the priest officiated with a mitre on his head, and in woman's apparel.——At Lindus, a solemnity of the same name was also observed, and at the celebration nothing was heard but execrations and profane words, and whosoever accidentally dropped any other words, was accused of having profaned the sacred rites.

HERACLEÔTES, a surname of Dionysius the philosopher.——A philosopher of Heraclea, who, like his master Zeno, and all the Stoics, firmly believed that pain was not an evil. A severe illness, attended with the most acute pains, obliged him to renounce his principles, and at the same time the philosophy of the Stoics, about 264 years before the Christian era. He became afterwards one of the Cyrenaic sect, which placed the summum bonum in pleasure. He wrote some poetry, and chiefly treatises of philosophy. Diog in vit.

HERACLEUM, a town of Macedonia, half way between Dium and Tempe. It probably answers to the present Litochori. Liv. 44, 8.——A promontory of Pontus, now Tschersches.——A city of Pontus, 360 stadia from the mouth of the Iris. Arrian. Periph ——A city on the northern coast of Crete; north of Cnossus, of which it was the harbour. The modern Carapana agrees with it. Strab. 10.—Plin. 4, 12.

HERACLIDÆ, the descendants of Hercules, greatly celebrated in ancient history. Hercules at his death, left to his son Hyllus all the rights and claims which he had upon the Peloponnesus, and permitted him to marry Iole, as soon as he came of age The posterity of Hercules were not more kindly treated by Eurystheus, than their father had been, and they were obliged to retire for protection to the court of Ceyx, king of Trachinia. Eurystheus pursued them thither; and Ceyx, afraid of his resentment, begged the Heraclidæ to depart from his dominions. From Trachinia they came to Athens, where Theseus the king of the country, who had accompanied their father in some of his expeditions, received them with great humanity, and assisted them against their common enemy, Eurystheus. Eurystheus was killed by the hand of Hyllus himself, and his children perished with him, and all the cities of the Peloponnesus became the undisputed property of the Heraclidæ. Their triumph, however, was short, their numbers were lessened by a pestilence, and the oracle informed them that they had taken possession of the Peloponnesus, before the gods permitted their return. Upon this, they abandoned Peloponnesus, and came to settle in the territories of the Athenians, where Hyllus, obedient to his father's commands, married Iole, the daughter of Eurytus. Soon after, he consulted the oracle, anxious to recover the Peloponnesus, and the ambiguity of the answer determined him to make a second attempt. He challenged to single combat Atreus, the successor of Eurystheus on the throne of Mycenæ, and it was mutually agreed that the undisturbed possession of the Peloponnesus should be ceded to whosoever defeated his adversary. Echemus accepted the challenge for Atreus, and Hyllus was killed, and the Heraclidæ a second time departed from Peloponnesus. Cleodæus the son of Hyllus, made a third attempt, and was equally unsuccessful, and his son Aristomachus some time after met with the same unfavourable reception, and perished in the field of battle. Aristodemus, Temenus, and Cresphontes, the three sons of Aristomachus, encouraged by the more expressive and less ambiguous word of an oracle, and desirous to revenge the death of their progenitors, assembled a numerous force, and with a fleet invaded all Peloponnesus. Their expedition was attended with success, and after some decisive battles they became masters of all the peninsula, which they divided among themselves two years after. The recovery of the Peloponnesus by the descendants of Hercules forms an interesting epoch in ancient history, which is universally believed to have happened eighty years after the Trojan war, or 1101 years before the Christian era. This conquest was totally achieved about 120 years after the first attempt of Hyllus. Apollod. 2, 7, &c.—Herod 9, 26.—Paus. 1, 17.—Patere 1, 2.—Thucyd. 1, 12, &c.—Diod. 1, &c.—Aristot. de Rep 7, 17

HERACLIDES, a philosopher of Heraclea in Pontus, for some time disciple of Speusippus and Aristotle. He wished it to be believed that he was carried into heaven the very day of his death, and the more firmly to render it credible, he begged one of his friends to put a serpent in his bed. The serpent disappointed him, and the noise which the number of visitors occasioned, frightened him from the bed, before the philosopher had expired He lived about 335 years before the Christian era. Cic. Tusc. 5 ad Quint. 3.—Ihog. in Pyth.——A Syracusan of high birth, who united himself to Dion, for the purpose of overthrowing the younger Dionysius. He was appointed admiral through the influence of Dion, but abused his power in corrupting the people, and in encouraging a spirit of mutiny and dissatisfaction. After various instances of levity and forgiveness on the part of Dion, towards this individual, the friends of the former, finding that as long as Heraclides existed, his turbulent and factious spirit would produce disorder in the state, broke into his house and put him to death. Plut. Vit Dion.——An individual who governed Syracuse along with Agathocles and Sosicrates, B. C 317 ——A son of Agathocles, slain by his father's soldiers Justin. 22, 5 ——Commander of the garrison sent to Athens by Demetrius, after his capture of that city.——A young Syracusan of high birth, who brought on the naval conflict in which the Syracusans were completely victorious over the Athenians, B C. 414. Plut. Vit. Nic ——A native of Tarentum, celebrated for his medical knowledge. He wrote on the Materia Medica, on poisons, and on the virtues of plants. His works are lost.——A Greek architect, a native of Tarentum, in the time of Philip, the father of Perseus, king of Macedon. This prince being at war with the Rhodians, Heraclides promised him that he would destroy their fleet In order to accomplish this, he feigned to be a fugitive from Philip, and took refuge in Rhodes. He found means upon this of setting fire to all the shipping in the port. A Greek painter, who lived under Perseus of Macedon. After the overthrow of this monarch, he fled to Athens, and there continued to exercise his art.

HERACLITUS, a native of Ephesus, who flourished about the sixty-ninth olympiad. He discovered an early attention to intellectual studies, and was initiated into the mysteries of the Pythagorean doctrine by Xenophanes and Hippasus, which he afterwards incorporated into his own system. His fellow-citizens solicited him to undertake the supreme magistracy, but on account of their dissolute manners, he declined it in favour of his brother. His natural temper being splenetic and melancholy, he despised the ignorance and follies of mankind, shunned all public intercourse, and devoted himself to retirement and contemplation. He made choice of a mountainous retreat for his residence, and lived upon the natural produce of the earth; the result of which diet and manner of life was a dropsy, that terminated his life about the sixtieth year of his age. Of Heraclitus it has been said, that he was perpetually shedding tears on account of the vices of mankind, but the story is probably as little founded as that of the perpetual laughing of Democritus. It is usual, however, to call the former the crying, the latter the laughing philosopher. Heraclitus wrote a treatise "On Nature," of which only a few fragments remain. Diog. in vita.

HERÆA, a town of Arcadia, on the right bank of the Alpheus, and near the frontiers of Elis, which frequently disputed its possession with Arcadia. Its site is now occupied by the village of Agiana Xen. Hist Gr. 6, 5, 22.——Festivals at Argos in honour of Juno, who was the patroness of that city. They were also observed by the colonies of the Argives which had been planted at Samos and Ægina. There were always two processions to the temple of the goddess without the city walls The first was of the men in armour, the second of the women, among whom the priestess, a woman of the first quality, was drawn in a chariot by white oxen. The Argives always reckoned their years from her priesthood, as the Athenians from their archons, and the Romans from their consuls When they came to the temple of the goddess they offered a hecatomb of oxen. Hence the sacrifice is often called ἑκατόμβοια, and sometimes λέχαια, from λέχος, a bed, because Juno presided over marriages, births, &c. There was a festival of the same name in Elis, celebrated every fifth year, in which sixteen matrons wove a garment for the goddess.——There were also others instituted by Hippodamia, who had received assistance from Juno when she married Pelops. Sixteen matrons, each attended by a maid, presided at the celebration. The contenders were young virgins, who being divided in classes, according to their age, ran races each in their order, beginning with the youngest The habit of all was exactly the same, their hair was dishevelled, and their right shoulder bare to the breast, with coats reaching no lower than the knee. She who obtained the victory was rewarded with crowns of olives, and obtained a part of the ox that was offered in sacrifice, and was permitted to dedicate her picture to the goddess.——There was also a solemn day of mourning at Corinth which bore the same name, in commemoration of Medea's children, who were buried in Juno's temple. They had been slain by the Corinthians; who, as it is reported, to avert the scandal which accompanied so barbarous a murder, presented Euripides with a large sum of money to write a play, in which Medea is represented as the murderer of her children.——Another festival of the same name at Pallene, with games in which the victor was rewarded with a garment.

HERÆI MONTES a chain of mountains at the north of Sicily. Diod. 14.

HERÆUM, a temple and grove of Juno, situate about forty stadia from Argos, and ten from Mycenæ. It was embellished with a lofty statue of Juno, made of ivory and gold, a golden peacock, enriched with precious stones, and other ornaments.——Another, in the island of Samos, constructed by Rhœcus, the son of Philaus, who, with Theodorus of Samos, invented the art of making moulds of clay.

HERBESSUS, a town of Sicily, at the north of Agrigentum, built by a Phœnician or Carthaginian colony Sil. 14, 265.

HERBITA, an inland town of Sicily. Cic Verr 2, 6 43, 32.

HERCEITS, an epithet given to Jupiter. Ovid Ib. 286 — Lucan 9, 979.

HERCULANEA VIA, a mound raised between the Lucrine lake and the sea, called also Herculeum iter. Sil 12, 11b.

HERCULANEUM, or HERCULANUM, a city of Campania, on the coast, and not far from Neapolis. It is said to have been founded by Hercules, and, according to Strabo, it belonged successively to the Osci, the Tyrrheni, the Pelasgi, and the Samnites. The Romans appear to have gained permanent possession of the surrounding territory, about 293 years before the Christian era; and it appears, from an inscription in honour of Lucius Manutius Concessanus, which was discovered in the neighbourhood, that it was made a Roman colony. According to the received opinion, this city was overwhelmed by an eruption of Vesuvius, in the first year of the reign of Titus, A D 79. Pompeii, which stood near, shared the same fate. After being buried for more than 1600 years, these cities were accidentally discovered: Herculaneum in 1713, by labourers digging for a well, and Pompeii forty years after. It appears that Herculaneum is in no part less than seventy feet, and in some parts 112 feet, below the surface of the ground, while Pompeii is buried ten or twelve feet deep, more or less. Sir William Hamilton thinks, that the matter which covers the city of Herculaneum is not the produce of one eruption only, but that the matter of six eruptions has taken its course over that which lies immediately above the town, and which was the cause of its destruction. Many valuable remains of antiquity, such as statues, paintings, manuscripts, &c, have been recovered from the ruins of this ancient city, and form the most curious museum in the world They are all preserved at Portici, and the engravings taken from them have been munificently presented to the principal public libraries of Europe. The plan, also, of many of the public buildings, has been laid out, and especially that of the theatre. Cic ad Att 7, 3.—Dion. Hal. 1, 44.—Strab. 5.—Mela. 2, 4 —Senec. Nat Q 6, 1.

HERCULES, a celebrated hero, who, after death, was ranked among the gods, and received divine honours. According to the ancients there were many persons of the same name. Diodorus mentions three, Cicero six, and some authors extend the number to no less than forty-three. Of all these the son of Jupiter and Alcmena, generally called the Theban, is the most celebrated, and to him, as may easily be imagined, the actions of the others have been attributed. The birth of Hercules was attended with many miraculous and supernatural events, and it is reported that Jupiter, who introduced himself to the bed of Alcmena, was employed for three nights in forming a child whom he intended to be the greatest hero the world ever beheld. (Vid. Alcmena.) Hercules was brought up at Tirynthus; or, according to Diodorus, at Thebes, and before he had completed his eighth month, the jealousy of Juno, intent upon his destruction, sent two snakes to devour him. The child, not terrified at the sight of the serpents, boldly seized them in both his hands and squeezed them to death, while his brother Iphiclus alarmed the house with his frightful shrieks. (Vid Iphiclus) He was early instructed in the liberal arts, and Castor the son of Tyndarus, taught him how to fight, Eurytus how to shoot with a bow and arrows, Autolycus to drive a chariot, Linus to play on the lyre, and Eumolpus to sing He, like the rest of his illustrious contemporaries, soon after became the pupil of the centaur Chiron, and under him he perfected and rendered himself the most valiant and accomplished of the age. In the eighteenth year of his age he resolved to deliver the neighbourhood of mount Cithæron from a huge lion which preyed on the flocks of Amphitryon, his supposed father; and which laid waste the adjacent country. He went to the court of Thespius, king of Thespiæ, who shared in the general calamity, and he received there a tender treatment, and was entertained during fifty days. The fifty daughters of the king became all mothers by Hercules, during his stay at Thespiæ, and some say that it was effected in one night. After he had destroyed the lion of mount Cithæron, he delivered his country from the annual tribute of an hundred-oxen which it paid to Erginus. (Vid. Erginus.) Such public services became universally known, and Creon, who then sat on the throne of Thebes, rewarded the patriotic deeds of Hercules by giving him his daughter in marriage, and intrusting him with the government of his kingdom. As Hercules by the will of Jupiter was subjected to the power of Eurystheus, (Vid. Eurystheus,) and obliged to obey him in every respect, Eurystheus, acquainted with his success and rising power, ordered him to appear at Mycenæ and perform the labours which by priority of birth he was empowered to impose upon him. Hercules refused, and Juno, to punish his disobedience, rendered him so delirious that he killed his own children by Megara, supposing them to be the offspring of Eurystheus, (Vid Megara.) When he recovered the use of his senses, he was so struck with the misfortunes which had proceeded from his insanity, that he concealed himself and retired from the society of men for some time. He afterwards consulted the oracle of Apollo, and was told that he must be subservient for twelve years to the will of Eurystheus, in compliance with the commands of Jupiter; and that, after he had achieved the most celebrated labours, he should be reckoned in the number of the gods. So plain and expressive an answer determined him to go to Mycenæ, and to bear with fortitude whatever gods or men imposed on him. Eurystheus seeing so great a man totally subjected to him, and apprehensive of so powerful an enemy, commanded him to achieve a number of enterprises the most difficult and arduous ever known, generally called the twelve labours of Hercules. The favours of the gods had completely armed him when he undertook his labours, He had received a coat of arms and helmet from Minerva, a sword from Mercury, a horse from Neptune, a shield from Jupiter, a bow and arrows from Apollo, and from Vulcan a golden cuirass and brazen buskins, with a celebrated club of brass according to the opinion of some writers, but more generally supposed to be of wood, and cut by the hero himself in the forest of Nemæa.—— The first labour imposed upon Hercules by Eurystheus, was to kill the lion of Nemæa, which ravaged the country near Mycenæ The hero, unable to destroy him with his arrows, boldly attacked him with his club, pursued him to his den, and after a close and sharp engagement he choked him to death. He carried the dead beast on his shoulders to Mycenæ, and ever after clothed himself with the skin. Eurystheus was so astonished at the sight of the beast, and at the courage of Hercules, that he ordered him never to enter the gates of the city when he returned from his expeditions, but to wait for his orders without the walls. He even made himself a brazen vessel into which he retired whenever Hercules returned.——The second labour of Hercules was to destroy the Lernæan hydra, which had seven heads according to Apollodorus, fifty according to Simonides, and a hundred according to Diodorus. This celebrated monster he attacked with his arrows, and soon after he came to a close engagement, and by means of his heavy club he destroyed the heads of his enemy. But this was productive of no advantage, for as soon as one head was beaten to pieces by the club, immediately two sprang up, and the labour of Hercules would have remained unfinished had he not commanded his friend Iolas to burn, with a hot iron, the root of the head which he had crushed to pieces. This succeeded, (Vid. Hydra,) and Hercules became victorious, opened the belly of the monster, and dipped his arrows in the gall to render the wounds which he gave fatal and incurable.——He was ordered in his third labour to bring alive and unhurt into the presence of Eurystheus, a stag, famous for its incredible swiftness, its golden horns, and brazen feet. This celebrated animal frequented the neighbourhood of Œnoe, and Hercules was employed for a whole year in continually pursuing it, and at last he caught it in a trap, or when tired, or according to others, by slightly wounding it and lessening its swiftness. As he returned victorious, Diana snatched the stag from him, and severely reprimanded him for molesting an animal which was sacred to her. Hercules pleaded necessity, and by representing the commands of Eurystheus, he appeased the goddess and obtained the beast.——The fourth labour was to bring alive to Eurystheus a wild boar which ravaged the neighbourhood of Erymanthus. In this expedition he destroyed the centaurs, (Vid. Centauri,) and caught the boar by closely pursuing him through the deep snow. Eurystheus was so frightened at the sight of the boar, that, according to Diodorus, he hid himself in his brazen vessel for some days.——In his fifth labour Hercules was ordered to clean the stables of Augias, where 3000 oxen had been confined for many years. (Vid. Augias.)——For his sixth labour he was ordered to kill the carnivorous birds which ravaged the country near the lake Stymphalis in Arcadia. (Vid. Stymphalis.)——In his seventh labour he brought alive into Peloponnesus a prodigious wild bull which laid waste the island of Crete.——In his eighth labour he was employed in obtaining the mares of Diomedes, which fed upon human flesh. He killed Diomedes, and gave him to be eaten by his mares, which he brought to Eurystheus. They were sent to mount Olympus by the king of Mycenæ, where they were devoured by the wild beasts; or, according to others, they were consecrated to Jupiter, and their breed still existed in the age of Alexander the Great.——For his ninth labour, he was commanded to obtain the girdle of the queen of the Amazons (Vid. Hippolyte.)——In his tenth labour he killed the monster Geryon, king of Gades, and brought to Argos his numerous flocks which fed upon human flesh. (Vid. Geryon.)——The eleventh labour was to obtain apples from the garden of the Hesperides. (Vid. Hesperides.)——The twelfth and last, and most dangerous of his labours, was to bring upon earth the three-headed dog Cerberus. This was cheerfully undertaken by Hercules, and he descended into hell by a cave on mount Tænarus. He was permitted by Pluto to carry away his friends Theseus and Pirithous, who were condemned to punishment in hell; and Cerberus also was granted to his prayers, provided he made use of no arms but only force to drag him away. Hercules, as some report, carried him back to hell, after he had brought him before Eurystheus.——Besides these arduous labours, which the jealousy of Eurystheus imposed upon him, he also achieved others of his own accord equally great and celebrated. (Vid. Cacus, Anteus, Busiris, Eryx, &c.) He accompanied the Argonauts to Colchis before he delivered himself up to the king of Mycenæ. He assisted the gods in their wars against the giants, and it was through him alone that Jupiter obtained a victory. (Vid. Gigantes.) He conquered Laomedon, and pillaged Troy. (Vid. Laomedon.) When Iole, the daughter of Eurytus, king of Œchalia, of whom he was deeply enamoured, was refused to his entreaties, he became the prey of a second fit of insanity, and he murdered Iphitus, the only one of the sons of Eurytus who favoured his addresses to Iole. (Vid Iphitus.) He was some time after purified of the murder, and his insanity ceased, but the gods persecuted him more, and he was visited by a disorder which obliged him to apply to the oracle of Delphi for relief. The coldness with which the Pythia received him irritated him, and he resolved to plunder Apollo's temple, and carry away the sacred tripod. Apollo opposed him, and a severe conflict was begun, which nothing but the interference of Jupiter with his thunderbolts could have prevented. He was upon this told by the oracle that he must be sold as a slave, and remain three years in the most abject servitude to recover from his disorder. He complied; and Mercury by order of Jupiter, conducted him to Omphale, queen of Lydia, to whom he was sold as a slave. Here he cleared all the country from robbers; and Omphale, who was astonished at the greatness of his exploits, restored him to liberty, and married him. Hercules had Agilaus, and Lamon, according to others, by Omphale, from whom Crœsus king of Lydia was descended. He became also enamoured of one of Omphale's female servants, by whom he had Alceus. After he had completed the years of his slavery, he returned to Peloponnesus, where he re-established on the throne of Sparta, Tyndarus, who had been expelled by Hippocoon. He became one of Dejanira's suitors, and married her, after he had overcome all his rivals. (Vid. Achelous.) He was obliged to leave Calydon, his father-in-law's kingdom, because he had inadvertently killed a man with a blow of his fist, and it was on account of this expulsion that he was not present at the hunting of the Calydonian boar. From Calydon he retired to the court of Ceyx, king of Trachinia. In his way he was stopped by the swollen streams of the Evenus, where the centaur Nessus attempted to offer violence to Dejanira, under the perfidious pretence of conveying her over the river. Hercules perceived the distress of Dejanira, and killed the centaur, who as he expired gave her a tunic which as he observed had the power of recalling a husband from unlawful love (Vid. Dejanira.) Ceyx, king of Trachinia, received him and his wife with great marks of friendship, and purified him of the murder which he had committed at Calydon. Hercules was still mindful that he had once been refused the hand of Iole, he therefore made war against her father

Eurytus, and killed him with three of his sons. Iole fell into the hands of her father's murderer, and found that she was loved by Hercules as much as before. She accompanied him to mount Œta, where he was going to raise an altar and offer a solemn sacrifice to Jupiter. As he had not then the tunic in which he arrayed himself to offer a sacrifice, he sent Lichas to Dejanira in order to provide himself a proper dress. Dejanira, informed of her husband's tender attachment to Iole, sent him a philter, or, more probably the tunic which she had received from Nessus, and Hercules as soon as he had put it on, fell into a desperate distemper, and found the poison of the Lernæan hydra penetrate through his bones. He attempted to pull off the fatal dress, but it was too late, and in the midst of his pains and tortures, he inveighed in the most bitter imprecations against the credulous Dejanira, the cruelty of Eurystheus, and the jealousy and hatred of Juno. As the distemper was incurable, he implored the protection of Jupiter, and gave his bow and arrows to Philoctetes, and erected a large burning pile on the top of mount Œta. He spread on the pile the skin of the Nemæan lion, and laid himself down upon it as on a bed, leaning his head on his club. Philoctetes, or according to others, Pæan or Hyllus, was ordered to set fire to the pile, and the hero saw himself on a sudden surrounded with the flames, without betraying any marks of fear or astonishment. Jupiter saw him from heaven, and told to the surrounding gods that he would raise to the skies the immortal parts of a hero who had cleared the earth from so many monsters and tyrants. The gods applauded Jupiter's resolution, the burning pile was suddenly surrounded with a dark smoke, and after the mortal parts of Hercules were consumed, he was carried up to heaven in a chariot drawn by four horses. Some loud claps of thunder accompanied his elevation, and his friends, unable to find either his bones or ashes, showed their gratitude to his memory by raising an altar where the burning pile had stood. Menœtius, the son of Actor, offered him the sacrifice of a bull, a wild boar, and a goat, and enjoined the people of Opus yearly to observe the same religious ceremonies. His worship soon became as universal as his fame, and Juno, who had once persecuted him with such inveterate fury, forgot her resentment, and gave him her daughter Hebe in marriage. Hercules has received many surnames and epithets, either from the place where his worship was established, or from the labours which he achieved. His temples were numerous and magnificent, and his divinity revered. No dogs or flies ever entered his temple at Rome, and that of Gades, according to Strabo, was always forbidden to women and pigs. The Phœnicians offered quails on his altars, and as it was supposed that he presided over dreams, the sick and infirm were sent to sleep in his temples, that they might receive in their dreams the agreeable presages of their approaching recovery. The white poplar was particularly dedicated to his service. Hercules is generally represented naked, with strong and well-proportioned limbs; he is sometimes covered with the skin of the Nemæan lion, and holds a knotted club in his hand, on which he often leans. Sometimes he appears crowned with the leaves of the poplar, and holding the horn of plenty under his arm. At other times he is represented standing with Cupid, who insolently breaks to pieces his arrows and his club, to intimate the passion of love in the hero, who suffered himself to be beaten and ridiculed by Omphale, who dressed herself in his armour, while he was sitting to spin with her female servants. The children of Hercules are as numerous as the labours and difficulties which he underwent, and indeed they became so powerful soon after his death, that they alone had the courage to invade all Peloponnesus. (Vid. Heraclidæ.) He was father of Deicoon and Thersimachus, by Megara; of Cteatippus, by Astydamia; of Palemon by Automoe; of Everes, by Parthenope; of Glycinomedes, Gyneus, and Odites, by Dejanira; of Thessalus, by Chalciope; of Thestalus, by Epicaste; of Tlepolemus, by Astyoche; of Agathyrsus, Gelon, and Scytha, by Echidna, &c. Such are the most striking characteristics of the life of Hercules, who is said to have supported for a while the weight of the heavens upon his shoulders, (Vid. Atlas), and to have separated by the force of his arm the celebrated mountains which were afterwards called the boundaries of his labours. (Vid. Abyla.) He is held out by the ancients as a true pattern of virtue and piety, and as his whole life had been employed for the common benefit of mankind, he was deservedly rewarded with immortality. His judicious choice of virtue in preference to pleasure, as described by Xenophon, is well known. Hercules, according to the theory of Dupuis and others, is no other than the sun, and his twelve labours are only a figurative representation of the annual course of that luminary through the signs of the zodiac. He is the powerful planet which animates and imparts fecundity to the universe, whose divinity has been honoured in every quarter by temples and altars, and consecrated in the religious strains of all nations. From Meroe, in Ethiopia, and Thebes, in Upper Egypt, even to Britain, and the icy regions of Scythia; from the ancient Taprobana and Palibothra, in India, to Cadiz and the shores of the Atlantic; from the forests of Germany, to the burning sands of Africa; every where, in short, where the benefits of the luminary of day are experienced, there we find established the name and worship of a Hercules. Many ages before the period when Alcmena is said to have lived, and the pretended Tirynthian hero to have performed his wonderful exploits, Egypt and Phœnicia, which certainly did not borrow their divinities from Greece, had raised temples to the sun, under the name of Hercules, and had carried his worship to the isle of Thasos, and to Gades. Here was consecrated a temple to the year, and to the months which divided it into twelve parts, that is, to the twelve labours or victories which conducted Hercules to immortality. It is under the name of Hercules Astrochyton (Ἀστροχίτων), or, the god clothed with a mantle of stars that the poet Nonnus designates the sun, adored by the Tyrians. "He is the same god," observes the poet, "whom different nations adore, under a multitude of different names: Belus on the banks of the Euphrates, Ammon in Libya, Apis at Memphis, Saturn in Arabia, Jupiter in Assyria, Serapis in Egypt, Helios among the Babylonians, Apollo at Delphi, Æsculapius through out Greece," &c. Martianus Capella, in his hymn to the Sun, as also Ausonius, and Macrobius, confirm the fact of this multiplicity of names given to a single star. The Egyptians, according to Plutarch, thought that Hercules had his seat in the Sun, and that he travelled with it around the moon. The author of the hymns ascribed to Orpheus, fixes still more strongly the identity of Hercules with the Sun. He calls Hercules "the god who produced time, whose forms vary, the father of all things, and destroyer of all. He is the god who brings back by turns Aurora and the night, and who, moving onwards from east to west, runs through the career of his twelve labours, the valiant Titan, who chases away maladies, and delivers man from the evils which afflict him." The Phœnicians, it is said, preserved a tradition among them that Hercules was the Sun, and that his twelve labours indicated the sun's passage through the twelve signs. Porphyry, who was born in Phœnicia, assures us that they there gave the name of Hercules to the sun, and that the fable of the twelve labours represents the sun's annual path in the heavens. In like manner the scholiast on Hesiod remarks, "the zodiac, in which the sun performs his annual course, is the true career which Hercules traverses in the fable of the twelve labours; and his marriage with Hebe, the goddess of youth, whom he espoused after he had ended his labours, denotes the renewal of the year at the end of each solar revolution." Among the different epochs at which the year in ancient times commenced among different nations, that of the summer solstice was one of the most remarkable. It was at this period that the Greeks fixed the celebration of their olympic games, the establishment of which is attributed to Hercules. It was the origin of the most ancient era of the Greeks. If we fix from this point the departure of the sun on his annual career, and compare the progress of that luminary through the signs of the zodiac with the twelve labours of Hercules in the order in which they are sometimes handed down to us, a very striking coincidence is instantly observed. A few examples will be adduced. In the first month, the sun passes into the sign Leo; and in his first labour, Hercules slew the Nemæan lion. In the second month, the sun enters the sign Virgo, when the constellation of the Hydra sets; and in his second labour, Hercules destroyed the Lernean hydra. In the third month, the sun enters the sign Libra, at the beginning of autumn, when the constellation of the centaur rises, represented as bearing a wine-skin full of liquor, and a thyrsus adorned with vine leaves and grapes. At this same period, what is termed by some astronomers the constellation of the boar rises in the evening; and in his third labour, Hercules, after being hospitably entertained by a centaur, encountered and slew the other centaurs who fought for a cask of wine: he slew also in this labour, the Erymanthian boar. In the fourth month, the sun enters the sign of Scorpio, when Cassiopeia rises, a constellation in which anciently a stag was represented; and in his fourth labour, Hercules caught the famous stag with golden horns and brazen feet. In the fifth month, the sun enters the sign Sagittarius, consecrated to Diana, who had a temple at Stymphalus, in which were seen the birds called Stymphalides. At this same time rise the three birds; namely, the constellations of the vulture, swan, and eagle pierced with the arrows of Hercules; and in his fifth labour, Hercules destroyed the harpies near lake Stymphalus, which are represented as three in number on the medals of Perinthus. In the sixth month, the sun passes into the sign Capricornus, who was, according to some, a grandson of the luminary. At this period, the stream which flows from Aquarius sets; its source is between the hands of Aristæus, son of the river Peneus. In his sixth labour, Hercules cleansed, by means of the Peneus, the stables of Augias, son of Phœbus. In the seventh month, the sun passes into the sign Aquarius. The constellation of the Lyre, or celestial vulture, now sets, which is placed by the side of the constellation called Prometheus, and at this same period the celestial bull, called the bull of Pasiphae, the bull of Marathon, in fine, the bull of Europa, passes the meridian. In his seventh labour, Hercules brings alive into the Peloponnesus, a wild bull which laid waste the island of Crete. He slays also the vulture that preyed upon the liver of Prometheus. In the eighth month the sun enters into the sign Pisces, when the celestial horse rises in the morning, known by the names of Pegasus and Arion; and in his eighth labour, Hercules overcame and carried off the horses of Diomede In the ninth month, the sun passes into the sign Aries, sacred to Mars, and which all the ancient authors who have written on astronomy, make to be the same with the ram of the golden fleece. When the sun enters into this sign, the celestial ship, called Argo, rises in the evening. At this same period, Cassiopeia and Andromeda set. Andromeda is remarkable for many beautiful stars, one of which is called her girdle. Hyginus makes this girdle consist of three stars. Aratus designates it particularly by the name of Ζώνη Now, in his ninth labour, Hercules embarked on board the ship Argo in quest of the golden fleece: he contends with the female warriors, and takes from Hippolyte, their queen, the daughter of Mars, a famous girdle. He also rescues Hesione from a sea monster, as Perseus did Andromeda. In the tenth month, the sun enters into the sign Taurus. The constellation of Orion, who was fabled to have pursued, through love, the Pleiades, or daughters of Atlas, now sets: the herdsman, or conductor of the oxen of Icarus, also sets; as does likewise the river Eridanus. At this period too, the Pleiades rise, and the she goat fabled to have been the spouse of Faunus. Now, in his tenth labour, Hercules restores to their father the seven Pleiades, whose beauty and wisdom had inspired with love Busiris, king of Egypt, and who, wishing to become master of their persons, had sent pirates to carry them off. He slew also Busiris, who is here identical with Orion. In this same labour, he bore away from Spain the oxen of Geryon, and arrived in Italy, where he overcame Cacus, and was hospitably received by Faunus In the eleventh month, the sun passes into the sign of Gemini. This period is marked by the setting of Procyon, and the cosmical rising of the dog-star. The constellation of the Swan also rises in the evening. In his eleventh labour, Hercules conquers Cerberus, the dog of Hades. He triumphs also over Cycnus, (Swan), and at the very time too, according to Hesiod, when the dog-star begins to parch the fields, and the cicada announces the summer by its song. In the twelfth month, the sun enters the sign Cancer, the last of the twelve commencing with Leo The constellations of the river and the centaur set, that of Hercules Ingeniculus also descends towards the western regions, or those of Hesperia, followed by the dragon of the pole, the guardian of the golden apples of the Hesperides, whose head he crushes with his foot. In his twelfth labour, Hercules travelled to Hesperia in quest of the golden fruit, guarded by the dragon. After this, he prepares to offer up a solemn sacrifice, and clothes himself with a robe dipped in the blood of the Centaur, whom he had slain in crossing a river. The robe takes fire, and the hero perishes amid the flames, but only to resume his youth in the heavens, and become a partaker of immortality. The Centaur thus terminates the mortal career of Hercules; and, in like manner, the new annual period commences with the passage of the sun into Leo, marked by a group of stars in the morning, which glitter like the flames that issued from the vestment of Nessus. Diod. 1 et 4.—*Cic. de Nat. HERMAPHRODITUS, a son of Venus and Mercury, educated on mount Ida by the Naiades. At the age of fifteen he began to travel to gratify his curiosity. When he came to Caria, he bathed himself in a fountain, and Salmacis, the nymph who presided over it, became enamoured of him and attempted to seduce him. Hermaphroditus continued deaf to all intreaties and offers, and Salmacis, endeavouring to obtain by force what was denied to prayers, closely embraced him, and entreated the gods to make them two but one body. Her prayers were heard, and Salmacis and Hermaphroditus, now two in one body, still preserved the characteristics of both their sexes. Hermaphroditus begged the gods that all who bathed in that fountain might become effeminate. Ovid. Met 4, 347.—Hygen. fab 271.

HERMAS, surnamed the shepherd, a father of the church, who is supposed to have been the contemporary of St Paul, and mentioned by him in his epistles.

HERMATHENA, from Ἑρμῆς and Ἀθήνη, a statue which represented Mercury and Minerva in the same body. This statue was generally placed in schools where eloquence and philosophy were taught, because these two deities presided over the arts and sciences.

HERMEAS, a tyrant of Mysia who revolted from Artaxerxes Ochus, B. C. 350 ——A general of Antiochus, &c.

HERMES the name of Mercury among the Greeks. (Vid. Mercurius.)——A famous gladiator. Martial. 5, ep 25 ——An Egyptian philosopher Vid Mercurius Trismegistus.

HERMESIANAX, a poet of Colophon, who flourished in the time of Philip and his son Alexander. He composed three books of elegies, and entitled the collection Leontium, in honour of his mistress. Some fragments of this poet are quoted by Athenæus. Paus. 6, 17.—Athen. 13. ——A native of Cyprus who wrote a history of Phrygia. Phot.

HERMIAS, a writer towards the close of the second century, and native of Galatia, who has left us a short but elegant discourse in ridicule of the pagan philosophers, entitled Διασυρμὸς τῶν ἔξω φιλοσόφων. It was published in the Auctar. Bibliath. Patrum. Paris, 1624; and in the Oxford edition of Tatian, 8vo, 1700.

HERMINIUS, a general of the Hermanni, &c. ——A Roman, who defended a bridge with Cocles against the army of Porsenna. Liv. 2, 10.——A Trojan killed by Catillus in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 11, 642.

HERMIONE, a daughter of Mars and Venus, who married Cadmus. The gods, except Juno, honoured her nuptials with their presence, and she received, as a present, a rich veil and a splendid necklace which had been made by Vulcan. She was changed into a serpent with her husband Cadmus, and placed in the Elysian fields. (Vid. Harmonia.) Apollod 3. – Ovid. Met 4, fab. 13.——A daughter of Menelaus and Helen. She was privately promised in marriage to Orestes the son of Agamemnon; but her father, ignorant of this pre-engagement, gave her hand to Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, whose service he had experienced in the Trojan war. Pyrrhus, at his return from Troy, carried home Hermione and married her. Hermione, tenderly attached to her cousin Orestes, looked upon Pyrrhus with horror and indignation. According to others, however, Hermione received the addresses of Pyrrhus with pleasure, and even reproached Andromache, his concubine, with stealing his affections from her. Her jealousy for Andromache, according to some, induced her to unite herself to Orestes, and to destroy Pyrrhus. She gave herself to Orestes after this murder, and received the kingdom of Sparta as a dowry. Homer. Od. 4.—Ruræp. in Andr. et Orest. Ovid. Heroid. 8.– Propert 1, 4.——A city of Argolis, on the southern coast, opposite Hydrea. It was founded by the Dryopes, whom Hercules had expelled from Œta. It contained a famous temple of Ceres, with an inviolable sanctuary, and a cave, supposed to communicate with the infernal regions, on which account the inhabitants neglected the usual rite of putting a piece of money into the mouths of the dead. Its site is now called Kastri. Herod 8, 43.—Strab. 8.—Plin 4, 5.—Mela, 2.—Paus. 2, 34.

HERMIONES, one of the three great divisions of the Germanic tribes, according to Tacitus, and occupying the central parts of the country. Tacit. G 2.

HERMIONICUS SINUS, a bay on the coast of Argolis near Hermione. Now, the bay of Hydron.

HERMIPPUS, a freedman, disciple of Philo, in the reign of Adrian, by whom he was greatly esteemed. He wrote five books upon dreams. ——A man who accused Aspasia, the mistress of Pericles, of impiety and prostitution. He was son of Lysis, and distinguished himself as a poet by forty theatrical pieces, and other compositions, some of which are quoted by Athenæus. Plut ——A peripatetic philosopher of Smyrna, who flourished B. C. 210.

HERMOCRATES, a general of Syracuse, against Nicias the Athenian. His lenity towards the Athenian prisoners was looked upon as treacherous. He was banished from Sicily without even a trial, and he was murdered as he attempted to return to his country, B. C. 409. Plut. in Nic. &c.——A sophist celebrated for his rising talents. He died in the twenty-eighth year of his age, in the reign of the emperor Severus.——The father-in-law of Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily.——A Rhodian employed by Artaxerxes to corrupt the Grecian states, &c.——A sophist, preceptor to Pausanias the murderer of Philip. Diod. 16.

HERMODORUS, a Sicilian, pupil to Plato.—— A philosopher of Ephesus, who is said to have assisted as interpreter, the Roman decemvirs in the composition of the ten tables of laws, which had been collected in Greece. Cic. Tusc. 5, 36. —Plin. 34, 5.——A native of Salamis, contemporary with Philo the Athenian architect. Cic. in Orat 1, 14.——A poet who wrote a book, called Νόμιμα, on the laws of different nations.

HERMOGENES, an architect of Alabanda in Caria, employed in building the temple of Diana at Magnesia. He wrote a book upon his profession.——A rhetorician of Tarsus, who flourished under M. Aurelius Antoninus. At fifteen he became a teacher; at seventeen he wrote his art of rhetoric: and at twenty-two other books on oratorical action: but at twenty five he lost his memory, and the faculty of speech. Of his works only some portions remain, which were printed at Geneva in 1614, 8vo.——A lawyer in the age of Constantine.——A musician. Horat. Sat. 1, 3, 130.——A heretic of the second century. He was a native of Africa, and known as a painter and stoic philosopher. Tertullian was engaged in refuting his doctrines HERMOLAUS, a young Macedonian among the attendants of Alexander. As he was one day hunting with the king, he killed a wild boar which was coming towards him. Alexander, who followed close behind him, wasso disappointed because the beast had been killed before he could dart at it, that he ordered Hermolaus to be severely whipped This treatment irritated Hermolaus, and he conspired to take away the king's life, with others who were displeased with the cruel treatment which he had received The plot was discovered by one of the conspirators, and Alexander seized them, and asked what had impelled them to conspire to take his life Hermolaus answered for the rest, and observed that it was unworthy of Alexander to treat his most faithful and attached friends like slaves, and to shed their blood without the least mercy. Alexander ordered him to be put to death. Curt. 8, 6.

HERMOPOLIS, or the city of Hermes, the name of two towns in Egypt. The first, surnamed Parva, was in the Delta, east of the Canopic branch of the Nile, and north-east of Andropolis. Its position agrees with that of the modern Demenhur The second was termed Magna or the great, and was situate in the Heptanomis, on the western bank of the Nile, opposite Antinopolis. It is now called Eshmounein HERMOTIMUS, a famous prophet of Clazomenæ It is said that his soul separated itself from his body, and wandered in every part of the earth to explain futurity, after which it returned again and animated his frame. His wife, who was acquainted with the frequent absence of his soul, took advantage of it and burnt his body, as if totally dead, and deprived the soul of its natural receptacle Hermotimus received divine honours in a temple at Clazomenæ, into which it was unlawful for women to enter. Plin. 7, 52, &c.—Lucian.

HERMUNDURI, a powerful nation of Germany, extending from the neighbourhood of the Elbe to the Danube, and from the upper course of the Mayn to the plains of Bohemia. Lupphurdum, or Leipzig, in the kingdom of Saxony, was one of their chief towns. Plin. 4, 14.—Tacit. Ann. 13, extra.—Vell. 2, 106.

HERMUS, a river of Asia Minor, rising in mount Dindymene, in Phrygia, and after running through the northern part of Lydia, discharging itself into the sea near Phocæa. It receives, besides other rivers, the Pactolus and Hyllus. The plains which this river watered were termed the plains of Hermus, and the gulf into which it discharged itself was anciently called the Hermæan gulf; but when Theseus, a person of distinction in Thessaly, founded on this gulf a town, which he called Smyrna, after the name of his wife, the gulf was denominated Smyrnæus Sinus, or gulf of Smyrna, a name which it still retains. The waters of the Hermus were said by the poets to roll down gold. The modern name of the river is the Sarabat. Plin. 5, 29.—Herod. 1, 80. 5, 101.—Virg. G. 2, 137.—Homer. Il. 20, 392.

HERNICI, a people of Latium, bordering on the Æqui and Marsi. They were probably descended from the Sabines. They are said to have derived their name from the rocky nature of their country; hernæ, in the Sabine language, denoting a rock. Their chief city was Anagnia, now Anagni. Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 7, 684.—Sil. 4, 226.—Dion. Hal. 8, 69.—Liv. 2, 41. 9, 43.

HERO, a beautiful priestess of Venus at Sestos, greatly enamoured of Leander, a youth of Abydos. These two lovers were so faithful to one another, that Leander in the night escaped from the vigilance of his family, and swam across the Hellespont, while Hero in Sestos directed his course by holding a burning torch on the top of a high tower. After many interviews of mutual affection and tenderness, Leander was drowned in a tempestuous night as he attempted this usual course, and Hero in despair threw herself down from her tower and perished in the sea Musæus de Leand. et Hero.—Ovid Heroid. 17 et 18.—Virg. G 3, 258.

HERODES, surnamed the Great, second son of Antipater the Idumæan, was born B. C. 71, at Ascalon, in Judæa. At the age of twenty-five, he was made by his father governor of Galilee, and distinguished himself by the suppression of a band of robbers, and the execution of their leader, with several of his comrades. He was summoned before the Sanhedrim for having done this by his own authority, and put these men to death without a trial; but through the strength of his party, and zeal of his friends, he escaped censure. He at first embraced the party of Brutus and Cassius; but, after their death, reconciled himself to Antony, by whose interest he was first named tetrarch, and afterwards king of Judæa. After the battle of Actium, he so successfully paid his court to the victor, that Augustus confirmed him in his kingdom, and on all occasions his abilities as a politician and commander were conspicuous In other respects his passions were fierce and ungovernable. Although married to the celebrated Mariamne, a princess of the Asmonean family, her brother Aristobulus, and venerable grandfather Hyrcanus, fell victims to his jealousy of the ancient pretensions of their race. His very love of Mariamne herself, mingled as it was with the most fearful jealousy, terminated in her execution; and his repentance and keen remorse on her death, only exasperated him to farther outrages against her surviving relations; her mother, Alexandra, and many more falling victims to his savage cruelty. His own sons by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus, whom indignation at the treatment of their mother seems to have led into some intrigues against his authority, were also sacrificed in his anger, and their deaths crowned the domestic barbarity of Herod. It was the latter event which induced Augustus to observe that it was better to be Herod's hog than his son. He rebuilt the temple of Jerusalem with great magnificence, and erected a stately theatre and amphitheatre in that city, in which he celebrated games in honour of Augustus, to the great displeasure of the more zealous of the Jews. He also rebuilt Samaria, which he called Sebaste, and adorned it with sumptuous edifices. He likewise, for his security, constructed many strong fortresses throughout Judæa, the principal one of which he termed Cæsarea, after the emperor. Such, indeed, was the magnificence he displayed in many public works, that Augustus said that his soul was too great for his kingdom. The birth of Jesus Christ took place in the thirty-third year of the reign of Herod, which important event was followed in a year or two by his death, of a languishing and loathsome disease, at the age of sixty-eight. According to Josephus, he planned a scene of posthumous cruelty, which could have been conceived only by the hardest and most depraved heart. Having summoned the chief persons among the Jews to Jericho, he caused them to be shut up in the circus, and gave strict orders to his sister, Salome, to have them massacred at his death, that every great family should weep for him, which savage order was not executed.——Antipas, son of Herod the Great, by Cleopatra, was appointed tetrarch of Galilee on his death. This was the Herod who put to death John the Baptist, in compliment to his wife Herodias, in revenge for his reproaches of their incestuous union; Herodias having been united to, and forcibly taken away from his brother Aretas. The ambition of Herodias stimulated her husband to a measure which proved his ruin. His nephew, Agrippa, having obtained royal honours from Caligula, she induced Herod to visit Rome to request the same favour, where he was met by an accusation on the part of Agrippa, of having been concerned in the conspiracy of Sejanus, and of being in secret league with the king of Parthia. This accusation being credited, he was stripped of his dominions, and sent with his wife into exile at Lyons, or, as some say, to Spain, where he died, after possessing his tetrarchy for forty-three years.——Agrippa, son of Aristobulus, and grandson of Herod the Great, born three years before the birth of our Saviour, and seven before the vulgar era. Vid. Agrippa.

HERODIANUS, a Greek historian, who flourished during the first part of the third century of our era, and died about A. D. 240, at the age of seventy years. He was born at Alexandria, and was employed among the officers of the Roman emperors. He wrote a history of Rome, in eight books, from the death of Marcus Aurelius to the accession of Gordian III., and he asserts that he had either seen or been personally acquainted with all that he relates. His style is peculiarly elegant, but it wants precision, and the work too plainly betrays that the author was not a perfect master of geography, nor sufficiently accurate in chronology. He has been accused of being too partial towards Maximinus, and severe with regard to Alexander Severus. His book comprehends the history of fifty-eight years. The best editions of this author are that of Irmisch, 5 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1789-1805; and that of Wolf, 8vo, Halle, 1792.——A grammarian of Alexandria, who flourished in the second century of the Christian era.

HERODICUS, a physician surnamed Gymnastic, who flourished B. C 443.——A grammarian surnamed Crateteus, B. C 123.

HERODOTUS, the oldest of the Greek historians, whose works are extant, and who is called by Cicero "The Father of History," was born at Halicarnassus, in Caria, in the first year of the seventy-fourth Olympiad, answering to B. C. 484. He fled to Samos when his country laboured under the oppressions and tyranny exercised by Lygdamis, and travelled, in the acquisition of knowledge, over Greece, Egypt, and Italy, collecting everywhere all the information he could obtain concerning the history and origin of nations. He is supposed to have retired to the isle of Samos for the composition of his work; he afterwards revisited his native place, and was chiefly instrumental in overthrowing the tyrannical government, a deed, which of itself alone ought to have immortalized his name, but so far from gaining the esteem and admiration of the people, it displeased and irritated them, and Herodotus was obliged to fly from Greece to avoid public resentment. When he had attained to his thirty-ninth year, a generous desire of fame led him publicly to recite his history to the people assembled at the Olympic games. It was received with universal applause, and gave him a lasting celebrity through all the Grecian states. So highly was the history esteemed by his contemporaries, that the names of the nine muses were given unanimously to the nine books of which it is composed. This celebrated composition is written in the Ionic dialect, and Herodotus is among historians, what Homer is among poets, and Demosthenes among orators. His history comprehends a period of about 240 years, from Cyrus the Great to Xerxes, and it contains, besides the transactions between Persia and Greece, a sketch of the affairs of other nations, as the Lydians, Ionians, Lycians, Egyptians, and Macedonians. The style of Herodotus is admired for its ease and sweetness, and he chiefly excels in narration. The value of his history has been a subject of much discussion and controversy, but the most considerate opinion deems him deserving of credit, in relation to the affairs of Greece which took place after his own birth; and in other respects he is believed to relate the traditional accounts concerning remote times and countries, just as he heard them, without feeling much solicitude to distinguish fact from fable. This carelessness has laid him open to the satire of Juvenal, and in modern times to that of Voltaire. Plutarch also accuses him of partiality, and composed a treatise "On the Malignity of Herodotus," taxing him with injustice to the Thebans, Corinthians, and Greeks in general. His work, however, will always be deemed one of the most precious remains of antiquity. A life of Homer is ascribed to Herodotus, which is evidently supposititious. The best editions of Herodotus are that of Wesseling, fol Amst. 1763, and that of Schweighaeuser, 6 vols. 8vo, Argent. et Paris, 1816. He has been translated into most modern languages; the English versions are those by Littlebury, Beloe, Laurent, and Taylor. Cic. de Leg. 1. De Orat. 2.—*Dionys. HEROES, a name which was given by the ancients to such as were born from a god, or to such as had signalised themselves by their actions, and seemed to deserve immortality by the services which they had rendered their country. The heroes which Homer describes, such as Ajax, Achilles, &c., were of such prodigious strength that they could lift up and throw stones which the united force of four or five men of his age could not have moved. The heroes were supposed to be interested in the affairs of mankind after death, and they were invoked with much solemnity. As the altars of the gods were crowded with sacrifices and libations, so the heroes were often honoured with a funeral solemnity, in which their great exploits were enumerated. The origin of heroism might proceed from the opinions of some philosophers, who taught that the souls of great men were often raised to the stars, and introduced among the immortal gods. According to the notions of the Stoics, the ancient heroes inhabited a pure and serene climate, situate above the moon. Besides those heroes, such as Bacchus, Hercules, Æsculapius, &c., who were raised to the dignity of gods, the Greeks have celebrated the names of Cadmus, Inachus, Jasius, Perseus, Theseus, Cecrops, Erichthon, Pandion, Triptolemus, Celeus, Hippolytus, Menelaus, Agamemnon, Castor and Pollux, Æacus, Peleus, and many others, all of whom had monuments erected to celebrate their memory, and groves consecrated around their tomb, where the vows of their descendants and admirers were frequently poured forth with all the fervour of devotion, accompanied with gifts and oblations. Cic. de Nat. D. 9, 15 et 19.—Strab. 6, &c.—Paus. 1, 20, 10, 8.—Diod. 4.

HEROIS, a festival, celebrated every ninth year by the Delphians, in honour of a heroine. There were in the celebration a great number of mysterious rites, with a representation of something like Semele's resurrection.

HERON, the name of two mathematicians, called by way of distinction, the elder and the younger. The first was a native of Alexandria, and the disciple of Ctesibius. He was celebrated for his skill in mechanics, and he was also a teacher of moral philosophy. There are extant of his part of a treatise, "De Constructione et Mensura Manubalistæ;" another, "De Telis Confciendis Jaculandique;" and one entitled "De Automatorum Fabrica." Heron the younger flourished in the reign of Heraclius. He wrote "De Machinis Bellicis;" "Geodesia;" "Liber de Obsidione Repellenda et Toleranda;" and "De Vocabulis Geometricis et Stereometricis."

HEROOPŌLIS, a city of Egypt, about midway between Pelusium and the head of the Red sea, where, according to Egyptian mythology, Typhon was struck dead by lightning. It gave name to the Heroopoliticus Sinus, or western arm of the Red sea, and appears to have been the same with Pithom, or Patumos, built for Pharaoh by the children of Israel.

HEROPHĪLA, a Sibyl, who, as some suppose, came to Rome in the reign of Tarquin. Others suppose her more ancient, and fix her age before the Trojan war, as she foretold that Helen would one day prove the destruction of Priam's kingdom. She composed several poems, some of which were said to be in possession of the people of Delos, so late as the reign of Antoninus. She gave oracles at Samos, Delphi, Delos, and Claros, and died in Troas, where her monument was to be seen in the age of Pausanias, in a grove sacred to Apollo Sminthæus. (Vid. Sibyllæ.) Paus. 10. 12.

HEROPHĪLUS an impostor in the reign of Julius Cæsar, who pretended to be the grandson of Marius. He was banished from Rome by Cæsar for his seditions, and was afterwards strangled in prison.——A physician of Chalcedon, who lived about 300 B. C. He discovered the lacteals and the nerves, with their uses: besides which, he was the first who wrote accurately on the pulse. Galen praises him highly as a physician and anatomist.

HEROSTRĀTUS. Vid. Erostratus.

HERSE, a daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, beloved by Mercury. The god disclosed his love to Aglauros, Herse's sister, in hopes of procuring an easy admission to Herse; but Aglauros, through jealousy, discovered the amour. Mercury was so offended at her behaviour, that he struck her with his caduceus and changed her into a stone. Herse became mother of Cephalus by Mercury, and after death, she received divine honours at Athens. Ovid. Met. 2, 559, &c.——A wife of Danaus. Apollod.

HERSEPHORIA, festivals celebrated at Athens in June, in honour of Minerva, or more probably of Herse, daughter of Cecrops. Young maidens between the age of seven and eleven, descended from the most illustrious families, were dressed in white habits, and carried in procession the sacred vases and other requisite utensils. Cakes, called πανες, were made for their entertainment.

HERSILIA, one of the Sabines carried away by the Romans at the celebration of the Consualia. She was given and married to Romulus, though according to some she married Hostus, a youth of Latium, by whom she had Hostus Hostilius. After death she was presented with immortality by Juno, and received divine honours under the name of Ora or Horta, because she exhorted and invited her votaries to virtue and morality. Liv. 1, 11.—Ovid. Met. 14, 832.

HERTHA and HERTA, a goddess among the Germans supposed to be the same as the earth. She had a temple and a chariot dedicated to her service in a remote island, and was supposed to visit the earth at stated times. No person, except her ministers, was permitted to touch her sacred chariot, but as soon as the priests declared that the goddess had entered into it, chosen heifers were harnessed to it, and it was conducted through the country, where rejoicings, and the acclamations of a venerating people marked the solemn procession. Tacit. de Germ. 40.

HERŪLI, a barbarian race, who attacked the Roman empire on its decline. According to Jornandes and Procopius, they were originally a Gothic nation. The former writer affirms that they first dwelt in Scandinavia, and, being expelled from thence by the Danes, they wandered eastward as far as the Palus Mæotis, and settled in that neighbourhood. Procopius represents them as in ancient times inhabiting the countries that lie beyond the Danube. Here they continued making frequent incursions into the empire, until the reign of Anastasius, when great numbers of them were cut off by the Lombards, and the rest migrated to the west. They began to invade the empire about A. D. 526.

HESIŌDUS, a celebrated Greek poet, supposed by some to have been a contemporary with Homer, though others have dated the era in which he flourished a century later. He was probably born at Cuma, in Æolia, but removed in his infancy with his father to Ascra, in Bœotia. Those who contend that he was a contemporary of Homer, affirm, that he even obtained a poetical prize in competition with him. He is, at an rate, the first that is known to have written a poem on agriculture. This is entitled "The Works and Days," being a kind of calendar of rural occupations; but, besides the instructions which are given to the cultivator of the ground, the reader is gratified by a variety of moral reflections, worthy of a Socrates or Plato. His "Theogony" is a miscellaneous relation, executed without much art or judgment; yet it has been highly esteemed for the faithful account it given of the gods of antiquity. "The Shield of Hercules" is but the fragment of a much larger poem, in which it is imagined the author gave an account of the most celebrated heroines among the ancients. Hesiod is said to have written several other works, which are lost. He is admired for the elegance of his diction, and the sweetness of his poetry. Pausanias says, that in his age, the verses of Hesiod were written on tablets, in the temple of the Muses, of which the poet was a priest. Virgil, in his Georgics, has imitated the manner of Hesiod, though he has gone far beyond the model in every kind of excellence. The Greeks were so partial to the poetry and moral instructions of Hesiod, that they ordered their children to commit them to memory. Hesiod was murdered by the sons of Ganyctor, of Naupactum, and his body thrown into the sea. The best editions of Hesiod are that of Robinson, 4to, Oxon. 1737; that of Loesner, 8vo, Lips. 1778; and that of Zamagna, 4to, Parm 1785. There are English translations by Chapman, Cooke, and Elton Cic. Fam. 6, 18.—Paus. 9, 3, &c.—Quintil. 10, 1.—Paterc. 1, 7.—Varro.—Plut de T. Sep. et de Anim. Sag.

HESIONE, a daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, by Strymo, the daughter of the Scamander It fell to her lot to be exposed to a sea monster, to whom the Trojans yearly presented a marriagable virgin, to appease the resentment of Apollo and Neptune, whom Laomedon had offended; but Hercules undertook to deliver her, provided he received as a reward six beautiful horses. Laomedon consented, and Hercules attacked the monster just as he was going to devour Hesione, and he killed him with his club Laomedon, however, refused to reward the hero's services; and Hercules, incensed at his treachery, besieged Troy, and put the king and all his family to the sword, except Podarces, or Priam, who had advised his father to give the promised horses to his sister's deliverer. The conqueror gave Hesione in marriage to his friend Telamon, who had assisted him during the war, and he established Priam upon his father's throne. The removal of Hesione to Greece proved at last fatal to the Trojans; and Priam, who remembered with indignation that his sister had been forcibly given to a foreigner, sent his son Paris to Greece to reclaim the possessions of Hesione, or more probably to revenge his injuries upon the Greeks by carrying away Helen, which gave rise, soon after, to the Trojan war. Lycophron mentions, that Hercules threw himself, armed, from head to foot, into the mouth of the monster to which Hesione was exposed, and that he tore his belly to pieces, and came out safe only with the loss of his hair, after a confinement of three days *Homer. HESPERIA, a large island of Africa, once the residence of the Amazons Diod 3.—A name common to both Italy and Spain. It is derived from Hesper or Vesper, the setting sun, or the evening, whence the Greeks called Italy Hesperia, because it was situate at the setting sun, or in the west. The same name, for similar reasons, was applied to Spain by the Latins Virg Æn 1, 534, &c.—Horat. Od. 1, 36, 4. 1, 27, 28.—Sil. 7, 15.—Ovid. Met. 11, 253.—A daughter of the Cebrenus *Ovid. HESPERIDES, three celebrated nymphs, daughters of Hesperus. Apollodorus mentions four, Ægle, Erythia, Vesta, and Arethusa; and Diodorus confounds them with the Atlantides, and supposes that they were the same number. They were appointed to guard the golden apples which Juno gave to Jupiter on the day of their nuptials; and the place of their residence, placed beyond the ocean by Hesiod, is more universally believed to be near mount Atlas in Africa, according to Apollodorus. This celebrated place or garden abounded with fruits of the most delicious kind, and was carefully guarded by a dreadful dragon which never slept. It was one of the labours of Hercules to procure some of the golden apples of the Hesperides. The hero, ignorant of the situation of this celebrated garden, applied to the nymphs in the neighbourhood of the Po for information, and was told that Nereus, the god of the sea, if properly managed, (Vid. Nereus) could direct him in his pursuits. Hercules seized Nereus as he was asleep, and the sea god, unable to escape from his grasp, answered all the questions which he proposed. Some say that Nereus sent Hercules to Prometheus, and that from him he received all his information. When Hercules came into Africa, he repaired to Atlas, and demanded of him three of the golden apples. Atlas unloaded himself, and placed the burden of the heavens on the shoulders of Hercules, while he went in quest of the apples. At his return Hercules expressed his wish to ease the burden by putting something on his head, and when Atlas assisted him to remove his inconvenience, Hercules artfully left the burden, and seized the apples, which Atlas had thrown on the ground. According to other accounts, Hercules gathered the apples himself, without the assistance of Atlas, and he previously killed the watchful dragon which kept the tree. These apples were brought to Eurystheus, and afterwards carried back by Minerva into the garden of the Hesperides, as they could be preserved in no other place. Hercules is sometimes represented gathering the apples, and the dragon which guarded the tree appears bowing down his head, as having received a mortal wound. This monster, as it is supposed, was the offspring of Typhon, and it had a hundred heads and as many voices. This number, however, is reduced by some to only one head. Those that attempt to explain mythology observe, that the Hesperides were certain persons who had an immense number of flocks, and that the ambiguous word μηλον, which signifies an apple and a sheep, gave rise to the fable of the golden apples of the Hesperides. Dupuis, who makes Hercules to have been the sun, and refers his twelve labours to the passage of that luminary through the signs of the zodiac, explains the fable of the Hesperides as follows. In the twelfth month, making the first coincide with Leo, the sun enters the sign Cancer. At this period the constellation of Hercules Ingeniculus descends towards the western regions, called Hesperia, followed by the polar dragon, the guardian of the apples of the Hesperides. On the celestial sphere Hercules tramples the dragon under foot, which falls towards him as it sets. Hence the fable. The gardens of the Hesperides are placed by geographical writers near the ancient Berenice, now Bengasi, in Cyrenaica, on the Mediterranean coast of Africa. Diod. 4.—Ovid Met. 4, 637, &c. 9, 90.—Hygin. fab. 30.—Apollod 2, 5.—*Hesiod. HESPERIDUM INSULÆ, are generally supposed to answer to the Cape Verde islands; but as these are too far from the coast, they possibly may have been rather the small islands called Bissagos, lying a little above Sierra Leone.

HESPERIS. Vid. Hesperus.—A town of Cyrenaica, now Bernic or Bengazi, where most authors have placed the gardens of the Hesperides.

HESPERITIS, a country of Africa Diod. 4.

HESPERIUM CORNU, a promontory on the western coast of Africa, now Cape Verde.

HESPERIUS SINUS, a bay on the western coast of Africa, now the bay or gulf of Benguo.

HESPERUS, a son of Japetus, brother to Atlas. He is said to have ascended mount Atlas to make observations on the stars, and as he never returned, the evening star was called after his name. According to the report of some authors he came to Italy, and the country received the name of Hesperia from him. He had a daughter called Hesperis, who married Atlas, and became mother of seven daughters, called Atlantides or Hesperides. Diod. 4.——The name of Hesperus was also applied to the planet Venus, when it appeared after the setting of the sun. It was called Phosphorus or Lucifer when it preceded the sun. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, 2.—Senec. de Hippol. 749. Id. in Med. 71.

HESUS, a deity among the Gauls, the same as the Mars of the Romans Lucan. 1, 445.

HESYCHIA, a daughter of Thespius. Apollod.

HESYCHIUS, a grammarian of Alexandria, of whom no particulars are known, nor even of the age when he lived. It appears that he was well acquainted with the Christian religion; and it is supposed that he was a disciple of Gregory Nazianzen. His Lexicon is a very valuable work; the best edition of which is that of Alberti, completed by Ruhnken, 2 vols. fol. L. Bat. 1746 – 1776.——A native of Miletus, who flourished under the emperors Justin and Justinian. He composed an "Universal History" from the reign of Belus, king of Assyria, to the death of the Greek emperor, Anastasius, which is no longer extant; but he wrote a treatise "De Viris Doctrina claris," and another, "De Rebus patriis Constantinopoleos," which still remain. They were published together, by Meursius, 12mo. L. Bat. 1613.

HETRICOLUM, now Lattarico a town in the country of the Bruttii Liv. 30, 19.

HETRURIA and ETRURIA, a celebrated country of Italy, bounded on the north by the river Macra and the Apennines, on the east and south by the Tiber, and on the west by the Tyrrhenian sea. It included the duchy of Massa and principality of Carrara, the duchy of Lucca, the grand duchy of Tuscany, and that part of the Papal States which is west of the Tiber. The inhabitants of Etruria were called Tyrrheni or Tyreni by the Greeks, and Tusci or Etrusci by the Romans. But the unity of these two people as well as their origin are points not generally agreed on: some bringing the Tyrrheni under the conduct of Tyrrhenus, on the occasion of a great famine, from Lydia in Asia Minor to the shores of the Adriatic amongst the Umbri; others, again, bringing them from the shores of Thrace and the northern islands of the Ægean Sea under the name of Pelasgi. Arriving in Umbria they found its aboriginal people at war with the Siculi, and joined them in the expulsion of the latter, whose territory (Etruria) was assigned to them by the Umbri. Here they built their twelve great cities Volaterræ, Vetulonii, Arretium, Cortona, Perusia, Clusium, Rusellæ, Vulsinii, Faleriі, Tarquinii, Veii, and Caere, each of which had its separate governor under the title Lucumon. The Tusci, on the other hand, were, probably, an aboriginal people, dwelling at first near the Umbri; they seem by degrees not only to have become masters of the country of the Tyrrheni, but also to have encroached on the territory of the Umbri, driving them from the banks of the Tiber, and wresting from them city after city till their dominions extended beyond the Po, and from the shores of the Adriatic to the Tuscan Sea. The Tuscans were remarkable for their superstition, and for their belief in divination and augury; their comic dancers, called Ludii, were also in great reputation. Plin. 3, 5.—Strab. 5.—Plut. in Rom.—Mela, 2, 4.

HIEMPSAL, a king of Numidia. Cic. Vat. 5. Rull 1, 4.——A son of Micipsa, cruelly murdered by Jugurtha. Sallust. in Jug. 12.

HIERA, a woman who married Telephus, king of Mysia, and who was said to surpass Helen in beauty.—— The mother of Pandarus and Bitias by Alcanor. Virg. Æn. 9, 673.—— One of the Lipari islands, called also Thereasia, now Vulcano. Paus. 10, 11.

HIERAPOLIS, a city of Syria near the Euphrates, south of Zeugma. It derived its Greek name (Holy City) from the circumstance of the Syrian goddess Atargatis being worshipped there. It was called Bambyce, or Mabog by the Syrians. It is now known as Bumbouck or Mombedj. —— A city in the south-western angle of Phrygia, near the confines of Lydia, and north-west of Laodicea. It was celebrated for its warm springs. It was the birth-place of Epictetus, the Stoic philosopher. Its modern name is Tabuk Kalasi.

HIERAX, a youth who awoke Argus to inform him that Mercury was stealing Io. Mercury killed him, and changed him into a bird of prey. Apollod. 2, 1.——Antiochus king of Syria, and brother to Seleucus, received the surname of Hierax. Justin. 27 2.——An Egyptian philosopher in the third century

HIERICHUS, (urbs) the name of Jericho in the Holy Land, called the city of palm-trees, from its abounding in dates. Vid Jericho. Plin 5, 14 ——Tacit. H. 5, 6

HIERO 1st, a king of Syracuse, after his brother Gelon, who rendered himself odious in the beginning of his reign by his cruelty and avarice. He made war against Theron, the tyrant of Agrigentum, and took Himera. He obtained three different crowns at the Olympic games, two in horse races, and one at a chariot race, and from these victories, immortalized by the pen of Pindar, he has obtained greater celebrity than from the administration of government, or the successive defeat of his jealous neighbours. In the latter part of his reign the conversation of Simonides, Epicharmus, Pindar, &c., softened in some measure the roughness of his morals and the severity of his government, and rendered him the patron of learning, genius, and merit. He died, after a reign of eighteen years, B. C 467, leaving the crown to his brother Thrasybulus, who disgraced himself by his vices and tyranny. Herod 7.—Athen. 14.—Cic. de Nat. D. 1, 22.—Diod. 11.——The second of that name, king of Syracuse, was descended from Gelon. He was unanimously elected king by all the states of the island of Sicily, and appointed to carry on the war against the Carthaginians. He joined his enemies in besieging Messana, which had surrendered to the Romans, but though brave and at the head of a valorous army, he was beaten by Appius Claudius, the Roman consul, and obliged to retire to Syracuse, where he was soon blocked up. Seeing all hope of victory lost, he made peace with the Romans, and proved so faithful to his engagements during the fifty-nine years of his reign, that the Romans never had a more firm, or more attached ally He died in the ninety-fourth year of his age, about 225 years before the Christian era. He was universally regretted, and all the Sicilians showed, by their lamentations, that they had lost in him a common father and a friend. He liberally patronized the learned, and employed the talents of his relation Archimedes for the good and the ornament of his country. He wrote a book on agriculture, now lost He was succeeded by Hieronymus. *Ælian. V. HIEROCÆSAREA, a town of Lydia. Tacit. A. 2, 47 3. 62

HIEROCLES, a Platonic philosopher of Alexandria, about A D. 450. It is said that he was persecuted by the Christians, and yet he was suffered to deliver lectures on philosophy at Alexandria. He wrote a treatise on Providence, extracts from which are in Photius; another on Fate; and a commentary on the Golden Verses of Pythagoras, which last is extant. The best edition of his commentary is that of Warner, 8vo. Lond. 1742.——A prefect of Bithynia, regarded as the author of the persecution of the Christians under Diocletian. He wrote a work on the Veterinary Art, of which some fragments remain. ——A general in the interest of Demetrius. Polyæn 3. ——An officer Vid Heliogabalus.

HIERONICA LEX, by Hiero, tyrant of Sicily, to settle the quantity of corn, the price and time of receiving it, between the farmers of Sicily and the collector of the corn tax at Rome This law, on account of its justice and candour, was continued by the Romans when they became masters of Sicily. Cic. Verr. 2, 13 et 60.

HIERONYMUS, a tyrant of Sicily, who succeeded his grandfather Hiero, when only fifteen years old. He made himself odious by his cruelty, oppression, and debauchery, and as if to render his reign more unpopular, he abjured the alliance of Rome, which Hiero had observed with so much honour and advantage. He was assassinated, and all his family was overwhelmed in his fall, and totally extirpated, B C 214. Sil. 14, 87.—Liv. 24, 4, &c.——An historian of Rhodes, who wrote an account of the actions of Demetrius Poliorcetes, by whom he was appointed over Boeotia, B. C. 294. Plut. in Dem. ——An Athenian set over the fleet, while Conon went to the king of Persia.——A father of the church (St Jerome), born of Christian parents, at Stridon, on the confines of Pannonia and Dalmatia, A D 331 He studied at Rome under Donatus, and made a great proficiency in classical literature, as well as in Hebrew, divinity, and rhetoric. After travelling through France and Italy, he visited Jerusalem; and in his thirty-first year adopted the monastic life in Syria, but suffered so much by hard study, and rigid abstinence, as to be under the necessity of going to Antioch, where he was ordained a presbyter in 378. Soon after this he went to Constantinople, where he lived with Gregory Nazianzen, whom he called his master. In 382 he visited Rome, and was made secretary to pope Damasus; but three years afterwards he returned into the east, accompanied by several monks and ladies, who wished to lead an ascetic life in the Holy Land Here Jerome settled at Bethlehem, but his peace was disturbed by the progress of Origen's opinions, against which he wrote with great vehemence; his principal opponent being Ruffinus, with whom he had formerly been on terms of friendship. He died A. D. 422. The first edition of the works of St Jerome was published by Erasmus, in 6 vols folio, 1516–1526; but the best is that of the Benedictines, at Paris, in 5 vols folio, 1693—1706.

HIEROPHILUS, a Greek physician. He instructed his daughter Agnodice in the art of midwifery, &c. Vid. Agnodice.

HIEROSOLYMA, a celebrated city of Palestine, the capital of Judæa. According to Josephus it was founded by Melchisedec, and it is supposed to have been the same with the city of Salem, mentioned by Moses. It was afterwards named Jebus, from Jebusæus, son of Canaan. The Jebusites held it until the time of David, when it was taken possession of by the tribe of Benjamin, who allowed the ancient inhabitants to remain. It was then called by the Hebrews Ierushalaim or Ierushalem, "the people or dwelling of peace." The name Hierosolyma was applied to it by the Greeks and Romans. It was built on several hills, the largest of which was mount Sion, which formed the southern part of the city. A valley towards the north separated this from Acra, the second or lower city, on the east of which was mount Moriah, the site of the temple of Solomon. North-east of mount Moriah was the mount of Olives, on the south was the valley of Hinnom, and, at the north, mount Calvary, the scene of the crucifixion of our Lord. It was besieged by Titus, and, after an obstinate defence, was taken and completely destroyed by him, according to the prophecy of our Saviour, A D. 70; this occurred, according to Josephus, 2,177 years after its foundation. It is said that during the siege, 1,100,000 persons perished, and that 97,000 more were made prisoners, most of whom were afterwards either sold for slaves, or exposed to the fury of wild beasts. The zeal of the Jews, however, and their veneration for the holy altar of their fathers, induced them to rebuild both the city and the temple, though without any of their former splendour; but owing to an uproar amongst them, which took place under the reign of Hadrian, they were all banished from the city upon pain of death, and their temple was wantonly profaned by the erection of an altar to Jupiter Capitolinus. The city was made a Roman colony, and called Ælia Capitolina, until the Christian emperors ascended the throne. *Joseph. Bell. HIGNATIA VIA, a large road, which led from the Ionian sea to the Hellespont, across Macedonia, about 536 miles. Strab 7.

HILARIA, a daughter of Leucippus and Philodice. As she and her sister Phœbe were going to marry their cousins Lynceus and Idas, they were carried away by Castor and Pollux, who married them. Hilaria had Anagon by Castor, and she, as well as her sister, obtained after death the honours which were generally paid to heroes. Apollod. 3.—Propert. 1, 2, 16.—Paus 2, 22 3, 19. ——Festivals at Rome in honour of the mother of the gods, observed on the 25th of March, when nature, over which the goddess presided, seemed to resume the vigour of the returning year The city was then filled for several days with gaiety and pleasure, the statue of the goddess was carried in procession through the streets, preceded by the most valuable possessions, which every votary was eager to produce on those occasions. Every appearance of sorrow and mourning was suspended or banished from the city, and individuals were permitted to dress themselves in whatever attire they pleased, and even to assume the robes of magistrates HILARIUS, a father of the church, was born at Poictiers in France, and educated in the Pagan religion, which he renounced when grown up to years of judgment. In 355, he was made bishop of Poictiers, in which situation he distinguished himself by his zeal for the orthodox faith against the Arians; for which he was banished to Phrygia, where he continued four years, and employed himself in writing his books on the Trinity, and other works. On his return to France he continued to exert himself in vindication of the doctrines of the church, till his death in 367. The best edition of his works is that of Paris, folio, 1693.——A bishop of Arles, a semi-pelagian in his opinions, who wrote a life of St Honoratus, and some devotional tracts. He died in 449, and, like the former, enjoyed the honours of canonization.

HILLEVIÓNES, a people of Scandinavia. Plin. 4, 13.

HIMELLA, now the Aja, a small river in the country of the Sabines. Virg. Æn. 7, 714.

HIMERA, a river of Sicily, falling into the Upper or Tuscan sea, to the east of Panormus; now Fiume Grande. The city of Himera stood a short distance to the west of its mouth.——Another river of Sicily, larger than the former. It rises in the same quarter with it, but pursues an opposite course, to the south, and falls into the Mediterranean near Phintia, and to the west of Gela. Its modern name is Fiume Salso.——A city of Sicily, at the mouth of a river of the same name, on the northern coast. It is said to have been founded by a colony of Chalcidians from Zancle, about A. U. C. 104. It was destroyed by the Carthaginians under Hannibal, who took the place by assault, razed it to its foundation, and treated the inhabitants with great cruelty, A. U. HIPPARCHIA, the wife of Crates the Cynic. Vid Crates.

HIPPARCHUS, a son of Pisistratus, who, together with his brother Hippias, succeeded his father as tyrant of Athens. He distinguished himself by his patronage of literature and learned men. An insult offered by him to the sister of Harmodius so irritated the latter, that he formed a secret party against him, and in conjunction with Aristogiton, a friend of his, slew Hipparchus in the public streets. Aristogiton for the moment escaped the guards, from the concourse of people, but being afterwards apprehended, was, to use the language of Thucydides, "not very mildly dealt with." As to Harmodius, he was slain on the spot. Thucyd. 6, 54, &c.—— One of Antony's freedmen.——The first person who was banished by ostracism at Athens.——The father of Asclepiades.——A celebrated astronomer, was born at Nicæa in Bithynia, and flourished between 160 and 125 B. C. He first reduced astronomy to a science, and prosecuted the study systematically. His catalogue of the fixed stars is in Ptolemy's Almagest, and he was the first who discovered the precession of the equinoxes. His observations were in the isle of Rhodes, whence he obtained the name of Rhodius; but afterwards he settled at Alexandria His commentary upon the Phænomena of Aratus is extant, and was printed at Florence, in 1567, folio. Plin. 2, 12 et 26 7, 5 ——An Athenian who conspired against Heraclides, who kept Athens for Demetrius, &c. Polyæn. 5.

HIPPEUS, a son of Hercules by Procris, the eldest of the fifty daughters of Thestius. Apollod 2, 7.

HIPPIA, a lascivious woman, &c. Juv. 6, 52

——A surname of Minerva, and also of Juno Paus. 5, 15.

HIPPIAS, a philosopher of Elis, who maintained that virtue consisted in not being in want of the assistance of men. At the Olympic games, he boasted that he was master of all the liberal and mechanical arts; and he said that the ring upon his finger, the tunic, cloak, and shoes, which he then wore, were all the work of his own hands. Cic. de Orat. 3, 32.——A son of Pisistratus, who became tyrant of Athens after the death of his father, with his brother Hipparchus. He was willing to revenge the death of his brother, who had been assassinated, and for this violent measure he was driven from his country. He fled to king Darius in Persia, and was killed at the battle of Marathon, fighting against the Athenians, B. C. 490. He had five children by Myrrhine, the daughter of Callias. Herod. 6 — Thucyd. 7.

HIPPIS, an historian and poet of Rhegium, in the reign of Xerxes. Ælian H An 8, 33

HIPPIUS, a surname of Neptune, from his having raised a horse (ἵππος,) from the earth in his contest with Minerva, concerning the giving a name to Athens.

HIPPO REGIUS, a city of Africa in that part of Numidia called the western province. It was situate near the sea, on a bay in the vicinity of the promontory of Hippi. It was called Hippo Regius, not only in contradistinction to Hippo Zarytus mentioned below, but also from its having been one of the royal cities of the Numidian kings. Of this city St Augustine was bishop. The ruins are spread at the present day over the neck of land between the rivers Boojemah and Seibouse. Near the ancient site is a town named Bona.——Zarytus, a town of Africa, on the coast to the west of Utica. It was thus termed to distinguish it from the one above mentioned, and the name is said to have reference to its situation among artificial canals, which afforded the sea an entrance to a navigable lagune adjacent. It is now called Bizerta.

HIPPOBOTES, a large meadow near the Caspian sea, where 50,000 horses could graze HIPPOBOTUS, a Greek historian, who composed a treatise on philosophers. Diog. in Pyth.

HIPPOCENTAURI, a race of monsters who dwelt in Thessaly. Vid. Centauri.

HIPPOCOÖN, a son of Œbalus, brother to Tyndarus. He was put to death by Hercules, because he had driven his brother from the kingdom of Lacedæmon. He was at the chase of the Calydonian boar. Diod 4 — Apollod. 2, &c. 3, 10.— Paus. Lacon — Ovid. Met. 8, 314.——A friend of Æneas, son of Hyrtacus, who distinguished himself in the funeral games of Sicily. Virg. Æn. 3, 492, &c.

HIPPOCORYSTES, a son of Ægyptus.——of Hippocoön Apollod

HIPPOCRÂTE, a daughter of Thespius. Apollod.

HIPPOCRATES, a celebrated physician, born in the island of Cos He studied physic, in which his grandfather Nebrus was so eminently distinguished; and he improved himself by reading the tablets in the temples of the gods, where each individual had written down the diseases under which he had laboured, and the means by which he had recovered. He delivered Athens from a dreadful pestilence in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, and he was publicly rewarded with a golden crown, the privileges of a citizen of Athens, and the initiation at the grand festivals. Skilful and diligent in his profession, he openly declared the measures which he had taken to cure a disease, and candidly confesses that of forty-two patients which were entrusted to his care, only seventeen had recovered, and the rest had fallen a prey to the distemper in spite of his medical applications. He devoted all his time to the service of his country; and when Artaxerxes invited him, even by force of arms to come to his court, Hippocrates firmly and modestly answered, that he was born to serve his countrymen, and not a foreigner. He enjoyed the rewards which his well-directed labours claimed, and while he lived in the greatest popularity, he was carefully employed in observing the symptoms and the growth of every disorder, and from his judicious remarks, succeeding physicians have received the most valuable advantages. The experiments which he had tried upon the human frame increased his knowledge, and from his consummate observations, he knew how to moderate his own life as well as to prescribe to others He died in the ninety-ninth year of his age, B. C. 361, free from all disorders of the mind and body; and after death he received with the name of Great, the same honours which were paid to Hercules. His writings, few of which remain, have procured him the epithet of divine, and show that he was the Homer of his profession. According to Galen, his opinion is as respectable as the voice of an oracle. He wrote in the Ionic dialect, at the advice of Democritus, though he was a Dorian. His memory is still venerated at Cos, and the present inhabitants of the island show a small house, which Hippocrates, as they mention, once inhabited. The best edition of his works is that of Festus, Francof. 1599, fol., reprinted at several subsequent periods, and, with the glossaries, at Geneva, in 1657, fol. In 1815, M. de Mercy commenced a valuable edition of select works of Hippocrates, with a French translation and commentary. The learned Coray also published a translation in French of the treatise on Airs, Waters, and Places, at Paris, 1801, in 2 vols. 8vo, enriched with critical, historical, and medical notes. Plin. 7, 37.—Cic. de Orat 3. *N. HIPPOCRATIA, a festival in honour of Neptune in Arcadia.

HIPPOCRÊNE, a fountain of Bœotia, near mount Helicon, sacred to the muses. It first rose from the ground, when struck by the feet of the horse Pegasus, whence the name ἵππου κρήνη, the horse's fountain Ovid. Met. 5, 256.

HIPPODAME and HIPPODAMIA, a daughter of Œnomaus, king of Pisa, in Elis, who married Pelops son of Tantalus. Her father, who was either enamoured of her himself, or afraid lest he should perish by one of his daughter's children, according to an oracle, refused to marry her, except to him who could overcome him in a chariot race His dexterity in driving and the swiftness of his horses ensured the defeat of his rivals; but to increase their danger, it is said, that he always compelled his daughter to mount the chariot of her lover, either to delay by the charms of her person, or to confound by her presence the probability of success. As the beauty of Hippo damia was greatly celebrated, many courted her, and accepted her father's conditions though death attended a defeat. Thirteen had already been conquered, and forfeited their lives, when Pelops came from Lydia and entered the lists. Pelops previously bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, and ensured himself the victory. In the race, Œnomaus, mounted on a broken chariot, which the corrupted Myrtilus had purposely provided for him, was easily overcome, and was killed in the course, and Pelops married Hippodamia, and avenged the death of Œnomaus, by throwing into the sea the perfidious Myrtilus, who claimed for the reward of his treachery, the favour which Hippodamia could grant only to her husband. Hippodamia became mother of Atreus and Thyestes, and it is said that she died of grief for the death of her father, which her guilty correspondence with Pelops and Myrtilus had occasioned. Others suppose that she destroyed herself when she was discovered to be guilty of the murder of Chrysippus son of Pelops, though it is more probable that she was expelled by her revengeful husband, and that she died at Argos. *Virg. HIPPODĀMUS, a man of Miletus, who settled a republic without any previous knowledge of government Aristot Polit. 2.——An Athenian who gave his house to his country when he knew such a concession would improve the port of the Piræus.——An Athenian archon.

HIPPODRŌMUS, a son of Hercules. Id.——A Thessalian, who succeeded in a school at Athens, in the age of M. Antony. Philostr.——A place wherein chariot and horse-races were performed, and horses exercised.

HIPPOLŌCHUS, a son of Bellerophon, father to Glaucus, who commanded the Lycians during the Trojan war. A son of Glaucus also bore the same name. Homer. Il. 6, 119.——A son of Antimachus, slain in the Trojan war. Id. 11, 122.

HIPPOLŸTE, a queen of the Amazons, given in marriage to Theseus by Hercules, who had conquered her, and taken away her girdle by order of Eurystheus. (Vid. Hercules.) She had son by Theseus, called Hippolytus. Plut. in Thes.—Propert 4, 3.—— The wife of Acastus, who fell in love with Peleus, who was in exile at her husband's court. She accused him of incontinence, and of attempts upon her virtue, before Acastus, only because he refused to gratify her desires. She is also called Astydamia. (Vid Acastus.)——A daughter of Cretheus. Apollod.

HIPPOLŸTUS, a son of Theseus and Hippolyte, famous for his virtues and his misfortunes. His step-mother Phædra fell in love with him, and when he refused to pollute his father's bed, she accused him of offering violence to her person before Theseus. Her accusation was readily believed, and Theseus entreated Neptune severely to punish the incontinence of his son. Hippolytus fled from the resentment of his father, and, as he pursued his way along the sea-shore his horses were so frightened at the noise of sea-calves, which Neptune had purposely sent there, that they ran among the rocks till his chariot was broken and his body torn to pieces. Temples were raised to his memory, particularly at Troezene, where he received divine honours. According to some accounts, Diana restored him to life, and he assumed the name of Virbius. Ovid. Fast. 3, 268. Met 15, 469.—Virg. Æn. 7, 761, &c.——A son of Ropalus, king of Sicyon, greatly beloved by Apollo. Plut. in Num.—— A giant, killed by Mercury.——A son of Ægyptus. Apollod. 1 et 2.—— A Christian martyr of the third century, who suffered under Severus in the fifth persecution, about the year 230. His works have been edited by Fabricius, Hamb. fol. 1716.

HIPPOMĀCHUS, a musician, who severely rebuked one of his pupils because he was praised by the multitude, and observed that it was the greatest proof of his ignorance. Athan. V. H. 2, 6.

HIPPOMĒDON, a son of Nisimachus and Mythidice, who was one of the seven chiefs who went against Thebes. He was killed by Ismarus, son of Acastus. Apollod. 3, 6.—Paus. 2, 36.

HIPPOMEDŪSA, a daughter of Danaus. Apollod.

HIPPOMĒNES, an Athenian archon, who exposed his daughter Limone to be devoured by horses, because guilty of adultery. Ovid. in Ib. 459.—— A son of Macareus and Merope, who married Atalanta, (Vid Atalanta,) with the assistance of Venus. These two fond lovers were changed into lions by Cybele, whose temple they had profaned in their impatience to consummate their nuptials. Ovid. Met. 10, 585, &c.—— The father of Megareus.

HIPPOMOLGI, a people of Scythia, who, as the name implies, lived upon the milk of horses. Dionys. Perieg.—Hippocr. de Aere, &c. 44.

HIPPON and HIPPO, a town of Africa. Vid. Hippo.

HIPPŌNA, a goddess who presided over horses. Her statues were placed in stables. Juv. 8, 157.

HIPPŌNAX, a Greek poet, born at Ephesus, 240 years before the Christian era. He cultivated the same satirical poetry as Archilochus, and was not inferior to him in the beauty or vigour of his lines. His satirical raillery obliged him to fly from Ephesus. As he was naturally deformed, two brothers, Bupalus and Athermus, made a statue of him, which, by the deformity of its features, exposed the poet to universal ridicule. Hipponax resolved to revenge the injury, and he wrote such bitter invectives and such keen and satirical lampoons against them that they hanged themselves in despair. Cic. ad Fam. 7, 24.

HIPPONIATES SINUS, a gulf in the country of the Brutii, near Hipponium.

HIPPONIUM, a town of Italy, on the western coast of the territory of the Brutii, south-west from Scylacium. It was founded by the Locri Epizephyrii, and destroyed by Dionysius. It was subsequently restored under Hannibal, and finally colonized by the Romans, who called it Vibo Valentia. It is now named Monte Leone. Strab. 6.—Dod. Sic. 14, 107, 15, 24.—Liv. 35, 40.

HIPPONŌUS, the father of Periboea and Capaneus. He was killed by the thunderbolts of Jupiter before the walls of Thebes. Apollod. 1, 8, 3, 1——The first name of Bellerophon.——A son of Priam.

HIPPOPODES, a people of Scythia, who have horses feet. The Hippopodes are mentioned by Dionysius Periegetes, Mela, and Pliny. But the truth is, that they had this appellation given them on account of their swiftness of foot.

HIPPOTADES, the patronymic of Æolus, grandson to Hippotas, by Segesta, as also of Acmastus, his son, who was killed in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 11, 674.—Ovid. Met. 11, 431.

HIPPŌTAS or HIPPŌTES, a Trojan prince, changed into a river. (Vid. Crinisus.)—The father of Æolus, who from thence is called Hippotades. Homer. Od. 10, 2.—Ovid. Heroid. 18, 46 Met. 14, 224.

HIPPOTHOE, a daughter of Nestor and Lysidice, carried away to the islands called Echinades by Neptune, by whom she had a son named Taphius. Apollod. 2, 4.—One of the Nereides. Id. 1, 2.—A daughter of Pelias. Id.

HIPPOTHOON, a son of Neptune and Alope, daughter of Cercyon, exposed in the woods by his mother, that her amours with the god might be concealed from her father. Her shame was discovered, and her father ordered her to be put to death. Neptune changed her into a fountain, and the child was preserved by mares, whence his name, and when grown up, placed on his grandfather's throne by the friendship of Theseus. Hygin fab. 187. Paus. 1, 38.

HIPPOTHOONTIS, one of the twelve Athenian tribes, which received its name from Hippothoon

HIPPOTHŌUS, a son of Lethus, killed by Ajax in the Trojan war. Homer Il 2, 347 17, 217 et 288.—A son of Priam. Apollod. 3, 12.—A son of Ægyptus. Id.—One of the hunters of the Calydonian boar. Ovid. Met 1, 307.

HIPPOTION, a prince who assisted the Trojans, and was killed by Merion. Homer. Il. 13, 792. 14. 514

HIPPŪRIS, one of the Sporades now, Hermones,

HIRA, or ALEXANDRIA, now Meyid Ali, a town of Asia in Babylonia, near a lake, at some distance from the western bank of the Euphrates It was the residence of a dynasty of princes, who served the Persians and Parthians against the Romans.

HIRPĪNI, a people of Italy, who formed a part of the Samnites, and were situate to the south of Samnium Proper. They are said to have obtained their name from the word Hirpus, denoting a wolf in the Samnite dialect, owing to their having followed the tracks of that animal in migrating to this quarter. It was towards the end of the second Punic war, that they began to be distinguished from the rest of the Samnites. Their territory comprehended the towns of Beneventum, Caudium, Abellinum, and Compsa

Q. HIRPINUS, a Roman, to whom Horace dedicated his od. 2, 11, and also ep. 1, 16.

HIRTIA LEX, de magistratibus, by A. Hirtius. It required that none of Pompey's adherents should be raised to any office or dignity in the state.

HIRTIUS AULUS, was an officer under Julius Cæsar, and wrote a supplementary part of the Commentaries published in his name The books composed by Hirtius are the eighth of the Gallic war, and those of the Alexandrine and African wars. Of the two latter he received his information in part from Cæsar's own mouth His style is good, but his narrative is reckoned less clear than that of Cæsar himself. He was made consul, together with C. Vibius Pansa, B. C. 43, and conduct of the war against Antony was committed to them in conjunction with the young Octavianus. He gave Antony a considerable check in the neighbourhood of Mutina, but his ardour carrying him too far into the enemy's quarters, he received a wound which laid him dead on the spot. Suet. in Aug. 10.

HIRTUS, a debauched fellow, &c. Juv. 10, 222

HISBON, a Rutulian, killed by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 10, 384.

HISPALIS, a town of Spain, situate on the Bætis, and answering to the modern Seville. Its foundation has been ascribed to Hercules, to Bacchus, to the Hebrews, the Chaldeans, and the Phœnicians. When it became a Roman colony, it was much frequented on account of its commerce. It had the surname of Romulensis and the title of Conventus Cæs. B. Civ. 2, 18. B. Hisp. 27, 35, &c.—Plin. 3, 1.

HISPANIA, an extensive country of Europe, bounded on the north by the Oceanus Cantabricus, or Bay of Biscay, and the Pyrenees, on the east and south by the Mediterranean Sea, and on the west by the Atlantic Ocean. It was called Iberia by the Greeks, from the Iberus or Ebro, which was the first great river they reached in the peninsula, and Hesperia Ultima by the Romans, from its extreme western situation. The name of Hispania was derived from the Phœnicians, who, at an early period planted colonies along its southern shores. The Carthaginians invaded it next; they founded several cities on the southern coast, and held it long in subjection. At the conclusion of the second Punic war it was wrested from them by the Romans, who, having also reduced the native tribes to obedience, divided it into two provinces, Citerior and Ulterior. Hispania Citerior was afterwards called Terraconensis, from Terraco, its capital, and extended from the foot of the Pyrenees to the mouth of the Durius, or Douro, on the Atlantic shore, comprehending all the north of Spain, together with the south as far as a line drawn below Carthago Nova, or Carthagena, and continued in an oblique direction to Salamantica, or Salamanca, on the Durius. Hispania Ulterior was subdivided into two provinces; Bætica, on the south of Spain between the Anas, or Guadiana, and Citerior, and above it Lusitania, answering in a great degree, though not entirely, to modern Portugal. This change took place in the time of Augustus. The inhabitants were naturally warlike, and they often destroyed a life which was become useless and even burdensome by its infirmities. Spain was famous for its rich mines of silver, which employed 40,000 workmen, and daily yielded to the Romans no less than 20,000 drachms. These have long since failed, though, in the flourishing times of Rome, Spain was said to contain more gold, silver, brass, and iron, than the rest of the world It gave birth to Quintilian, Lucan, Martial, Mela, Silius, Seneca, &c Justin. 44.—Strab 3.—Mela. 2, 6.—Plin. 3, 1 et 20

HISPANUS, a native of Spain. The word Hispaniensis was also used, but generally applied to a person living in Spain and not born there. Martial praef. 12

HISTO, a noted debauchee, &c. Juv. 2, 50

HISPULLA, a lascivious woman Juv. 6, 74.

HISTER PACUVIUS, a man distinguished as much by his vices as his immense riches. Juv. 2, 58.

HISTIÆA. Vid. Oreus.

HISTIÆOTIS, a country of Thessaly, situate below mount Olympus and mount Ossa, anciently called Dorus, from Dorus the son of Deucalion, and inhabited by the Pelasgi. The Pelasgi were driven from the country by the Cadmeans, and these last were also dispossessed by the Perrhæbeans, who gave to their newly acquired possessions the name of Histiæotis, or Estiæotis, from Estiæa, or Histiæa, a town of Eubœa, which they had then lately destroyed, and whose inhabitants they had carried to Thessaly with them. Strab.—Herod. 4.——A small country of Eubœa, of which Histiæa, or Estiæa, was the capital.

HISTIÆUS, a tyrant of Miletus, who, when the Scythians had almost persuaded the Ionian princes to destroy the bridge over the Ister, in order that the Persian army might perish, opposed the plan, and induced them to abandon the design. His argument was, that if the Persian army was destroyed, and the power of Darius brought to an end, a popular government would be established in every Ionian city, and the tyrants expelled. He was held in high estimation on this account by Darius, and rewarded with a grant of land in Thrace. But Megabyzus having convinced the king that it was bad policy to permit a Grecian settlement in Thrace, Darius induced Histiæus, who was already founding a city there, to come to Susa, having allured him by magnificent promises. Here he was detained under various pretences, the king being afraid of his influence and turbulent spirit at home. Histiæus, tired of this restraint, urged, by means of secret messengers, his nephew Aristagoras to effect a revolt of the Ionians. This was done, and Histiæus was sent by Darius to stop the revolt. He put himself at the head of an army of Ionians and Æolians, and attacked the Persians; but being made prisoner, was crucified by Artaphernes at Sardis Herod. 4, 137. 5, 11, &c.

HODIUS, a herald in the Trojan war.

HOMEROMASTIX, a surname given to Zoilus the critic.

HOMERUS, a celebrated Greek poet, the most ancient of all the profane writers. The age in which he lived is not known, though some suppose it to be about 168 years after the Trojan war, or, according to others, 160 years before the foundation of Rome. According to Paterculus, he flourished 968 years before the Christian era, or 884, according to Herodotus, who supposes him to be contemporary with Hesiod. The Arundelian marbles fix his era 907 years before Christ, and make him also contemporary with Hesiod. This diversity of opinions proves the antiquity of Homer; and the uncertainty prevails also concerning the place of his nativity No less than seven illustrious cities disputed the right of having given birth to the greatest of poets, as it is well expressed in these lines:

Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, Salamis, Rhodos,
Argos, Athenæ,
Orbis de patria certat, Homere, tua.

He was called Melesigenes, because supposed to be born on the borders of the river Meles. There prevailed a report that he had established a school at Chios in the latter part of his life; and, indeed, this opinion is favoured by the present inhabitants of the island, who still glory in showing to travellers the seats where the venerable master and his pupils sat in the hollow of a rock, at the distance of about four miles from the modern capital of the island. These difficulties and doubts have not been removed, though Aristotle, Herodotus, Plutarch, and others, have employed their pen in writing his life. In his two celebrated poems called the Iliad and Odyssey, Homer has displayed the most consummate knowledge of human nature, and rendered himself immortal by the sublimity, the fire, sweetness, and elegance of his poetry. He deserves a greater share of admiration when we consider that he wrote without a model, and that none of his poetical imitators have been able to surpass, or, perhaps, to equal their great master. If there are any faults found in his poetry, they are to be attributed to the age in which he lived, and not to him; and we must observe that the world is indebted to Homer for his happy successor Virgil. In his Iliad, Homer has described the resentment of Achilles, and its fatal consequences in the Grecian army, before the walls of Troy. In the Odyssey, the poet has chosen for his subject the return of Ulysses into his country, with the many misfortunes which attended his voyage after the fall of Troy. These two poems are each divided into twenty-four books, the same number as the letters of the Greek alphabet, and, though the Iliad claims an uncontested superiority over the Odyssey, yet the same force, the same sublimity and elegance, prevail, though divested of its more powerful fire; and Longinus, the most refined of critics, beautifully compares the Iliad to the mid-day, and the Odyssey to the setting sun, and observes, that the latter still preserves its original splendour and majesty, though deprived of its meridian heat. The poetry of Homer was so universally admired, that, in ancient times, every man of learning could repeat with facility any passage in the Iliad or Odyssey; and, indeed, it was a sufficient authority to settle disputed boundaries, or to support any argument. The poems of Homer are the compositions of a man who travelled and examined with the most critical accuracy whatever deserved notice and claimed attention. Modern travellers are astonished to see the different scenes which the pen of Homer described about 3000 years ago, still existing in the same unvaried form, and the sailor who steers his course along the Ægean, sees all the promontories and rocks which appeared to Nestor and Menelaus, when they returned victorious from the Trojan war. The ancients had such veneration for Homer, that they not only raised temples and altars to him, but offered sacrifices, and worshipped him as a god. The inhabitants of Chios celebrated festivals every fifth year in his honour, and medals were struck, which represented him sitting on a throne, holding his Iliad and Odyssey. In Egypt his memory was consecrated by Ptolemy Philopater, who erected a magnificent temple, within which was placed a statue of the poet beautifully surrounded with a representation of the seven cities which contended for the honour of his birth. The inhabitants of Cos, one of the Sporades, boasted that Homer was buried in their island; and the Cyprians claimed the same honour, and said that he was born of Themisto, a female native of Cyprus Alexander was so fond of Homer, that he generally placed his compositions under his pillow with his sword; and he carefully deposited the Iliad in one of the richest and most valuable caskets of Darius, observing, that the most perfect work of human genius ought to be preserved in a box the most valuable and precious in the world. It is said that Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens, was the first who collected and arranged the Iliad and Odyssey in the manner in which they now appear to us; and that it is to the well-directed pursuits of Lycurgus that we are indebted for their preservation. Many of the ancients have written the life of Homer, yet their inquiries and labours have not much contributed to prove the native place, the parentage, and connexions of a man whom some have represented as deprived of sight. Besides the Iliad and Odyssey, Homer wrote, according to the opinion of some authors, a poem upon Amphiaraus's expedition against Thebes, besides the Phoceis, the Cercopes, the small Iliad, the Epichlides, and the Batrachomyomachia, and many hymns to some of the gods. The merit of originality is taken very improperly, perhaps, from Homer, by those who suppose, with Clemens Alex. Strom. 6,) that he borrowed from Orpheus, or that according to Suidas (voce Corinnus), he took his plan of the Iliad from Corinnus, an epic poet, who wrote on the Trojan war, at the very time the Greeks besieged that famed city. Agathon, an ancient painter, according to Ælian, represented the merit of the poet in a manner as bold as it was indelicate. Homer was represented as vomiting, and all other poets as swallowing what he ejected. Of the numerous commentaries published on Homer, that of Eustathius, bishop of Thessalonica, is by far the most extensive and erudite. The best edition of the Iliad is that of Heyne, 8 vols, 8vo, Lips. 1802. Next in value to it are the editions of Wolf, 4 vols. 12mo, Lips. 1-04 7; and of Villoison, fol Venet. 1735. An edition of the Odyssey, which promises to be a valuable one, is now publishing in Germany, under the editorial care of Crusius Clarke's edition, however, may still be regarded as the most popular one with a certain class of scholars The principal English translations of the Iliad and Odyssey are those of Pope, Cowper, and Sotheby. Herod. 2, 53.—Theocrit 16.—*Aristot. HOMOLIPPUS, a son of Hercules and Xanthis Apollod.

HOMOLOÏDES, one of the seven gates of Thebes. Stat. Theb 7, 252.

HOMONADA, a strong fortress of Cilicia Trachea, on the confines of Isauria. The Homonadenses were a wild and plundering people, and greatly infested the surrounding country. They were subdued, however, by the Roman commander Quirinus, who blocked up the passages of the mountains, and reduced them by famine. It is now Ermenak, and presents the appearance of a castle hewn out of a rock. Plin 6 27.

HONOS, a virtue which received divine homage among the Romans. Her first temple was erected by Scipio Africanus, and another was afterwards built by Claud. Marcellus, by the side [redacted] edifice consecrated to virtue, through which [redacted] necessary to pass before that of Honor [redacted] approached a lesson noble and highly becoming the first age of Roman greatness, when virtue alone was the guide to distinctions and to public rewards. A third temple was raised to Honor by Marius after the defeat of the Cimbri. Cic de Nat. D. 2, 23.—Val. Max. 1, 1.—Ovid. Fast. 5, 474.—Liv. 29.

HONORIUS, a Roman emperor of the west, second son of Theodosius the Great, who succeeded to the throne of the west as Arcadius, his brother, to that of the east. The reins of government were, during his minority, placed in the hands of the illustrious general Stilicho, whose daughter he married in 398. As his character opened, he appeared ill adapted to his high station, addicted to puerile amusements, and void of talents. The revolt of the Goths, and the invasion of Italy by Alaric, so alarmed him that he fled to Liguria, and was for a time besieged in a town there by the Goths. Stilicho came to his relief, and, by the defeat of Alaric, also freed Italy from present danger. After this, he fixed his residence at Ravenna, and was completely governed by his ministers He died of a dropsy in the thirty ninth year of his age. Under him and his brother the Roman power was divided into two different empires. The successors of Honorius, who fixed their residence at Rome, were called emperors of the west, and the successors of Arcadius, who sat on the throne of Constantinople, were distinguished by the title of emperors of the eastern Roman empire. Honorius was twice married, but left no issue.——A Greek surname of Jupiter, the same as the Terminalis of the Latins He was honoured under the form of a stone, over which, as separating fields and boundaries, the ancients swore in the most solemn manner. *Aul. HOPLEUS, an Argive slain by Æpytus. Stat Theb. 10, 400.

HORA, a goddess at Rome, supposed to be Hersilia, who married Romulus. She was said to preside over beauty. Ovid. Met. 14, 851.

HORÆ, three sisters, daughters of Jupiter and Themis, according to Hesiod, called Eunomia, Dice, and Irene. They were the same as the seasons who presided over the spring, summer, and winter, and were represented by the poets as opening the gates of heaven and of Olympus, and yoking the horses of Phœbus. Homer Il. 5, 749.—Paus. 5, 11.—Hesiod Theog. 902.

HORAPOLLO, a grammarian, of Panoplus, in Egypt, who taught first at Alexandria, and next at Constantinople, about A. D. 380. There are extant, under his name, two books concerning the hieroglyphics of the Egyptians, printed in Greek by Aldus, in 1505, folio; and again by De Pauw, with a Latin version, at Utrecht. in 1727, 4to Their authenticity, however, is questionable.

HORATIA, the sister of the Horatii, killed by her brother for mourning the death of the Curiatii. Cic. de Inv. 2, 20.

HORATIUS COCLES Vid Cocles.——Q. Flaccus, a celebrated poet, born at Venusia. His father, who was a freedman, adopted the name of Horatius, the master who granted him liberty, and, though poor in his circumstances, he liberally educated his son, and sent him to learn philosophy at Athens, after he had received the lessons of the best masters at Rome. Horace followed Brutus from Athens, and the timidity which he betrayed at the battle of Philippi so effectually discouraged him, that he for ever abandoned the profession of arms, and, at his return to Rome, he applied himself to cultivate poetry. His rising talents claimed the attention of Virgil and Varius, who recommended him to the protection of Mecænas and Augustus, the most celebrated patrons of literature. Under the fostering patronage of the emperor and of his minister, Horace gave himself up to indolence and refined pleasure. He was a follower of Epicurus, and while he liberally indulged his appetites, he neglected the calls of ambition, and never suffered himself to be carried away by the tide of popularity or public employments. He even refused to become the secretary of Augustus, and the emperor was not offended at his refusal He lived at the table of his illustrious patrons as if he were in his own house; and Augustus, while sitting at his meals with Virgil at his right hand, and Horace at his left, often ridiculed the short breath of the former, and the watery eyes of the latter, by observing that he sat between tears and sighs, Ego sum inter suspiria et lacrymas. Horace was warm in his friendships, and, if ever any ill-judged reflection had caused offence, the poet immediately made every concession which could effect a reconciliation, and not destroy the good purposes of friendly society. Horace died in the fifty-seventh year of his age, B. C 6. His gaiety was suitable to the liveliness and dissipation of a court; and his familiar intimacy with Mecænas has induced some to believe that the death of Horace was violent, and that he hastened himself out of the world to accompany his friend The seventeenth ode of his second book, which was written during the last illness of Mecænas, is too serious to be considered as a poetical rhapsody, or unmeaning effusion; and, indeed, the poet survived the patron only three weeks, and ordered his bones to be buried near those of his friend He left all his possessions to Augustus The poetry of Horace, so much commended for its elegance and sweetness, is deservedly censured for the licentious expressions and indelicate thoughts which he too frequently introduces. In his odes he has imitated Pindar and Anacreon, and if he has confessed himself to be inferior to the former, he has shown that he bears the palm over the latter by his more ingenious and refined sentiments, by the ease and melody of his expressions, and by the pleasing variety of his numbers. In his satires and epistles, Horace displays much wit, and much satirical humour, without much poetry, and his style, simple and unadorned, differs little from prosaical composition. In his art of poetry he has shown much taste and judgment, and has rendered in Latin hexameters, what Aristotle had, some ages before, delivered to his pupils in Greek prose. The poet gives judicious rules and useful precepts to the most powerful and opulent citizens of Rome, who, in the midst of peace and enjoyment, wished to cultivate poetry and court the Muses. The best editions of Horace will be found to be that of Basle, fol., 1580, illustrated by eighty commentators; that of Baxter, improved by Gesner, and after him by Zeunius, Lips 1815, in 8vo. A new edition of this last appeared in 1822, from the Leipsic press, edited by Böthe, which is in many respects superior to the old one The edition of Doering, Gotha, 1824, is, however, decidedly the best. It was reprinted at Glasgow, in 1826, in one vol. 8vo. Suet. in Aug.—Ovid Trist. 4, 10, 49.——Three brave Romans, born at the same birth, who fought against the three Curiatii, about 667 years before Christ. This celebrated fight was fought between the hostile camps of the people of Alba and Rome, and on their success depended the victory. In the first attack two of the Horatii were killed, and the only surviving brother, by joining artifice to valour, obtained an honourable trophy. By pretending to fly from the field of battle he easily separated his antagonists, and, in attacking them one by one, he was enabled to conquer them all. As he returned victorious to Rome, his sister reproached him with the murder of the Curiatii, to one of whom she was promised in marriage. He was incensed at the rebuke, and killed his sister. This violence raised the indignation of the people; he was tried, and capitally condemned. His eminent services, however, pleaded in his favour, the sentence of death was exchanged for a more moderate, but more ignominious punishment, and he was only compelled to pass under the yoke. A trophy was raised in the Roman forum, on which he suspended the spoils of the conquered Curiatii Cic. de Inv. 2, 26.—Liv 1, 24, &c. - *Dionys. HORMISDAS, or HORMOUZ, a king of Persia who succeeded to the throne A. D. 579, after the death of his father, Chosroes the Great. While directed by the influence of prudent counsellors, he governed his dominions wisely, but when left to himself he became a cruel tyrant. He was deposed and put to death by his subjects.

HORRATUS, a Macedonian soldier, who fought with another private soldier in sight of the whole army of Alexander. Curt. 9, 7.

HORTA, or HORTINUM, a town of the Sabines, on the confluence of the Nar and the Tiber. Virg. Æn. 7, 716 ——A goddess among the Romans, who presided over youth and excited them to virtue by her exhortations. Her temple was never shut, to admonish youth, so liable to be seduced, that they should always be disposed, with particular vigilance, to watch over themselves as regards the practice of virtue.

HORTENSIA, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of the orator Hortensius, whose eloquence she had inherited in the most eminent degree. When the triumvirs had obliged 14,000 women to give upon oath an account of their possessions, to defray the expenses of the state, Hortensia undertook to plead their cause, and was so successful in her attempt, that 1000 of her female fellow-sufferers escaped from the avarice of the triumvirate. Val Max 8, 3.

HORTENSIA LEX, by Q. Hortensius, the dictator, A. U. C. 467. It ordered the whole body of the Roman people to pay implicit obedience to the plebiscita, or laws enacted by the commons at the Comitia Tributa The nobility, before this law was enacted, had claimed an absolute exemption.——Another, that the nundinæ or market days, which used to be held as feriæ, or holidays, should be fasti or court days, in order that the country people, who came to town for market, might then get their lawsuits determined

HORTENSIUS, Q. a distinguished Roman orator, born B C. 115. He began to plead at the age of nineteen, and with so much success, that, as Cicero says, "the genius of Hortensius, like the statue of Phidias, was at once beheld and approved." He afterwards entered the army and rose to the post of military tribune: he then passed through the usual course of civil offices to the consulship, which he served with Cæcilius Metellus, B C. 70. At that period he had acquired so much power and distinction by his eloquence, that when the lot of the Cretan war fell upon him, he resigned it to his colleague, preferring the peaceable triumphs of the forum and senate-house. He continued to plead till his death, which happened in his sixty-fourth year, B. C. 51. As an orator he was elegantly splendid in his diction, apt in his composition, and copious in his matter. He embraced the whole subject in his memory, divided it acutely, and omitted nothing which the cause supplied, either for confirmation or refutation. He was aided with uncommon powers of memory, which enabled him to repeat a whole oration in the words which he had previously conceived, without committing it to writing, and to go through all the arguments of an opponent in their order. Though Hortensius died very rich, he lived in a very luxurious style: he possessed several magnificent country seats, furnished with parks, aviaries, fish-ponds, &c, in which he very much delighted. He was accustomed with his own hand to irrigate his fine plane-trees with wine, which may render credible the anecdote of his leaving to his heir 10,000 casks of that liquor Cic in Brut ad Attic de Orat. &c.—Varro de R. R 3, 5.——A rich Roman, who asked the elder Cato his wife, to procreate children Cato gave his wife to his friend, and took her again after his death. This behaviour of Cato was highly censured at Rome, and it was observed, that Cato's wife had entered the house of Hortensius very poor, but that she returned to the bed of Cato in the greatest opulence. Plut. in Cat.——A Roman, slain by Antony on his brother's tomb. Id ——A prætor, who gave up Macedonia to Brutus. Id.——One of Sylla's lieutenants Id.——A Roman, the first who introduced the eating of peacocks at Rome. This was at the feast he gave when he was created augur.

HORTONA, a town of Italy, on the confines of the Æqui. Liv 3. 30.

HORUS, a son of Isis and Osiris, and one of the deities of Egypt.

HOSPITALIS, a surname of Jupiter among the Romans, the same as the Xenius of the Greeks, because the god presided over hospitality, and punished every violation of its most sacred laws. Virg. Æn 1, 735.

HOSTILIA, now Ostiglia, a village on the Padus, or Po, in the vicinity of Cremona. Tacit. Ann. 2. 40

HOSTILIA LEX, was enacted A. U. C 563. By it such as were among the enemies of the republic, or absent when the state required their assistance, were guilty of rapine.

HOSTIUS HOSTILIUS, a warlike Roman, presented with a crown of boughs by Romulus, for his intrepid behaviour in a battle. Dionys Hal ——A consul ——A Latin poet in the age of J. Cæsar, who composed a poem on the wars of Istria. Macrob. Sat. 6, 3 et 5.——A lawyer. Cic. Orat. 1, 57.

HUNNI, a nomadic race of the Uralian or Finnic family, whose original country is supposed to have been the Sarmatian plains bordering on the Mæotis Palus and the Tanais, or Don. In the fourth century, they became masters of all the country between the Tanais and the Danube, and in the fifth, under Attila, threatened the Roman empire with destruction. In some respects, they seem to have resembled the Calmucks; and it is not improbable that Mongol and Finnic tribes may have been confounded under the same national name of khun, people, which their enemies, the Scandinavian and Sclavonian tribes, corrupted into hunds, dogs The Hungarians Proper, or Magiars, are supposed to be descended from the Avars, a branch of the Huns.

HYACINTHIA, an annual solemnity at Amyclæ, in Laconia, in honour of Hyacinthus and Apollo. It continued for three days, during which time the grief of the people was so great for the death of Hyacinthus, that they did not adorn their hair with garlands during their festivals, nor eat bread, but fed only upon sweetmeats. They did not even sing pæans in honour of Apollo, or observe any of the solemnities which were usual at other sacrifices. On the second day of the festival there were a number of different exhibitions. Youths, with their garments girt about them, entertained the spectators, by playing sometimes upon the flute, or upon the harp, and by singing anapæstic songs, in loud echoing voices, in honour of Apollo. Others passed across the theatre mounted upon horses richly adorned, and at the same time, choirs of young men came upon the stage singing their uncouth rustic songs, and accompanied by persons who danced at the sound of vocal and instrumental music, according to the ancient custom. Some virgins were also introduced in chariots of wood, covered at the top and magnificently adorned. Others appeared in race chariots. The city began then to be filled with joy, and immense numbers of victims were offered on the altars of Apollo, and the votaries liberally entertained their friends and slaves. During this latter part of the festivity, all were eager to be present at the games, and the city was almost left without inhabitants. Athen 4.—Ovid. Met. 10, 219.—Paus. 3, 1 et 19.

HYACINTHUS, a son of Amyclas and Diomede, greatly beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus. He returned the former's love, and Zephyrus, incensed at his coldness and indifference, resolved to punish his rival. As Apollo, who was entrusted with the education of Hyacinthus, once played at quoit with his pupil, Zephyrus blew the quoit, as soon as it was thrown by Apollo, upon the head of Hyacinthus, and he was killed with the blow Apollo was so disconsolate at the death of Hyacinthus, that he changed his blood into a flower, which bore his name, and placed his body among the constellations. The Spartans also established yearly festivals in honour of the nephew of their king (Vid. Hyacinthia.) Paus. 3, 19 —Ovid. Met. 10, 185, &c.—Apollod 3, &c.

HYADES, five daughters of Atlas, king of Mauritania, who were so disconsolate at the death of their brother, Hyas, who had been killed by a wild boar, that they pined away and died. They became stars after death, and were placed near Taurus, one of the twelve signs of the zodiac. They received the name of Hyades from their brother Hyas. Their names are Phaola, Ambrosia, Eudora, Coronis, and Polyxo. To these some have added Thione and Prodice, and they maintained, that they were daughters of Hyas and Æthra, one of the Oceanides. Euripides calls them daughters of Erechtheus. The ancients supposed that the rising and setting of the Hyades were always attended with much rain, whence the name (ὗω, pluo). —Ovid. Fast. 5, 165. Met. 3, 314.—Hygin. fab. 182.—Eurip. in Ion. 1155.

HYALE, one of the nymphs of Diana.

HYAMPEIA, one of the two lofty rocks which rise perpendicularly above Delphi, and obtained for Parnassus the epithet of διάφορος, or the two-headed. The other was called Naupleia. It was from these elevated crags that criminals were hurled by the Delphians; and in this manner Æsop was barbarously murdered. Eurip. Phœn. 243.—Herod. 8, 39.—Plut. de Ser. Num. Vind.

HYAMPOLIS, a city in the northern extremity of Phocis, and one of the most ancient places in that territory. It was said to have been founded by the Hyantes, one of the earliest tribes in Greece. Strab. 9.

HYANTES, the name of an ancient people of Bœotia, who succeeded the Ectenes in the possession of that country, when the latter were exterminated by a plague. Cadmus is sometimes called Hyanthius, because he was king of Bœotia Ovid Met. 3, 147.

HYANTIS, an ancient name of Bœotia.

HYAS, a son of Atlas, of Mauritania, by Æthra. His extreme fondness for shooting proved fatal to him, and in his attempts to rob a lioness of her whelps, he was killed by the enraged animal. Some say that he died by the bite of a serpent, and others that he was killed by a wild boar. His sisters mourned his death with such constant lamentations, that Jupiter, in compassion for their sorrow, changed them into stars. (Vid Hyades.) Hygin. fab. 192.—Ovid. Fast 5, 170.

HYBLA, the name of three towns in Sicily; Hybla major, minor, and parva. The first was situated near and south of mount Ætna, on a hill of the same name with the city. This was the Hybla so celebrated in antiquity for its bees and honey. Paus. 5, 23.——The second place was called also Herea; it was situated in the southern part of Sicily, and is placed in the itinerary of Antonine on the route from Agrigentum to Syracuse This is now Calata Girone. Lac. 24, 30 ——The last place was a maritime one on the eastern coast of Sicily, above Syracuse. It was also denominated Galaotis, but more frequently Megara, whence the gulf to the south of it was called Megarensis Sinus. Plin. 3, 8.—Diod. Sic 4, 80.

HYBREAS, an orator of Caria, &c. Strab. 13.

HYCCARON, (plur.-a), a town of Sicily, the native place of Lais.

HYDARNES, one of the seven noble Persians who conspired to destroy the usurper Smerdis, &c. Herod. 3 et 6.—Strab. 11.

HYDASPES, a river of India, and one of the tributaries of the Indus. It is now the Jhylum. Upon its banks, Alexander defeated Porus, and founded the town Nicæa to perpetuate his victory, as well as another called Bucephala, in memory of his favourite horse Bucephalus, that died here of old age. Strab. 15.—Arrian. 4, 5. 5, 3.—Mela, 3, 7.——A friend of Æneas, killed in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 10, 747.

HYDRA, a celebrated monster, which infested the neighbourhood of the lake Lerna in Peloponnesus. It was the fruit of Echidna's union with Typhon. It had a hundred heads, according to Diodorus; fifty, according to Simonides; and nine, according to the more received opinion of Apollodorus, Hyginus, &c. As soon as one of these heads was cut off, two immediately grew up, if the wound was not stopped by fire. It was one of the labours of Hercules to destroy this dreadful monster, and this he easily effected with the assistance of Iolas, who applied a burning iron to the wounds as soon as one head was cut off. While Hercules was destroying the hydra, Juno, jealous of his glory, sent a sea crab to bite his foot. This new enemy was soon dispatched; and Juno, unable to succeed in her attempts to lessen the fame of Hercules, placed the crab among the constellations, where it is now called the Cancer. The conqueror dipped his arrows in the gall of the hydra, and, from that circumstance, all the wounds which he gave proved incurable and mortal. Hesiod. Theog. 315.—Apollod. 2, 5.—Paus 5, 17.—Ovid. Met. 9, 69.—Horat. Od. 4, 4, 61.—Virg. Æn 6, 276. 1, 7, 658.

HYDRAOTES, a tributary to the Indus. It is now the Ravee.

HYDROPHORIA, a festival observed at Athens, called ἀπὸ τοῦ φορεῖν ὕδωρ, from carrying water. It was celebrated in commemoration of those who perished in the deluge of Deucalion and Ogyges.

HYDRUNTUM and HYDRUS, a port and city of Calabria, fifty miles south of Brundisium. It was the nearest point of Italy to Greece, which induced Pyrrhus, and afterwards Varro, Pompey's lieutenant, to think of joining the two countries by a bridge. Its modern name is Otranto. Cic. Ep. ad Att. 15, 21.—Plin. 3, 11.

HYEMPSAL, a son of Micipsa, brother to Adherbal, murdered by Jugurtha, after the death of his father. Sallust. de Jug. Bell HYGEIA or HYGIRA, the goddess of health, daughter of Æsculapius, held in great veneration among the ancients. Her statues represented her with a veil, and the matrons usually consecrated their locks to her divinity. She was also represented on monuments as a young woman holding a serpent in one hand, and in the other a cup, out of which the serpent sometimes drank. According to some authors, Hygeia is the same as Minerva, who received that name from Pericles, who erected her a statue, because in a dream she had told him the means of curing an architect, whose assistance he wanted to build a temple. Plut. in Pericl.—Paus. 1, 23.

HYGINUS, C. JUL. a grammarian, who lived in the time of Augustus. Suetonius says, that he was a freedman, and a native of Spain; though others think that he was an Alexandrian. He was appointed keeper of the Palatine library, and received pupils for instruction. He was intimately acquainted with Ovid and other literary characters of the day, and was said to be the imitator of Cornelius Alexander, a Greek grammarian. He wrote the lives of illustrious men, referred to by Aulus Gellius, a copious treatise on the cities of Italy, quoted by Servius and Macrobius, and a work on genealogies. Other works have been attributed to him; but the only pieces that have come down to us are entitled, Poeticon Astronomicon, De Mundi et sphærœ ac utriusque partium declaratione, and a book of fables. The best edition of this writer is that of Munker, in the Mythographi Latini, 8vo, Amst. 1681 Suet de Gramm. 20.

HYLA and HYLAS, a river of Mysia, where Hylas was drowned. Virg. G. 3, 6.——A colony of Phocis.

HYLACTOR, one of Actæon's dogs, from his barking (ὑλακτέω, latro). Ovid. Met. 3.

HYLÆ, a small town of Bœotia Plin. 4, 7.

HYLÆUS, a name given to some Centaurs, one of whom was killed by Hercules on mount Pholoe. Virg. Æn. 8, 294.——Another by Theseus, at the nuptials of Pirithous Stat. Theb. 7, 267.—Ovid. Met 12. 378 ——Another killed by Bacchus. Stat Theb 6, 530 — Virg. G. 2, 457.——A fourth, killed by Atalanta. Apollod. 3.——One of Actæon's dogs.

HYLAS, a son of Thiodamas, king of Mysia and Menodice, stolen away by Hercules and carried on board the ship Argo to Colchis. On the Asiatic coast the Argonauts landed to take a supply of fresh water, and Hylas, following the example of his companions, went to the fountain with a pitcher, and fell into the water and was drowned. The poets have embellished this tragical story, by saying, that the nymphs of the river, enamoured of the beautiful Hylas, carried him away; and that Hercules, disconsolate at the loss of his favourite youth, filled the woods and mountains with his complaints, and, at last, abandoned the Argonautic expedition to go and seek him. Apollod. 1, 9.—Hygin fab 14, 271.—Virgil. Ecl. 6, 44.—Propert 1, 20 ——A fountain of Bithynia, where Hylas was carried away by the Naiads. The inhabitants of Prusias celebrated yearly a festival in commemoration of that event. Apoll. Arg. 1, 1353.—Strab. 12.

HYLAX, a dog mentioned in Virgil, Ecl. 8.

HYLIAS, a river of Magna Græcia.

HYLLAICUS, a part of Peloponnesus near Messenia.

HYLLUS, a son of Hercules and Dejanira, who, soon after his father's death, married Iole. He, as well as his father, was persecuted by the envy of Eurystheus, and obliged to fly from the Peloponnesus The Athenians gave a kind reception to Hyllus and the rest of the Heraclidæ, and marched against Eurystheus. Hyllus obtained a victory over his enemies, and killed with his own hand Eurystheus, and sent his head to Alemena, his grandmother. Some time after he attempted to recover the Peloponnesus, with the Heraclidæ, and was killed in single combat by Echemus, king of Arcadia. (Vid. Heraclidæ, Hercules.) Herod. 7, 204, &c.—Strab 9.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Met. 9, 279.——A river of Lydia which falls into the Hermus. Strabo states that in his time it commonly bore the name of Phrygius. Herod. 1, 80.—Homer. Il. 20, 392.

HYLONOME, the wife of Cyllarus, who killed herself the moment her husband was murdered by the Lapithæ. Ovid Met. 12. 405.

HYLOPHAGI, a people of Æthiopia. Diod. 3.

HYMENÆUS and HYMEN, the god of marriage among the Greeks, was son of Bacchus and Venus, or according to others, of Apollo and one of the Muses. Hymenæus, according to the more received opinions, was a young Athenian of extraordinary beauty, but ignoble origin He became enamoured of the daughter of one of the richest and noblest of his countrymen, and, as the rank and elevation of his mistress removed him from her presence and conversation, he contented himself to follow her wherever she went. In a certain procession, in which all the matrons of Athens went to Eleusis, Hymenæus, to accompany his mistress, disguised himself in woman's clothes, and joined the religious troop. His youth, and the fairness of his features, favoured his disguise. A great part of the procession was seized by the sudden arrival of some pirates, and Hymenæus, who shared the captivity of his mistress, encouraged his female companions, and assassinated their ravishers while they were asleep. Immediately after this, Hymenæus repaired to Athens, and promised to restore to liberty the matrons who had been enslaved, provided he was allowed to marry one among them who was the object of his passion The Athenians consented, and Hymenæus experienced so much felicity in his marriage state, that the people of Athens instituted festivals in his honour, and solemnly invoked him at their nuptials, as the Latins did their Thalassius. Hymen was generally represented as crowned with flowers, chiefly with marjoram or roses, and holding a burning torch in one hand, and in the other a vest of a purple colour. It was supposed that he always attended at nuptials; for, if not, matrimonial connexions were fatal, and ended in the most dreadful calamities, and hence the people ran about calling aloud, Hymen! Hymen! &c. Ovid. Medea. Met. 12, 215 — Virg. Æn.), &c.—Catull ep 62.

HYMETTUS, a mountain of Attica, south-east of Athens. It was celebrated for its fragrant flowers and excellent honey. It was also famous for its marble. On its summit stood a statue of Jupiter Hymettius, and the altars of Jupiter Pluvius, and Apollo Providus. It is now called Trello-couni or Monte Matto Strab. 9.—Ital 14, 200. —Plin. 36, 3.—Horat. Od. 2, 18, 3. Sat. 2, 2, 15. —Ov. Fas. 2, 24.

HYPÆPA or IPEPÆ, a town of Lydia, sacred to Venus, between mount Tmolus and the Caystrus Its ruins are to be seen near the modern Pirghe, or Burkhe. Strab 13.—Ovid. Met. 11, 152.

HYPÄNIS, a river of Sarmatia Europæa, rising in the Peucini Montes near Amadoca Palus, and flowing with a south easterly course into the sea, close to the mouth of the Borysthenes It is now the Boug. Herod. 4, 52, &c.—Ovid. Met 15, 285. ——A river of India, the same as the Hyphasis. ——Another rising on the northern side of the Caucasus, and running into the Palus Mœotis. (Vid. Vardanus.)——Another of Pontus. Cic. Tusc 2, 39.——A Trojan who joined himself to Æneas, and was killed by his own people, who took him for one of the enemy, in the night that Troy was burned by the Greeks. Virg Æn. 2, 428.

HYPARINUS, a son of Dion, who reigned at Syracuse for two years after his father.——The father of Dion.

HYPATA, the chief town of the Æniænes, in Thessaly, on the river Sperchius. Its women were famed for their skill in magic. Its site bears the name of Castritza Lav 36, 14 —Apul. Met 1. · Theophr. H. Plant. 9, 2.

HYPATES, a river of Sicily, near Camarina. Ital. 14 231.

HYPATIA, the daughter of Theon, president of the Platonic school at Alexandria, in the fourth century. She succeeded her father in the academy, and excelled him in every branch of science, particularly astronomy. Among her pupils was Synesius, afterwards bishop of Ptolemais, who ever held her in the highest esteem. Orestes, the governor of the city, also entertained the greatest respect for Hypatia, which brought upon her the hatred of the bigoted monks, who waylaid and murdered her, in a most horrible manner, about A. D. 415.

HYPENOR, a Trojan killed by Diomedes at Troy Homer. Il. 5, 144.

HYPERBATUS, a prator of the Athenians, B. C. 224

HYPERBIUS, a son of Ægyptus Apollod.

HYPERBOREI, a nation in the northern parts of Europe and Asia, who were said to live to an incredible age, even to a thousand years, and in the enjoyment of all possible felicity. The sun was said to rise and set to them but once a-year, and, therefore, perhaps, they are placed by Virgil under the north pole. The word signifies people who inhabit beyond the wind Boreas. Thrace was the residence of Boreas, according to the ancients. Whenever the Hyperboreans made offerings, they always sent them towards the south, and the people of Dodona were the first of the Greeks who received them. The word Hyperboreans, is applied, in general, to all those who inhabit any cold climate Plin 4, 12. 6, 17. —Mela, 3, 5.—Virg. G. 1, 240. 3, 169 et 381.—Herod. 4, 13, &c.—Cic. N. D. 3, 23. 4, 12.

HYPERIA, a fountain of Thessaly, in the vicinity of Pheræ. Strab. 9.

HYPERESIA, the more ancient name of Ægira in Achaia.

HYPERIDES, an eminent Grecian orator, the son of Glaucippus, was born at Athens, and studied under Plato and Isocrates. He cultivated the art of eloquence, became one of the most distinguished orators of his time, and acquired that sway in state affairs which popular oratorical talents never failed to obtain in the ancient democracies. He was the steady and zealous opponent of Philip of Macedon, and his zeal caused him to be made commander of a galley, in which capacity he gained much credit by his promptness and zeal in succouring the Byzantians. When Philip threatened an invasion of Eubœa, Hyperides procured a tax to be levied for the equipment of forty galleys, and set the example by contributing one for himself and another for his son. In the time of Alexander he was possessed of the chief influence in Athens, and when that prince demanded galleys and officers from the Athenians, he opposed the grant of either. His life was fully devoted to his country. He moved distinguished honours to Demosthenes his great competitor in eloquence; but when this prince of orators was suspected of having taken a bribe from Harpalus, he was appointed to conduct the prosecution against him. Hyperides was himself accused of having acted contrary to the laws, by procuring a decree for granting citizenship to foreigners, and liberty to the slaves, whose families he caused to be transported to the Piræus, but he justified himself on the ground of state necessity. and proved that it was not he who passed the decrees, but the alarm with which Athens was seized, and the defeat of Chæronea. Hyperides continued his opposition to the Macedonian power after the death of Alexander, and when Antipater sent deputies to Athens, who made a high eulogy upon their master as the worthiest of men: "I know," replied Hyperides, "that he is a very worthy man, but we will have no master, however worthy he may be." The approach of Antipater obliged Hyperides and the other leading characters to quit Athens, and he had an interview with Demosthenes, also a fugitive, at Ægina. Departing thence, he was seeking for a safer place of refuge, when he was apprehended by Archias in the temple where he had taken sanctuary, and carried to Antipater at Cleonæ. He was put to the torture with the hope of obtaining from him some state secrets: to prevent this, he is said to have bit off part of his tongue; but another account relates that his tongue was cut out by the tyrant as a punishment due to his silence. His body was left unburied till some of his relations secretly committed it to the funeral pile, and brought his ashes to Athens. Quintilian characterizes the oratory of Hyperides as singularly sweet and acute, better adapted to little than to great causes In the time of Photius, fifty-two of his orations were extant Plut. in Phoc. et Demost.—Cic. in Orat. 1, 31. 2, 53. 3, 16.—Quintil. 10, 1. 12, 10.

HYPERION, a son of Cœlus and Terra, who married Thea, by whom he had Aurora, the sun and moon Hyperion is often taken by the poets for the sun itself. Hesiod. Theog. – Apollod. 1, 1 et 2.—Homer. Hymn. ad Ap ——A son of Priam. Apollod. 1, 2.

HYPERMNESTRA, one of the fifty daughters of Danaus, who married Lynceus, son of Ægyptus. She disobeyed her father's bloody commands, who had ordered her to murder her husband the first night of her nuptials, and suffered Lynceus to escape unhurt from the bridal bed. Her father summoned her to appear before a tribunal for her disobedience, but the people acquitted her, and Danaus was reconciled to her and her husband, to whom he left his kingdom at his death. Some say, that Lynceus returned to Argos with an army, and that he conquered and put to death his father-in-law, and usurped his crown. Vid. Danaides. Paus. 2, 19.—Apollod. 2, 1.—Ovid. Heroid. 14.——A daughter of Thestius. Apollod.

HYPEROCHUS, a man who wrote a poetical history of Cuma. Paus. 10, 12.

HYPHÆUS, a mountain of Campania. Plut. in Syll.

HYPHASIS, a tributary of the Indus, now the Reypasha, or, as it is more commonly written, Beyah. It was the limit of Alexander's conquests, and he built altars on its banks in memory of his expedition.

HYLSA, now the Belici, a river of Sicily, falling into the Crinisus, and then into the Mediterranean near Selinus. Ital. 14, 228.

HYPSEA, a Roman matron, of the family of the Plautii. She was blind, according to Horace; or, perhaps, was partial to some lover, who was recommended neither by personal nor mental excellence. Horat Sat. 1, 2, 91.

HYPSENOR, a priest of the Scamander, killed during the Trojan war. Homer. Il 5.

HYPSEUS, a son of the river Peneus. ——A pleader at the Roman bar before the age of Cicero. Cic de Orat. 1, 36

HYPSICLES, an astronomer of Alexandria, who flourished under Ptolemy Physcon, about 146 B. C. He was the author of a work entitled Ἀναφορικὸς, in which he gives a method, far from exact, of calculating the risings of each sign or portion of the ecliptic. He is supposed to have been the author of the fourteenth and fifteenth books of the Elements of Geometry, which are usually attributed to Euclid.

HYPSICRATEA, the wife of Mithridates, who accompanied her husband in man's clothes, when he fled before Pompey. Plut. in Pomp.

HYPSICRATES, a Phœnician, who wrote a history of his country, in the Phœnician language. This history was saved from the flames of Carthage, when that city was taken by Scipio, and translated into Greek.

HYPSIPYLES, a Macedonian in Alexander's army, famous for his friendship for Menedemus, &c. Curt. 7. 7.

HYPSIPYLE, a queen of Lemnos, daughter of Thoas and Myrine. During her reign, Venus, whose altars had been universally slighted, punished the Lemnian women, and rendered their mouths and breaths so extremely offensive to the smell, that their husbands abandoned them and gave themselves up to some female slaves, whom they had taken in a war against Thrace. This contempt was highly resented by all the women of Lemnos and they resolved on revenge, and all unanimously put to death their male relations, Hypsipyle alone excepted, who spared the life of her father Thoas. Soon after this cruel murder, the Argonauts landed at Lemnos, in their expedition to Colchis, and remained for some time in the island During their stay the Argonauts rendered the Lemnian women mothers, and Jason, the chief of the Argonautic expedition, left Hypsipyle pregnant at his departure, and promised her eternal fidelity Hypsipyle brought twins, Euneus and Nebrophonus, whom some have called Deiphilus or Thoas. Jason forgot his vows and promises to Hypsipyle, and the unfortunate queen was soon after forced to leave her kingdom by the Lemnian women, who conspired against her life, still mindful that Thoas had been preserved by means of his daughter. Hypsipyle, in her flight, was seized by pirates, and sold to Lycurgus, king of Nemæa. She was intrusted with the care of Archemorus, the son of Lycurgus; and, when the Argives marched against Thebes, they met Hypsipyle, and obliged her to show them a fountain, where they might quench their thirst. To do this more expeditiously, she laid down the child on the grass, and in her absence he was killed by a serpent. Lycurgus attempted to revenge the death of his son, but Hypsipyle was screened from his resentment by Adrastus, the leader of the Argives. *Ovid. HYRCANUS, John, high priest and prince of the Jewish nation, succeeded his father Simon Maccabeus, who had been treacherously slain by the orders of Ptolemæus, his son in law. Hyrcanus commenced his reign by punishing the assassin, whereupon Ptolemæus applied for aid to Antiochus, king of Syria, who laid siege to Jerusalem, and compelled Hyrcanus to pay him tribute. At the death of Antiochus, however, he profited by the troubles of Syria to effect the deliverance of his country from this foreign yoke. He took several cities in Judæa, subjugated the Idumæans, demolished the temple at Gerazim, and made himself master of Samaria. He died not long after, B. C. 106.——The eldest son of Alexander I., succeeded his father in the high priesthood, B C 78. Aristobulus, his brother, disputed the crown with him, on the death of Alexandra the mother, and proved victorious, B. C 66. Hyrcanus, reduced to the simple office of the priesthood, had recourse to Aretas, king of Arabia, who besieged Aristobulus in the temple. Scaurus, the lieutenant of Pompey, however, whom Aristobulus had engaged in his interests, compelled Aretas to raise the siege, and Hyrcanus was forced to content himself with the office of high priest. He was put to death by Herod, at the age of eighty years, B C. 30, on his attempting to take refuge once more among the Arabians.

HYRIA, a town built by the Cretans, who assumed the name of Iapyges Messapii It was situated in the interior of the country, between Brundusium and Tarentum It is now Oria. Herod. 7, 170.——A town of Isauria, on the Calycadnus.

HYRIEUS or HYREUS, a peasant, or, as some say, a prince of Tanagra, son of Neptune and Alcyone, who kindly entertained Jupiter Neptune, and Mercury, when travelling over Bœotia. Being childless, he asked of the gods to give him a son without his marrying, as he promised his wife, who was lately dead, and whom he tenderly loved, that he never would marry again. The gods, to reward the hospitality of Hyreus, made water in the hide of a bull, which had been sacrificed the day before to their divinity, and they ordered him to wrap it up and bury it in the ground for nine months. At the expiration of the nine months, Hyreus opened the earth, and found a beautiful child in the bull's hide, whom he called Orion. Vid. Orion. Ovid. Fast. 5, 493 et 535.—*Hygin. A. HYSTASPES, a noble Persian, of the family of the Achæmenides His father's name was Arsames. His son Darius reigned in Persia, after the murder of the usurper Smerdis. It is said, by Ctesias, that he wished to be carried to see the royal monument which his son had built between two mountains. The priests who carried him, as reported, slipped the cord with which he was suspended in ascending the mountain, and he died of the fall. Hystaspes was the first who introduced the learning and mysteries of the Indian Brachmans into Persia, and to his researches in India the sciences were greatly indebted, particularly in Persia. Darius is called Hystaspes, or son of Hystaspes, to distinguish him from his royal successors of the same name. Herod. 1, 209 5, 63 —Ctesias Fragm.

JANICULUM and JANICULARIUS MONS, one of the seven hills at Rome, joined to the city by Ancus Martius, and made a kind of citadel, to protect the place against an invasion This hill (Vid. Janus), which was on the opposite shore of the Tiber, was joined to the city by the bridge Sublicius, the first ever built across that river, and perhaps in Italy. It was less inhabited than the other parts of the city, on account of the grossness of the air, though from its top, the eye could have a commanding view of the whole city It is famous for the burial of king Numa and of the poet Italicus. Porsenna, king of Etruria, pitched his camp on mount Janiculum, and the senators took refuge there in the civil wars, to avoid the resentment of Octavius. Liv 1, 33, &c —Dio 47.—*Ovid. JANUS, the most ancient king who reigned in Italy He was a native of Thessaly, and son of Apollo, according to some. He came to Italy, where he planted a colony and built a small town on the river Tiber, which he called Janiculum. Some authors make him son of Cœlus and Hecate, and others make him a native of Athens. During his reign, Saturn, driven from heaven by his son Jupiter, came to Italy, where Janus received him with much hospitality, and made him his colleague on the throne. Janus is represented with two faces, because he was acquainted with the past and the future; or, according to others, because he was taken for the sun who opens the day at his rising, and shuts it at his setting. Some statues represented Janus with four heads. He sometimes appeared with a beard, and sometimes without. In religious ceremonies, his name was always invoked the first, because he presides over all gates and avenues, and it is through him only that prayers can reach the immortal gods. From that circumstance, he often appears with a key in his right hand, and a rod in his left. Sometimes he holds the number 300 in one hand, and in the other 65, to show that he presides over the year, of which the first month bears his name. Some suppose that he is the same as the world, or Cœlus; and, from that circumstance, they call him Eanus, ab eundo, because of the revolution of the heavens. He was called by different names, such as Consivius, a conserendo, because he presided over generation; Quirinus or Martialis, because he presided over war. He is also called Patulcius and Clusius, because the gate of his temples were opened during the time of war, and shut in time of peace. He was chiefly worshipped among the Romans, where he had many temples, some erected to Janus Bifrons, others to Janus Quadrifrons. The temples of Quadrifrons were built with four equal sides, with a door and three windows on each side. The four doors were the emblems of the four seasons of the year, and the three windows in each of the sides the three months in each season, and, all together, the twelve months of the year. Janus was generally represented in statues as a young man. The first day of the year was particularly devoted to him, when incense and aromatic plants were burned on his altars, young bullocks fattened in the plains of Falisci were offered in sacrifice, and the votaries appeared at the capitol, each attired in new garments. Janus was ranked among the gods, for the popularity of his government, and the civilization which he had introduced among the wild inhabitants of Italy. His temple, which was always open in times of war, was shut only three times during above 700 years, under Numa, 234 B. C. and under Augustus; and during that long period of time, the Romans were continually employed in war. As the statues of the god looked both ways, the word Janus is used to express a passage or thoroughfare which has an opening at both ends. Ovid. Fast. 1, 65, &c — Virg. Æn. 7, 607.—*Varro de L. IASION and IASIUS, a son of Jupiter and Electra, one of the Atlantides, who reigned over part of Arcadia, where he diligently applied himself to agriculture. He married the goddess Cybele or Ceres, and all the gods were present at the celebration of his nuptials. He had by Ceres two sons, Philomelus and Plutus, to whom some have added a third, Corybas, who introduced the worship and mysteries of his mother in Phrygia. He had also a daughter, whom he exposed as soon as born, saying that he would raise only male children. The child who was suckled by a she-bear and preserved, rendered herself famous afterwards under the name of Atalanta. Iasion was killed with a thunderbolt of Jupiter, and ranked among the gods after death, by the inhabitants of Arcadia. Hesiod. Theog. 970.—Virg. Æn. 3, 168.—Hygin. Poet 2, 4.

JASON, a celebrated hero, son of Alcimede, daughter of Phylacus, by Æson the son of Cretheus and Tyro the daughter of Salmoneus. Tyro, before her connexion with Cretheus, the son of Æolus, had two sons, Pelias and Neleus, by Neptune. Cretheus was king of Iolchos, and at his death the throne was usurped by Pelias, and Æson the lawful successor was driven to retirement and obscurity. The education of young Jason was entrusted to the care of the Centaur Chiron, and he was removed from the presence of the usurper, who had been informed by an oracle that one of the descendants of Æolus would dethrone him. After he had made the most rapid progress in every branch of science, Jason left the Centaur, and by his advice went to consult the oracle. He was ordered to go to Iolchos his native country, covered with the spoils of a leopard, and dressed in the garments of a Magnesian. In his journey he was stopped by the inundation of the river Evenus or Enipeus, over which he was carried by Juno, who had changed herself into an old woman In crossing the stream he lost one of his sandals, and at his arrival at Iolchos the singularity of his dress and the fairness of his complexion attracted the notice of the people, and drew a crowd around him in the market-place. Pelias came to see him with the rest, and as he had been warned by the oracle to beware of a man who should appear at Iolchos with one foot bare, and the other shod, the appearance of Jason, who had lost one of his sandals, alarmed him. His terrors were soon after augmented. Jason, accompanied by his friends, repaired to the palace of Pelias, and boldly demanded the kingdom which he had unjustly usurped. The boldness and popularity of Jason intimidated Pelias; he was unwilling to abdicate the crown, and yet he feared the resentment of his adversary As Jason was young and ambitious of glory, Pelias, at once to remove his immediate claims to the crown, reminded him that Æetes king of Colchis had severely treated, and inhumanly murdered their common relation Phryxus. He observed that such a treatment called aloud for punishment, and that the undertaking would be accompanied with much glory and eternal fame. He further added, that his old age had prevented him from avenging the death of Phryxus, and that of Jason would undertake the expedition, he would resign to him the crown of Iolchos when he returned victorious from Colchis. Jason readily accepted a proposal which seemed to promise such military fame. His intended expedition was made known in every part of Greece, and the youngest and the bravest of the Greeks assembled to accompany him, and share his toils and glory. They embarked on board a ship called Argo, and after a series of adventures they arrived at Colchis. (Vid. Argonautæ.) Æetes promised to restore the golden fleece, which was the cause of the death of Phryxus, and of the voyage of the Argonauts, provided they submitted to his conditions. Jason was to tame bulls which breathed flames, and which had feet and horns of brass, and to plough with them a field sacred to Mars. After this he was to sow in the ground the teeth of a serpent from which armed men would arise, whose fury would be converted against him who ploughed the field. He was also to kill a monstrous dragon which watched night and day at the foot of the tree on which the golden fleece was suspended. All were concerned for the fate of the Argonauts; but Juno, who watched with an anxious eye over the safety of Jason, extricated them from all these difficulties. Medea, the king's daughter, fell in love with the Grecian hero, and as her knowledge of herbs, enchantments, and incantations was uncommon, she pledged herself to deliver her lover from all his dangers if he promised her eternal fidelity. Jason, not insensible to her charms and to her promise, vowed eternal fidelity in the temple of Hecate, and received from Medea whatever instruments and herbs could protect him against the approaching dangers. He appeared in the field of Mars, he tamed the fury of the oxen, ploughed the plain, and sowed the dragon's teeth. Immediately an army of men sprang from the field, and ran towards Jason. He threw a stone among them, and they fell one upon the other till all were totally destroyed. The vigilance of the dragon was lulled to sleep by the power of herbs, and Jason took from the tree the celebrated golden fleece, which was the sole object of his voyage. These actions were all performed in the presence of Æetes and his people, who were all equally astonished at the boldness and success of Jason. After this celebrated conquest, Jason immediately set sail for Europe with Medea, who had been so instrumental in his preservation. Upon this, Æetes, desirous to revenge the perfidy of his daughter Medea, sent his son Absyrtus to pursue the fugitives. Medea killed her brother, and strewed his limbs in her father's way, that she might more easily escape, while he was employed in collecting the mangled body of his son. (Vid. Absyrtus.) The return of the Argonauts into Thessaly was celebrated with universal festivity; but Æson, Jason's father, was unable to attend on account of the infirmities of old age. This obstruction was removed, and Medea, at the request of her husband, restored Æson to the vigour and sprightliness of youth. (Vid. Æson.) Pelias the usurper of the crown of Iolchos, wished also to see himself restored to the flower of youth, and his daughters, persuaded by Medea, who wished to avenge her husband's wrongs, cut his body to pieces, and placed his limbs in a caldron of boiling water. Their credulity was severely punished. Medea suffered the flesh to be consumed to the bones, and Pelias was never restored to life. This inhuman action drew the resentment of the populace upon Medea, and she fled to Corinth with her husband Jason, where they lived in the enjoyment of undisturbed love during ten successive years. Jason's partiality for Glauce, the daughter of the king of the country, afterwards disturbed their matrimonial happiness, and Medea was divorced that Jason might more freely indulge his amorous propensities. This infidelity was severely revenged by Medea, (Vid. Glauce,) who destroyed her children in the presence of their father. (Vid Medea.) After his separation from Medea, Jason lived an unsettled and melancholy life. As he was one day reposing himself by the side of the ship which had carried him to Colchis, a beam fell upon his head, and he was crushed to death. This tragical event had been predicted to him before by Medea, according to the relation of some authors. Some say that he afterwards returned to Colchis, where he seized the kingdom and reigned in great security. *Eurip. in Med. Ovid. He usurped the supreme power in his native place, while still quite young, about 375 B. C., reduced nearly all Thessaly under his sway; and caused himself to be invested with the title of generalissimo, which soon became in his hands only another name for monarch of the country. The success which attended his other expeditions also, against the Dolopes, the Phocians, &c.; his alliances with Athens, Macedon, and Thebes; in fine, his rare military talents emboldened him to think of undertaking some enterprise against Persia; but before he could put these schemes into operation, he was assassinated whilst celebrating some public games at Pheræ, in the third year of his reign. Jason was a popular tyrant among his immediate subjects. He cultivated letters and the oratorical art, and was intimate with Isocrates, and Gorgias of Leontium. He had contracted a friendship also with Timotheus, the son of Conon, and went himself to Athens to save him from a capital accusation.——A native of Argos, who flourished during the second century. He wrote a work on Greece, in four books, comprehending the earlier times of the nation, the wars against the Persians, the exploits of Alexander, the actions of Antipater, and ending with the capture of Athens. He composed also a treatise on the Temples (or, as others render it, Sacrifices) of Alexander. IAXARTES, a large river of Asia, rising in the chain of Mons Imaus, and running with a north-western course into the Aral sea. It was called Silis by the Scythians; but the Macedonians named it Tanais out of compliment to Alexander, a confusion which was farther increased by some of the ancients asserting that it ran into the Caspian sea. It is now the Sihon. Curt. 6 et 7.—Plin. 6, 16.—Arrian. 4, 15.

IAZYGES, a people of Scythia. Of these there were the Iazyges Mæotæ, who occupied the northern coast of the Palus Mæotis, the Iazyges Metanastæ, who inhabited the angular territory formed by the Tibiscus, the Danube, and Dacia: they lived in the vicinity of Dacia, and are called by Pliny Sarmates. The Iazyges Basilii, or Royal, were a people of Sarmatia, joined by Strabo to the Iazyges on the coast of the Euxine, between the Tyras and the Borysthenes. Ptolemy speaks only of the Metanastæ, who were probably the most considerable of the three. The territory of this latter people was, towards the decline of the empire, occupied by the Vandals, and afterwards became a part of the empire of the Goths. About the year 350, they were expelled by the Huns. It has since formed a part of Hungary, and of the Bannat of Temeswar. Ptol.—Ovid. Ep. ex Pont. 1, 2, 79. Trist. 2. 191.

IBERIA, a country of Asia, bounded on the west by Colchis, on the north by mount Caucasus, on the east by Albania, and on the south by Armenia. It answers now to Imeriti, Georgia, the country of the Gurians, &c. The name of Imeriti is an evident derivation from the ancient one. The Cyrus, or Kur, flowed through this country. Ptolemy enumerates several towns of this country, such as Agiuna, Vasada, Varica, &c. The Iberians were allies of Mithridates, and were therefore attacked by Pompey, who defeated them in a great battle, and took many prisoners. Plutarch makes the number of slain to have been not less than 9,000, and that of the prisoners 10,000. The same writer states that the Iberians had never been subject to the Medes, or to the Persians; they had escaped even the Macedonian yoke, because Alexander was obliged to quit Hyrcania in haste. Plin. 6, 4. 10, 3.—Strab. 11.—Ptol. 5, 11.——One of the ancient names of Spain, derived from the river Iberus.

IBERUS, a river of Spain, rising in the angle formed by the mountains Vinnius and Idubeda, and flowing with a south-eastern course into the Mediterranean sea. It is now the Ebro, and is in general very rapid and unfit for navigation, being full of rocks and shoals. At the close of the first Punic war, the Iberus was made the boundary between the Roman and Carthaginian possessions in Spain, the Romans agreeing not to pass the right bank of the river, and obtaining the protection of Saguntum, although it was in the Punic territory. Lucan. 4, 335.—Plin. 3, 3.—Mela, 2, 6.—Liv. 21, 5.——A river of Iberia in Asia, flowing from mount Caucasus into the Cyrus, probably the modern Iora.

IBIS, a poem of the poet Callimachus, in which he bitterly satirizes the ingratitude of his pupil the poet Apollonius. Ovid has also written a poem which bears the same name, and which, in the same satirical language, seems, according to the opinion of some, to inveigh bitterly against Hygenus, the supposed hero of the composition. Suidas.

IBYCUS, a lyric poet of Rhegium, about 540 years before Christ. He was murdered by robbers, and at the moment of death he implored the assistance of some cranes which were then flying over his head. Some time after, as the murderers were in the market place, one of them observed some cranes in the air, and said to his companions, αἱ Ἴβύκου ἵκέται φάρεσιν, there are the birds that are conscious of the death of Ibycus. These words and the recent murder of Ibycus raised suspicions in the people: the assassins were seized and tortured, and they confessed their guilt. Cic. Tusc. 4, 43.—Ælian. V. H ——The husband of Chloris, whom Horace ridicules, 3, od. 15.

ICADIUS, a robber killed by a stone, &c. Cic. Fat. 3.

ICARIA, an island of the Ægean, west of Samos. It is said to have obtained its name from Icarus, son of Dædalus, whose body was washed upon its shores after the unfortunate termination of his flight. It was of small extent, being long but narrow. In Strabo's time it was thinly inhabited, and the Samians used it principally for the pasturage of their cattle. Its modern name is Nicaria. Strab. 14.

ICARIS and ICARIOTIS, a name given to Penelope, as daughter of Icarius. Propert. 3, 13, 10.

ICARIUM MARE, a part of the Ægean sea near the islands of Mycone and Gyaros. The ancient mythologists deduce the name from Icarus, who fell into it and was drowned. Vid. Icarus.

ICARIUS, an Athenian, father of Erigone. He gave wine to some peasants, who drank it with the greatest avidity, ignorant of its intoxicating nature. They were soon deprived of their reason, and the fury and resentment of their friends and neighbours were immediately turned upon Icarius, who perished by their hands. After death he was honoured with public festivals, and his daughter was led to discover the place of his burial by means of his faithful dog Mœra. Erigone hung herself in despair, and was changed into a constellation called Virgo. Icarius was changed into the star Bootes, and the dog Mœra into the star Canis. Hygin. fab. 130.—Apollod. 3, 14.——A son of Œbalus of Lacedæmon. He gave his daughter Penelope in marriage to Ulysses king of Ithaca, but he was so tenderly attached to her, that he wished her husband to settle at Lacedæmon. Ulysses refused, and when he saw the earnest petitions of Icarius, he told Penelope as they were going to embark, that she might choose freely either to follow him to Ithaca, or to remain with her father. Penelope blushed in the deepest silence, and covered her head with her veil. Icarius, upon this, permitted his daughter to go to Ithaca, and immediately erected a temple to the goddess of modesty, on the spot where Penelope had covered her blushes with her veil. Homer. Od. 16, 435.

ICARUS, a son of Dædalus, who, with his father, flew with wings from Crete to escape the resentment of Minos. His flight being too high, proved fatal to him, the sun melted the wax which cemented his wings, and he fell into that part of the Ægean sea which was called after his name. Vid. Daedalus. Ovid. Met. 8, 178, &c. ——A mountain of Attica.

ICCIUS, a lieutenant of Agrippa in Sicily. Horace writes to him, 1 od 29, and ridicules him for abandoning the pursuits of philosophy and the muses for military employments.——One of the Rhemi in Gaul, ambassador to Cæsar. Cæs. B G. 2, 3.

ICELOS, one of the sons of Somnus, who changed himself into all sorts of animals, whence the name (εἰκελος, similis). Ovid. Met. 11, 640.

ICENI, or CENIMAGNI, a people of Britain, who were situated to the north of the Trinobantes, and inhabited that country, which is now divided into the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon. They were a brave nation, who, on being pillaged by the Romans, and their queen Boadicea, with her daughters, shamefully insulted, took up arms against them in conjunction with their neighbours, defeated them in several engagements, and destroyed Camelodunum and Verolamium; but they were conquered in their turn by Suetonius Paulinus, A. D. 61. Their capital was Venta Icenorum now Caister, near Norwich. Tacit. Ann. 12, 31.—Cæs. B G. 5, 21.

ICETAS, a man who obtained the supreme power at Syracuse after the death of Dion. He attempted to assassinate Timoleon, for which he was conquered, &c B C 340. C. Nep in Tim ICHNÆ, a town of Macedonia, placed by Herodotus in Bottiæa, and situated probably at the mouth of the Ludias. From other authors, cited by Steph. Byz., it appears that the name was sometimes written Achnæ Herod. 7, 123.——A city of Thessaly, near Phyllus, and in the district of Phthiotis. The goddess Themis was especially reverred here. Strab. 9.—Hom. Hymn. in Apoll 94.

ICHNUSA, an ancient name of Sardinia, which it received from its likeness to the print of a foot, (ἴχνος). Paus. 10, 17.—Plin. 3, 7.—Sil Ital 12, 881.

ICHONÛPHYS, a priest of Heliopolis, at whose house Eudoxus resided when he visited Egypt with Plato. Diog.

ICHTHYOPHAGI, a name given by the Greek geographers to several tribes of barbarians in different parts of the ancient world, and which indicates a people "living on fish." A people of Gedrosia, on the coast of the Mare Erythræum. Plin 6, 23 ——A people in the north-eastern part of Arabia Felix, along the coast of the Sinus Persicus.——A people of Troglodítica, according to Strabo south-west of the island Topazos; probably near the straits of Diræ, or Bab-el-Mandeb ICHTHYOPHAGORUM SINUS, a bay on the north-eastern coast of Arabia Felix.

ICILIUS, L a tribune of the people who made a law, A U. C. 397, by which mount Aventine was given to the Roman people to build houses upon. Liv 3, 54.——A tribune who made a law, A. U. C. 281, that forbade any man to oppose or interrupt a tribune while he was speaking in an assembly. Liv. 2, 58.——A tribune who signalized himself by his inveterate enmity against the Roman senate. He took an active part in the management of affairs after the murder of Virginia, &c.

ICIUS. Vid Itius Portus.

ICONIUM, now Konsa, the chief city of Lycaonia, in Asia Minor. It was fancied by the Greeks to have received its name from εἰκὼν, imago, owing to a little statue, which was here set up by Prometheus or Perseus. It is rendered very interesting from the labours of St Paul, as are also two cities to the south of it, called Derbe and Lystra. Plin. 5, 27 —Acts 14, 1—27.

ICOS, a small island near Scyros, said to have been colonized by the Cretans. It is now Skyro Poulo. Strab 9.

ICTINUS, a celebrated architect, 430 years before Christ. He built a famous temple to Apollo Epicurius at Phigalia, and to Minerva at Athens. This last was 100 feet on all sides, and was remarkable for its magnificence. Paus 8, 42.—Strab. 9.

ICULISNA, a town of Gaul, now Angoulême, on the Charente.

IDA, a nymph of Crete, who went into Phrygia, where she gave her name to a mountain of that country. Virg. Æn. 8, 177.——The mother of Minos the II.——A celebrated mountain, or more properly, a ridge of mountains in Troas, chiefly in the neighbourhood of Troy. The abundance of its waters became the source of many rivers, and particularly of the Simois, Scamander, Æsopus, Granicus, &c. It was on mount Ida that the shepherd Paris adjudged the prize of beauty to the goddess Venus. It was covered with green woods, and the elevation of its top opened a fine extensive view of the Hellespont and the adjacent countries, from which reason the poets say that it was frequented by the gods during the Trojan war. Strab. 13.—Mela, 1, 18.—Homer Il. 14, 283.—Virg. Æn. 3, 5, &c.—Ovid Fast. 4, 79.—Lucan. 3, ol. 11 ——A mountain of Crete, the highest in the island, where it was reported that Jupiter was educated by the Corybantes, who, on that account, were called Idæi. Strab 10.

IDÆA, the surname of Cybele, because she was worshipped on mount Ida. Her worship was introduced into Italy, and received the firmest support from the power which she exerted to vindicate the suspected innocence of Claudia. The Romans adopted the same ceremonies as were observed in Phrygia, and the goddess was served by a priest born at Troas. Apollon Arg. 2, 1127. —Tibull. 1, el 4.—Eurip. in Orest. 1456.—Virg. Æn 10, 252.—Propert. 4, el 11.—Dionys. Hal. 1. —Liv 29.—Lucret. 2, 611.

IDÆUS, a surname of Jupiter.——An armour-bearer and charioteer of king Priam, killed during the Trojan war. Virg. Æn. 6, 487.——One of the attendants of Ascanius. Id. 9, 500.

IDALIS, the country round mount Ida. Lucan. 3, 204.

IDALIUM, or IDALIA, a height and grove of Cyprus, near the promontory of Pedalium. It was the favourite abode of Venus, hence called Idalia, and here too Adonis was killed by the tooth of the boar. Theocr. Idyl. 15, 101.—Virg Æn. 1, 681.—Catull 61, 17.

IDANTHYRSUS, a powerful king of Scythia, who refused to give his daughter in marriage to Darius the I., king of Persia. This refusal was the cause of a war between the two nations, and Darius marched against Idanthyrsus, at the head of 700,000 men. He was defeated, and retired to Persia, after an inglorious campaign. Strab. 13.

IDARNES, an officer of Darius, by whose negligence the Macedonians took Miletus. Curt. 4, 5

IDAS, a son of Aphareus and Arane, famous for his valour and military glory. He was among the Argonauts, and married Marpessa, the daughter of Evenus king of Ætolia. Marpessa was carried away by Apollo, and Idas pursued his wife's ravisher with bow and arrows, and obliged him to restore her. (Vid. Marpessa.) According to Apollodorus, Idas with his brother Lynceus associated with Pollux and Castor to carry away some flocks; but when they had obtained a sufficient quantity of plunder, they refused to divide it into equal shares. This provoked the sons of Leda. Lynceus was killed by Castor, and Idas to revenge his brother's death, immediately killed Castor, and in his turn perished by the hand of Pollux. According to Ovid and Pausanias, the quarrel between the sons of Leda and those of Aphareus arose from a more tender cause; Idas and Lynceus, as they say, were going to celebrate their nuptials with Phœbe and Hilaira the two daughters of Leucippus; but Castor and Pollux, who had been invited to partake the common festivity, offered violence to the brides, and carried them away. Idas and Lynceus fell in the attempt to recover their wives Homer Il. 9, 549.—Hygin. fab. 14, 100, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 5, 700 —Apollod 1 et 3 —Paus. 4, 2, 5, 18.—A son of Ægyptus.—A Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, 575.

IDÆA or IDÆA, a daughter of Dardanus, who became the second wife of Phineus king of Bithynia, and abused the confidence reposed in her by her husband. (Vid Phineus.) Apollod. 3.—The mother of Teucer by Scamander. Apollod.

IDESSA, a town of Iberia on the confines of Colchis. Strab. 11.

IDEX, a small river of Italy, now Idice, near Bononia.

IDISTAVISUS, a plain, now Hastenbach, where Germanicus defeated Arminius, near Oldendorp on the Weser in Westphalia. Tacit A 2, 16.

IDMON, son of Apollo and Asteria, or as some say, of Cyrene, was the prophet of the Argonauts. He was killed in hunting a wild boar in Bithynia, where his body received a magnificent funeral. He had predicted the time and manner of his own death. Apollod. 1, 9.—Orpheus.—A dyer of Colophon, father to Arachne. Ovid. Met. 6, 8.—A man of Cyzicus, killed by Hercules, &c. Flacc. 3 —A son of Ægyptus, killed by his wife. Vid. Danaides.

IDOMÈNE, a daughter of Pheres, who married Amythaon. Apollod. 1, 9.

IDOMENEUS, succeeded his father Deucalion on the throne of Crete, and accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, with a fleet of ninety ships. During this celebrated war he rendered himself famous by his valour, and slaughtered many of the enemy. At his return he made a vow to Neptune in a dangerous tempest, that if he escaped from the fury of the seas and storms, he would offer to the god whatever living creature first presented itself to his eye on the Cretan shore. This was no other than his own son, who came to congratulate his father upon his safe return. Idomeneus performed his promise to the god, and the inhumanity and rashness of his sacrifice rendered him so odious in the eyes of his subjects, that he left Crete, and migrated in quest of a settlement. He came to Italy, and founded a city on the coast of Calabria, which he called Salentum. He died in an extreme old age, after he had had the satisfaction of seeing his new kingdom flourish, and his subjects happy. According to the Greek scholiast of Lycophron, ver. 1217, Idomeneus, during his absence in the Trojan war, entrusted the management of his kingdom to Leucus, to whom he promised his daughter Clisithere in marriage at his return. Leucus, at first governed with moderation; but he was persuaded by Nauplius, king of Eubœa, to put to death Meda the wife of his master, with her daughter Clisithere, and to seize the kingdom. After these violent measures, he strengthened himself on the throne of Crete; and Idomeneus, at his return, found it impossible to expel the usurper. Ovid. Met. 13, 258.—Hygin. 92.—Homer Il. 11, &c. Od. 19.—Paus. 5, 25 —Virg. Æn. 3, 122.—A son of Priam.—A Greek historian of Lampsacus, in the age of Epicurus. He wrote a history of Samothrace, the life of Socrates, &c.

IDOTHÉA, a daughter of Proetus, king of Argos. She was restored to her senses with her sisters, by Melampus (Vid. Proetides) Homer. Od. 11. —A daughter of Proteus, the god who told Menelaus how he could return to his country in safety. Homer. Od. 4, 363.— One of the nymphs who educated Jupiter.

IDRIEUS, the son of Euromus of Caria, brother to Artemisia, who succeeded to Mausolus, and invaded Cyprus. Diod. 16.—Polyæn 7.

IDUBEDA, a range of mountains in Spain, commencing among the Cantabri, and traversing with a winding course the eastern part of Spain, till it reaches the Mediterranean coast, near Saguntum, which lay at its foot. Strab 3.

IDUMÆA, a province of Arabia, which derives its name from Edom, or Esau, who there settled in the mountains of Seir, in the land of the Horites, south east of the Dead Sea. His descendants afterwards extended themselves throughout Arabia Petræa, and south of Palestine, between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean. During the Babylonish captivity, and when Judæa was almost deserted, they seized the south of Judah, and advanced to Hebron. Hence that tract of Judæa, which they inhabited, retained the name of Idumæa in the time of our Saviour. Under Moses and Joshua, and even under the kings of Judah, the Idumæans were confined to the east and south of the Dead Sea, in the land of Seir; but afterwards they extended their territories more to the south of Judah. The capital of east Idumæa was Bozra, or Bosra; and that of south Idumæa, Petra, or Jactael. Idumæa was famous for its palm trees. In general, however, the country was hot, dry, mountainous, and in some parts barren. It is now inhabited by some tribes of wild Arabs. Virg. G. 3, 12.

IDYIA, one of the Oceanides, who married Æetes king of Colchis, by whom she had Medea, &c Hygin.—Hesiod. Th. 960.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 19.

JENISUS, a town of Arabia, near the Palus Sirbonis.

JERA, one of the Nereides. Homer Il 18, 42.

JERICHO, a city of Judæa, in the tribe of Benjamin, about seven leagues from Jerusalem, and two from the Jordan. Moses calls it the city of palm-trees, because of the palm-trees growing in the plain of Jericho. Josephus says, that in the territory of this city were not only many palm-trees, but also the balsam-tree. Jericho was the first city of Canaan taken by Joshua, who destroyed it A new city was afterwards built by Hiel of Bethel, but it would seem that before the time of Hiel there was another Jericho built near the site of the old. Deut. 34, 3.—Josh. 2, 1, 2, &c. —Judges 3, 13.

IERNE, now Ireland, a large island lying to the west of Britain, from which it is separated by the Mare Hibernicum, or St George's Channel, and the Mare Vergivium, or the Irish Sea. It is otherwise called Iuverna, Iris, Ivernia, and Hibernia. Its greatest length is 260 miles, and its average breadth about 140; but, owing to the deep indentations of the coast, there is not a spot in the whole island that is fifty miles distant from the sea. Orpheus — Aristot. — Jur. 2, 160.—Mela, 3, 6.—Dod. Sic. 1, 353.—Ptol. 2, 2.—Cæs. Bell. G. 13.—Plin. 4, 16.

JEROMUS and JERONYMUS, a Greek of Cardia, who wrote a history of Alexander.——A native of Rhodes, disciple of Aristotle, of whose compositions some few historical fragments remain. Dionys Hal 1.

JERUSALEM, the capital of Judea. Vid Hierosolyma

IGILGILIS, a town of Mauritania Cæsariensis, west of the mouth of the river Ampsagas. It is now Zezeli.

IGILIUM, now Giglio, an island of Italy, near the coast of Etruria, off the promontory of Argentarius. The thick woods of this island served as a place of refuge for a great number of Romans, who fled from the sack of Rome by Attila. Mela, 2, 7.—Rutilius, It. 1, 325.

IGNATIUS, an officer of Crassus in his Parthian expedition.——One of the apostolical fathers, born in Syria. He was brought up under St John the Evangelist; and there are those who affirm that he was one of the children brought to our Saviour. He became bishop of Antioch, A. D. 51, and continued there till 107, when Trajan entered the city in triumph, after having conquered the Scythians and Daci A persecution of the Christians followed, and Ignatius, after a long conference with the emperor, was sent to Rome, to suffer death in the amphitheatre. On his arrival there the Christians went out to meet him, with a mixture of joy and sorrow; and as the execution was not to take place till the Saturnalia, the interval was spent in holy rites and prayers for the church He suffered with great fortitude, Dec. 20 of that or the following year, and his remains were gathered up and transported to Antioch, by the companions of his journey. Seven of his epistles were published by archbishop Usher, at Oxford, in 1645, but the best edition is that of Cotelerius in the Patres Apostolici. They have been translated by archbishop Wake. The fewer epistles, which pass under his name, are spurious, though supported by Whiston.

IGNIGENA, a surname applied to Bacchus, as saved from the flames which consumed his mother Semele Ovid. Met. 4, 12

IGUVIUM, a town of Umbria, on the Via Flaminia, now Gubbio. Cæs. B. C. 1, 12.—Sil. Ital. 8, 460

ILAIRA, a daughter of Leucippus, carried away with her sister Phœbe, by the sons of Leda, as she was going to be married, &c.

ILBA or ILVA, an island of the Tyrrhene sea, off the coast of Etruria, and about ten miles from the promontory of Populonium. It was famed for its iron mines. It was called Æthalia by the Greeks. It is now Elba. Virg. Æn. 10, 173.

ILERCAONES, a Spanish tribe, east of the Edetani, on both sides of the Iberus, near its mouth. Dertosa, now Tortosa, and Terraco, now Tarragona, were two of their towns.

ILERDA, the capital city of the Ilergetes in Spain, situate on the Sicoris, or Segre, a tributary of the Iberus. Its situation at the foot of the Pyrenees, exposed it incessantly to the horrors of war, from the time that the Romans began to penetrate into Spain Under Gallienus, it was almost entirely destroyed by the barbarians, who, migrating from Germany, ravaged the western parts of the empire. It is now Lerida in Catalonia. Strab. 3.—Cæs. B. C. 1, 61.—Flor. 4, 12.—Appian B. C 2, 42.

ILERGETES. Vid. Ilerda.

ILIA or RHEA, a daughter of Numitor, king of Alba, consecrated by her uncle Amulius to the service of Vesta, which required perpetual chastity, that she might not become a mother to dispossess him of his crown. He was however disappointed; violence was offered to Ilia, by the god Mars, and she brought forth Romulus and Remus, who drove the usurper from his throne, and restored the crown to their grandfather Numitor, its lawful possessor. Ilia was buried alive by Amulius, for violating the laws of Vesta; and because her tomb was near the Tiber, some suppose that she married the god of that river. Horat. Od. 1, 2.—Virg. Æn. 1, 277.—Ovid. Fast. 2, 598.——A wife of Sylla.

ILIACI LUDI, games instituted by Augustus, in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained over Antony and Cleopatra. They are supposed to be the same as the Trojani ludi and the Actia, and Virgil says, they were celebrated by Æneas, not only because they were instituted at the time when he wrote his poem, but because he wished to compliment Augustus, by making the founder of Lavinium solemnize games on the very spot which was, many centuries after, to be immortalized by the trophies of his patron. During these games were exhibited horse races, and gymnastic exercises. Virg. Æn. 3, 280.

ILIACUS, an epithet applied to such as belong to Troy Virg Æn 1, 101.

ILIADES, a surname given to Romulus, as son of Ilia. Ovid.—— A name given to the Trojan women. Virg Æn. 1, 494.

ILIAS, a celebrated poem composed by Homer upon the Trojan war. It delineates the wrath of Achilles, and all the calamities which befell the Greeks, from the refusal of that hero to appear in the field of battle. It finishes at the death of Hector, whom Achilles had sacrificed to the shades of his friend Patroclus. It is divided into twenty-four books. (Vid. Homerus.)——A surname of Minerva, from a temple which she had at Daulis in Phocis. This sacred spot was remarkable for some dogs kept by the priests, which were said to bark only at such persons as were not natives of the country. The temple was erected, as some suppose, after the return of Ulysses from his embassy to Troy, by the Greeks, who had made a vow which they thus fulfilled in honour of the Trojan goddess. Xenoph. in Hell.

ILIENSES, a people of Sardinia, fabled to have been descended from some Trojans who came to that island after the fall of Troy. They were driven into the mountains by Libyan colonies, and here, according to Pausanias, the name Ilei is existed even in his time. Paus. 10, 17.

ILIONE, the eldest daughter of Priam, who married Polymnestor, king of Thrace. Virg. Æn. 1, 657.

ILIONEUS, a Trojan, son of Phorbas. He came into Italy with Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, 525. ——A son of Artabanus, made prisoner by Parmenio, near Damascus. Curt. 3, 13.——One of Niobe's sons. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 6.

ILIPA, a town of Bætica. Liv. 35, 1.

ILISSUS, a small river of Attica, falling into the sea near the Piræus. There was a temple on its banks, sacred to the Muses Stat. Theb. 4, 52.

ILITHYIA, a goddess called also Juno Lucina Some suppose her to be the same as Diana. She presided over the travails of women; and in her temple at Rome, it was usual to carry a small piece of money as an offering. This custom was first established by Servius Tullius, who, by enforcing it, was enabled to know the exact number of the Roman people. Hesiod. Th 450 — Homer. Il. 11, 269. Odyss 19, 188.—Apollod. 1 et 2.—Horat. Carm. Secul.—Ovid. Met. 9, 283

ILIUM or ILION, another name for the city of Troy, or, more properly, the true one, since Troja, the appellation given to the place by the Roman writers, was, strictly speaking, the name of the district. (Vid Troja.)——Novum, a city of the Troad, originally a small village, but enlarged by the Macedonians, from the time of Alexander, and after them by the Romans. It was situated on the right bank of the Simois, about thirty stadia lower down than Troy

ILIBERRIS, or ELIBERRI, a town of Gallia Narbonensis, south of Ruscino, and in the territory of the Sardones, the same probably with the Volcæ Tectosages It was a flourishing place when Hannibal passed through on his march into Italy, and here he established a garrison It sank in importance afterwards; until Constantine almost rebuilt it, and called it, in memory of his mother Helena, Helenensis civitas. In this place Magnentius slew Constans, and here Constantine died in a castle built by himself. It is now Rine.

ILLICE, now Elche, a city of the Contestani in Spain, north-east of Carthago Nova. Mela, 2, 6 —Plin. 3, 3.

ILLICITANUS SINUS, a bay on the south-east coast of Spain, extending from Carthago Nova to the Dianium Promontorium. It is now the bay of Alicant. Mela, 2, 6.

ILLITURGIS, ILITURGIS, or ILIRGIA, a city of Spain, near the modern Andujar, in Andalusia, on the river Bætis, destroyed by Scipio for having revolted to the Carthaginians. Liv. 23, 49. 24, 41. 25. 17.

ILLYRICUM, ILLYRIS, and ILLYRIA, a country bordering on the Adriatic sea, opposite Italy. It was wholly contained between the rivers Naro, or Narenta, and; Drilo. Some authors, among whom are Pliny and Ptolemy, extend the limits of this country so as to include Liburnia and Dalmatia. D'Anville has assigned to Illyricum the whole country which lies between Istria and the small river Arsia, as far as the mouth of the Drilo; but he observes that the Illyric nations extended much farther. They spread themselves at a very early period along the eastern coast of Italy, to the south of the Padus, or Po, in which quarter traces of them were found even in the time of the Romans. They were very famous for their early acquaintance with, and subsequent skill in, navigation; and the light Liburnian galleys aided not a little in securing to Augustus the victory at Actium. Illyricum answers now in part to modern Albania. Strab. 2 et 7.—Paus. 4, 35.—Mela, 2, 2, &c.—Plin. 1, 18. 4, 2.—Ptol. 2, 17.

ILLYRIUS, a son of Cadmus and Hermione, from whom Illyricum received its name. Apollod.

ILORCI, now Lorca, a town of Spain. Plin. 3, 3.

ILURO, now Oleron, a town of Gascony in France.

ILUS, the fourth king of Troy, was son of Tros by Callirhoe. He married Eurydice the daughter of Adrastus, by whom he had Themis, who married Capys, and Laomedon the father of Priam. He built, or rather embellished, the city of Ilium, called also Troy from his father Tros Jupiter gave him the Palladium, a celebrated statue of Minerva, and promised that as long as it remained in Troy, so long would the town remain impregnable When the temple of Minerva was in flames, Ilus rushed into the middle of the fire to save the Palladium, for which action he was deprived of his sight by the goddess, though he recovered it some time after. Homer. Il.—Strab. 13 - Apollod. 3, 12.—Ovid. Fast. 4, 33 6, 419.——A name of Ascanius, while he was at Troy. Virg Æn. 1, 272.——A friend of Turnus, killed by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 10, 400.

ILVA Vid. Ilba.

ILYRGIS, a town of Hispania Bætica, now Lora. Polyb

IMANUENTIUS, a king of part of Britain, killed by Cassivelaunus, &c. Cæs. Bell. G 5.

IMAUS, the name of a large chain of mountains, which in a part of its course divided, according to the ancients, the vast region of Scythia into Scythia intra Imaum and Scythia extra Imaum. It is, in fact, merely a continuation of the great Tauric range. That part of the Tauric chain over which Alexander crossed, and whence the Indus springs, was called Paropamisus. Farther on were the Emodi Montes, giving rise to the Ganges, and still farther to the east the range of Imaus, extending to the eastern ocean Imaus is generally thought to answer to the Himalah mountains of Thibet; strictly speaking, however, this name belongs to the Emodi Montes; and Imaus, in the early part of its course, is the modern Mustag, or the chain which branches off to the north-west from the centre of the Himalah range. All the names by which this chain is distinguished are derived from the Sanscrit term Hem, signifying "snow." Hence have arisen the names Imaus and Emodus among the ancients, and Himalah, Himadri, Himachal, and Himalaya, among the moderns. As the chain of Imaus proceeds on to the east, it ceases to be characterized as snowy, and, in separating the region of Scythia into its two divisions, answers to the modern range of Altai The highest summit in the Himalah chain is Dwalaghiri, or, the White Mountain, which is 26,872 feet above the level of the sea. Plin 6, 17.—Strab. 1

IMBARUS, a part of mount Taurus in Armenia.

IMBRACIDES, a patronymic given to Asius, as son of Imbracus. Virg Æn. 10 123.

IMBRASIDES, a patronymic given to Glaucus and Lades, as sons of Imbrasus. Virg. Æn. 12, 343.

IMBRASUS, or PARTHENIUS, a river of Samos. Juno, who was worshipped there, received the surname of Imbrasia, and the inhabitants boasted that the goddess was born on the banks under a willow-tree, which they still showed in the age of Pausanias. Plin. 5. 2.—Paus. 7, 4.——The father of Pirus, the leader of the Thracians during the Trojan war. Virg. Æn. 10, 123. 12, 343. —Homer Il. 4. 520.

IMBREUS, one of the Centaurs, killed by Dry-

as, at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, 310

IMBREX, C. Licinius, a poet. Vid. Licinius.

IMBRIUS, a Trojan of Pedeo, killed by Teucer, son of Mentor. He had married Medesicaste Priam's daughter. Homer Il. 13, 170.

IMBROS, an island of the Ægean, twenty two miles east of Lemnos, and now called Imbro. Like Lemnos, it was at an early period the seat of the Pelasgi, who worshipped the Cabiri and Mercury by the name of Imbramus. Imbros is generally mentioned by Homer in conjunction with Lemnos. It was first conquered by the Persians, and afterwards by the Athenians, who derived from thence excellent darters and targeteers. There was a town, probably of the same name with the island, the ruins of which are to be seen at a place called Castro. Plin. 4, 12. — Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 36. — Herod. 5, 27. Thucyd. 4, 28

INACHI, a name given to the Greeks, particularly the Argives, from king Inachus

INACHIA, a name given to Peloponnesus, from the river Inachus. — A festival in Crete in honour of Inachus; or, according to others, of Io's misfortunes. — A courtezan in the age of Horace. Epod 11. 5. 12. 14.

INACHIDÆ, the name of the eight first successors of Inachus, on the throne of Argos.

INACHIDES, a patronymic of Epaphus, as grandson of Inachus. Ovid Met 1, 704. — Also of Perseus, descended from Inachus. Id 4. fab. 11.

INACHIS, a patronymic of Io, as daughter of Inachus. Ovid. Fast 1, 451.

INACHUS, a son of Oceanus and Tethys, father of Io, and also of Phoroneus and Ægialeus. He founded the kingdom of Argos, and was succeeded by Phoroneus, B. C. 1807, and gave his name to a river of Argos, of which he became the tutelary deity He reigned sixty years. Virg G 3, 151. — Apollod. 2. 3. — Paus. 2, 15. — A river of Argolis, flowing past the foot of the Acropolis of Argos, and emptying itself into the bay of Nauplia. Its source was in mount Lyceus on the confines of Arcadia, but the poets feigned it to be a branch of the Inachus of Amphilochia, which, after joining the Achelous, passed underground and reappeared in Argolis. It is now called the Xeria. Strab. 6 et 8 — A river of the Amphilochian district in Acarnania It was said to rise in that part of mount Pindus called Laemon, and joining the Achelous, to pass under the sea till it reached the Peloponnesian Argos. Others, however, affirmed, that the Peloponnesian Inachus was a different river from that of the Amphilochians. Strab. 6.

INAMAMES, a river in the east of Asia, as far as which Semiramis extended her empire. Polyæn

INARIME, an island near Campania, with a mountain under which Jupiter confined the giant Typhœus. It is now called Ischia, and is remarkable for its fertility and population. There was formerly a volcano in the middle of the island. Virg. Æn. 9, 716

INARUS, a son of Psammeticus, king of that part of Libya which borders upon Egypt. Sallying forth from Marea, he drew over the greater part of Egypt to revolt from Artaxerxes, the Persian emperor, and, becoming himself their ruler, called in the Athenians to his assistance, who happened to be engaged in an expedition against Cyprus, with two hundred ships of their own and their allies. The enterprise at first was eminently successful, and the whole of Egypt fell under the power of the invaders and their ally. Eventually, however, the Persian arms triumphed, and Inarus, being taken by treachery, was crucified. Thucyd. 1, 104, 109 et 110.

INCITATUS, a horse of the emperor Caligula, made one of his priests, and intended also for the consulship.

INDATHYRSUS Vid Idanthyrsus.

INDIA, an extensive country of Asia, divided by Ptolemy and the ancient geographers into India intra Gangem, and India extra Gangem, or India on this side, and India beyond, the Ganges. The first division corresponds with the modern Hindoostan; the latter with the Burmah Empire, and the dominions of Pegu, Siam, Laos, Cambodia, Cochin China, Tonquen, and Malacca. India derived its name from the river Indus, which formed its western boundary. The Greeks knew but little of India till its invasion by Alexander the Great, as may be inferred from none of their existing poets mentioning even its name The fabled campaigns, which some of their mythologists represent Dionysius, or Bacchus, and Hercules, to have undertaken against it, were invented after they had arrived at a considerable knowledge of the country, and the accounts which they received concerning the Indians, may for the most part be classed amongst those fables, which were related on all sides of the people dwelling at the extremities of the then known world Amongst these fables may be included that of the Pygmæi or nation of black dwarfs, who were so small that the tallest among them seldom exceeded two feet in height They were admirable archers; their animals were all of a proportionable stature with themselves, and upon these they went out to make war against certain birds, called cranes, which came annually from Scythia to plunder them. Later traditions, however, remove these Pygmies to the deserts of Africa, where they represent them as attacked Hercules, when sleeping after his victory over Antæus. The campaign of Alexander was confined to the countries watered by the Indus and its branches. He entered India near Cabul, and crossed the Indus and Hydaspes, on the banks of which last, he defeated Porus, one of the Indian kings, whose dominions, however, he afterwards increased by the addition of several new provinces. Alexander then traversed the Punjaub as far as the banks of the Hyphasis, or Beyah, when his troops refused to proceed farther eastward. This disobedience was confirmed by the reports of the warlike preparations made against them by the king of the Gangaridæ and Prasii, which filled even the veterans with such apprehension, that they declared openly they would follow their chief no farther in that direction. In this crisis of his affairs, Alexander yielded to the general wish; he accordingly made preparations for retreating, but first having enlarged the circuit of his encampment, he built twelve immense altars on the banks of the river, and ordered beds and other pieces of furniture to be left behind, of greater dimensions than corresponded with the ordinary proportions of man, intending them as a subject of wonder for all posterity. He then retreated to the Hydaspes, and descended the Indus to Patala, and subsequently to the sea. Having performed sacrifices to Neptune, he ascended the Indus to Xylempolis, which he had ordered to be built in his absence; and finally set off at the head of his army, traversed the southern provinces of Persia, in the deserts of which he lost the greater part of his troops, and arrived at length at Babylon. India is said to have contained more than a hundred different nations; its inhabitants were a fine, athletic race, and were divided anciently into seven castes. India was reckoned by the ancients amongst the most opulent of all the countries of Asia; it was also exceedingly fertile, producing almost every kind of grain, as well as many sorts of spices in great abundance. Its elephants were especially famed for their size and strength, and were much preferred to the African; it was also greatly celebrated for its tigers and serpents. India produced many perfumes, as well as precious stones and gold, its woods, and the trees in them, were of a vast magnitude and height, and its ebony was very famous; there is likewise some slight mention made of its indigo and sugar-cane. Diod 1.—Strab 1, &c.—Mela, 3, 7.—Plin. 5, 28.—Curt. 8, 10.—Justin. 1, 2. 12, 7.

INDIBILIS, a princess of Spain, betrothed to Albutius.

INDIGETES, a name given to those deities who were worshipped only in some particular places, or who were become gods from men, as Hercules, Bacchus, &c. Some derive the word from inde et genus, born at the same place where they received their worship. Virg. G. 1, 498.—Ovid. Met. 14, 608.

INDUS, a celebrated river of India, falling, after a course of 1300 miles, into the Indian Ocean. Its sources are supposed to be situated in the northern declivity of the Caulas branch of the Himalah mountains, in about lat. 31° 20′ N., and long 80° 30′ E., within a few miles of the sources of the Sutlege, its principal tributary. Its name in Sanscrit is Sindh or Hindh, an appellation which is obtains from its blue colour. Under the name Sindus it was known even to the Romans, besides its more common appellation of Indus. The Indus receives the waters of many large streams. The most remarkable on the eastern side, are the five rivers of the Punyaub, which unite in one stream called the Punynud. For seventy miles above the point of junction with the Indus, the two rivers run parallel to each other, and the distance between them is not more than ten miles. In July and August, the whole intermediate tract is under water, and the villages are, for the most part, mere temporary erections. The five rivers of the Punyaub, each of which is equal to the largest rivers of Europe, are, the Hydaspes or Jhylum, the Acesines or Chunab, which joins the Hydaspes; the Hydraotes or Ravee, the smallest of the five, which joins the former two; the Hyphasis or Beyah, which falls into the Zaradrus, and the mighty Zaradrus or Sutlege itself, which assumes, below the junction, the name of Ghara or Ghavrah. Although the Indus divides into several channels as it approaches the sea, it does not form a delta, the lateral streams being absorbed by the sand, before they can reach the ocean. An easterly branch, called the Fullalee, rejoins the main stream, forming the island upon which Hyderabad is built. Below this point, the river is generally about a mile in breadth, and from two to five fathoms in depth; and it reaches the sea by one mouth. The tides are not perceptible higher up than sixty or sixty-five miles; but from the sea to Lahore, a distance of 760 geographical miles, the Indus, as well as the Ravee its tributary, is navigable for vessels of 260 tons. Cic. N. D. 2, 52.—Strab. 15.—Curt. 8, 9.—Diod. 2.—Ovid. Fast 3, 720.—Plin. 6, 20.——A river of Caria. Liv. 38, 14.

INFERUM MARE Vid. Tyrrhenum Mare.

INO, a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, who nursed Bacchus. She married Athamas, king of Thebes, after he had divorced Nephele by whom she had two children, Phryxus and Helle. Ino became mother of Melicerta and Learchus, and soon conceived an implacable hatred against the children of Nephele, because they were to ascend the throne in preference to her own. Phryxus and Helle were informed of Ino's machinations, and they escaped to Colchis, on a golden ram. (Vid. Phryxus.) Juno, jealous of Ino's prosperity, resolved to disturb her peace, and more particularly, because she was of the descendants of her greatest enemy, Venus. Tisiphone was sent, by order of the goddess, to the house of Athamas; and she filled the whole palace with such fury, that Athamas, taking Ino to be a lioness and her children whelps, pursued her, and dashed her son Learchus against a wall. Ino escaped from the fury of her husband, and from a high rock she threw herself into the sea, with Melicerta in her arms. The gods pitied her fate, and Neptune made her a sea deity, which was afterwards called Leucothoe. Melicerta became also a sea god, known by the name of Palæmon Homer. Od 5, 333.—*Cic. Tusc. INOA, festivals in memory of Ino, celebrated yearly with sports and sacrifices at Corinth. An anniversary sacrifice was also offered to Ino at Megara, where she was first worshipped, under the name of Leucothoe.——Another in Laconia, in honour of the same. It was usual at the celebration to throw cakes of flour into a pond, which, if they sank, were presages of prosperity, but if they swam on the surface of the waters, they were inauspicious and very unlucky.

INOUS, a patronymic given to the god Palæmon, as son of Ino. Virg. Æn. 5, 823

INOPUS, a river of Delos, which the inhabitants suppose to be the Nile, coming from Egypt under the sea. It was near its banks that Apollo and Diana were born. Plin. 2, 103.—Plaut 5, 105.—Strab 6.—Paus. 2, 4.

INSUBRES, the inhabitants of Insubria, a country near the Po, supposed to be of Gallic origin. They were conquered by the Romans, and the country became a province, where the modern towns of Milan and Pavia were built. Strab. 5. —Tacit A 11, 23.—Plin. 3, 17.—Liv. 5, 34.—Flor. 3, 1.

INTAPHERNES, one of the seven Persian noblemen who conspired against Smerdis, who usurped the crown of Persia. He was so disappointed at not obtaining the crown, that he fomented seditions against Darius, who had been raised to the throne after the death of the usurper. When the king had ordered him and all his family to be put to death, his wife, by frequently visiting the palace, excited the compassion of Darius, who pardoned her, and permitted her to redeem from death any one of her relations whom she pleased. She obtained her brother; and when the king expressed his astonishment, because she preferred him to her husband and children, she replied that she could procure another husband, and children likewise, but that she could never have another brother, as her father and mother were dead. Intaphernes was put to death. Herod. 3.

INTEMELIUM, a city of Liguria, on the coast. It was the capital of the Intemelii, and answers to the modern Ventimaglia. Strab. 4.—Plin. 3, 5.

INTERAMNA, an ancient city of Umbria, reputed to have been the birth-place of the historian Tacitus, and of the emperor of the same name. It is situate between two branches of the Nar (inter amnes), whence its name. It is now called Terni. Varro L. L. 4, 5.—Tacit. Hist. 2, 64.——A city of Picenum, in the territory of the Praetutii; hence called for distinction sake Praetutiana. Its modern name is Teramo, situate between the small rivers Fuzola and Turdino. Plin.——A city of New Latium, situate on the Liris, and between that river and the small stream now called Sogne, but the ancient name of which, Strabo, who states the fact, has not mentioned. It was usually called Interamna ad Lirim, to distinguish it from the other cities of similar name. Strab. 5.—Liv. 9, 28. 10, 36. 26, 9. 27, 9. —Plin 3, 5.——A town of the Frentani, near the river Trinius, now Termoli.

INTERCATIA, a town of Spain, now Quantajalla del Monte.

INTERREX, a supreme magistrate at Rome, who was intrusted with the care of the government after the death of a king, till the election of another. This office was exercised by the senators alone, and none continued in power longer than five days, or, according to Plutarch, only twelve hours. The first interrex mentioned in Roman history, is after the death of Romulus, when the Romans quarrelled with the Sabines concerning the choice of a king. An interrex was often chosen under the republic, when from contention between the patricians and plebeians, or any other cause, the comitia for electing magistrates could not be held in due time, or before the end of the year. He was chosen by the patricians out of their own number, and his authority continued for five days, after which, another was created to succeed him; and so on in succession new interreges were created every five days, till consuls were elected. The comitia were hardly ever held by the first interrex, sometimes by the second, sometimes by the third, and sometimes not even till the eleventh. Liv. 1, 17.—Dionys 2, 15

INYCUM, a city of Sicily, now Menfrici. Paus. 7.—Herod. 6, 23

Io, a daughter of Inachus, or, according to others, of Jasus or Pirenes, was priestess of Juno at Argos. Jupiter became enamoured of her; but Juno, jealous of his intrigues, discovered the object of his affections, and surprised him in the company of Io, though he had shrouded himself in all the obscurity of clouds and thick mists. Jupiter changed his mistress into a beautiful heifer; and the goddess, who well knew the fraud, obtained from her husband the animal, whose beauty she had condescended to commend. Juno commanded the hundred-eyed Argus to watch the heifer; but Jupiter, anxious for the situation of Io, sent Mercury to destroy Argus, and to restore her to liberty. (Vid. Argus.) Io, freed from the vigilance of Argus, was now persecuted by Juno; who sent one of the Furies, or rather a malicious insect, to torment her. She wandered over the greatest part of the earth, and crossed over the sea, till at last she stopped on the banks of the Nile, still exposed to the unceasing torments of Juno's insect. Here she intreated Jupiter to restore her to her ancient form; and when the god had changed her from a heifer into a woman, she brought forth Epaphus. Afterwards she married Telegonus king of Egypt, or Osiris, according to others, and she treated her subjects with such mildness and humanity, that after death she received divine honours, and was worshipped under the name of Isis. According to Herodotus, Io was carried away by Phoenician merchants, who wished to make reprisals for Europa, who had been stolen from them by the Greeks. Some suppose that to never came to Egypt. She is sometimes called Phoronis, from her brother Phoroneus. Ovid. Met. 1, 748.—Paus. 1, 25, 3, 18.—Manthus—Apollod. 2, 1.—*Lucr. IOBATES and IOBATES, a king of Lycia, father of Stenoboea, the wife of Proetus, king of Argos. He was succeeded on the throne by Bellerophon, to whom he had given one of his daughters, called Philonoe, in marriage. Vid Bellerophon. Apollod 2, 2.—Hygin. fab. 57.

IOBES, a son of Hercules by a daughter of Thespius. He died in his youth. Apollod. 2, 7.

IOCASTA, a daughter of Menoeceus, who married Laius, king of Thebes, by whom she had Oedipus. She afterwards married her son Oedipus, without knowing who he was, and had by him Eteocles, Polynices, &c. (Vid. Laius, Oedipus.) When she discovered that she had married her own son, and had been guilty of incest, she hanged herself in despair. She is called Epicasta by some mythologists. *Stat. JOHANNES DAMASCENUS, or John of Damascus, a saint of the Greek church, was born there about A. D 676. He succeeded his father as counsellor of state to the caliph, but at the close of life he went into a monastery, and died about 760. His works were printed at Paris in 2 vols. folio, 1712.

IOLAIA, a festival at Thebes, the same as that called Heracleia. It was instituted in honour of Hercules and his friend Iolas, who assisted him in conquering the hydra. It continued during several days, on the first of which were offered solemn sacrifices. The next day horse races and athletic exercises were exhibited. The following day was set apart for wrestling; the victors were crowned with garlands of myrtle, generally used at funeral solemnities. They were sometimes rewarded with tripods of brass. The place where the exercises were exhibited was called Iolaion, where there were to be seen the monument of Amphitryon, and the cenotaph of Iolas, who was buried in Sardinia. These monuments were strewed with garlands and flowers on the day of the festival.

IOLAS or IOLAUS, a son of Iphiclus, king of Thessaly, who assisted Hercules in conquering the hydra, and burned with a hot iron the place where the heads had been cut off, to prevent the growth of others (Vid Hydra) He was restored to his youth and vigour by Hebe, at the request of his friend Hercules. Some time afterwards, Iolas assisted the Heraclidæ against Eurystheus, and killed the tyrant with his own hand. According to Plutarch, Iolas had a monument in Bœotia and Phocis, where lovers used to go and bind themselves by the most solemn oaths of fidelity, considering the place as sacred to love and friendship According to Diodorus and Pausanias, Iolas died and was buried in Sardinia, where he had gone to make a settlement At the head of the sons of Hercules by the fifty daughters of Thespius Ovid Met 9, 399.—Apollod. 2, 4 —Paus 10, 17 —A friend of Æneas, killed by Catillus in the Rutulian wars *Virg. IOLCOS, a town of Thessaly, in the district of Magnesia, at the head of the Pelasgicus Sinus, and north-east of Demetrias. It was situate about seven stadia from the sea, on an eminence, and was the birth-place of Jason Strabo reckons this city in the number of those which were destroyed in order to people the town of Demetrias Paus 4, 2.—Apollod. 1, 9.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, 3 —Lucan 3 192.

IOLE, a daughter of Eurytus, king of Œchalia. Her father promised her in marriage to Hercules, but he refused to perform his engagements, and Iole was carried away by force (Vid Eurytus) It was to extinguish the love of Hercules for Iole, that Dejanira sent him the poisoned tunic, which caused his death. (Vid Hercules and Dejanira) After the death of Hercules, Iole married his son Hyllus, by Dejanira. Apollod. 2, 7.—Ovid Met 9, 270.

ION, a son of Xuthus and Creusa, daughter of Erechtheus, who married Helice, the daughter of Selinus, king of Ægiale. He succeeded on the throne of his father-in-law, and built a city, which he called Helice, on account of his wife His subjects from him received the name of Ionians, and the country that of Ionia. (Vid. Iones and Ionia.) Apollod 1, 7.—Paus 7, 1.—Strab 7. —Herod. 7, 94. 8, 44.—A tragic poet, a native of Chios, and surnamed Xuthus. He began to exhibit, Ol. 82, 2, B. C. 451. The number of his dramas is variously estimated at from twelve to forty. Bentley has collected the names of eleven The same great critic has also shown that this Ion was a person of birth and fortune, distinct from Ion Ephesius, a mere begging rhapsodist. Besides tragedies, Ion composed dithyrambs, elegies, &c., and several works in prose. Like Euripides, he was intimate with Socrates. Ion was so delighted with being decreed victor on one occasion, that he presented each citizen with a vase of Chian pottery. We gather from a joke of Aristophanes, on a word taken from one of his dithyrambs, that Ion died before the exhibition of the Pax, B. C. 419. Diog. Laert. 2, 23.—Athen. 1.—Aristoph. Pax, 833, &c.

IONE, one of the Nereides. Apollod. 1.

IONES, a name originally given to the subjects of Ion, who dwelt at Helice. In the age of Ion the Athenians made a war against the people of Eleusis and implored his aid against their enemies. Ion conquered the Eleusinians and Eumolpus, who was at their head; and the Athenians, sensible of his services, invited him to come and settle among them; and the more strongly to show their affection, they assumed the name of Ionians. Some suppose that, after this victory, Ion passed into Asia Minor, at the head of a colony. When the Achæans were driven from Peloponnesus by the Heraclidæ, eighty years after the Trojan war, they came to settle among the Ionians, who were then masters of Ægialea. They were soon dispossessed of their territories by the Achæans, and went to Attica, where they met with a cordial reception. Their migration from Greece to Asia Minor was about sixty years after the return of the Heraclidæ, B C 1044, and eighty years after the departure of the Æolians, and they therefore finally settled themselves, after a wandering life of about thirty years

IONIA, a country of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Æolia, on the west by the Ægean and Icarian seas, on the south by Caria, and on the east by Lydia and part of Caria. It was founded by colonies from Greece, and particularly Attica, by the Ionians, or subjects of Ion Ionia was divided into twelve small states, which formed a celebrated confederacy, often mentioned by the ancients. These twelve states were Phocæa, Smyrna, Clazomenæ, Erythræ, Teos, Lebedus, Colophon, Ephesus, Priene, Myus, Miletus, Samos, and Chios The inhabitants of Ionia built a temple, which they called Panionium, from the concourse of people that flocked there from every part of Ionia. After they had enjoyed their freedom for many years, they were conquered by Crœsus, and subsequently paid tribute to the Asiatic monarchs, until they were restored to independence by the assistance of the Athenians They, however, soon forgot this essential service, as well as their relation to the mother-country, by joining Xerxes in his invasion of Greece They were afterwards delivered from the Persian yoke by Alexander; and at a later period, the Romans, on their obtaining the sovereignty of the country, granted them at first their full immunities, rather for the sake of creating a divided interest in the peninsula, than out of respect for the institutions of the colony. Ionia was much celebrated for the genius of its inhabitants, who were accounted a soft and luxurious people; its climate was good, and its soil very productive. Herod 1, 6 et 28.—Strab 14. —Mela. 1, 2, &c —Paus 7, 1.—An ancient name given to Hellas, or Achaia because it was for some time the residence of the Ionians.

IONIUM MARE, a part of the Mediterranean sea, at the bottom of the Adriatic, lying between Sicily and Greece. That part of the Ægean sea which lies on the coast of Ionia, in Asia, is called the sea of Ionia, and not the Ionian sea. According to some authors, the Ionian sea receives its name from Io, who swam across there, after she had been metamorphosed into a heifer. Strab 7, &c.—Dionys. Perieg.

IOPAS, an African chieftain among the suitors of Dido. He was an excellent musician, poet, and philosopher, and he exhibited his superior abilities at the entertainment which Dido gave to Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, 744.

JOPPA, now Yaffa, a city of Palestine, situate on the coast, about seventy-miles north-west of Jerusalem. In the Old Testament it is called Japho. It was the only port possessed by the Jews, and the wood for the temple, which was cut on mount Lebanon, was brought in floats to Joppa, thence to be sent to Jerusalem. It was hither that Jonah fled and took ship for Tarshish; here, too, the apostle Peter raised Dorcas to life, and fell into his remarkable trance. Joppa is mentioned by the profane authors, as the spot where Andromeda is said to have been chained to a rock to be devoured by a sea monster, from which she was rescued by Perseus. Joshua, 19, 46.—2 Chron 2, 16.—Jonah, 1, 3.—Acts, 9, 36, &c.—Strab, 16.——A daughter of Iphiclus, who married Theseus Plut

IOPHON, a son of Sophocles, who accused his father of imprudence in the management of his affairs The old man repeated before his judges the tragedy of Œdipus Coloneus which he had just finished, and convinced his audience that the meanest passions of avarice and unnatural disrespect had given rise to the accusation. Suidas.——A poet of Gnossus in Crete. Paus 1, 31

JORDANES, a river of Asia, forming the eastern boundary of Galilee and Judæa. It has a double source. According to Josephus, its true source was lake Phiala, so called from its being round like a bowl (φιάλη), but, according to captain Mangles, this lake has no apparent discharge, and the connexion between it and the Jordan must be, if it exists, subterranean; which is what Josephus probably means by saying, the water of the lake is carried to Paneum in an occult manner. The apparent source is near Paneas or Paneum, the modern Banias, and probably the Baal-Gad of the Hebrews, situated "under mount Hermon." It flows from under a cave at the foot of a precipice, in the perpendicular sides of which are several niches, adorned with pilasters, having Greek inscriptions. The hill, now called Tel-el-Kadi, is an hour and a quarter north east of Banias. There the springs, the waters of which unite immediately below, the larger source forming a rapid stream twelve or fifteen yards across At the distance of about an hour and a half, it is joined by the river Hasbeia, flowing from the vale of that name, which is the larger head-stream of the two. Near this confluence was situated the Dan of the Scriptures. The united streams form the great Jordan of Josephus, which, flowing through the marshes of lake Samachonites and the district now called Ard Hoole, enters the lake of Tiberias at its northern extremity, and, passing through it, continues its course in a southerly direction till it falls into the Dead Sea. At its mouth, it is deep and rapid, and between 290 and 300 feet in width; rolling its turbid waters through a deep channel, the perpendicular banks of which are from six to fifteen feet high, bordered with willows and reeds Its appearance and volume vary, however, very considerably with the season, which will explain the contradictory accounts given by travellers Between the end of January and the end of March, the Jordan, swelled by the rains, rises very rapidly nine or ten feet in perpendicular height, but owing, apparently, to its having worn for itself a deeper channel, it no longer overflows its banks, as in ancient times At the distance, however, of about a furlong, in some places, from the immediate bank of the stream, there is an outer bank, from which there is a descent of several feet, and to which the inundations seem to have formerly reached. The intermediate borders of the river are so covered with a thicket of willow, oleander, and other bushes and reeds, that the traveller cannot see the river till he has made his way through them; and this thicket still furnishes covert, for wild animals, as when, of old, the leopard was driven up into the plain by the swelling of Jordan. The name of the river is supposed to mean "the river of Dan." Between the lake Samachonites and the lake of Tiberias, it is still called Ordeu; but after its exit from the lake, it takes that of Sheriat, which it preserves till it reaches the Dead Sea. Strab. 16.

JORNANDES, a Goth by birth, secretary to one of the kings of the Alans, and, as some believe, afterwards bishop of Ravenna. In the year 552 of our era, he wrote a history of the Goths (De rebus Geticis). This is little more than an abridgment of a lost work on the same subject by Cassiodorus. He likewise composed a work, entitled, De regnorum et temporum successione in which the account of Roman affairs is a transcript from Florus. He is blamed for attributing to his countrymen all the great actions of the Scythians, and for suppressing whatever he thought discreditable to them

JOS, now Nio, an island in the Myrtoan sea, at the south of Naxos, celebrated as the place where Homer's mother was born, and where he himself, in the opinion of some, died on his voyage from Samos to Greece. Strab 10.—Plin. 4. 12.

JOSEPHUS FLAVIUS, an eminent Jewish historian, was born at Jerusalem, A D. 37, when Caligula was emperor. His father, Mattathias, was descended from the ancient high priests of the Jews, and by his mother's side he was of the royal lineage of the Asmoneans, or Maccabees. He was educated in the knowledge of the Jewish law, and at the age of sixteen was induced to join the Essenes, but afterwards became a strict and zealous member of the sect of Pharisees. At the age of twenty-six, he visited Rome, and by means of an introduction to Poppæa, afterwards the wife of Nero, procured the release of some priests whom Felix had sent prisoners to that capital. On his return to Judæa, he was made governor of the two Galilees, in which capacity he bravely defended Iotapata against Vespasian. He was, however, taken prisoner, but his life was spared at the intercession of Titus, who became his patron, and whom he accompanied to the siege of Jerusalem. He was sent to his countrymen with offers of peace, but was treated with great contumely as a deserter At the capture of the city he was enabled to deliver his brother and several of his friends without ransom. He accompanied Titus back to Rome, where he was rewarded with the freedom of that city, and received agension and other marks of favour from Vespasian and his son, as a mark of gratitude to whom he assumed their family name of Flavius. He employed his leisure in drawing up those works which have perpetuated his name These are, his "History of the Jewish War," in seven books; his "Antiquities of the Jews," in twenty book-; "Two Books against Apion of Alexandria," a great adversary of his nation: a "Discourse on the Martyrdom of the Maccabees;" and a "Treatise on his Own Life." All these are written in Greek, in which language his style is judged by Photius to be easy, pure, and even eloquent. Few works are more interesting than his account of the Jewish war, of the incidents of which he was a spectator. With respect to his fidelity, very different opinions have prevailed. In his Jewish Antiquities, he frequently differs from the Scriptural accounts, and manifestly avoids shocking the prejudices of his Gentile readers. In his other narrations, a spirit of exaggeration, and a desire of exalting the honour of his nation, may be discerned, as well as the party spirit of a sectary. Upon the whole, however, his works rank among the most valuable remains of that age. The best editions of Josephus are those of Hudson, 2 vols. fol. Oxon. 1720, and of Havercamp, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1726. There are English translations of his works, by L'Estrange and Whiston. Sueton. in Vesp. &c.—Fosti Hist Græc.

JOVIANUS, Flavius Claudius, a native of Pannonia, elected emperor of Rome by the soldiers after the death of Julian. He at first refused to be invested with the imperial purple, because his subjects followed the religious principles of the late emperor; but they removed his groundless apprehensions, and, when they assured him that they were sincerely attached to Christianity, he accepted the crown He made a disadvantageous treaty with the Persians, against whom Julian was marching with a victorious army. Jovian died seven months and twenty days after his ascension, and was found in his bed suffocated by the vapours of charcoal, which had been lighted in the room, A. D 364. Some attribute his death to intemperance, and say that he was the son of a baker. He burned a celebrated library at Antioch. Marcellin.

IPHIANASSA, a daughter of Proetus king of Argos, who, with her sisters Iphinoe and Lysippe, ridiculed Juno, &c. (Vid. Proetides)——The wife of Endymion

IPHICLUS, or IPHICLES, a son of Amphitryon and Alcmena, born at the same birth with Hercules. As these two children were together in the cradle, Juno, jealous of Hercules, sent two large serpents to destroy him. At the sight of the serpents, Iphicles alarmed the house; but Hercules, though not a year old, boldly seized them, one in each hand, and squeezed them to death. Apollod 2, 4.—Theocrit.——A king of Phylace, in Phthiotis, son of Phylacus and Clymene. He had bulls famous for their bigness, which were kept by a monster of terrible appearance. Melampus, at the request of his brother (Vid. Melampus), attempted to steal them away, but he was caught in the fact, and imprisoned Iphiclus soon received some advantages from the prophetical knowledge of his prisoner, and not only restored him to liberty, but also presented him with the oxen. Iphiclus, who was childless, learned from the soothsayer how to become a father. He had married Automedusa, and afterwards a daughter of Creon, king of Thebes. He was father to Podarces and Protesilaus. Homer. Od. 11. Il. 13.—Apollod. 1, 9.—Paus. 4, 36 ——A son of Thestius, king of Pleuron Apollod. 2, 1.

IPHICRATES, a celebrated general of Athens, who, though son of a shoemaker, rose from the lowest station to the highest offices in the state He made war against the Thracians, obtained some victories over the Spartans, and assisted the Persian king against Egypt. He changed the dress and arms of his soldiers, and rendered them more alert and expeditious in using their weapons. He married a daughter of Cotys, king of Thrace, by whom he had a son called Amyntheus, and died 380 B. C When he was once reproached for the meanness of his origin, he observed, that he would be the first of his family, but that his detractor would be the last of his sort. C. Nep. in Iphic.——A sculptor of Athens ——An Athenian, sent to Darius the third, king of Persia, &c. Curt. 3, 13.

IPHIDAMUS, a son of Antenor and Theano, killed by Agamemnon. Homer. Il. 10, 222

IPHIGENIA, called also Iphianassa, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When the Greeks, going to the Trojan war, were detained by contrary winds at Aulis, they were informed by Calchas the priest of Apollo, and the soothsayer of the army, that to appease the gods, they must sacrifice Iphigenia, Agamemnon's daughter, to Diana. (Vid. Agamemnon.) The father, who had provoked the goddess by killing her favourite stag, heard this with the greatest horror and indignation, and rather than shed the blood of his daughter, he commanded one of his heralds, as chief of the Grecian forces, to order all the assembly to depart each to his respective home. Ulysses and the other generals interfered, and Agamemnon consented to immolate his daughter for the common cause of Greece. As Iphigenia was tenderly loved by her mother, the Greeks sent for her on pretence of giving her in marriage to Achilles. Clytemnestra gladly permitted her departure, and Iphigenia came to Aulis: here she saw the bloody preparations for the sacrifice; she implored the forgiveness and protection of her father, but tears and entreaties were unavailing. Calchas took the knife in his hand, and, as he was going to strike the fatal blow, Iphigenia suddenly disappeared, and a goat of uncommon size and beauty was found in her place ready for the sacrifice This supernatural change animated the Greeks, the wind suddenly became favourable, and the combined fleet set sail from Aulis. Iphigenia's innocence had raised the compassion of the goddess on whose altar she was going to be sacrificed, and she carried her to Taurica, where she entrusted her with the care of her temple In this sacred office Iphigenia was obliged by the command of Diana, to sacrifice all the strangers who came into that country. Many had already been offered as victims on the bloody altar, when Orestes and Pylades came to Taurica. Their mutual and unparalleled friendship (Vid. Pylades and Orestes.) disclosed to Iphigenia that one of the strangers whom she was going to sacrifice was her brother; and, upon this, she conspired with the two friends to fly from the barbarous country, and carry away the statue of the goddess. They successfully effected their enterprise, and murdered Thoas, who enforced the human sacrifices. According to some authors, the Iphigenia, who was sacrificed at Aulis, was not a daughter of Agamemnon, but a daughter of Helen by Theseus. Homer does not speak of the sacrifice of Iphigenia, though very minute in the description of the Grecian forces, adventures, &c. The statue of Diana, which Iphigenia brought away, was afterwards placed in the grove of Aricia in Italy. Paus. 2, 22 3, 16.—*Ovid. IPHIMEDIA, a daughter of Triopas, who married the giant Aloeus. She fled from her husband, and had two sons, Otus and Ephialtes, by Neptune, her father's father. Homer. Od. 11, 124 —Paus 9, 22.—Apollod 1, 7.

IPHIMEDON, a son of Eurystheus, killed in a war against the Athenians and Heraclidæ. Apollod.

IPHIMEDŌSA, one of the daughters of Danaus, who married Eurbenor. Vid. Danaides.

IPHINŌE, one of the principal women of Lemnos, who conspired to destroy all the males of the island after their return from a Thracian expedi-dion. Flacc. 2, 163.——One of the daughters of Prœtus. She died of a disease while under the care of Melampus. Vid. Prœtides.

IPHIS, son of Alector, succeeded his father on the throne of Argos. He advised Polynices, who wished to engage Amphiaraus in the Theban war, to bribe his wife Eriphyle, by giving her the golden collar of Harmonia. This succeeded, and Eriphyle betrayed her husband. Apollod. 3.—Flacc. 1, 441, 3, 135, 7, 342.——A beautiful youth of Salamis, of ignoble birth. He became enamoured of Anaxarete, and the coldness and contempt he met with rendered him so desperate that he hung himself. Anaxarete saw him carried to his grave without emotion, and was instantly changed into a stone. Ovid. Met 14, 703 ——A daughter of Thespius. Apollod.——A mistress of Patroclus, given him by Achilles. Homer. Il. 9——A daughter of Ligdus and Telethusa, of Crete. When Telethusa was pregnant, Ligdus ordered her to destroy her child, if it proved a daughter, because his poverty could not afford to maintain an useless charge. The severe orders of her husband alarmed Telethusa, and she would have obeyed, had not Isis commanded her in a dream to spare the life of her child. Telethusa brought forth a daughter, who was given to a nurse, and passed for a boy under the name of Iphis. Ligdus continued ignorant of the deceit, and, when Iphis was come to the years of puberty, her father resolved to give her in marriage to Ianthe, the beautiful daughter of Teletes. A day to celebrate the nuptials was appointed, but Telethusa and her daughter were equally anxious to put off the marriage; and, when all was unavailing, they implored the assistance of Isis, by whose advice the life of Iphis had been preserved. The goddess was moved, she changed the sex of Iphis, and, on the morrow, the nuptials were consummated with the greatest rejoicings. Ovid Met. 9, 666, &c

IPHITION, an ally of the Trojans, son of Otrynteus and Naïs, killed by Achilles. Homer. Il 20, 382

IPHITUS, a son of Eurytus, king of Œchalia When his father had promised his daughter Iole to him who could overcome him or his sons in drawing the bow, Hercules accepted the challenge, and came off victorious. Eurytus refused his daughter to the conqueror, observing, that Hercules had killed one of his wives in a fury, and that Iole might, perhaps, share the same fate. Some time after, Autolycus stole away the oxen of Eurytus, and Hercules was suspected of the theft. Iphitus was sent in quest of the oxen, and in his search, he met with Hercules, whose good favours he had gained by advising Eurytus to give Iole to the conqueror. Hercules assisted Iphitus in seeking the lost animals; but, when he recollected the ingratitude of Eurytus, he killed Iphitus by throwing him down from the walls of Tirynthus. Homer Od. 21, 14—Apollod. 2, 6.—— A Trojan, who survived the ruin of his country, and fled with Æneas to Italy. Virg. Æn. 2, 340, &c.—Homer Il 8, 128.——A king of Elis, son of Praxonides, in the age of Lycurgus. He reestablished the Olympic games 338 years after their institution by Hercules, or about 884 years before the Christian era. This epoch is famous in chronological history, as every thing previous to it seems involved in fabulous obscurity. Paterc 1, 8—Pans. 5, 4.

IPHITIME, a sister of Penelope, who married Eumelus. She appeared, by the power of Minerva, to her sister in a dream, to comfort her in the absence of her son Telemachus. Hom. Od. 4, 795

IPSEA, the mother of Medea. Ovid. Heroid. 17, 232.

IPSUS, a place of Phrygia, celebrated for a battle which was fought there about 301 years before the Christian era, between Antigonus and his son, and Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander. The former led into the field an army of above 70,000 foot and 10,000 horse, with 75 elephants. The latter's forces consisted of above 64,000 infantry, besides 10,500 horse, 400 elephants, and 120 armed chariots. Antigonus and his son were defeated. Antigonus lost his life in the action; Demetrius fled into Greece. The conquerors divided their possessions between them. Plut in Demetr.

IRA, a city of Messenia, in the north, towards the confines of Elis, and near the river Cyparissus, commonly supposed by some to have been one of the cities promised by Agamemnon to Achilles, if the latter would become reconciled to him This is incorrect, as Homer names the place to which Agamemnon alludes Ἶρη and not Ἴρα. Agamemnon promised Achilles seven cities of Messenia, of which Ire (not Ira) was one, and the poet describes all seven as lying near the sea, whereas Ira was inland. This place is famous in history as having supported a siege of eleven years against the Lacedæmonians. Its capture, B. C 671, put an end to the second Messenian war. Homer. Il. 9, 150 et 292.—Strab. 8.

IRENÆUS, bishop of Lyons, was a native of Greece, and the disciple of Polycarp, by whom it is supposed he was sent into Gaul. He was at first a priest in the church of Lyons, and on the martyrdom of Photinus, in 174, succeeded him in that bishopric He had a disputation with Valentinus at Rome, and held a council at Lyons in which the Gnostic heresy was condemned. Irenæus was a great lover of peace, and laboured to allay the controversy respecting the time of celebrating Easter. He was beheaded at Lyons in the persecution under Severus, about A. D. 202. The best edition of his works is that of Grabe, Oxon. fol 1702.

IRENE, a daughter of Cratinus the painter. Plin 35, 11——One of the seasons among the Greeks, called by the moderns Horæ. Her two sisters were Dia and Eunomia, all daughters of Jupiter and Themis. Apollod. 1, 3.

IRESUS, a beautiful country in Lybia, not far from Cyrene. When Battus, in obedience to the oracle, was seeking a place for a settlement, the Lybians, who were his guides, managed so as to lead him through it by night Milton calls the name Irassa, for which he has the authority of Pindar. Find Pyth. 9, 185.—Herod. 4, 158, &c.

IRIS, a daughter of Thaumas and Electra, one of the Oceanides, messenger of the gods, and more particularly of Juno Her office was to cut the thread which seemed to detain the soul in the body of those that were expiring. She is the same as the rainbow, and, from that circumstance she is represented with wings, with all the variegated and beautiful colours of the rainbow, and appears sitting behind Juno ready to execute her commands. She is likewise described as supplying the clouds with water to deluge the world The Greek term for the rainbow, Ἶρις, is supposed by some to be derived from εἶρω, I speak, I tell, as being an appearance in the heavens that is supposed to foretell, or rather to declare, rain. The fable of Iris being the particular messenger of Juno may have relation to the circumstance of the latter goddess being the same as the air, according to some. Hesiod. Theog. 266.—Ovid. Met. 1, 271 et seqq. 4, 480. 11, 585.—Virg. Flacc. 5, 121.

IRUS, a beggar of Ithaca, who executed the commissions of Penelope's suitors. When Ulysses returned home, disguised in a beggar's dress, Irus hindered him from entering the gates, and even challenged him. Ulysses brought him to the ground with a blow, and dragged him out of the house. From his poverty originates the proverb, Iro pauperior. Homer. Od. 8, 1 et 3.—Ovid. Trist. 3, 7, 42.

IS, a town about eight days' journey from Babylon, near which flows a river of the same name, which falls into the Euphrates With the current of this river, particles of bitumen descended towards Babylon, by means of which its walls were constructed. Herod. 1, 179

ISADAS, a Spartan, who, upon seeing the Thebans entering the city, stripped himself naked, and with a spear and sword engaged the enemy The Ephori honoured him with a chaplet for his gallant achievement, but at the same time fined him 1000 drachmas for having dared to appear without his armour. Plut. Vit. Ages.

ISÆA, one of the Nereides.

ISÆUS, an orator of Chalcis, in Euboea, who flourished about the end of the Peloponnesian war, the fourth century before the Christian era. When he came to Athens, he put himself under the instructions of the orator Lysias, from whom he obtained the same purity, accuracy, conciseness, and perspicuity of style, which distinguished his master, with more force and vigour. He was celebrated for popular eloquence, and had the honour of being the instructor of Demosthenes It has been said that he was dissipated in early life, but that as he attained to years of maturity, he became illustrious by the practice of the opposite virtues. He lived to the time of king Philip. He was author of sixty-nine orations, of which ten only are now remaining, which are published in the Corpus Oratorum Græcorum of Reiske, Lips. 1770, 12 vols. 8vo An excellent translation of them by Sir William Jones, was given in 1779 Jur. 3, 74.—Plut. de 10. *Orat. ISÄPIS, a river of Umbria. Lucan. 2, 406.

ISAR and ISARA, the Isère, a river of Gaul, where Fabius routed the Allobroges. It rose in the Graian Alps, and fell into the Rhodanus, near Valentia, the modern Valence. Plin. 3, 4. —Lucan. 1, 399.——Another called the Oise, which falls into the Seine below Paris.

ISARCHUS, an Athenian archon, B. C. 424.

ISARGUS, a river of Vindelicia, which, after a northern course, falls into the Danube. Now, the Iser. Strab. 4.

ISAURA (-æ, or -orum), now Bei Shehr, the capital of Isauria, near the confines of Phrygia. It was attacked by the Macedonians under Perdiccas, but the inhabitants set it on fire, and rushed into the flames to prevent their falling into their enemies' hands. They rebuilt it afterwards, but their robbery and piracy drew down upon them the vengeance of the Romans, who, during the age of Mithridates, sent P. Servilius against them, he conquered them and reduced their city to ashes, for which service he was surnamed Isauricus, and honoured with a triumph. In the age of Augustus, however, Amyntas, king of Galatia, built them a new city, hence called Isaura Nova, now Sudi Shehr, where he himself took up his residence, it was here that the pirate Trebellianus proclaimed himself emperor of Rome, A. D 264, but was shortly after defeated and slain by the lieutenants of Gallienus. Dod. Sic. 18.—Strab. 12.—Amm. Marcell 14, 8.

ISAURIA, a country of Asia Minor, north of, and adjacent to Pisidia. The inhabitants were a fierce and lawless set of robbers, who annoyed the whole country round, and, in conjunction with their neighbours the Cilicians, carried on a bold system of piracy till they were checked by the Romans under P. Servilius, and finally by Pompey. They were, however, never completely subdued by the latter people, but continued to make inroads on the neighbouring provinces, especially on the Roman possessions in Cilicia Trachea, the inhabitants of which at last joined them, and thus caused their province to be called Isauria. Strab. 12.—Flor. 3, 6.—Justop. 6, 3.—Cic ad Fam. 15, 2.

ISAURICUS, a surname of P. Servilius from his conquests over the Isaurians. Ovid. Fast. 1, 599.—Cic. Att. 5, 21.

ISCHENIA, an annual festival at Olympia, in honour of Ischenus, the grandson of Mercury, and Hierea, who, in a time of famine, devoted himself for his country, and was honoured with a monument near Olympia.

ISCHOMACHUS, a noble athlete of Crotona, about the consulship of M. Valerius and P. Postumius.

ISDEGERDES, a king of Persia, appointed by the will of Arcadius, guardian to Theodosius the Second. He died in his thirty-first year, A. D. 408.

ISELASTICA, a name applied to the athletic games among the Greeks, because the victors a them were conducted with great pomp into their respective cities, through a breach made in the walls for that purpose, intimating, says Plutarch, that a city which produced such brave citizens had little occasion for the defence of walls. The name comes from iσελαύνω, to enter.

ISIA, certain festivals observed in honour of Isis, which continued nine days. It was usual to carry vessels full of wheat and barley, as the goddess was supposed to be the first who taught mankind the use of corn. These festivals were adopted by the Romans, among whom they soon degenerated into licentiousness. They were abolished by a decree of the senate, A.U. C. 696. They were introduced again, about 200 years after, by Commodus. Jur. 6, 487.

ISIACI, the priests of Isis in Egypt. Their life was tinctured with austerity, they passed the night in prayer before the statue of the goddess, and after singing hymns in her honour at the rising of the sun, they were permitted to wander in quest of relief. Their heads were shaved; they clothed themselves in fine linen, and their feet were covered with the thin bark of the papyrus. They were not permitted to taste salt, nor the flesh of either sheep or hogs, and they were likewise forbidden to eat certain fishes, such especially as were caught with a line, and also onions, because, as they believed, they only grew during the ill-omened wane of the moon. Cic de Div 1, 133 —Val Max. 7, 3.— Plut de Isid. et Os.

ISIACORUM PORTUS, a harbour on the shore of the Euxine, in the north eastern part of Mœsia Inferior, near the mouth of the Danube.

ISIDORUS, a native of Charax, who published in the reign of Caligula a "Description of Parthia." It is contained in the Geographi Græci Minores of Hoeschel and Hudson ——An epigrammatic poet, a native of Bolbitine in Egypt.—— A New-Platonist, a native of Gaza, who succeeded Hegias in the chair of Athens, in the fifth century, or rather at the beginning of the sixth He was a zealous follower of Proclus, but deficient in talent and erudition, and consequently soon made way for Zenodotus as his successor ——A native of Pelusium, a saint in the Roman Catholic calendar, and one of the most celebrated of the disciples of Chrysostom He lived in the fifth century, professed the monastic life from his youth, and composed some thousand epistles of which two thousand and twelve remain, in five books, and are deemed valuable, especially for the information which they contain in relation to points of discipline and for practical rules The best edition is that of Schottus, Paris, 1638, fol ——Another saint in the Roman Catholic calendar, born at Carthago Nova, of which city his father was governor He succeeded his brother in the bishopric of Seville, A. D 601, and died A. D 636. His works are numerous, and among them is a Chronicle ending at A D 626. The editions of his Missal and Breviary are very scarce. In his treatise on Divine Offices are some curious observations on music.

ISIS, a celebrated deity of the Egyptians, daughter of Saturn and Rhea, according to Diodorus of Sicily Some suppose her to be the same as Io, who was changed into a cow, and restored to her human form in Egypt, where she taught agriculture, and governed the people with mildness and equity, for which reasons she received divine honours after death. According to some traditions mentioned by Plutarch, Isis married her brother Osiris, and was pregnant by him even before she had left her mother's womb. These two ancient deities, as some authors observe, comprehended all nature, and all the gods of the heathens. Isis was the Venus of Cyprus, the Minerva of Athens, the Cybele of the Phrygians, the Ceres of Eleusis, the Proserpine of Sicily, the Diana of Crete, the Bellona of the Romans, &c. Osiris and Isis reigned conjointly in Egypt, but the rebellion of Typhon, the brother of Osiris, proved fatal to this sovereign. (Vid Osiris and Typhon.) The ox and cow were the symbols of Osiris and Isis, because these deities, while on earth, had diligently applied themselves in cultivating the earth. (Vid Apis.) As Isis was supposed to be the moon, and Osiris the sun, she was represented as holding a globe in her hand, with a vessel full of ears of corn. The Egyptians believed that the yearly and regular inundations of the Nile proceeded from the abundant tears which Isis shed for the loss of Osiris, whom Typhon had basely murdered. The word Isis, according to some, signifies ancient, and, on that account, the inscriptions on the statues of the goddess were often in these words: I am all that has been, that shall be, and none among mortals has hitherto taken off my veil. The worship of Isis was universal in Egypt; the priests were obliged to observe perpetual chastity, their head was closely shaved, and they always walked barefooted, and clothed themselves in linen garments. As the goddess was often represented with a sistrum in her right hand, with which she was supposed to inflict diseases; her priests also were adorned with the same instrument. In their meals they never ate onions, they abstained from salt with their meat, and were forbidden to eat the flesh of sheep and of hogs. During the night they were employed in continual devotion near the statue of the goddess Cleopatra, the beautiful queen of Egypt, was wont to dress herself like this goddess, and affected to be called a second Isis. Cic de Div. 1.—Plut. de Isid. et Osirid.— Diod 1.—*Dionys. ISMARUS, (Ismara, plu) a mountain of Thrace near the mouth of the Hebrus, covered with vine yards. This part of Thrace was famous for good wines. Ulysses, in the Odyssey, is made to speak in commendation of some wine given him by Maron, the priest of Apollo at Ismarus. Homer. Od 1, 197.—Virg. Georg 2, 37.——A Theban, son of Asteeus ——A son of Eumolpus Apollod. ——A Lydian, who accompanied Æneas to Italy, and fought with great vigour against the Rutuli. Virg Æn 10, 139.

ISMENE, a daughter of Œdipus and Jocasta, who, when her sister Antigone had been condemned to be buried alive by Creon, for giving burial to her brother Polynices, against the tyrant's positive orders, declared herself as guilty as her sister, and insisted upon being equally punished with her This instance of generosity was strongly opposed by Antigone, who wished not to see her sister involved in her calamities She was betrothed to Atys, a youth of Cyrra, who was slain by Tydeus before the celebration of the nuptials Stat Theb 8, 555.—Sophocl in Antig. —Apollod 3, 5 ——A daughter of the river Asopus, who married the hundred-eyed Argus, by whom she had Jasus. Apollod 2, 1.

ISMENIAS, a celebrated musician of Thebes. When he was taken prisoner by the Scythians, Atheas, the king of the country, observed, that he liked the music of Ismenias better than the braying of an ass. Plut. in Apoph.——A Theban, bribed by Timocrates of Rhodes, that he might use his influence to prevent the Athenians and some other Grecian states from assisting Lacedæmon, against which Xerxes was engaged in war. Paus. 3, 9 ——A Theban general, sent to Persia with an embassy by his countrymen. As none were admitted into the king's presence without prostrating themselves at his feet, Ismenias had recourse to artifice to avoid doing an action which would have proved disgraceful to his country. When he was introduced he dropped his ring, and the motion he made to recover it from the ground was mistaken for the most submissive homage, and Ismenias had a satisfactory audience of the monarch.——A river of Bœotia, falling into the Euripus, where Apollo had a temple, from which he was called Ismenius. A youth was yearly chosen by the Bœotians to be the priest of the god, an office to which Hercules was once appointed. Paus. 9, 10.——Ovid. Met. 2.—Strab. 9.

ISMENIDES, an epithet applied to the Theban women, as being near the Ismenus, a river of Bœotia. Ovid. Met 4, 31.

ISMENIUS, a surname of Apollo, at Thebes, where he had a temple on the borders of the Ismenus.

ISMENUS, a son of Apollo and Melia, one of the Nereides, who gave his name to the Ladon, a river of Bœotia, near Thebes, falling into the Asopus, and thence into the Euripus Paus 9, 10.——A son of Asopus and Metope. Apollod. 3 12.——A son of Amphion and Niobe, killed by Apollo. Id. 3, 5.—*Ovid. ISOCRATES, a celebrated orator, son of Theodorus, a rich musical instrument maker at Athens He was taught in the schools of Gorgias, of Tisias, of Theramenes, and Prodicus, but his oratorical abilities were never displayed in public, and Isocrates was prevented by an unconquerable timidity from speaking in the national assemblies. He opened a school of eloquence at Athens, where he distinguished himself by the number, character, and fame, of his pupils, and by the immense riches which he amassed. He was intimate with Philip of Macedon, and regularly corresponded with him; and to his familiarity with that monarch, the Athenians were indebted for some of the few peaceful years which they passed. The aspiring ambition of Philip, however, displeased Isocrates, and the defeat of the Athenians at Cheronæa had such an effect upon his spirits, that he did not survive the disgrace of his country, but died, after he had been four days without taking any aliment, in the ninety-ninth year of his age, about 338 years before Christ. Isocrates has always been much admired for the sweetness and graceful simplicity of his style, for the harmony of his expressions, and the dignity of his language. The remains of his orations extant inspire the world with the highest veneration for his abilities as a moralist, an orator, and above all, as a man His merit, however, is lessened by those who accuse him of plagiarism from the works of Thucydides, Lysias, and others, seen particularly in his panegyric. He was so studious of correctness, that his lines are sometimes poetry. The severe conduct of the Athenians against Socrates highly displeased him, and, in spite of all the undeserved unpopularity of that great philosopher, he put on mourning the day of his death About thirty-one of his orations are extant Isocrates was honoured after death with a brazen statue by Timotheus, one of his pupils, and Aphareus his adopted son. The best editions of the entire works of Isocrates, are, that of Lange, Halæ, 8vo, 1803, and that of Coray, Paris, 8vo, 1807. Among the editions of separate works of his may be mentioned that of the Panegyricus by Bekker, Lips. 1804, 8vo; reprinted, with new observations by Spohn, Lips. 1817, 8vo. Plut. de 10. Orat. &c.—Cic Orat. 20. de Inv. 2, 126. in Brut. 15. de Orat 2, 6.—Quintil. 2, &c.—Paterc. 1, 16.——One of the officers of the Peloponnesian fleet, &c. Thucyd ——One of the disciples of Isocrates.——A rhetorician of Syria, enemy to the Romans, &c.

ISSE, a daughter of Macareus, the son of Lycaon. She was beloved by Apollo, who, to obtain her confidence, changed himself into the form of a shepherd to whom she was attached. This metamorphosis of Apollo was represented in the web of Arachne. Ovid. Met. 6, 124.

ISSEDONES, the principal nation in Scrica, whose metropolis was Sera, now Kasi-cheou, in the Chinese province of Shesi-Si, without the great wall This city has been erroneously confounded with Pekin, the capital of China, which is 300 leagues distant. They had also two towns, both called Issedon, but distinguished by the epithets of Serica and Scythica.

ISSUS, now Aias, a town of Cilicia, on the confines of Syria, famous for a battle fought there between Alexander the Great and the Persians under Darius their king, in October, B C. 333, in consequence of which it was called Nicopolis. In this battle, the Persians lost, in the field of battle, 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, and the Macedonians only 300 foot and 150 horse, according to Diodorus Siculus. The Persian army, according to Justin, consisted of 400,000 foot, and 100,000 horse, and 60,000 of the former and 10,000 of the latter, were left dead on the spot, and 40,000 were taken prisoners. The loss of the Macedonians, as he farther adds, was no more than 130 foot and 150 horse. According to Curtius, the Persians slain amounted to 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse; and those of Alexander to 32 foot and 150 horse killed, and 504 wounded. This spot is likewise famous for the defeat of Niger by Severus, A. D. 194. Plut in Alex.—Justin. 11, 9.—Curt 3, 7.—Arrian—Dod. 17.—Cic Att. 5, 20.

ISTER, a native of Cyrene, who flourished under Ptolemy III. of Egypt. Suidas makes him to have been a disciple of Callimachus. Besides his Ἀττικά, in sixteen books, he left a number of other works, on Egypt, Argolis, Elis, &c. A few fragments only remain, which were collected and published with those of Demon, another historian, by Siebelis and Lenz, Lips 1812, 8vo.—— The name of the eastern part of the Danube, after its junction with the Savus, or Soave.

ISTHMIA, sacred games among the Greeks, which received their name from the Isthmus of Corinth, where they were observed. They were celebrated in commemoration of Melicerta, who was changed into a sea deity, when his mother Ino had thrown herself into the sea with him in her arms. The body of Melicerta, according to some traditions, when cast upon the sea-shore, received an honourable burial, in memory of which the Isthmian games were instituted, B C. 1326. They were interrupted after they had been celebrated with great regularity during some years, and Theseus at last re-instituted them in honour of Neptune, whom he publicly called his father. These games were observed every third, or rather fifth, year, and held so sacred and inviolable that even a public calamity could not prevent the celebration. When Corinth was destroyed by Mummius, the Roman general, they were observed with the usual solemnity, and the Sicyonians were entrusted with the superintendence, which had been before one of the privileges of the ruined Corinthians. Combats of every kind were exhibited and the victors were rewarded with garlands of pine leaves. Some time after the custom was changed, and the victor received a crown of dry and withered parsley. The years were reckoned by the celebration of the Isthmian games, as among the

Romans from the consular government Pans. 1, 44. 3, 1 et 2.—Plin. 4, 5.—Plut. in Thes.

ISTHMUS, a small neck of land which joins one country to another, and prevents the sea from making them separate, such as that of Corinth, called often the Isthmus by way of eminence, which joins Peloponnesus to Greece. Vid Corinthi Isthmus.

ISTIÆOTIS, a country of Greece, near Œta. Vid Histiæotis.

ISTRIA, or ISTRIA, a peninsula lying to the west of Liburnia, and bounded on the south and west by the Adriatic. The inhabitants, said to be of Thracian origin, were pirates, and lived on plunder. They were not subjected to Rome till six centuries after its foundation. Strab 1.—Mela, 2, 3.—Liv. 10, &c.—Plin. 3, 19.—Justin 9, 2

ISTROPOLIS, a city of Thrace, situate on the coast of the Euxine, below the mouth of the Ister, where a lagune, or salt lake, called Halmyris, formed by an arm of the Danube, has its issue into the sea. It appears to be succeeded at the present day by a place called Kara-Kermon, or, the black fortress. Istropolis is said to have been founded by a Milesian colony. Plin 4, 11.

ISUS and ANTIPHUS, sons of Priam, the latter by Hecuba, and the former by a concubine. They were seized by Achilles, as they fed their father's flocks on mount Ida; but they were redeemed by Priam, and fought against the Greeks. They were both killed by Agamemnon. Homer. Il. 11, 102.

ITABYRIUS, a mountain of Galilæa Inferior, near the southern limits of the tribe of Zebulon, and south-east from Carmel. According to Josephus, it was thirty stadia high, and had on its summit a plain of twenty six stadia in extent. Its modern name is Thabor. It is supposed to have been the mountain on which our Saviour's transfiguration took place. Joseph. Bell. Jud. 4, 5

ITALIA, a celebrated country of Europe, bounded on the north and north west by the Alps; on the east by the Mare Superum, or Hadriaticum; on the west by the Mare Inferum, or Tyrrhenum; and on the south by the Mare Ionium. In form, it has been compared to the shape of a boot, lying in an oblique direction from north-west to south-east. Its length from north to south is about 600 miles, and its breadth varies from 100 to 300 miles or more. It has borne at different periods very different names. One of its most ancient names was Italia, either from Italus, a chief of the country, or from Ἰτάλος, a Greek word signifying an ox, an animal very common in that part of Europe. It was called Hesperia, on account of its western situation in respect to Greece; Saturnia, from Saturn; Latium, from the Latini, Ausonia, from the Ausones, and Œnotria, from the Œnotri. These names were originally appropriated to particular provinces, but, in process of time, were applied to the whole country, which has been denominated the garden of Europe. The ancient inhabitants called themselves Aborigines, offspring of the soil; and the country was, at a very early period, peopled by colonies from Greece. The Pelasgi and Arcadians made settlements there, and the whole country was divided into as many different governments as there were towns, till the rapid increase of the Roman power changed the face of Italy, and united all the states in support of one common cause. (Vid. Roma.) Under the dominion of the Gauls and Greeks, Italy, in reference to its inhabitants, was divided into Gallia Cisalpina, Italia Propria, and Magna Græcia: the first comprehended the provinces lying between the Alps, and the Rubico; the second included the intermediate provinces; and the third those adjacent to Sicily and Greece, and inhabited chiefly by Grecian colonies. It was divided into eleven small provinces or regions by Augustus, but, according to the common and most approved division, it consisted of two parts, namely, Gallia Cisalpina, and Italia Propria: the former, likewise, called Gallia Italica, and sometimes Gallia, was bounded on the north by Rhætia, and on the south by the Sinus Ligusticus, or Gulf of Genoa. This province, while under the Roman dominion, contained several tribes, which are noticed in their places. Italia Propria was on all sides surrounded by the sea, except on the north where it was bounded by an imaginary line, extending from the mouth of the Macra to that of the Rubico. It contained, among others the following provinces, namely, Etruria, Sabinum, Latium, Campania, Samnium, Apulia, Messapia, Lucania, and Bruttium. During the middle ages, Italy underwent many revolutions, and frequently changed its masters. In the reign of Honorius, the Visigoths, under the command of Alaric, penetrated into that fertile country, which they plundered from the foot of the Alps to the strait of Sicily. The reign of the Goths in Italy ended in Teia, Totila's son, who was defeated and slain by Narses, A. D. 553. Italy now became a province of the Greek empire. The Lombards were a fierce nation, first discovered between the Elbe and the Oder, from thence they descended to the south and the Danube. They afterwards passed the Danube, wandered along the coast of the Adriatic, and in the year 566, aided by the Avari, a Scythian horde, they undertook the conquest of Italy. Many provinces were added to their dominions, as a large portion of the Venetian territory, Tyrol, Milanese, Piedmont, the coast of Genoa, Mantua, Parma, and Modena, the grand duchy of Tuscany, together with a considerable portion of the ecclesiastical state. Ptol 3, 1.—Dionys Hal. 1, 1.—Justin. 4, 1. 12, 1. 28, 2. 43, 1.—Virg Æn. 1, 534. 3. 166. 6, 6. 7, 3.—*Varro de R. ITALICA, the capital of the Peligni in Italy. (Vid Corfinium.)——A city of Spain, north of Hispalis, and situate on the western side of the river Bætis. It was founded by Publius Scipio in the second Punic war, who placed here the old soldiers whom age incapacitated from the performance of military service. It was the birthplace of the emperors Trajan and Hadrian, and according to some, of the poet Silius Italicus. It is supposed to answer to Sevilla la Vieja, about a league distant from the city of Seville. Strab. 3.—Appian B. Hisp. 38.—Cæs. B Civ. 2, 20.

ITALICUS, a poet. Vid. Silius.

ITALUS, a son of Telegonus. Hygin. Fab 127.——An Arcadian prince, who came to Italy, where he established a kingdom called after him. It is supposed that he received divine honours after death, as Æneas calls upon him among the deities to whom he paid his adoration, when he entered Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, 178.——A prince, whose daughter Roma, by his wife Lemearia, is said to have married Æneas or Ascanius. Plut in Rom.——A king of the Cherusci, &c. Tacit. Ann. 1, 16.

ITEA. a daughter of Danaus. Hygin. fab. 170.

ITEMALES, an old man who exposed Œdipus on mount Cithæron, &c. Hygin. fab 65.

ITHACA, an island in the Ionian sea, north-east of Cephallenia, famous for being the birth-place of Ulysses, the son of Laertes. It had a city of the same name. It is, generally speaking, a rugged and mountainous island, containing about forty-one square miles. Its modern name is Teaki, or Ithaca. Hom Il 2, 139 Odyss. 1, 186. 4, 601 9, 20.—*Virg. ITHACESIÆ, three islands opposite Vibo, on the coast of the Bruttii.——Baiæ was called also Ithacensis, because built by Baius the pilot of Ulysses. Sil. 8, 540 12, 113.

ITHOBALUS, a king of Tyre, who died B. C. 595. Josephus.

ITHOMAIA, a festival in which musicians contended, observed at Ithome, in honour of Jupiter, who had been nursed by the nymphs Ithome and Neda, the former of whom gave her name to a mountain, and the latter to a river

ITHOME, a town of Thessaly, in the vicinity of Metropolis. It is now Hasan Kens. Homer Il 2, 729.——A fortress of Messenia, on a mountain of the same name. It was celebrated for the obstinate defence which the Messenians there made against the Spartans. It and Acrocorinthus were deemed the two strongest places in the Peloponnesus, for which reason, Philip, the son of Demetrius, when planning his attack on the peninsula, was advised to make himself master of them, as he would thus seize the helter by the horns. Strab. 8.—Polyb 7, 11.

ITHYPHALLUS, an obscene surname of Priapus. From this word obscene verses were called Ithyphalliça, or Priapeia, such as were under this name attributed to Catullus, Virgil, Martial, and Petronius. Dial 1.—Columell. 10.

ITIUS PORTUS, a harbour of Gaul, whence Cæsar set sail for Britain. Some have referred this harbour to Boulogne, others to Wissant, and others to Calais. Cæs. B Gall. 5, 2 et 5.

ITONIA, a surname of Minerva, from a place in Bœotia, where she was worshipped.

ITONUS, a king of Thessaly, son of Deucalion, who first invented the manner of polishing metals, and of coining money. Lucan 6, 402.

ITUNA ÆSTUARIUM, now Solway Firth, in Scotland.

ITURÆA, a country of Palestine, so called from Itur or Jetur, one of the sons of Ishmael, who settled in it, but whose posterity were either driven out or subdued by the Amorites; when it is supposed to have formed a part of the kingdom of Bashan, and subsequently of the half tribe of Manasseh east of Jordan; but as it was situated beyond the southern spur of mount Hermon, called the Djebel Heish, this is doubtful. It lay on the north-eastern side of the land of Israel, between it and the territory of Damascus, or Syria; and is supposed to have been the same country at present known by the name of Djedour, on the east of the Djebel Heish, between Damascus and the lake of Tiberias. The Ituræans being subdued by Aristobulus, the high priest and governor of the Jews, B. C 106. were forced by him to embrace the Jewish religion, and were at the same time incorporated into the state. Philip, one of the sons of Herod the Great, was tetrarch or governor of this country when John the Baptist commenced his ministry.

ITYLUS, a son of Zetheus and Ædon, killed by his mother. (Vid. Ædon.) Homer. Od. 19, 462.

ITYS, a son of Tereus, king of Thrace, by Procne, daughter of Pandion, king of Athens He was killed by his mother when he was about six years old, and served up as meat before his father. He was changed into a pheasant, his mother into a swallow, and his father into an owl. (Vid. Philomela.) Ovid Met. 6, 620. Amor. 2, 14. 29.—Hygin. Od. 4, 12.——A Trojan who came to Italy with Æneas, and was killed by Turnus Virg. Æn. 9 571.

JUBA, a king of Numidia and Mauritania, who succeeded his father Hiempsal, and favoured the cause of Pompey against Julius Cæsar. He defeated Curio, whom Cæsar had sent to Africa, and after the battle of Pharsalia, he joined his forces to those of Scipio. He was conquered in a battle at Thapsus, and totally abandoned by his subjects. He killed himself with Petreius, who had shared his good fortune and his adversity His kingdom became a Roman province, of which Sallust was the first governor. Plut. in Pomp et Cæs.—Flor 4, 12.—Suet. in Cæs 35.—Dion. 41.—Mela, 1, 6.—Lucan. 3, &c.—Cæsar. de Bell. Civ. 2.—Patere 2, 54.——The second of that name was the son of Juba the first. He was led among the captives to Rome, to adorn the triumph of Cæsar. His captivity was the source of the greatest honours, and his application to study procured him more glory than he could have obtained from the inheritance of a kingdom. He gained the hearts of the Romans by the courteousness of his manners, and Augustus rewarded his fidelity by giving him in marriage Cleopatra, the daughter of Antony, and conferring upon him the title of king and making him master of all the territories which his father once possessed. His popularity was so great, that the Mauritanians rewarded his benevolence, by making him one of their gods The Athenians raised him a statue, and the Æthiopians worshipped him as a deity. Juba wrote a history of Rome in Greek, which is often quoted and commended by the ancients, but of which only a few fragments remain. He also wrote on the history of Arabia and the antiquities of Assyria, chiefly collected from Berosus. Besides these, he composed some treatises upon the drama, Roman antiquities, the nature of animals, painting, grammar, &c. now lost Strab. 17.—Suet. in Cal. 26.—Plin. 5, 25 et 34.—Dion. 51, &c.

JUDÆA, a province of Palestine, bounded on the north by Samaria, on the east by the Dead Sea, on the south by Arabia Petræa, and on the west by the Mediterranean Sea. It comprehended the territories of Judah, Benjamin, Dan, and Simeon. It is often taken in a more extended sense, by Josephus and the ecclesiastical writers, as denoting all Palestine. Hence, the word Jews or Judæans has come to signify the whole Israelitish nation. Plut de Onir.—Sallust. 16.—Dion. 36.—Tacit. Hist. 5, 6.—Lucan 2, 593.

JUGALIS, a surname of Juno, because she presided over marriage, in the celebration of which it was usual for the husband and the wife to pass under the yoke (jugum). The goddess had an altar in one of the streets of Rome, which from this circumstance received the name of Vicus Jugarius. Festus de V. Sig.

JUGANTES, a people of Britain, supposed to be the same with the Brigantes. Tacit. Ann. 12, 32.

JUGARIUS, a street in Rome, below the capitol

JUGURTHA, the illegitimate son of Manaste-

bal, the brother of Micipsa. Micipsa and Manastabal were the sons of Masinissa, king of Numidia. Micipsa, who had inherited his father's kingdom, educated his nephew with his two sons, Adherbal and Hiempsal; but, as he was of an aspiring disposition, he sent him with a body of troops to the assistance of Scipio, who was besieging Numantia, hoping to lose a youth whose ambition seemed to threaten the tranquillity of his children. His hopes were frustrated; Jugurtha showed himself brave and active, and after endearing himself to the Roman general, he returned to Africa loaded with military honours. Micipsa, now anxious to convert the abilities of this artful youth to the safety of his family, appointed him successor to his kingdom, conjointly with his two sons, hoping that gratitude would make him respect, in their inferior talents, the memory of his benefactor but the kindness of the father proved fatal to the children. Jugurtha giving way to his ambitious projects, cut off Hiempsal, and stripped Adherbal of his possessions, and obliged him to fly to Rome for safety. The Romans listened to the well grounded complaints of Adherbal, but Jugurtha's gold prevailed among the senators, and the supplant monarch, forsaken in his distress, perished by the snares of his enemy. The Roman character, however, though obscure by the licentiousness of the times, reassumed its wonted dignity, the wrongs of Masinissa's wretched family were contemplated with compassion, and Cæcilius Metellus marched at the head of an army against Jugurtha, who, no longer secure in his artful evasions and proffered terms of submission, fled in dismay to solicit support among his savage neighbours. Marius and Sylla succeeded Metellus in the conduct of the war, and fought with equal success. Jugurtha was at last betrayed by his father in-law Bocchus, from whom he claimed assistance, and he was delivered into the hands of Sylla, after carrying on a war of various success for five years, and displaying in the cabinet and in the field talents worthy better times and a better cause. He was exposed to the view of the Roman people, and dragged in chains to adorn the triumph of Marius. He was afterwards put in a prison, where he died six days after of hunger. B. C. 106. The name and the wars of Jugurtha have been immortalized by the pen of Sallust. Sallust. in Jug.—Flor. 3, 1.—Patere 2, 10, &c.—Plut in Mar et Syll.—Eutrop. 4, 3.

JULIA LEX, prima de provinciis, by J. Cæsar, A. U. C. 691. It confirmed the freedom of all Greece; it ordained that the Roman magistrates should act there as judges, and that the towns and villages through which the Roman magistrates and ambassadors passed should maintain them during their stay; that the governors, at the expiration of their office, should leave a scheme of their accounts in two cities of their province, and deliver a copy of it at the public treasury; that the provincial governors should not accept of a golden crown unless they were honoured with a triumph by the senate; that no supreme commander should go out of his province, enter any dominions, lead an army, or engage in a war, without the previous approbation and command of the Roman senate and people.——Another, de sumptibus, in the age of Augustus. It limited the expense of provisions on the dies profesti, or days appointed for the transaction of business, to 200 sesterces; on common calendar festivals to 300; and on all extraordinary occasions, such as marriages, births, &c. to 1000. By a subsequent edict of Augustus, or Tiberius, the allowance for an entertainment was raised from 300 to 2000 sesterces.——Another, de provinciis, by J. Cæsar Dictator. It ordained that no prætorian province should be held more than one year, and a consular province more than two years.——Another, called also Campana agraria, by the same, A. U. C. 691, for distributing the lands of Campania and Stella to 20,000 poor citizens, who had each three children or more.——Another, de civitate, by L. J. Cæsar, A. U. C. 664. It rewarded with the name and privileges of citizens of Rome all such as, during the civil wars, had remained the constant friends of the republican liberty. When that civil war was at an end, all the Italians were admitted as free denizens, and composed eight new tribes.——Another, de judiciis, by J. Cæsar. It confirmed the Pompeian law in a certain manner, requiring the judges to be chosen from the richest people in every century, allowing the senators and knights in the number, and excluding the tribuni ærarii.——Another, de ambitu, by Augustus. It restrained the illicit measures used at elections, and restored to the comitia their ancient privileges, which had been destroyed by the ambition and bribery of J. Cæsar.——Another, by Augustus, de adulteriis et pudicitiâ. It punished adultery with death. It was afterwards confirmed and enforced by Domitian. Juvenal, Sat 2, 30, alludes to it.——Another, called also Papia, or Papia Poppæa, which was the same as the following, only enlarged by the consuls Papius and Poppæus, A. U. C. 762.——Another, de maritandis ordinibus, by Augustus. It proposed rewards to such as engaged in matrimony of a particular description. It inflicted punishment on celibacy, and permitted the patricians, the senators and sons of senators excepted, to intermarry with the libertini, or children of those that had been liberti, or servants manumitted. Horace alludes to it when he speaks of lex marita.——Another, de majestate, by J. Cæsar. It punished with aquæ et ignis interdictio all such as were found guilty of the crimen majestatis, or treason against the state.

JULIA, a daughter of J. Cæsar, by Cornelia, famous for her personal charms and for her virtues. She married Corn. Cæpio, whom her father obliged her to divorce to marry Pompey the Great. Her amiable disposition more strongly cemented the friendship of the father and of the son in law; but her sudden death in childbed, B. C. 53, broke all ties of intimacy and relationship, and soon produced a civil war. Plut.—Suet Cæs 1, 21 et 26.—Lucan. 1, 125.—Patere. 2, 47.——The mother of M. Antony, whose humanity is greatly celebrated in saving her brother-in law J. Cæsar from the cruel prosecutions of her son.——An aunt of J. Cæsar, who married C. Marius. Her funeral oration was publicly pronounced by her nephew.——The only daughter of the emperor Augustus, remarkable for her beauty, genius, and debaucheries. She was tenderly loved by her father, who gave her in marriage to Marcellus; after whose death she was given to Agrippa, by whom she had five children. She became a second time a widow, and was married to Tiberius. Her lasciviousness and debaucheries so disgusted her husband, that he retired from the court of the emperor; and Augustus, informed of her lustful propensities and behaviour, banished her from his sight, and confined her in a small island on the coast of Campania. She was starved to death, A. D. 14, by order of Tiberius, who had succeeded to Augustus, as emperor of Rome. Tacit. Ann. 1, 53.—Plut.——A daughter of the emperor Titus, who married her relation Sabinus, and, at last, after his murder, prostituted herself to her brother Domitian.——A daughter of Julia, the wife of Agrippa, who married Lepidus, and was banished for her licentiousness.——A daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, born in the island of Lesbos, A. D. 17. She married a senator called M. Vinucius, at the age of sixteen, and enjoyed the most unbounded favours in the court of her brother Caligula, who is accused of being her first seducer. She was banished by Caligula on suspicion of conspiracy. Claudius recalled her, but she was soon after banished by the powerful intrigues of Messalina, and put to death about the twenty-fourth year of her age. She was no stranger to the debaucheries of the age, and she prostituted herself as freely to the meanest of the people as to the nobler companions of her brother's extravagance. Seneca, as some suppose, was banished to Corsica for having seduced her.——A celebrated woman, born at Emesa in Syria. She is also called Domna. She applied herself to the study of geometry and philosophy, &c., and rendered herself conspicuous, as much by her mental as by her personal charms. She came to Rome, where her learning recommended her to all the literati of the age. She married Septimius Severus, who, twenty years after this matrimonial connexion, was invested with the imperial purple. Severus was guided by the prudence and advice of Julia, but he was blind to her foibles, and often punished with the greatest severity those vices which were enormous in the empress. She is even said to have conspired against the emperor, but she resolved to blot out by patronising literature, the spots which her debauchery and extravagance had rendered indelible in the eyes of virtue. Her influence, after the death of Severus, was for some time productive of tranquillity and cordial union between his two sons and successors. Geta, at last, however, fell a sacrifice to his brother Caracalla, and Julia was even wounded in the arm while she attempted to screen her favourite son from his brother's dagger. According to some, Julia committed incest with her son Caracalla, and publicly married him. She starved herself when her ambitious views were defeated by Macrinus, who aspired to the empire in preference to her, after the death of Caracalla.——A town of Gallia Togata.

JULIACUM, a town of Germany, now Juliers.

JULIANUS, a son of Julius Constantius the brother of Constantine the Great, born at Constantinople. The massacre which attended the elevation of the sons of Constantine the Great to the throne, nearly proved fatal to Julian and to his brother Gallus. The two brothers were privately educated together, and taught the doctrines of the Christian religion, and exhorted to be modest, temperate, and to despise the gratification of all sensual pleasures. Gallus received the instructions of his pious teachers with deference and submission, but Julian showed his dislike for Christianity by secretly cherishing a desire to become one of the votaries of Paganism. He gave sufficient proofs of this propensity when he went to Athens in the twenty-fourth year of his age, where he applied himself to the study of magic and astrology. He was some time after appointed over Gaul, with the title of Cæsar, by Constans, and there he showed himself worthy of the imperial dignity by his prudence, valour, and the numerous victories which he obtained over the enemies of Rome in Gaul and Germany. His mildness, as well as his condescension, gained him the hearts of his soldiers; and when Constans, to whom Julian was become suspected, ordered him to send him part of his forces to go into the east, the army immediately mutinied, and promised immortal fidelity to their leader, by refusing to obey the order of Constans. They even compelled Julian, by threats and entreaties, to accept of the title of independent emperor and of Augustus, and the death of Constans, which soon after happened, left him sole master of the Roman empire, A. D. 361. Julian then disclosed his religious sentiments, and publicly disavowed the doctrines of Christianity, and offered solemn sacrifices to all the gods of ancient Rome. This change of religion, opinion was attributed to the austerity with which he received the precepts of Christianity, or, according to others, to the literary conversation and persuasive eloquence of some of the Athenian philosophers. From this circumstance, therefore, Julian has been called Apostate. After he had made his public entry at Constantinople, he determined to continue the Persian war, and check those barbarians, who had for sixty years derided the indolence of the Roman emperors. When he had crossed the Tigris, he burned his fleet, and advanced with boldness into the enemy's country. His march was that of a conqueror, he met with no opposition from a weak and indigent enemy, but the counsels of Assyria had been left desolate by the Persians, and Julian, without corn or provisions, was obliged to retire. As he could not convey his army again over the streams of the Tigris, he took the resolution of marching up the source of the river, and imitate the bold return of the ten thousand Greeks. As he advanced through the country, he defeated the officers of Sapor, the king of Persia, but another engagement proved fatal to him, and he received a deadly wound as he animated his soldiers to battle. He expired the following night, the 27th of June, A. D. 363, in the thirty-second year of his age. His last moments were spent in a conversation with a philosopher about the immortality of the soul, and he breathed his last without expressing the least sorrow for his fate, or the suddenness of his death. Julian's character has been admired by some and censured by others, but the malevolence of his enemies arises from his apostasy. As a man and as a monarch he demands our warmest commendations, but we must blame his idolatry, and despise his bigoted principles. He was moderate in his successes, merciful to his enemies, and amiable in his character. He abolished the luxuries which reigned in the court of Constantinople, and dismissed with contempt the numerous officers who waited upon Constantius, to anoint his head or perfume his body. He was frugal in his meals and slept little, reposing himself on a skin spread on the ground. He awoke at midnight and spent the rest of the night in reading or writing, and issued early from his tent to pay his daily visit to the guards around the camp. He was not fond of public amusements, but rather dedicated his time to study and solitude. When he passed through Antioch in his Persian expedition, the inhabitants of the place, offended at his religious sentiments, ridiruled his person, and lampooned him in satirical verses. The emperor made use of the same arms for his defence, and rather than destroy his enemies by the sword, he condescended to expose them to derision, and unveil their follies and debaucheries in a humorous work, which he called Misopogon, or beard-hater. He imitated the virtuous example of Scipio and Alexander, and laid no temptation for his virtue by visiting some female captives who had fallen into his hands. In his matrimonial connexions, Julian rather consulted policy than inclination, and his marriage with the sister of Constantius arose from his unwillingness to offend his benefactor, rather than to obey the laws of nature. He was buried at Tarsus, and afterwards his body was conveyed to Constantinople. He distinguished himself by his writings, as well as by his military character. Besides his Misopogon, he wrote the history of Gaul. He also wrote two letters to the Athenians; and, besides, there are now extant sixty-four of his letters on various subjects. His Cæsars is the most famous of all his compositions, being a satire upon all the Roman emperors from Julius Cæsar to Constantine. It is written in the form of a dialogue, in which the author severely attacks the venerable character of M. Aurelius, whom he had proposed to himself as a pattern, and speaks in scurrilous and abusive language of his relation Constantine. It has been observed of Julian, that, like Cæsar, he could employ at the same time his hand to write, his ear to listen, his eyes to read, and his mind to dictate. The best edition of his works is that of Spanheim, fol. Lips. 1696, and of the Cæsars, that of Heusinger, 8vo Gothæ, 1741. Julian.—Socrat.—Eutrop.—Amm.—Liban. &c.——A son of Constantine.——A maternal uncle of the emperor Julian.——A Roman emperor. JUNO, a celebrated deity among the ancients, daughter of Saturn and Ops. She was sister to Jupiter, Pluto, Neptune, Vesta, Ceres, &c. She was born at Argos, or, according to others, in Samos, and was intrusted to the care of the seasons, or, as Homer and Ovid mention, to Oceanus and Tethys. Some of the inhabitants of Argolis supposed that she had been brought up by the three daughters of the river Asterion; and the people of Stymphalus, in Arcadia, maintained, that she had been educated under the care of Temenus, the son of Pelasgus. Juno was devoured by Saturn according to some mythologists; and according to Apollodorus she was again restored to the world by means of a potion which Metis gave to Saturn, to make him give up the stone which his wife had given him to swallow instead of Jupiter. (Vid. Saturnus.) Jupiter was not insensible to the charms of his sister; and the more powerfully to gain her con-silence he changed himself into a cuckoo, and raised a great storm, and made the air unusually chill and cold. Under this form he went to the goddess, all shivering. Juno pitied the cuckoo, and took him into her bosom. When Jupiter had gained these advantages, he resumed his original form, and obtained the gratification of his desires, after he had made a solemn promise of marriage to his sister. The nuptials of Jupiter and Juno were celebrated with the greatest solemnity, the gods, all mankind, and all the brute creation, attended. Chelone, a young woman was the only one who refused to come, and who derided the ceremony. For this impiety Mercury changed her into a tortoise, and condemned her to perpetual silence, from which circumstance the tortoise has always been used as the symbol of silence among the ancients. By her marriage with Jupiter, Juno became the queen of all the gods, and mistress of heaven and earth. Her conjugal happiness, however, was frequently disturbed by the numerous amours of her husband, and she showed herself jealous and inexorable in the highest degree. Her severity to the mistresses and illegitimate children of her husband was unparalleled. She persecuted Hercules and his descendants with the most inveterate fury; and her resentment against Paris, who had given the golden apple to Venus in preference to herself, was the cause of the Trojan war, and of all the calamities which happened to the unfortunate house of Priam. Her severities to Alemena Ino, Athamas, Semele, &c., are also well known. Juno had some children by Jupiter. According to Hesiod she was mother of Mars, Hebe, and Ilithya; or Lucina, and besides these, she brought forth Vulcan, without having any commerce with the other sex, but only by smelling a certain plant. This was in imitation of Jupiter, who had produced Minerva from his brain. According to others, it was not Vulcan, but Mars, or Hebe whom she brought forth in this manner, and this was after eating some lettuces at the table of Apollo. The daily and repeated debaucheries of Jupiter at last provoked Juno to such a degree, that she retired to Eubœa, and resolved for ever to forsake his bed. Jupiter produced a reconciliation after he had applied to Cithæron for advice, and after he had obtained forgiveness by fraud and artifice. (Vid Dædala.) This reconciliation, however cordial it might appear, was soon dissolved by new offences, and, to stop the complaints of the jealous Juno, Jupiter had often recourse to violence and blows. He even punished the cruelties which she had exercised upon his son Hercules, by suspending her from the heavens by a golden chain, and tying a heavy anvil to her feet. Vulcan was punished for assisting his mother in this degrading situation and he was kicked down from heaven by his father, and broke his leg by the fall. This punishment rather irritated than pacified Juno. She resolved to revenge it, and she engaged some of the gods to conspire against Jupiter and to imprison him, but Thetis delivered him from this conspiracy, by bringing to his assistance the famous Briareus. Apollo and Neptune were banished from heaven for joining in the conspiracy, though some attribute their exile to different causes.—The worship of Juno was universal, and even more than that of Jupiter, according to some authors. Her sacrifices were offered with the greatest solemnity. She was particularly worshipped at Argos, Samos, Carthage, and afterwards at Rome. The ancients generally offered on her altars a ewe lamb and a sow the first day of every month. No cows were ever immolated to her, because she assumed the nature of that animal when the gods fled into Egypt in their war with the giants. Among the birds, the hawk, the goose, and particularly the peacock, often called Junonia avis, (Id. Argus) were sacred to her. The dittany, the poppy, and the lily, were her favourite flowers. The latter flower was originally of the colour of the crocus, but, when Jupiter placed Hercules to the breasts of Juno while asleep, some of her milk fell down upon earth, and changed the colour of the lilies from purple to a beautiful white. Some of the milk also dropped in that part of the heavens, which from its whiteness still retains the name of the milky way, via lactea. As Juno's power was extended over all the gods, she often made use of the goddess Minerva as her messenger, and even had the privilege of hurling the thunder of Jupiter when she pleased. Her temples were numerous, the most famous of which were at Argos, Olympia, &c. At Rome no woman of debauched character, was permitted to enter her temple, or even to touch it. The surnames of Juno are various; they are derived either from the function or things over which she presided, or from the places where her worship was established. She was the queen of the heavens; she protected cleanliness, and presided over marriage and childbirth, and particularly patronized the most faithful and virtuous of the sex, and severely punished incontinence and lewdness in matrons. She was the goddess of all power and empire, and she was also the patroness of riches. She is represented sitting on a throne with a diadem on her head and a golden sceptre in her right hand. Some peacocks generally sat by her, and a cuckoo often perched on her sceptre, while Iris behind her displayed the thousand colours of her beautiful rainbow. She is sometimes carried through the air in a rich chariot drawn by peacocks. The Roman consuls, when they entered upon office, were always obliged to offer her a solemn sacrifice. The Juno of the Romans was called Matrona or Romana. She was generally represented as veiled from head to foot, and the Roman matrons always imitated this manner of dressing themselves, and deemed it indecent in any married woman to leave any part of her body but her face uncovered. She has received the surname of Olympia, Samia, Lacedæmonia, Argiva, Telchinia, Candrena, Resenthes, Prosymna, Imbrasia, Acrea, Cithæronia, Bunea, Ammonia, Fluonia, Anthea, Migale, Gemelia, Tropeia, Boopis, Parthenos, Teleia, Xera, Egophage Hyperchmia, Juga, Ilithyia, Lucina, Pronuba, Caprotina, Mena, Populonia, Lacuna, Sospita, Moneta, Curis, Domiduca, Februa, Opigenia, &c. *Cic. de Nat. JUPITER, the most powerful of all the gods of the ancients According to Varro, there were no less than 300 persons of that name; Diodorus mentions two, and Cicero three, two of Arcadia, and one of Crete To that of Crete, who passed for the son of Saturn and Ops, the actions of the rest have been attributed. According to the opinion of the mythologists, Jupiter was saved from destruction by his mother, and intrusted to the care of the Corybantes. Saturn, who had received the kingdom of the world from his brother Titan, on condition of not raising male children, devoured all his sons as soon as born, but Ops, offended at her husband's cruelty, secreted Jupiter, and gave a stone to Saturn, which he devoured on the supposition that it was a male child Jupiter was educated in a cave on mount Ida, in Crete, and fed upon the milk of the goat Amalthæa, or upon honey, according to others. He received the name of Jupiter, quasi juvans pater. His cries were drowned by the noise of cymbals and drums, which the Corybantes beat at the express command of Ops. (Vid. Corybantes.) As soon as he was a year old, Jupiter found himself sufficiently strong to make war against the Titans, who had imprisoned his father because he had brought up male children. The Titans were conquered, and Saturn set at liberty by the hands of his son. Saturn, however, soon after, apprehensive of the power of Jupiter, conspired against his life, and was, for this treachery, driven from his kingdom, and obliged to fly for safety into Latium Jupiter, now become the sole master of the empire of the world, divided it with his brothers. He reserved for himself the kingdom of heaven, and gave the empire of the sea to Neptune, and that of the infernal regions to Pluto The peaceful beginning of his reign was soon interrupted by the rebellion of the giants, who were sons of the earth, and who wished to revenge the death of their relations the Titans. They were so powerful that they hurled rocks, and heaped up mountains upon mountains, to scale heaven, so that all the gods to avoid their fury fled to Egypt, where they escaped from the danger by assuming the form of different animals. Jupiter, however, animated them, and by the assistance of Hercules, he totally overpowered the gigantic race, which had proved such tremendous enemies. (Vid. Gigantes.) Jupiter now freed from every apprehension, gave himself up to the pursuit of pleasures. He married Metis, Themis, Eurynome, Ceres, Mnemosyne, Latona, and Juno. (Vid. Juno.) He became a Proteus to gratify his passions. He introduced himself to Danae in a shower of gold; he corrupted Antiope in the form of a satyr, and Leda in the form of a swan; he became a bull to seduce Europa, and he enjoyed the company of Ægina in the form of a flame of fire. He assumed the habit of Diana to corrupt Callisto, and became Amphitryon to gain the affections of Alcmena. His children were also numerous as well as his mistresses. According to Apollodorus, 1, 3, he was father of the Seasons, Irene, Eunomia, the Fates, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, by Themis; of Venus, by Dione; of the Graces, Aglaia, Euphrosyne, and Thalia, by Eurynome, the daughter of Oceanus; of Proserpine, by Styx; of the nine Muses, by Mnemosyne, &c. (Vid. Niobe, Laodamia Pyrrha, Protogenia, Electra, Maia, Semele, &c.) The worship of Jupiter was universal, he was the Ammon of the Africans, the Belus of Babylon, the Osiris of Egypt, &c. His surnames were numerous, many of which he received from the place or function over which he presided. He was severally called Jupiter Feretrius, Inventor, Rhetus, Capitolinus, Latialis, Pistor, Sponsor, Herceus, Anxurus, Victor, Maximus, Optimus, Olympius, Fluvialis, &c. The worship of Jupiter surpassed that of the other gods in solemnity. His altars were not like those of Saturn and Diana stained with the blood of human victims, but he was delighted with the sacrifice of goats, sheep, and white bulls. The oak was sacred to him because he first taught mankind to live upon acorns. He is generally represented as sitting upon a golden or ivory throne, holding, in one hand, thunderbolts just ready to be hurled, and in the other, a sceptre of cypress. His looks express majesty, his beard flows long and neglected, and the eagle stands with expanded wings at his feet. He is sometimes represented with the upper parts of his body naked, and those below the waist carefully covered, as if to show that he is visible to the gods above, but that he is concealed from the sight of the inhabitants of the earth. Jupiter had several oracles, the most celebrated of which were at Dodona, and Ammon, in Libya. As Jupiter was the king and father of gods and men, his power was extended over the deities and every thing was subservient to his will, except the Fates. From him mankind received their blessings and their miseries, and they looked upon him as acquainted with every thing past, present, and future. He was represented at Olympia with a crown like olive branches; his mantle was variegated with different flowers, particularly by the lily, and the eagle perched upon the top of the sceptre which he held in his hand The Cretans represented Jupiter without ears, to signify that the sovereign master of the world ought not to give a partial ear to any particular person, but be equally candid and propitious to all. At Lacedæmon he appeared with four heads, that he might seem to hear with greater readiness the different prayers and solicitations which were daily poured to him from every part of the earth. It is said that Minerva came all armed from his brains when he ordered Vulcan to open his head. Paus. 1, 2, &c.—Liv. 1, 4, 5, &c.—Diod. 1 et 3.—*Homer. JUSTINIANUS, a Roman emperor, who succeeded his uncle, Justinus I, A. D. 527. He was a zealous Christian, and enacted some severe laws against heretics. After settling the affairs of the empire, and defeating the Goths, he collected the Roman laws into one body, called "The Code," to which he gave his own name. The emperor next caused the judicial decisions and opinions in difficult cases to be reduced, and arranged in order; which labour was chiefly intrusted to Tribonian, an eminent lawyer, and, at the expiration of ten years, was completed. These collections were called "The Digests, or Pandects:" after which Justinian ordered a summary of the whole to be drawn up in four books, termed "The Institutes," and, lastly, the modern laws were brought into one volume, to which the name of Novellæ, or "New Code," was given. In the time of this emperor the consular dignity was abolished. He also built a number of churches, particularly that of St Sophia at Constantinople. He died A. D. 565, at the age of eighty three.

JUSTINUS, M. JUNIANUS, a Latin historian, supposed to have lived in the second century under Antoninus Pius. Nothing is known concerning his family or condition, but one of the manuscripts of his work calls him M Junianus Justinus. His history is merely an abridgment of that of Trogus Pompeius in forty-four books. Justin writes with considerable purity; his reflections, although obvious, are sensible, and his style occasionally rises to eloquence. He can, however, only be regarded as a minor historian, and his book is chiefly used as an elegant compendium for the youthful Latin student. The best editions of Justin are that of Gronovius, 8vo, L. Bat. 1719; of Hearne, 8vo, Oxon. 1705; of Fischer, 8vo, Lips. 1737; and of Wetzel, 8vo, Lejan. 1806.—Justin, martyr, the Martyr, a father of the church, was born at Flavia Neapolis, the ancient Sichem of Samaria, towards the close of the first century. He was brought up in the Pagan religion, and, after studying in Egypt, embraced the Platonic system, from which, in the year 133, he was converted to Christianity, though he still retained the dress of a philosopher. At the beginning of the reign of Antoninus Pius he visited Rome, where he wrote against the heresy of Marcion, and presented his first Apology for the Christian religion to the emperor, who, in consequence of it, adopted milder measures. Not long after this, Justin went into the east, and at Ephesus he had a conference with Tryphon, an eminent Jew, of which he has left an interesting account in his works. On his return to Rome he engaged in a controversy with Crescens, a philosopher; and he also presented another Apology for Christianity to Marcus Antoninus Philosophus; but in this he was not so successful as in the former. At the instance of Crescens he was arrested, with six of his companions, and beheaded, A. D. 165. Justin, who stands at the head of the Christian Platonists, was a man of brilliant talents of great virtue, and ardent zeal. The best editions of his works are that of Maran, fol. Paris, 1742, and that of Oberthür, 3 vols 8vo. Wurtzburgh, 1777. His Apologies have been translated into English by Reeves, 2 vols. 8vo.—The first, also called the "Elder," an emperor of the east, born A. D. 450, of Thracian origin. He abandoned the employment of a shepherd for the profession of arms, and, passing through the several military gradations, attained eventually to the highest dignities of the empire. On the death of Anastasius (A. D 516), he was commissioned by Amantius to distribute a sum of money among the soldiers, in order to secure the elevation of one of the creatures of the former. Justin did this, but in his own name, and was in consequence himself proclaimed emperor. At the close of his reign he associated with him in the empire his nephew Justinian. He died A. D. 527, after a reign of eleven years.—The second, surnamed the "Younger," an emperor of the east, succeeded his uncle Justinian, A. D 565. The beginning of his reign gave rise to the most favourable hopes; but these soon disappeared, and Justin showed himself a feeble, voluptuous, and cruel prince. His weaknesses and failings appear to have been the result of a disease which affected the organs of his brain and impaired the faculties of his mind. He abdicated in favour of Tiberius, the captain of his guards, A. D 578.

JUTURNA, a sister of Turnus, king of the Rutuli. She heard with contempt the addresses of Jupiter, or according to others, she was not unfavourable to his passion, so that the god rewarded her love with immortality. She was afterwards changed into a fountain of the same name near the Numicus, falling into the Tiber. The waters of that fountain were used in sacrifices, and particularly in those of Vesta. They had the power to heal diseases. Varro de L. L. 1, 10.—Ovid Fast 1, 708. 2, 585.—Virg. Æn 12, 130.—Cic Cluent 56.

JUVENALIS, DECIUS JUNIUS, a celebrated Roman satirist, born at Aquinum in Campania, about the beginning of the reign of Claudius. He was either the son by birth or adoption of a rich freedman, who gave him a liberal education, and bred him up to the study of eloquence. He passed about half his life in the pursuits of the bar, when, as appears from some of Martial's epigrams, he acquired considerable reputation. His first essay in poetical satire was directed against the player Paris, a great favourite with Domitian, on which account the satirist was sent into honourable banishment, under pretence of being nominated to the command of a cohort in the army quartered at Pentapolis, on the frontiers of Egypt and Lybia. On the death of Domitian, he returned to Rome, and his thirteenth satire, addressed to Calvinus, appears to have been written in the third year of Adrian, when the poet was above seventy years old. He is supposed to have died about A. D. 128, at the age of eighty. Sixteen satires of Juvenal have reached posterity, and stand pre-eminent in the class of those which castigate vice in preference to folly. Many of his maxims are delivered with great force and elevation, but the moral indelicacy of his age renders him extremely gross in much of his portraiture, a defect which risks the contagion of vice from the very indignation of virtue. As a poet, he has more point and animation than taste; and in style he is occasionally inflated and negligent, retaining, however, a rich vein of poetry and picturesque expression. Of Juvenal the best editions are that of Henninius, 4to, Ultraj. 1685, and that of Ruperti, 2 vols 8vo, Lips. 1819. This poet has been ably translated into English by Dryden, Gifford, Hodgson, and Badham.

JUVENTAS or JUVENTUS, a goddess at Rome who presided over youth and vigour. She is the same as the Hebe of the Greeks, and represented as a beautiful nymph, arrayed in variegated garments. Liv. 5, 54. 21, 62. 36, 36.—Ovid. ex Pont. 1, ep. 9. 12.

JUVERNA. Vid Iverne.

IXION, a king of Thessaly, son of Phlegas, or, according to Hyginus, of Leontes, or, according to Diodorus, of Antion by Perimela, daughter of Amythaon. He married Dia, daughter of Eioneus or Deioneus, and promised his father-in-law a valuable present for the choice he had made of him to be his daughter's husband. His unwillingness, however, to fulfil his promises, obliged Deioneus to have recourse to violence to obtain it, and he stole away some of his horses Ixion concealed his resentment under the mask of friendship; he invited his father-in-law to a feast at Larissa, the capital of his kingdom, and when Deioneus was come according to the appointment, he threw him into a pit which he had previously filled with wood and burning coals. This premeditated treachery so irritated the neighbouring princes that all of them refused to perform the usual ceremony, by which a man was then purified of murder, and Ixion was shunned and despised by all mankind Jupiter had compassion upon him, and he carried him to heaven, and introduced him at the tables of the gods Such a favour, which ought to have awakened gratitude in Ixion, served only to inflame his lust, he became enamoured of Juno, and attempted to seduce her. Juno was willing to gratify the passion of Ixion, though according to others, she informed Jupiter of the attempts which had been made upon her virtue Jupiter made a cloud in the shape of Juno, and carried it to the place where Ixion had appointed to meet Juno Ixion was caught in the snare, and from his embrace with the cloud, he had the Centaurs, or according to others, Centaurus. (Vid. Centauri.) Jupiter, displeased with the insolence of Ixion, banished him from heaven; but when he heard that he had seduced Juno, the god struck him with his thunder, and ordered Mercury to tie him to a wheel in hell which continually whirls round. The wheel was perpetually in motion, therefore the punishment of Ixion was eternal. Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab 62.—Pindar Pyth. 2, 2.—Virg G. 4, 484. Æn 6, 601.—Ovid Met 12, 210 et 385.—Philostr Ic 2, 3.—Lactant in Theb. 2 ——One of the Heraclidæ who reigned at Corinth for fifty-seven or thirty-seven years. LABARUM, the sacred banner or standard, borne before the Roman emperors in war, from the time of Constantine. It is described as a long pike intersected by a transverse beam. A silken veil, of a purple colour, hung down from the beam, and was adorned with precious stones, and curiously inwrought with the images of the reigning monarch and his children. The summit of the pike supported a crown of gold, which inclosed the mysterious monogram at once expressive of the figure of the cross, and the two initial letters (X and P) of the name of Christ. The safety of the Labarum was intrusted to fifty guards of approved valour and fidelity. Their station was marked by honours and emoluments; and some fortunate accidents soon introduced an opinion, that as long as the guards of the Labarum were engaged in the execution of their office, they were secure and invulnerable amid the darts of the enemy. In the second civil war Licinius felt and dreaded the power of this consecrated banner, the sight of which, in the distress of battle, animated the soldiers of Constantine with an invincible enthusiasm, and scattered terror and dismay through the ranks of the adverse legions. Eusebius introduces the Labarum before the Italian expedition of Constantine, but his narrative seems to indicate that it was never shown at the head of an army, till Constantine, above ten years afterwards, declared himself the enemy of Licinius, and the deliverer of the church The Christian emperors, who respected the example of Constantine, displayed in all their military expeditions the standard of the cross, but when the degenerate successors of Theodosius had ceased to appear in person at the head of their armies, the Labarum was deposited as a venerable but useless relic in the palace of Constantinople. Its honours are still preserved on the medals of the Flavian family Their grateful devotion has placed the monogram of Christ in the midst of the ensigns of Rome. The solemn epithets of "safety of the republic," "glory of the army," "restoration of public happiness," are equally applicable to the religious and military trophies; and there is still extant a medal of the emperor Constantius, where the standard of the Labarum is accompanied with these memorable words, "By this sign thou shalt conquer." The etymology of the word Labarum has given rise to many conflicting opinions. Some derive the name from labor; others, from λάβαρα, "reverence;" others, from λαμβανω, "to take;" and others again, from λάφυρα, "spoils." Lapsius de Cruce, 3, 15.—Euseb. Vit. Const. 2, 7, &c.

LABDA, a daughter of Amphion, one of the Bacchanalæ, born lame. She married Aetion, by whom she had a son whom she called Cypselus, because she saved his life in a coffer. Vid. Cypselus. This coffer was preserved at Olympia. Herod 5, 92.—Aristot. Polit 5.

LABDACIDES, a name given to Œdipus, as descended from Labdacus

LABDACUS, a son of Polydorus by Nycteis, the daughter of Nycteus, king of Thebes. His father and mother died during his childhood, and he was left to the care of Nycteus, who, at his death left his kingdom in the hands of Lycus, with orders to restore it to Labdacus as soon as of age. He was father to Laius. It is unknown whether he ever sat on the throne of Thebes. According to Statius his father's name was Phœnix His descendants were called Labdacides. Stat. Theb. 6, 451.—Apollod. 3, 5.—Paus. 2, 6 9, 5.

LABDALON, a hill near Syracuse, forming part of Epipolæ. It was fortified by the Athenians in their contest with Syracuse. Thucyd. 6, 97.

LABRATES, a people of Dalmatia, in the lower part, whose territory constituted the principal portion of the dominions of Gentius. His capital was Scodra. In the country of the Labeates was the Labeatis Palus, now the Lake of Scutari.

LABEO, Antistius, a celebrated lawyer in the age of Augustus, whose views he opposed, and whose offers of the consulship he refused. He was wont to enjoy the company and conversation of the learned for six months, and the rest of the year was spent in writing and composing. His works were said to amount to 500 volumes, all of which are lost, though some were extant in the age of Justinian. His father, of the same name, was one of Cæsar's murderers, and after sharing the dangers of Brutus at the battle of Philippi, he caused himself to be slain by one of his freedmen, not to survive public liberty. Horace (Sat. 1, 3, 82,) has unjustly taxed Labeo with insanity, because no doubt he inveighed against his patrons. Appian. Alex. 4 — Suet. in Aug 45 —— A tribune of the people at Rome, who condemned the censor Metellus to be thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, because he had expelled him from the senate. This rigorous sentence was stopped by the interference of another of the tribunes —— Q Fabius, a Roman consul, A U C 571, who obtained a naval victory over the fleet of the Cretans. He assisted Terence in composing his comedies, according to some —— Actius, an obscure poet, who recommended himself to the favour of Nero by an incorrect translation of Homer into Latin. Schol. ad Pers. Sat. 1, 1.

LABERIUS, J. Decimus, a Roman knight, famous for his talent in writing pantomimes. He was sixty years of age when Julius Cæsar, in the plenitude of his power, urged him, by the promise of a liberal reward, to appear on the stage, in one of his own pieces. The poet consented with great reluctance, and showed his resentment during the acting of the piece, by throwing severe aspersions upon Julius Cæsar, and by broadly hinting at the tyranny and despotism of which he was guilty In pronouncing the following line, he fixed the eyes of the whole assembly upon the usurper:

Necesse est multos timeat quem multi timent.

Cæsar restored him to the rank of knight, which he had lost by appearing on the stage, but he could not so easily restore him to the good opinion of his friends. When he went to take his seat among the knights, no one offered to make him room, even his friend Cicero sarcastically said Recepimum te nisi anguste sederem, to which Laberius replied, Mirum si anguste sedes, qui soles duabus sellis sedere; alluding to the orator's meanness and duplicity, during the civil wars between Cæsar and Pompey. Laberius died B. C 44. The titles of several of his pieces are preserved by A. Gellius, and a few fragments of him are given in Mattaire's Corpus Poetarum Macrob Sat. 2, 3 et 7.—*Horat. LABIENUS, one of Cæsar's lieutenants in the Gallic war. In the beginning of the civil war, he left Cæsar for Pompey, escaped from the battle of Pharsalia, and was killed in that of Munda. Labienus appears to have parted with almost all his former success, on abandoning the side of his old commander. Cæs B. Civ 3, 13. B. Hisp. 31. —— A son of the preceding, who inherited all his father's hatred to the party of Cæsar. After the defeat of Brutus and Cassius, he refused to submit to the triumvirs, and retired to Parthia, where he was invested with a military command, and proved very serviceable to his new allies in their contests with the Romans. He was made prisoner in Cilicia and put to death.—— An individual, whose writings were condemned by Augustus to be burned on account of their seditious and defamatory character. He shut himself up in the tomb of his ancestors, determined not to survive the loss of his productions. Senec.

LABINETUS or LABYNETUS, a king of Babylon, &c. Herod 1, 74.

LABRADEUS, a surname of Jupiter in Caria. The name was derived, according to Plutarch, from λάβρυς, the Lydian term for a hatchet, which the statue of Jove held in its hand, and which had been offered up by Arselis of Mylassa from the spoils of Candaules, king of Lydia. Plut. Quæst. Gr.

LABRÔNIS PORTUS, or PORTUS HERCULIS LIBURNI, a harbour of Etruria, below the mouth of the Arnus. It is now Livorno or Leghorn. Cic. ad Q Fratr. 2, 6.

LABYRINTHUS, a building whose numerous passages and perplexing windings render the escape from it difficult, and almost impracticable. There were four very famous among the ancients, one near the city of Crocodiles or Arsinoe, another in Crete, a third at Lemnos, and a fourth in Italy built by Porsenna. That of Egypt was the most ancient, and Herodotus who saw it, declares that the beauty and the art of the building were almost beyond belief It was built by twelve kings, who at one time reigned in Egypt, and it was intended for the place of their burial, and to commemorate the actions of their reign. It was divided into twelve halls, or, according to Pliny, into sixteen, or as Strabo mentions, into twenty-seven The halls were vaulted according to the relation of Herodotus. They had each six doors, opening to the north, and the same number to the south, all surrounded by one wall. The edifice contained 3000 chambers, 1500 in the upper part, and the same number below. The chambers above were seen by Herodotus, and astonished him beyond conception, but he was not permitted to see those below, where were buried the holy crocodiles and the monarchs whose munificence had raised the edifice. The roofs and walls were encrusted with marble, and adorned with sculptured figures. The halls were surrounded with stately and polished pillars of white stone, and according to some authors, the opening of the doors was artfully attended with a terrible noise like peals of thunder. The labyrinth of Crete was built by Dædalus, in imitation of that of Egypt, and it is the most famous of all in classical history It was the place of confinement for Dædalus himself, and the prison of the Minotaur. According to Pliny, the labyrinth of Lemnos surpassed the others in grandeur and magnificence. It was supported by forty columns of uncommon height and thickness, and equally admirable for their beauty and splendour. Modern travellers are still astonished at the noble and magnificent ruins which appear of the Egyptian labyrinth, at the south of the lake Mœris, about thirty miles from the ruins of Arsinoe. Mela, 1, 9.—Plin 36, 13.—Strab 10.—Diod 1.—Herod 2, 148.—Virg Æn 5, 588.

LACÆNA, an epithet applied to a female native of Laconia, and among others, to Helen, Virg. Æn 6, 511.

LACEDÆMON, a son of Jupiter and Taygeta the daughter of Atlas, who married Sparta the daughter of Eurotas, by whom he had Amyclas and Eurydice the wife of Acrisius. He was the first who introduced the worship of the Graces in Laconia, and who first built them a temple. From Lacedæmon and his wife, the capital of Laconia was called Lacedæmon and Sparta. Apollod. 3, 10.—Hygin. fab. 155.—Paus. 2, 1.—A noble city of Peloponnesus, the capital of Laconia, called also Sparta. It has been severally known by the name of Lelegia, from the Leleges the first inhabitants of the country, or from Lelex one of their kings; and Œbalia from Œbalus the sixth king from Eurotas. It was also called Hecatompolis, from the hundred cities which the whole province once contained. Lelex is supposed to have been the first king. His descendants, thirteen in number, reigned successively after him, till the reign of the sons of Orestes, when the Heraclidæ recovered the Peloponnesus, about eighty years after the Trojan war. Procles and Eurysthenes, the descendants of the Heraclidæ, enjoyed the crown together, and with them it was decreed that the two families should always sit on the throne together. (Vid Eurysthenes.) These two brothers began to reign B. C. 1102, their successors in the family of Procles were called Procleidæ, and afterwards Eurysthenidæ, and those of Eurysthenes, Eurysthenidæ and afterwards Agidæ. The successors of Procles on the throne began to reign in the following order: Sous, 1060 B. C. after his father had reigned forty-two years: Eurypon, 1025. Prytanis, 1021: Eunomus, 986. Polydectes, 907: Lycurgus, 895. Charilaus, 873. Nicander, 809: Theopompus, 770. Zeuxidamus, 723: Anaxidamus, 690: Archidamus, 651: Agasicles, 601. Ariston, 564: Demaratus, 526. Leotychides, 491: Archidamus, 469. Agis, 427: Agesilaus, 397. Archidamus, 361. Agis second, 338: Eudamidas, 310: Archidamus, 295. Eudamidas second, 265. Agis, 244: Archidamus, 230: Eucleidas, 225: Lycurgus, 219.—The successors of Eurysthenes were Agis, 1059. Echestratus, 1058. Labotas, 1023: Dorysaus, 986: Agesilaus, 957: Archelaus, 913. Teleclus, 853: Alcamenes, 813: Polydorus, 776. Eurycrates, 724: Anaxander, 687: Eurycrates second, 644: Leon, 607: Anaxandrides, 563: Cleomenes, 530. Leonidas, 491: Plistarchus, under guardianship of Pausanias, 480: Plistonax, 466: Pausanias, 408: Agesipolis, 397: Cleombrotus, 380: Agesipolis second, 371: Cleomenes second, 370. Areus or Areus, 309. Acrotatus, 265: Areus second, 264: Leonidas, 257: Cleombrotus, 243. Leonidas restored, 241: Cleomenes, 235: Agesipolis, 219. Under the two last kings, Lycurgus and Agesipolis, the monarchical power was abolished, though Machanidas the tyrant made himself absolute, B. C. 210, and Nabis, 206 for fourteen years. In the year 191, B. C. Lacedæmon joined the Achæan league, and about three years after the walls were demolished by order of Philopœmen. The territories of Laconia shared the fate of the Achæan confederacy, and the whole was conquered by Mummius, 147 B. C. and converted into a Roman province. The inhabitants of Lacedæmon have rendered themselves illustrious for their courage and intrepidity, for their love of honour and liberty, and for their aversion to sloth and luxury. They were inured from their youth to labour, and their laws commanded them to make war their profession. They never applied themselves to any trade, but their only employment was arms, and they left every thing else to the care of their slaves (Vid. Helotæ.) They hardened their body by stripes, and other manly exercises; and accustomed themselves to undergo hardships, and even to die without fear or regret. From their valour in the field, and their moderation and temperance at home, they were courted and revered by all the neighbouring princes, and their assistance was severally implored to protect the Sicilians, Carthaginians, Thracians, Egyptians, Cyrenæans, &c. They were forbidden by the laws of their country, (Vid. Lycurgus,) to visit foreign states, lest their manners should be corrupted by an intercourse with effeminate nations. The austere manner in which their children were educated, rendered them undaunted in the field of battle, and from this circumstance, Leonidas with a small band was enabled to resist the millions of the army of Xerxes at Thermopylæ. The women were as courageous as the men, and many a mother has celebrated with festivals the death of her son who had fallen in battle, or has coolly put him to flight, if, by a shameful flight or loss of his arms, he brought disgrace upon his country. As to domestic manners, the Lacedæmonians as widely differed from their neighbours as in political concerns, and their noblest women were not ashamed to appear on the stage hired for money. In the affairs of Greece, the interest of the Lacedæmonians was often powerful and obtained the superiority for 500 years. Their jealousy of the power and greatness of the Athenians is well known. The authority of their monarchs was checked by the watchful eye of the Ephori, who had the power of imprisoning the kings themselves if guilty of misdemeanours. (Vid. Ephori.) The Lacedæmonians are remarkable for the honour and reverence which they paid to old age. The names of Lacedæmon and Sparta, are promiscuously applied to the capital of Laconia, and often confounded together. The latter was applied to the metropolis, and the former was reserved for the inhabitants of the suburbs, or rather of the country contiguous to the walls of the city. This propriety of distinction was originally observed, but in process of time it was totally lost, and both appellatives were soon synonymous, and indiscriminately applied to the city and country. LACINIA, a surname of Juno from her temple at Lacinium in Italy.

LACINIUM PROMONTORIUM, a celebrated promontory of Magna Græcia, in the territory of the Brutii, a few miles to the south of Crotona. It runs out for some distance into the sea, and with the opposite Iapygian promontory incloses the gulf of Tarentum Its modern names are Capo delle Colonne (Cape of the Columns), and Capo Nao (Cape of the Temple), from the remains of the temple of Juno Lacinia, which are still visible on its summit. This celebrated edifice, remarkable for its great antiquity, the magnificence of its decorations, and the veneration with which it was regarded, was surrounded by a thick grove of trees, in the midst of which were spacious meadows; here numerous herds and flocks were pastured in perfect security, as they were accounted sacred. From the profits accruing out of the sale of these cattle, which were destined for sacrifices, it was said that a column of solid gold was erected and consecrated to the goddess. On the festival of Juno, which was celebrated annually, an immense concourse of the inhabitants of all the Italian Greek cities assembled here, and a grand display of the most rare and precious productions of art and nature was exhibited. On one of these occasions Alexithenes, a Sybarite, is said to have produced a purple robe exquisitely embroidered, and adorned with feathers of every colour, on which were represented the city of Sybaris and the twelve principal deities. This costly dress having come into the possession of the elder Dionysius, was sold by him to some Carthaginian merchants for the enormous sum of 120 talents. Among other splendid pictures with which this temple was adorned, the famous Helen of Zeuxis was more particularly admired. The artist was said to have conceived his idea of that celebrated beauty, from a selection of the fairest women which Crotona could present to his view. History has not acquainted us with the founders of this consecrated pile, but its great antiquity is attested by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who affirms that Æneas on his arrival there presented to the goddess a brazen vase. According to Diodorus Siculus, some ascribed its origin to Hercules. This sanctuary was respected by Pyrrhus, as well as by Hannibal; the latter caused an inscription in Greek and Punic characters to be deposited there, recording the number of his troops, and their several victories and achievements. But several years afterwards it sustained great injury from Fulvius Flaccus, a censor, who caused a great portion of the roof, which was covered with marble, to be removed, for the purpose of adorning a temple of Fortune constructed by him at Rome. Such an outcry was raised against this act of impiety, that orders were issued by the senate that every thing should be restored to its former state; but this could not be effected, no architect being found of sufficient skill to replace the marble tiles according to their original position. From the ruins of this celebrated edifice it is evident that it was of the early Doric style, with fluted pillars, broader at the base than at the capital. It measured about 132 yards in length and sixty-six in breadth; and, as it faced the east, its principal entrance opened to the west. Strab. 6.—Liv. 24, 3 42, 3.—Cic. de Div. 1, 24 de Inv. 2, 2.—Aristot. de Mirab.—*Dion. LACONIA, a country of Peloponnesus, situate at its southern extremity, having Messenia on the west, and Arcadia and Argolis on the north The extent of Laconia from east to west where it reached farthest, was 1° 45′, but it became narrower towards the north, and its extent from north to south was about fifty miles. As the southern parts were encompassed by the sea, and the east and north-east parts by the Sinus Argolicus, it had a great number of promontories, the chief of which were those of Malea and Tænarus, now Cape Malio and Cape Matopan The seacoast of Laconia was furnished with a considerable number of sea ports, towns, and commodious harbours, the chief of which were Trinasus, Aeria, Gythium, and Epidaurus The Laconian coasts were famous for yielding a shell-fish, whence was obtained a beautiful purple dye, inferior only to that which was brought from the Red Sea The mountains of Laconia were numerous the most famous was Taygetus Its principal river was the Eurotas, on which stood the capital Lacedæmon or Sparta. The soil was very rich, especially in the low grounds, and, being well watered, was excellent for pasture, but the number of its mountains and hills prevented its being tilled so well as it might otherwise have been. Among the animals of the country may be enumerated wild and tame goats, wild boars, deer, and excellent hounds. A blackish green marble (probably basalt,) was obtained at Tænarus. Cic Att 4, 10.—Strab. 8.—Plol. 3, 16.—Mela, 2, 3

LACRINES, a Lacedæmonian, ambassador to Cyrus Herod. 1 152

LACTANTIUS, LUCIUS CŒLIUS (or CÆCILIUS), an eloquent father of the church, was, according to some, an African; while others, with more probability, say that he was a native of Firmum, in Italy. He studied rhetoric at Sicca, a city of Africa, under Arnobius; after which, he became tutor to Crispus, the son of Constantine. He formed his style upon the model of Cicero, and wrote several works, the principal of which are Institutiones Divinæ, in seven books, and a treatise De Persecutione. The best edition of Lactantius is that of the Abbe Langlet, 2 vols. 8to, Paris, 1746.——Placidus, a grammarian, who flourished about 550 A. D. He was the author of Argumenta Metamorphoseon Ovidii, in prose.

LACYDES, a Greek philosopher, and native of Cyrene, was a disciple of Arcesilaus, whom he succeeded in the academic chair. He was brought up in very humble circumstances, but acquired great reputation by intense application to his studies, and a graceful elocution. He was highly esteemed by king Attalus who gave him a garden where he might devote himself to study and to the instruction of others this was afterwards known by the name of the Lacydean garden Attalus wished Lacydes to come and reside at his court, to which he respectfully replied that the portraits of kings should be viewed at a distance He taught his disciples never to be hasty in their judgments and never to speak positively Having taught philosophy twenty six years he resigned the employment to his scholars Telecles and Evander In the second year of the 141st Olympiad In old age he disgraced himself by giving a favourite goose a most magnificent funeral and he fell a victim to excessive drinking Diog Laert 4, 59 &c —Ælian V H 2, 31,— Athen 10 0

LAERTES a king of Ithaca, son of Arcesius and Chalcomedusa who married Anticlea, the daughter of Autolycus Anticlea was pregnant by Sisyphus when she married Laertes, and eight months after her union with the king of Ithaca she brought forth a son called Ulysses. (Vid Anticlea) Ulysses was treated with paternal care by Laertes though not really his son, and Laertes ceded to him his crown and retired into the country where he spent his time in gardening He was found in this mean employment by his son at his return from the Trojan war after twenty years absence and Ulysses at the sight of his father, whose dress and old age declared his sorrow being hesitated whether he should suddenly introduce himself as his son, or whether he should as a stranger gradually awaken the paternal feelings of Laertes who had believed that his son was no more Him last measure was preferred and when Laertes had burst into tears at the mention which was made of his son, Ulysses threw himself on his neck, exclaiming, 'O father I am he for whom you weep' This welcome declaration was followed by a recital of all the hardships which Ulysses had suffered and immediately after the father and son repaired to the palace of Penelope the wife of Ulysses, whence all the suitors who daily importuned the princess, were forcibly removed Laertes was one of the Argonauts, according to Apollodorus, 1, 9 Homer Od 11 et 24 — Ovid Met 13 92 Herod 1, 95 — A town and harbour of Cilicia, on the confines of Pamphylia, and west of Side It was the birth place of Diogenes Laertius Strab 14.

LAERTIUS DIOGENES, a writer born at Laertes Vid Diogenes,

LÆSTRYGONES, the most ancient inhabitants of Sicily Some suppose them to be the same as the people of Leontium and to have been neighbours to the Cyclops They fed on human flesh, and when Ulysses came on their coasts they sunk his ships and devoured his companions (Vid Antiphates) They were of a gigantic stature, according to Homer, who however, does not mention their country, but only speaks of Lamus as their captain A colony of them, as some suppose passed over into Italy with Lamus at their head, where they built the town of Formiæ whence the epithet of Lastrygonia often used for that of Formiana Plin 3 5 — Ovid Met 14, 233 &c Fast 4 ex Pont 4 ep 10 — Tzetz in Lycophr 662 et 818.— Homer Od 10, 81.— Sil 7, 276.

LAGIA, a name of the island Delos. Vid. Delos.

LAGIDES Vid. Lagus.

LAGUS, a Macedonian of mean extraction. He received in marriage Arsinoe the daughter of Meleager, who was then pregnant by king Philip, and being willing to hide the disgrace of his wife, he exposed the child in the woods. An eagle preserved the life of the infant, fed him with her prey, and sheltered him with her wings against the inclemency of the air. This uncommon preservation was divulged by Lagus, who adopted the child as his own, and called him Ptolemy, conjecturing that as his life had been so miraculously preserved, his days would be spent in grandeur and affluence. This Ptolemy became king of Egypt after the death of Alexander. According to other accounts Arsinoe was nearly related to Philip king of Macedonia, and her marriage with Lagus was not considered as dishonourable, because he was opulent and powerful. The first of the Ptolemies is called Lagus, to distinguish him from his successors of the same name. Ptolemy, the first of the Macedonian kings of Egypt, wished it to be believed that he was the legitimate son of Lagus, and he preferred the name of Lagides to all other appellations. It is even said, that he established a military order in Alexandria, which was called Lageion. The surname of Lagides was transmitted to all his descendants on the Egyptian throne till the reign of Cleopatra. Antony's mistress. Plutarch mentions an anecdote which serves to show how far the legitimacy of Ptolemy was believed in his age. A pedantic grammarian, says the historian, once displaying his great knowledge of antiquity in the presence of Ptolemy, the king suddenly interrupted him with the question of, Pray tell me, sir, who was the father of Peleus? Tell me, replied the grammarian, without hesitation, tell me you can, O king! who the father of Lagus was? This reflection on the meanness of the monarch's birth did not in the least irritate his resentment, though the courtiers all glowed with indignation. Ptolemy praised the humour of the grammarian, and showed his moderation and the mildness of his temper, by taking him under his patronage. Pyrr. Alt.—Plut. de ira cohib.—Lacon. 1, 6?——A Rutulian, killed by Pallas son of Evander. Virg. Æn. 10, 381.

LAGUSA, an island in the Sinus Glaucus, near the northern coast of Lycia, now Panagia di Carchisius, or, according to some, Christiana.——Of Lagusæ, an island, or more properly, a cluster of islands, on the coast of Troas, to the north of Tenedos, now Taochan Adasi. Plin 5, 31.

LAIADES, a patronymic of Œdipus son of Laius. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 18.

LAIS, a celebrated courtezan, daughter of Timandra the mistress of Alcibiades, born at Hyccara in Sicily. She was carried away from her native country into Greece, when Nicias the Athenian general invaded Sicily. She first began to sell her favours at Corinth, and the immense number of princes, noblemen, philosophers, orators, and plebeians, who courted her embraces, show how much commendation is owed to her personal charms. The expenses which attended her pleasures, gave rise to the proverb of Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum. Even Demosthenes himself visited Corinth for the sake of Lais, but when he was informed by the courtezan, that admittance to her bed was to be bought at the enormous sum of 10,000 drachmas, or about 300*l* English money, the orator departed, and observed, that he would not buy repentance at so dear a price. The charms which had attracted Demosthenes to Corinth, had no influence upon Xenocrates. When Lais saw the philosopher unmoved by her beauty, she visited his house herself; but there she had no reason to boast of the licentiousness or easy submission of Xenocrates. Diogenes the cynic was one of her warmest admirers, and though filthy in his dress and manners, yet he gained her heart and enjoyed her most unbounded favours. The sculptor Myron also solicited the favours of Lais, but he met with coldness; he, however, attributed the cause of his ill reception to the whiteness of his hair, and dyed it of a brown colour, but to no purpose: Fool that thou art, said the courtezan, to ask what I refused yesterday to thy father. Lais ridiculed the austerity of philosophers, and laughed at the weakness of those who pretend to have gained a superiority over their passions, by observing that the sages and philosophers of the age were not above the rest of mankind, for she found them at her door as often as the rest of the Athenians. The success which her debaucheries met at Corinth, encouraged Lais to pass into Thessaly, and more particularly to enjoy the company of a favourite youth called Hippostratus She was, however, disappointed: the women of the place, jealous of her charms, and apprehensive of her corrupting the fidelity of their husbands, assassinated her in the temple of Venus, about 340 years before the Christian era. Some suppose that there were two persons of this name, a mother and her daughter. Cic. ad Fam. 9, 26.—Ovid. Amor. 1, 5.—Plut. in Alcib.—Paus. 2, 2.

LAIUS, a son of Labdacus, who succeeded to the throne of Thebes, which his grandfather Nycteus had left to the care of his brother Lycus, till his grandson came of age. He was driven from his kingdom by Amphion and Zethus, who were incensed against Lycus for the indignities which Antiope had suffered. He was afterwards restored, and married Jocasta the daughter of Creon. An oracle informed him that he should perish by the hand of his son, and in consequence of this dreadful intelligence he resolved never to approach his wife. A day spent in debauch and intoxication made him violate his vow, and Jocasta brought forth a son. The child as soon as born was given to a servant, with orders to put him to death. The servant was moved with compassion, and only exposed him on mount Cithæron where his life was preserved by a shepherd The child, called Œdipus, was educated in the court of Polybus, and an unfortunate meeting with his father in a narrow road proved his ruin Œdipus ordered his father to make way for him without knowing who he was, Laius refused, and was instantly murdered by his irritated son His armour bearer or charioteer shared his fate (Vid Œdipus) Sophocl in Œdip —Hygin fab 9 et 66 —Apollod 3 5 —Paus 9, 5 et 26 —Plut de Curios

LAMACHUS, a son of Xenophanes, sent into Sicily with Nicias He was killed B C 414, before Syracuse, where he had displayed much courage and intrepidity Plut in Alcib —A governor of Heraclea in Pontus who betrayed his trust to Mithridates after he had invited all the inhabitants to a sumptuous feast

LAMBRUS or LAMBER a river of Cisalpine Gaul issuing from the Lupilus Lacus and falling into the Olona one of the tributaries of the Po It is now the Lambro

LAMIA a town of Thessaly situate inland from the head waters of the Sinus Maliacus and about thirty stadia from the Sperchius It is celebrated in history as the principal scene of the war waged by the Athenians and other Greeks at the instigation of their orators against the Macedonians, under Antipater (Vid Lamiacum Bellum) According to Dr Holland there is very little doubt that the site of Zeitoun corresponds with that of the ancient Lamia. Strab 9 —Titus, a Roman of distinguished family claiming descent from Lamus the most ancient monarch of the Læstrygones He signalized himself in the war with the Cantabri as one of the lieutenants of Augustus Horat Od 3, 17 —A famous courtezan, daughter of Cleanora mistress to Demetrius Poliorcetes, at whose court she became particularly known by her extravagance, her intrigues, and her ascendency over her lover s affections She also distinguished herself as a player on the flute, and the admiration she gained was paid no less to her personal charms, than to her wit to the accomplishments of her mind and her superior skill in music and poetry. Plut in Demetr —Athen 13 —Ælian V H 13 9

LAMIACUM BELLUM happened after the death of Alexander, when the Greeks, and particularly the Athenians incited by their orators resolved to free Greece from the garrisons of the Macedonians Leosthenes was appointed commander of a numerous force, and marched against Antipater, who then presided over Macedonia. Antipater entered Thessaly at the head of 13 000 foot and 600 horse, and was beaten by the superior force of the Athenians and of their Greek confederates And pater after this blow fled to Lamia B C 323, where he resolved, with all the courage and sagacity of a careful general, to maintain a siege with about the 8 or 9000 men that had escaped from the field of battle Leosthenes unable to take the city by storm, began to make a regular siege His operations were delayed by the frequent sallies of Antipater, and Leosthenes being killed by the blow of a stone, Antipater made his escape out of Lamia, and soon after, with the assistance of the army of Craterus brought from Asia, he gave the Athenians battle near Cranon, and though only 500 of their men were slain, yet they became so dispirited, that they sued for peace from the conqueror. Antipater at last with difficulty consented, provided they raised taxes in the usual manner, received a Macedonian garrison defrayed the expenses of the war, and lastly delivered into his hands Demosthenes and Hyperides the two orators, whose prevailing eloquence had excited their countrymen against him These disadvantageous terms were accepted by the Athenians yet Demosthenes had time to escape and poison himself Hyperides was carried before Antipater, who ordered his tongue to be cut off and afterwards put him to death Plut in Demost —Diod 17 —Justin. 11, &c

LAMIÆ small islands in the Ægean opposite Troas Plin 5, 31 —A celebrated family at Rome, said to be descended from Lamus, the king of the Lestrygones —Certain monsters of Africa who had the face and breast of a woman, and the rest of their body like that of a serpent They allured strangers to come to them, that they might devour them and though they were not endowed with the faculty of speech, yet their hissings were pleasing and agreeable. Some believed them to be witches or rather evil spirits, who under the form of a beautiful woman, enticed young children and devoured them According to some the fable of the Lamiæ is derived from the amours of Jupiter with a certain beautiful woman called Lamia, whom the jealousy of Juno rendered deformed, and whose children she destroyed; upon which Lamia became insane, and so desperate, that she eat up all the children that came in her way They are also called Lemures (Vid Lemures) Philostr. in Ap —Horat Art Poet 340 —Plut de Curios.

LAMPEDO a woman of Lacedæmon, who was daughter, wife, sister and mother of a king She lived in the age of Alcibiades Agrippina, the mother of Claudius could boast the same honours. Tacit Ann 12, 22 et 37

LAMPETIA, a daughter of Apollo and Neæra. She with her sister Phaetusa guarded her father s flocks in Sicily when Ulysses arrived on the coasts of that island These flocks were fourteen in number, seven herds of oxen, and seven flocks of sheep, consisting each of fifty. They fed by night as well as by day, and it was deemed unlawful and even sacrilegious to touch them. The companions of Ulysses, impelled by hunger, paid no regard to their sanctity, or to the threats and intreaties of their chief, but they carried away and killed some of the oxen. The watchful keepers complained to their father, and Jupiter, at the request of Apollo, punished the offence of the Greeks The hides of the oxen appeared to walk, and the flesh which was roasting by the fire began to bellow, and nothing was heard but dreadful noises and loud lowings The companions of Ulysses embarked on board their ships, but here the resentment of Jupiter followed them. A storm arose, and they all perished except Ulysses, who saved himself on the broken piece of a mast. Homer Od 12 119.—Propert 3, 13 —According to Ovid (Met. 2 349), Lampetia is one of the Heliades, who was changed into a poplar tree at the death of her brother Phaeton.

LAMPETO and LAMPEDO a queen of the Amazons, who boasted herself to be the daughter of Mars. She gained many conquests in Asia, where she founded several cities She was surprised afterwards by a band of barbarians and destroyed with her female attendants. Justin. 2, 4.

LAMPON, LAMPOS, or LAMPUS, one of the horses of Diomedes.——Of Hector.——Of Aurora. Homer. Il. 8, 185. Od. 23, 246.——A horse mentioned by Italicus as swifter than the wind Ital. 16, 367.——A son of Laomedon father of Dolops. Homer. Il. 5, 545.——A soothsayer of Athens in the age of Socrates Plut in Pericl.

LAMPONIUS, an Athenian general, sent by his countrymen to attempt the conquest of Sicily. Justin. 4, 3.

LAMPRIDIUS ÆLIUS, a Latin historian, who lived in the fourth century, under Diocletian and Constantine the Great. He is supposed to have been the author of the lives of Commodus, Antoninus, Diadumenus, Heliogabalus, and Alexander Severus. The style and arrangement of Lampridius will not allow him a place among historians of a superior class, yet he is valuable for his facts His lives make a part of the Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores, 2 vols. 8vo, 1671.

LAMPSĀCUS now Lamsaki, a city of Mysia in Asia Minor, situate on the Hellespont, where it begins to open into the Propontis, and north east of Abydos. The early name of the spot where Lampsacus stood, was Pityusa from the number of pine-trees which grew there A Phocæan colony is said to have founded this city, and given it its name, being directed by the oracle to settle wherever they saw lightning first. This took place in the district Pityusa, and hence the name of the city from λάμπω, luceo. Strabo calls Lampsacus a Milesian colony: very probably it was only enlarged by a colony from Miletus Another account, however, makes the city to have existed prior to the arrival of the Phocæans, and merely the name to have been changed by them. They aided, it seems, Mandro, king of the Bebryces, against the neighbouring barbarians, and were persuaded by him to occupy a part of his territory. Their successes in war, however, and the spoils they had obtained, excited the envy of the Bebrycians, and the Phocæans would have been secretly destroyed, had not Lampsace, the king's daughter, apprized them of the plot. Out of gratitude to her, they called the city Lampsacus, having destroyed the former inhabitants. The neighbouring country was termed Abarnus or Abarnus, because Venus, who here was delivered of Priapus, was so disgusted with his appearance, that she disowned (ἀπώσατο) him for her offspring. Priapus was the chief deity of the place His temple there was the asylum of lewdness and debauchery; and hence the epithet Lampsacus is used to express immodesty and wantonness. Alexander resolved to destroy the city on account of the vices of its inhabitants, or more probably for its firm adherence to the interest of Persia. It was, however, saved from ruin by the artifice of Anaximenes. (See Anaximenes.) Mela, 1, 19.—Strab. 14.—Polyæn 8, 37.

LAMPTERA, a town of Phocæa in Ionia. Liv. 37, 31.

LAMPTERIA, a festival at Pellene, in Achaia, in honour of Bacchus, who was surnamed Lampter, from λάμπειν, to shine, because, during this solemnity, which was observed in the night, the worshippers went to the temple of Bacchus, with lighted torches in their hands. It was also customary to place vessels full of wine in several parts of every street in the city. Paus. 4, 21.

LAMUS, a king of the Læstrygones, who is supposed by some to have founded Formiæ in Italy. The family of the Lamiæ at Rome, was, according to the opinion of some, descended from him. Horat. Od. 3, 17 ——A son of Hercules and Omphale, who succeeded his mother on the throne of Lydia, but afterwards was banished and retired to Caria. Ovid. Heroid. 9, 51.——A Latin chief killed by Nisus. Virg Æn. 9, 334. ——A river in the western part of Cilicia Campestris, now the Lamus It gave to the adjacent district the name of Lamotis.

LAMYRUS, buffoon, a surname of one of the Ptolemies.——One of the auxiliaries of Turnus, killed by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, 334.

LANASSA, a daughter of Cleodæus, who married Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, by whom she had eight children Justin. 17, 3.

LANCIA, the name of two towns in Lusitania, distinguished by the appellations of Oppidana and Transcudana. The first was on the frontiers of the Lusitani, near the sources of the river Munda, or Mondego. It is now Guarda The latter lay to the east of the former, and is now Ciudad Rodrigo. It was called Transcudana, because it lay beyond the Cuda LANGOBARDI, a people of Germany, seated on the Albis, or Elbe, and the Viadrus, or Oder, in part of what is now called Brandenburg They were famed for their bravery, though few in number. They are said to have migrated from Scandinavia, where their original name was Vinili, which they exchanged for one denoting their long beards. Tacit Ann. 2, 45. G. 40.

LANUVĪUM, a town of Latium, about sixteen miles from Rome on the Appian way. Juno had there a celebrated temple which was frequented by the inhabitants of Italy, and particularly by the Romans, whose consuls on first entering upon office offered sacrifices to the goddess. The statue of the goddess was covered with a goat's skin, and armed with a buckler and spear, and wore shoes which were turned upwards in the form of a cone. Cic pro Mur. de Nat. D. 1, 29. pro Milon 10.—Liv. 8, 14.—Ital. 13, 364.

LAONOTAS, or LAEOTAS, a Spartan king, of the family of the Agidæ, who succeeded his father Echestratus, B. C 1023. During his reign, war was declared against Argos, by Sparta. He sat on the throne for thirty seven years, and was succeeded by Doryssus, his son. Paus 3, 2.

LAOCOON, a son of Priam and Hecuba; or, according to others, of Antenor, or of Capys. As being priest of Apollo, he was commissioned by the Trojans to offer a bullock to Neptune to render him propitious During the sacrifice two enormous serpents issued from the sea, and attacked Laocoon's two sons who stood next to the altar. The father immediately attempted to defend his sons, but the serpents falling upon him squeezed him in their complicated wreaths, so that he died in the greatest agonies. This punishment was inflicted upon him for his temerity in dissuading the Trojans to bring into the city the fatal wooden horse which the Greeks had consecrated to Minerva, as also for his impiety in hurling a javelin against the sides of the horse as it entered within the walls. Hyginus attributes this to his marriage against the consent of Apollo, or according to others, for his polluting the temple, by his commerce with his wife Antiope before the statue of the god. The sons of Laocoon are called Antiphas and Thymbræus by Hyginus, and by Thessander, quoted by Servius, Æthron and Melanthus. This dreadful fate of the priest of Apollo described in so masterly a style by Virgil and by Petronius, is still more familiar to the moderns, by a celebrated marble statue, the work of Polydorus, Athenodorus, and Ages ander, which has survived the ravages of time and barbarism. This famous monument, found in the baths of Titus during the pontificate of Julius II, and preserved in the Vatican, represents Laocoon at the very moment when the two serpents writhe themselves around him, and destroy the powers of life by their mortal venom. The art of the sculptors has here excelled, and the features of the father express the agonizing feelings of parental anxiety as if it were animated nature.—Virg Æn. 2, 41 et 201.—Hygin. fab. 135 —Plin 36, 5.- Servius in Æn. 2, 201 et 211. —Tzetzes in Lycoph. 347, LAODAMAS, a son of Alcinous, king of the Phæacians who offered to wrestle with Ulysses, while at his father's court. Ulysses, mindful of the hospitality of Alcinous, refused the challenge of Laodamas Homer, Od 7, 170.

LAODAMIA, a daughter of Acastus and Astydamia, who married Protesilaus, the son of Iphiclus king of a part of Thessaly. The departure of her husband for the Trojan war was the source of grief to her, but when she heard that he had fallen by the hand of Hector, her sorrow was increased. To keep alive the memory of her husband whom she had tenderly loved, she ordered a wooden statue to be made and regularly placed in her bed. This was seen by one of her servants, who informed Iphiclus that his daughter's bed was daily defiled by an unknown stranger. Iphiclus watched his daughter, and when he found that the intelligence was false, he ordered the wooden image to be burned, in hopes of dissipating his daughter's grief. He did not succeed, Laodamia threw herself into the flames with the image and perished. This circumstance has given occasion to fabulous traditions related by the poets, which mention that Protesilaus was restored to life, and to Laodamia, for three hours, and that when he was obliged to return to the infernal regions, he persuaded his wife to accompany him Virg. Æn 6. 447.—Ovid. Her 13. - Hygin. fab 104. - Propert. 1, 19. —— A daughter of Bellerophon by Achemone the daughter of king Iobates. She had a son by Jupiter, called Sarpedon. She dedicated herself to the service of Diana, and hunted with her; but her haughtiness proved fatal to her, and she perished by the arrows of the goddess Homer. Il 6, 197. 12, 305 16, 419.—A daughter of Alexander, king of Epirus, by Olympia the daughter of Pyrrhus She was assassinated in the temple of Diana, where she had fled for safety during a sedition. Her murderer, called Milo, soon after turned his dagger against his own breast and killed himself Justin 26, 3.

LAODICE, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, who became enamoured of Acamas, son of Theseus, when he came with Diomedes from the Greeks to Troy with an embassy to demand the restoration of Helen She obtained an interview and the gratification of her desires at the house of Philebia, the wife of a governor of a small town of Troas which the Greek ambassador had visited She had a son by Acamas, whom she called Munitus. She afterwards married Helicaon, son of Antenor, and Telephus, king of Mysia. Some call her Astyoche. According to the Greek scholiast of Lycophron, Laodice threw herself down from the top of a tower and was killed when Troy was sacked by the Greeks, and from this circumstance she is nowhere mentioned among the captives, though, according to Pausanias, the famous painting of the fall of Troy by Polygnotus, represented her near an altar, at some distance from the captive princesses of Troy. Dictys Cret. 1.—Paus. 10, 26.—Homer. Il 3 et 6. —— One of the Oceanides.——A daughter of Cinyras, by whom Elatus had some children. Apollod. 3, 14 —— A daughter of Agamemnon, called also Electra. Homer. Il. 9, 145 ——A sister of Mithridates who married Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and afterwards her own brother Mithridates. During the secret absence of Mithridates she prostituted herself to her servants, in hopes that her husband was dead; but when she saw her expectations frustrated, she attempted to poison Mithridates, for which she was put to death.——A queen of Cappadocia, put to death by her subjects for poisoning five of her children ——A sister and wife of Antiochus II. She put to death Berenice, whom her husband had married. (Vid Antiochus II) She was murdered by order of Ptolemy Evergetes, B C 246.——A daughter of Demetrius, shamefully put to death by Ammonius the tyrannical minister of the vicious Alexander Bala, king of Syria ——A daughter of Seleucus ——The mother of Seleucus. Nine months before she brought forth she dreamt that Apollo had introduced himself into her bed, and had presented her with a precious stone, on which was engraved the figure of an anchor, commanding her to deliver it to her son as soon as born. This dream appeared the more wonderful, when in the morning she discovered in her bed a ring answering the same description. Not only the son that she brought forth, called Seleucus, but also all his successors of the house of the Seleucidæ, had the mark of an anchor upon their thigh. Justin.

LAODICEA, a city of Phrygia, in the south-western angle of the country. It was situate on the river Lycus, (hence surnamed Ad Lycum,) and stood on the borders of Phrygia, Lydia, and Caria. It was formerly called Diospolis and Rhous, but was named Laodicea by Antiochus, son of Stratonice, after his wife Laodice. Though constantly suffering from destructive earthquakes, it became much celebrated for its extensive commerce, and for the fine soft wool of its sheep. Its memory is consecrated in Scripture, being one of the seven churches mentioned in the Revelation of St John. Its ruins occupy the site termed Eskhissar. Strab. 12.—Plin. 5, 29 —— Scabiosa, a city of Syria, south-west of Emesa and of the Orontes. It is sometimes, though erroneously, styled Cabiosa. The surname Scabiosa must have reference to the leprosy, or some cutaneous complaint very prevalent here in the time of the Roman power. Its previous name under the Greeks was Laodicea ad Libanum. Strab. 16.—Plin. 5, 23.—A maritime city of Syria, on an eminence near the coast, called, for distinction's sake, Laodicea ad Mare. It was built by Seleucus Nicator, who named it after his mother. Its modern name is Ladkeyah. Strab. 16.—Plin. 21, 5 ——Combusta, a city of Lycaonia, north-west of Iconium. It is said to have received its epithet from the volcanic nature of the district in which it was situated. It is now Iorgan Ladik. Strab. 12.——A city of Media, on the confines of Persia. Plin. 6. 26 ——A city of Mesopotamia, near Seleucia. Plin. 4, 26.

LAODICENE, a province of Syria, which receives its name from Laodicea, its capital.

LAODOCHUS, a son of Antenor, whose form

Minerva borrowed to advise Pandarus to break the treaty which subsisted between the Greeks and Trojans. Homer. Il. 4, 67.——An attendant of Antilochus Homer. Il. 17, 699.——A son of Priam. Apollod. 3, 12 ——A son of Apollo and Pythia. Id 1, 7.

LAOGONUS, a son of Bias brother to Dardanus, killed by Achilles at the siege of Troy. Homer. Il. 20, 461.——A priest of Jupiter, killed by Merion in the Trojan war. Homer. Il 16, 601.

LAOGORAS, a king of the Dryopes, who accustomed his subjects to become robbers. He plundered the temple of Apollo at Delphi, and was killed by Hercules. Apollod. 2, 7.—Diod 4.

LAOGORE, a daughter of Cinyras and Methame, daughter of Pygmalion. She died in Egypt. Apollod. 3, 14

LAOMEDON, son of Ilus king of Troy, married Strymo, called by some Placia, or Leucippe, by whom he had Podarces, afterwards known by the name of Priam, and Hesione. He built the walls of Troy, and was assisted by Apollo and Neptune, whom Jupiter had banished from heaven, and condemned to be subservient to the will of Laomedon for one year. When the walls were finished, Laomedon refused to reward the labours of the gods, and soon after his territories were laid waste by the god of the sea, and his subjects were visited by a pestilence sent by Apollo. Sacrifices were offered to the offended divinities, but the calamities of the Trojans increased, and nothing could appease the gods, according to the words of the oracle, but annually to expose to a sea monster a Trojan virgin. Whenever the monster appeared the marriageable maidens were assembled, and the lot decided which of them was doomed to death for the good of her country. When this calamity had continued for five or six years, the lot fell upon Hesione, Laomedon's daughter. The king was unwilling to part with a daughter whom he loved with uncommon tenderness, but his refusal would irritate more strongly the wrath of the gods. In the midst of his fears and hesitation, Hercules came and offered to deliver the Trojans from this public calamity, if Laomedon promised to reward him with a number of fine horses The king consented, but, when the monster was destroyed, he refused to fulfil his engagements, and Hercules was obliged to besiege Troy and take it by force of arms. Laomedon was put to death after a reign of twenty-nine years, his daughter Hesione was given in marriage to Telamon, one of the conqueror's attendants, and Podarces was ransomed by the Trojans, and placed upon his father's throne. According to Hyginus, the wrath of Neptune and Apollo was kindled against Laomedon, because he refused to offer on their altars, as a sacrifice, all the first born of his cattle, according to a vow which he had made. The meaning of the fable appears to be simply this:—Laomedon employed in erecting the walls of Troy certain sums of money consecrated to the use of Apollo and Neptune, and which had been delivered to him by the priests of these deities on his promising to restore the amount. This promise he never fulfilled; hence he was said to have defrauded the gods. Homer. Il 21.—*Virg. LAOMEDONTEUS, an epithet applied to the Trojans from their king Laomedon. Virg. Æn. 4, 343, 7, 105. 8, 18.

LAOMEDONTIADÆ, a patronymic given to the Trojans from Laomedon their king. Virg. Æn. 3, 248.

LAONOME'NE, a daughter of Thespius, by whom Hercules had two sons Teles and Menippides, and two daughters, Lysidice and Stenedice. Apollod. 2, 7

LAOTHOE, a daughter of Altes, a king of the Leleges, who married Priam, and became mother of Lycaon and Polydorus. Homer. Il. 21, 85.——One of the daughters of Thespius, mother of Antidus, by Hercules. Apollod. 2, 7.

LAPHRIA, a surname of Diana at Patræ, in Achaia where she had a temple with a statue of gold and ivory, which represented her in the habit of a huntress. The statue was made by Menechmus and Soidas, two artists of celebrity. This name was given to the goddess from Laphrius, the son of Delphus, who consecrated the statue to her. There was a festival of the goddess there, called also Laphria, of which Pausanias (7 18) gives an account.

LAPHYSTIUM, a mountain in Bœotia, where Jupiter had a temple, whence he was called Laphystius. It was here that Athamas prepared to immolate Phryxus and Helle, whom Jupiter saved by sending them a golden ram, whence the surname, and the homage paid to the god. Paus. 9, 34.

LAPIDEUS, a surname of Jupiter among the Romans, either in allusion to the stone which Rhea gave to Saturn, and which he devoured instead of Jupiter, or from the stone which those who made an oath by Jupiter held in their hand. The god was on those occasions invoked with the greatest solemnity, and he who swore intreated him to banish him from his possessions just as he threw away the stone from his hand. Aul. Gell. 1, 21.—Hygin. fab 139.

LAPITHÆ, a people of Thessaly. (Vid Lapithus.)

LAPITHUS, a son of Apollo, by Stilbe. He was brother to Centaurus, and married Orsinome, daughter of Euronymus, by whom he had Phorbas and Periphas. The name of Lapithæ was given to the numerous children of Phorbas and Periphas, or rather to the inhabitants of the country, of which they had obtained the sovereignty. The chief of the Lapithæ assembled to celebrate the nuptials of Pirithous, one of their number, and among them were Theseus, Dryas, Hopleus, Mopsus, Phaleus, Exadius, Prolochus, Titaresius, Œneus, &c The Centaurs were also invited to partake the common festivity, and the amusements would have been harmless and innocent, had not one of the intoxicated Centaurs offered violence to Hippodamia, the wife of Pirithous. The Lapithæ resented the injury, and the Centaurs supported their companions, upon which the quarrel became universal, and ended in blows and slaughter. Many of the Centaurs were slain, and they at last were obliged to retire. Theseus among the Lapithæ showed himself brave and intrepid in supporting the cause of his friends, and Nestor also was not less active in the protection of chastity and innocence. This quarrel arose from the resentment of Mars, whom Pirithous forgot or neglected to invite among the other gods, at the celebration of his nuptials, and therefore the divinity punished the insult by sowing dissension among the festive assembly. (Vid. Centaurs.) Hesiod has described the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, as also Ovid, in a more copious manner. The invention of bits and bridles for horses is attributed to the Lapithæ.

LAR or LARS, a name applied to the kings of Etruria, probably to express their rank and dignity. Liv. 2, 9. 4, 17.—Cic. Phil 9, 9.

LARA or LARANDA, one of the Naiads, daughter of the river Almon in Latium, famous for her beauty and her loquacity, which her parents long endeavoured to correct, but in vain. She revealed to Juno, the amours of her husband Jupiter with Juturna, for which the god cut off her tongue, and ordered Mercury to conduct her to the internal regions. The messenger of the gods fell in love with her by the way, and gratified his passion. Lara became mother of two children, to whom the Romans have paid divine honours, according to the opinion of some, under the name of Lares. Ovid Fast 2, 599.

LARENTIA and LAURENTIA, a courtezan in the first ages of Rome. Vid Acca.

LARES, gods of inferior power at Rome, who presided over houses and families. They were two in number, sons of Mercury by Lara. (Vid Lara.) In process of time their power was extended not only over houses, but also over the country and the sea, and we find Lares Urbani to preside over the cities, Familiares over houses, Rustici over the country, Compitales over cross roads, Marini over the sea, Viales over the roads, Patellarii, &c. According to the opinion of some, the worship of the gods Lares, who are supposed to be the same as the manes, arises from the ancient custom among the Romans and other nations of burying their dead in their houses, and from their belief that their spirits continually hovered over the houses for the protection of the inhabitants. The statues of the Lares resembling monkeys, and covered with the skin of a dog, were placed in a niche behind the doors of the houses, or around the hearths. At the feet of the Lares was the figure of a dog barking, to intimate their care and vigilance. Incense was burned on their altars, and a sow was also offered on particular days. Their festivals were observed at Rome in the month of May, when their statues were crowned with garlands of flowers, and offerings of fruit presented. The word Lares seems to be derived from the Etruscan word Lar, which signifies a prince or leader. Ovid. Fast. 5, 129.—Juv 6, 8.—Plut in Quæst. Rom.—*Varro de L. LARGA, a well known prostitute in Juvenal's age. Juv. 4, 25.

LARGUS, a Latin poet who wrote a poem on the arrival of Antenor in Italy, where he built the town of Padua. He composed with ease and elegance. Ovid ex Pont 4, 16, 17.

LARIDES, a son of Daucus or Daunus, who assisted Turnus against Æneas, and had his hand cut off with one blow by Pallas the son of Evander. Virg. Æn 10, 391.

LARINA, a virgin of Italy, who accompanied Camilla in her war against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 11, 655.

LARINUM, a town of Apulia, which appears to have belonged once to the Frentani, from the name of Larinates Frentani attached to its inhabitants by Pliny. It was situate on the road which led from Picenum into Apulia. Its ruins, which are said to be considerable, occupy the site called Larrino Vecchio. Plin. 3, 12.—Liv. 22, 18.

LARISSA, a town of Syria on the western side of the Orontes, south-east of Apamea. It was either founded or else re-established by Seleucus Nicator. Pliny calls the inhabitants Larissæi. Appian. B. Syr. 57.—Plin 5, 23.——A town of Lydia, on the left bank of the Caystrus, 180 stadia from Ephesus. It had a famous temple of Apollo. Strab. 13.——A town on the coast of Troas, north of Colonæ and Alexandria Troas. Whether it is the same with the place assigned by Homer to the Pelasgi is uncertain. Strabo, however, decides in favour of the Larissa below Cumæ. Hom. Il. 2, 841.—Strab. 13.——A town Æolis, in Asia Minor, to the south east of Cumæ, and on the northern bank of the Hermus. Xenophon styles it the Egyptian Larissa, because it was said to have been one of the towns which Cyrus the elder gave to the Egyptians who had fought against him in the army of Crœsus. Strab. 13.—Xen. Cyrop. 7, 1, 45.——A city of Assyria, on the banks of the Tigris. The ten thousand found it deserted and in ruins. Xenophon states that it had been once inhabited by the Medes. Anab. 3, 4, 7.——An ancient and flourishing city of Thessaly, on the river Peneus, to the north-east of Pharsalus. Acrisius retired to this city, in order to avoid the death with which an oracle had menaced him; but taking part in the games here celebrated, he was killed by a blow from the discus of Perseus. Strab. 9.—Thucyd. 2, 32.—Herod 9, 58.—Polyb. 18, 16.——Cremaste, so called from the steepness of its situation, a city of Thessaly in the district Phthiotis, and south of Phthiotic Thebes. It lay in the dominions of Achilles, and it is probably from that circumstance that Virgil gives him the title of Larissæus, unless this epithet is a general one for Thessalicus. Strab 9.—Liv. 31, 46. 42, 56.——An old town of the Pelasgi in Attica, near mount Hymettus. Strab. 9.—— A town on the confines of Elis and Achaia. Xen. Hist. Gr. 3, 2, 17.——The acropolis of Argos, deriving its name from Larissa daughter of Pelasgus. Plut. Vit. Cleom.

LARISSÆUS Vid. Larissa.

LARISSUS, a river of Achaia, forming the line of separation between that country and Elis. It descends from mount Scollis, called by Homer the "Olenian rock." Its modern name is Rizo. Paus 7, 17.—Homer Il. 11, 757.—Strab. 8.

LARIUS, a lake of Cisalpine Gaul, north of the Po, and east of the Lacus Verbanus. Polybius, as Strabo reports, estimated its length at 300 stadia, and its breadth at thirty, or thirty-eight miles by four. Servius says, Cato reckoned sixty miles from one extremity to the other, and the real distance, including the lake of Chiavenna, is not short of that measurement; so that Virgil seems justified in saying, "Anne lacus tantos? te, Lari maxime"—This lake receives the Addua, or Adda, which again emerges from it, and pursues its course to the Po. The modern name is Lago di Como, from the modern Como, the ancient Comum. Throughout its whole extent, the banks of the lake are formed of precipitous mountains from two to three thousand feet in height, in some places dotted with luxuriant wood, and studded with hamlets and villas; in others, bare and craggy, and presenting the most varied and picturesque scenery. Strab. 4.—Virg. 2, 159.

LARONIA, a shameless courtezan in Juvenal's age. Juv. 2, 86.

LARS. Vid. Lar.

LARS TOLUMNIUS, a king of the Velentes, conquered by the Romans, and put to death, A. U. C 329. Liv. 4, 17 et 19.

LARTIUS FLORUS, T. a consul, who appeased a sedition raised by the poorer citizens, and was the first dictator ever chosen at Rome, B. C 498. He made Spurius Cassius his master of horse. Liv. 2, 18.——Spurius, one of the three Romans who alone withstood the fury of Porsenna's army at the head of a bridge, while the communication was cutting down behind them. His companions were Cocles and Herminius. (Vid. Cocles.) Liv. 2, 10 et 18.—Dionys. Hal. 5.—Val. Max 3, 2.——The name of Lartius has been common to many Romans.

LARVÆ, a name given to the wicked spirits and apparitions, which, according to the notions of the Romans, issued from their graves in the night, and came to terrify the world. As the word lar va signifies a mask, whose horrid and uncouth appearance often serves to frighten children, that name has been given to the ghosts or spectres, which superstition believes to hover around the graves of the dead. Some call them Lemures. Servius in Virg. Æn. 3, 64. 5, 152.

LASUS, a celebrated dithyrambic poet, born at Hermione in Argolis, and, according to some authorities, the instructor of Pindar. He was contemporary with Simonides, and flourished in the reign of Hipparchus at Athens, and in the reign of Darius. He was the first that introduced the dithyrambic measure into the celebrations at the Olympic games. The poet Archilochus, however, who was much older than Lasus, uses the word dithyrambus in two verses cited by Athenæus, so that Lasus could not have been the inventor of this species of measure. Thom Mag. Vit Pind.—Aristoph. Vesp 1401.—Herod 7, 6.—Athen 10.

LATAGUS, a king of Pontus, who assisted Ægtes against the Argonauts, and was killed by Darapes. Flacc. 5, 584.——One of the companions of Æneas, killed by Mezentius. Virg. Æn. 10, 697.

LATERANUS PLAUTUS, a Roman consul elect, A. D. 65. A conspiracy with Piso against the emperor Nero proved fatal to him. He was led to execution, where he refused to confess the associates of the conspiracy, and did not even frown at the executioner who was as guilty as himself. When a first blow could not sever his head from his body, he looked at the executioner, and shaking his head he returned it to the hatchet with the greatest composure and it was cut off.

LATERENSIS, M. a friend of Cicero's, of strong republican principles. He bore some of the offices of the state, and killed himself rather than join the party of Antony with Lepidus. Cic. Fam 8, 8. 10, 21 et 23. Att 2, 18.

LATERIUM, the villa of Q. Cicero at Arpinum near the Liris. Cic. ad Attic. 10, 1. 4, 7. Ad. fr. 3, 1.—Plin. 15, 15.

LATIÁLIS, a surname of Jupiter who was worshipped by the inhabitants of Latium upon mount Albanus at stated times. The festivals, which were first instituted by Tarquin the Proud, lasted fifteen days. (Vid. Feriæ Latinæ.)

LATINI, the inhabitants of Latium (Vid. Latium.)

LATINIUS LATIARIS, a celebrated informer, in the court of Tiberius. To gratify the passions of Sejanus, he procured the destruction of Sabinus, and on the fall of his infamous patron, he met the punishment which his perfidy deserved. Tacit. Ann. 4, 68. 6, 4.

LATINUS, a son of Faunus by Marica, king of the Aborigines in Italy, who from him were called Latini. He married Amata by whom he had a son and a daughter. The son died in his infancy, and the daughter, called Lavinia, was secretly promised in marriage by her mother to Turnus king of the Rutuli one of her most powerful admirers. The gods opposed this union, and the oracles declared that Lavinia must become the wife of a foreign prince. The arrival of Æneas in Italy seemed favourable to this prediction, and Latinus by offering his daughter to the foreign prince, and making him his friend and ally, seemed to have fulfilled the commands of the oracle. Turnus, however, disapproved of the conduct of Latinus, he claimed Lavinia as his lawful wife, and prepared to support his cause by arms. Æneas took up arms in his own defence, and Latium was the seat of the war. After mutual losses it was agreed that the quarrel should be decided by the two rivals, in single combat, and Latinus promised his daughter to the conqueror. Æneas obtained the victory and married Lavinia. Latinus soon after died and was succeeded by his son-in law Virg Æn. 9, &c.—Ovid Met. 13, 613 14, 449. Fast 2, 544. 6, 601.—Dionys H. 1, 13.—Liv 1, 1, &c.—Justin. 43, 1.——A son of Sylvius Æneas, surnamed also Sylvius. He was the fifth king of the Latins and succeeded his father. He was father to Alba his successor. Dionys H 1, 15.—Liv. 2, 3.——A son of Ulysses and Circe also bore this name. Servius, Æn 7, 47 12, 164.

LATIUM, a country of Italy, lying south of Etruria, from which it was separated by the Tiber. It comprehended the Campagna di Roma, and a considerable part of Terra di Lavoro. The appellation Latium has been said to have been derived from the word lateo, because Saturn lay hid there from the pursuit of his son; but others deduce it, probably with as little justice, from a prince of the country called Latinus. It was at first only applied to that part of Italy which was inhabited by the Latini and Rutuli; but subsequently, in the time of the consuls, it extended from the mouth of the Tiber to Sinuessa beyond the mouth of the Liris. The earliest inhabitants of Latium are said to have been the Sicani; they migrated from the banks of the Sicanus in Spain, and after having traversed certain parts of Italy, were driven from it into Sicily by the Aborigines, as were also the Siculi, who were of Ligurian origin and had been beaten out of Etruria by the Umbri and Tyrrheni-Pelasgi. The Aborigines intermixing with colonies of the latter people occupied Latium, and from them sprung the various communities of Latini, Rutuli, Volsci, and Hernici: the colony under Æneas which landed on this coast was of a later date. The northern part of Latium was inhabited by the Latini, Rutuli, and Hernici; the southern part by the Volsci and Ausones. Ovid. Fast. 1, 238.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, 5.—Virg. Æn. 8, 328. 11, 317.

LATMUS, a mountain of Caria near Miletus. It is famous for the residence of Endymion, whom Diana regularly visited in the night, whence he is often called Latmius Heros. (Vid. Endymion.) Mela, 1, 17.

LATOBIUS, the god of health among the Corinthians.

LATOBRIGI, a people of Belgic Gaul, in the vicinity of the Tulingi, Rauraci, and Helvetii, whose country lay on the banks of the Rhine, about ninety miles to the west of the Lacus Brigantinus, or Lake of Constance. If they are the nation called by Ptolemy Latobici, they must have changed their settlements before that geographer wrote, as he includes their territories in Pannonia near Noricum.

LATŌIS, a name of Diana, as being the daughter of Latona.

LATOMIÆ. Vid. Lautumiæ.

LATŌNA, a daughter of Cœus the Titan and Phœbe, or, according to Homer, of Saturn. She was admired for her beauty, and celebrated for the favours which she granted to Jupiter. Juno, always jealous of her husband's amours, made Latona the object of her vengeance, and sent the serpent Python to disturb her peace and to persecute her. Latona wandered from place to place in the time of her pregnancy, continually alarmed for fear of Python. She was driven from heaven, and Terra, influenced by Juno, refused to give her a place where she might find rest and bring forth. Neptune moved with compassion, struck with his trident, and made immovable the island of Delos, which before wandered in the Ægean, and appeared sometimes above, and sometimes below, the surface of the sea. Latona, changed into a quail by Jupiter, came to Delos, where she resumed her original shape, and gave birth to Apollo and Diana, leaning against the trunk of a palm or olive tree. Her repose was of short duration, Juno discovered the place of her retreat, and obliged her to fly from Delos. She wandered over the greatest part of the world, and in Caria, where her fatigue compelled her to stop, she was insulted and ridiculed by peasants of whom she asked for water, while they were weeding a marsh. Their refusal and insolence provoked her, and she intreated Jupiter to punish their barbarity, upon which they were all by the avenging god changed into frogs. She was exposed to repeated insults by Niobe, who boasted herself greater than the mother of Apollo and Diana, and ridiculed the presents which the piety of her neighbours had offered to Latona. (Vid Niobe.) Her beauty proved fatal to the giant Tityus, whom Apollo and Diana put to death. (Vid Tityus.) At last, Latona, though persecuted and exposed to the resentment of Juno, became a powerful deity, and saw her children receive divine honours. Her worship was generally established where her children received adoration, particularly at Argos, Delos, &c where she had temples. She had an oracle in Egypt, celebrated for the true decisive answers which it gave. Diod. 5.—Herod. 2, 155.—Paus. 2, 21. 8, 53.—Homer Il. 21. Hym. in Ap. et Dian.—Hesiod Theog. 405.—Apollod. 3, 5 et 10.—*Ovid. LATOPŌLIS, a city of Egypt in the Thebaid, between Thebes and Apollonopolis Magna. It derived its name from the fish Latos, which was found there in great abundance, and was the largest amongst all the fishes of the Nile. Its site is occupied by the modern Esneh. Athen. 7, 17.—Strab. 17.

LATŌUS, a name given to Apollo as son of Latona. Ovid. Met. 6. Fab. 9.

LATREUS, one of the Centaurs, who, after killing Halesus, was himself slain by Cæneus. Ovid. Met. 12, 463.

LAUDAMIA, a daughter of Alexander king of Epirus and Olympias, daughter of Pyrrhus, killed in a temple of Diana, by the enraged populace. Justin. 28, 3.—The wife of Protesilaus. Vid. Laodamia.

LAUREA TULLIUS, a freedman of Cicero, whose learning and genius the orator encouraged and admired. He wrote epigrams and other small pieces, commended for their ease and elegance, in which he did not fail to celebrate the liberality and the praises of his patron. Only ten verses are preserved of his compositions. Cic. in Epist.—Plin.

LAURĀCUM, a fortified town of Noricum Ripense, the station of a Roman fleet on the Danube, and the headquarters of the second legion. It lay to the east of the junction of the Ænus and Danube.

LAURENTALIA, certain festivals celebrated at Rome in honour of Laurentia, on the last day of April, and the 23d of December. They formed, in process of time, part of the Saturnalia. Ovid. Fast. 3, 57.

LAURENTES AGRI, the country in the neighbourhood of Laurentum. Tibul. 2, 5, 41.

LAURENTIA. Vid. Acca.

LAURENTINI, the inhabitants of Latium. They received this name from the great number of laurels which grew in the country. King Latinus found one of uncommon largeness and beauty, when he was going to build a temple to Apollo, and the tree was consecrated to the god, and preserved with the most religious ceremonies. Virg. Æn. 7, 59.

LAURENTUS, belonging to Laurentum or Latium. Virg Æn 10, 709.

LAURENTUM, the capital of Latium, about sixteen miles below Ostia, following the coast, and near the spot now called Paterno. It derived its name from its groves of bay-trees. It was once the residence of Latinus, Picus, and Faunus.—Strab. 5.—Mela. 2, 4.—Virg Æn. 7, 59 et 171.

LAURION, a range of hills, extending from that part of the Attic coast which lay near Azenia, below the Astypalea Promontorium, to the promontory of Sunium, and from thence to the neighbourhood of Prasiæ on the eastern coast. This tract was celebrated for its silver mines. The produce of these was shared among the Athenians, but at the advice of Themistocles, and during a war with Ægina, they applied it to the construction of 200 galleys, a measure which was the chief cause of their naval ascendancy.—Herod. 7, 143.—Thucyd. 2, 55.—Pyus. 1, 1.—Strab 9.

LAURON, a town of Spain, towards the eastern limits of Bætica, and not far from the sea, probably among the Bastitani. It has been supposed by some to be the modern Liria, five leagues from Valentia. It was this city of which Sertorius made himself master in the face of Pompey's army; and in its vicinity at a subsequent period, Cn. Pompeius, son of Pompey the Great, was slain after the battle of Munda. Plut. in Sert.—Flor 4, 2.—Cæs Bell. Hisp 37.

LAUS, a river of Lucania, flowing into the Sinus Laus, or gulf of Policastro, at the southern extremity of the province. It is now the Lao.—A town at the southern extremity of Lucania, at the mouth of the river Laus, and on the gulf of the same name. It was founded by the Sybarites. Its site seems to answer to that of Scalea.—Herod. 6, 20.—Strab. 6

LAUS POMPEIA, a town of Cisalpine Gaul, situate to the south-east of Mediolanum, near the Lambrus. It was founded by the Boii, and afterwards colonized by Pompeius Strabo, father of Pompey the Great. Plin. 3, 17.

LAUSUS, a son of Numitor and brother of Ilia. He was put to death by his uncle Amulius, who usurped his father's throne. Ovid Fast 1, 54.—A son of Mezentius, king of the Tyrrhenians, killed by Æneas in the war which his father and Turnus made against the Trojans. Virg Æn. 7, 649 10, 426, &c.

LAUTUMIÆ OR LATOMIÆ, a name properly signifying a quarry, and derived from the Greek λας, lapis, and τεμνω, seco. These were an ancient used as gaols for criminals. Dionysius had a place of this kind dug in a rock near Syracuse, where a great number of people were shut up. (Vide Dionysius.) Cicero reproaches Verres with imprisoning Roman citizens in Latomiæ. Latomia became in time a general name for a prison, and the prisoners inclosed in them were called latomarii.

LAVERNA, the goddess of thieves and dishonest persons at Rome. She did not only preside over robbers, called from her Lavernones, but she protected such as deceived others, or performed their secret machinations in obscurity and silence. Her worship was very popular and the Romans raised her an altar near one of the gates of the city, which from that circumstance was called the gate of Laverna. She was generally represented by a head without a body. Horat 1, ep, 16 60.—Varro de L. L. 4.

LAVERNIUM, a temple of Laverna, near Formiæ. Cic. Att 7, 8.

LAVINIA, a daughter of king Latinus and Amata. She was betrothed to her relation king Turnus, but because the oracle ordered her father to marry her to a foreign prince, she was given to Æneas after the death of Turnus (Vid Latinus.) At her husband's death she was left pregnant, and being fearful of the tyranny of Ascanius her son in law, she fled into the woods, where she brought forth a son called Æneas Sylvius. Dionys Hal. 1.—Virg Æn. 6, 760 7, 54.—Ovid Met. 14, 567.—Liv 1, 1.

LAVINIUM, a town of Latium, situate on the river Numicus, near the coast, and to the west of Ardea. It was said to have been founded by Æneas, on his marriage with Lavinia. Plutarch notices it as the place where Tatius, the colleague of Romulus, was murdered. Dion. Hal. 1, 45.—Liv 1, 1.—Plut. Vit Rom.

LAENA. an Athenian harlot. Vid Lamia.

LEANDER, a youth of Abydos, famous for his amours with Hero. Vid. Hero.

LEANDRIAS, a Lacedæmonian refugee of Thebes, who declared, according to an ancient oracle, that Sparta would lose the superiority over Greece when conquered by the Thebans at Leuctra. Diod 15.

LEARCHUS a son of Athamas and Ino, crushed to death against a wall by his father, in a fit of madness. (Vid. Athamas.) Ovid. Fast 6, 490.

LEBADEA, now Livadia, a city of Bœotia, west of Coronea, built on a plain adjacent to the small river Hercyne. It derived its name from Lebadus, an Athenian, having previously been called Midea. It was celebrated for the oracle of Trophonius, situated in a cave, into which those who sought responses were obliged to descend. It is remarkable for having given the modern name of Livadia to a great part of northern Greece. Strab. 9, 39. Herod, 1, 46. 8, 134.—Diod. Sic.

LEBEDUS, one of the twelve cities of Ionia, north-west of Colophon, on the coast. It was at first a flourishing city, but upon the removal of a large portion of its inhabitants to Ephesus by Lysimachus, it sank greatly in importance. In the time of Horace, it was deserted and in ruins. Its site is called Ecclesia, or Xenos. Paus 1, 9.—Strab 14.—Horat 1, ep, 1, 1, 7.

LEBENA a commercial town of Crete, with a temple sacred to Æsculapius. Paus 2, 26.

LEBINTHUS, an island in the Ægean sea, near Patmos. Strab 10. Ovid Met 6, 224.

LECHÆUM that part of Corinth which was situated on the sinus Corinthiacus, being distant from the city about twelve stadia, and connected with it by means of two long walls. It was the great emporium of Corinthian traffic with the western parts of Greece, as well as with Italy and Sicily. Strab 8.—Liv 32, 23.

LECTISTERNIA, festivals at Rome observed in times of public calamity. The gods were solemnly invited, and their images were placed on beds round the tables, whence their name. Those of the goddesses were seated in chairs without cushions underneath, to intimate the frugality and self denial of the matrons of ancient times. The first time this festival was observed, was 354 A. U. C. in consequence of the pestilential distemper which had visited Rome. It lasted eight days; and the gods particularly honoured were Neptune, Mercury, Hercules, Apollo, Latona, and Diana. During the celebration, the citizens kept open tables each according to his ability, and in the temples of the invited divinities a profusion of meats was served up at the expense of the republic for the ministers and officers of the gods. Liv 5, 13 7, 2 27, 4 40 19.—Val. Max. 2, 1.

LECTUM, a promontory of Troas below the island of Tenedos, now Cape Baba. It formed the northern limit, in the time of the eastern empire, of the province of Asia as it was termed, which commenced near the Mæander, and extended along the coast upwards to Lectum. Herod 9, 114.—Thucyd. 8, 101.—Liv 37, 37.

LEDA, a daughter of king Thespius and Furythemis who married Tyndarus, king of Sparta. She was seen bathing in the river Eurotas by Jupiter, when she was some few days advanced in her pregnancy, and the god, struck with her beauty, resolved to deceive her. He persuaded Venus to change herself into an eagle, while he assumed the form of a swan, and, after this metamorphosis, Jupiter, as if fearful of the tyrannical cruelty of the bird of prey, fled through the air into the arms of Leda, who willingly sheltered the trembling swan against the assaults of his superior enemy. The caresses with which the naked Leda received the swan enabled Jupiter to avail himself of his situation, and nine months after this adventure the wife of Tyndarus brought forth two eggs of one of which sprang Pollux and Helena, and of the other Castor and Clytemnestra. The two former were deemed the offspring of Jupiter and the others claimed Tyndarus for their father. Some mythologists attribute this amour to Nemesis, and not to Leda, and they further mention, that Leda was intrusted with the education of the children which sprang from the eggs brought forth by Nemesis (Vid Helena.) To reconcile this diversity of opinions, others maintain that Leda received the name of Nemesis after death. Homer and Hesiod make no mention of the metamorphosis of Jupiter into a swan, whence some have imagined that the fable was unknown to these two ancient poets, and probably invented since their age. Apollod 1, 8, 3, 10 —Ovid Met 6 109 —Hesiod. 17 55 —Hygin fab 77 —Isocr. in Hel —Homer Od 11 —Eurip. in Hel —A famous dancer in the age of Juvenal, Sat 6, 63.

LEDÆA an epithet given to Hermione, &c. as related to Leda. Virg Æn 3, 328

LEDUS now Lez, a river of Gaul near the modern Montpelier Mela, 2, 5

LEGIO a body of forces, of a number of which the Roman armies were chiefly composed The word comes from the Latin legere to choose, because, when Romulus instituted this body of troops, he chose a certain number from each tribe for that purpose. The number of soldiers of which the legion consisted was different at different times but it is impossible to determine the precise time and manner of their alteration In the time of Romulus the institutor of this corps, each legion contained 3000 foot and 300 horse These were divided into three bodies, which made so many lines of battle, each body consisting of ten companies. Under the consuls the legion consisted of 4000 or 4200 foot and 400 horse About the year of Rome 114, it was composed of 5000 foot, which was the number of a legion during Julius Cæsar's wars with the Gauls Under Augustus, each legion consisted of 6100 foot and 726 horse After his death they were reduced to 5000 foot and 600 horse. Under Tiberius, the legion was raised again to 6000 foot and 600 horse. In the time of Septimius Severus, the legion was composed of 7000 men under the following emperors, it was the same as it had been under Augustus Under Constantine a great reduction took place and the legion appears to have contained no more than 1000 or 1500 men The legion was generally divided, in the days of the republic, into ten cohorts, each cohort into three manipies and each manipie into two centuries The different kinds of infantry which composed it were the hastati, who were young men, and formed the first line deriving their name from the hasta or spear with which they were at first armed, the principes who were men in the vigour of life, and occupied the second line, being so called because they were originally the first line, and the triarii, who were old soldiers of approved valour, and stationed in the third line These last were also called pilani from the pilum or javelin which they used and the hast ati and principes, who stood before them antepilani The velites or light-armed soldiers, who fought in front, formed a fourth kind of troops. In the description of Cæsar's battle, however, there is no mention made of the soldiers being thus named and arranged, but only of a certain number of legions and cohorts which Cæsar generally drew up into three lines. In the battle of Pharsalia he formed a body of reserve, which he calls a fourth line, to oppose the cavalry of Pompey, which indeed determined the fortune of the day. In the time of Cæsar, first the bravest troops were generally placed in front, contrary to the ancient custom; an alteration which is ascribed to Marius. The constitution of the imperial legion may be described as follows The heavy armed infantry, which composed its principal strength, was divided into ten cohorts and fifty-five companies, under the orders of a correspondent number of tribunes and centurions The first cohort, which always claimed the post of honour and the custody of the eagle, was formed of 1105 soldiers, the most approved for valour and fidelity. The remaining cohorts consisted each of 555; and the whole body of legionary infantry amounted to 6100 men. In the first ages of the republic, four legions for the most part were annually raised, two to each consul, for two legions composed a consular army But often a greater number was raised. Augustus maintained a standing army of twenty-three or twenty-five legions, and this number was seldom diminished. In the reign of Tiberius there were twenty-seven legions, exclusive of the troops in Italy, and the forces of the allies, and the peace establishment of Adrian maintained no less than thirty of these formidable brigades. They were distributed over the Roman empire, and their stations were settled and permanent The peace of Britain was protected by three legions; sixteen were stationed on the banks of the Rhine and Danube, namely, two in Lower, and three in Upper Germany, one in Noricum, one in Rhætia, three in Mœsia, four in Pannonia, and two in Dacia. Eight were stationed on the Euphrates, six of which remained in Syria, and two in Cappadocia, while the remote provinces of Egypt Africa, and Spain, were guarded each by a single legion Besides these, the tranquillity of Rome was preserved by 20,000 soldiers, who, under the titles of city cohorts and of prætorian guards watched over the safety of the monarch and of the capital. The legions were distinguished by different appellations, and generally borrowed their name from the order in which they were first raised, as prima, secunda, tertia, quarta, &c Besides this distinction, another more expressive was generally added, as from the name of the emperor who embodied them, as Augusta Claudiana, Galbiana, Flavia, Ulpia, Trajana, Antonana, &c. from the provinces or quarters where they were stationed, as Britannica, Cyrenaica, Gallica, &c., from the provinces which had been subdued by their valour, as Parthica, Scythica, Arabica, Africana, &c; from the names of the deities whom their generals particularly worshipped as Minervia, Apollinaris, &c; or from more trifling accidents, as Martia, Fulminatrix, Rapax, Adjutrix, &c Each legion was divided into ten cohorts, each cohort into three manipuli, and every manipulus into two centuries or ordines. The chief commander of the legion was called legatus, lieutenant. The standards borne by the legions were various In the first ages of Rome a wolf was the standard, in honour of Romulus; after that a hog, because that animal was generally sacrificed at the conclusion of a treaty, and, therefore, it indicated that war is undertaken for the obtaining of peace. A minotaur was sometimes the standard, to intimate the secrecy with which the general was to act, in commemoration of the labyrinth. Sometimes a horse or boar was used, till the age of Marius, who changed all these for the eagle, a bird whose superior strength and greater size deservedly claims sovereignty over the feathered race The standard, therefore, supported a representation of that bird in silver, holding sometimes a thunderbolt in its claws, and the Roman eagle ever after remained in use, though Trajan made use of the dragon.

LEGIO SEPTIMA GEMINA, a Roman military colony in Spain among the Astures, north-east of Asturica It is now the modern Leon. Plin. 3, 3.

LEITUS or LETUS, a commander of the Bœotians at the siege of Troy He was saved from the victorious hand of Hector and from death by Idomeneus. Homer. Il. 2, 6 et 17.——One of the Argonauts, son of Alector. Apollod. 1.

LELAPS, a dog that never failed to seize and conquer whatever animal he was ordered to pursue. It was given to Procris by Diana, and Procris reconciled herself to her husband by presenting him with that valuable present. According to some, Procris had received it from Minos, as a reward for the dangerous wounds of which she had cured him. Hygin. fab 129.—Ovid. Met. 7, 771.—Paus. 9, 19.——One of Actæon's dogs. Ovid Met. 3, 211.

LELEGEIS, a name applied to Miletus, because once possessed by the Leleges. Plin 5, 29.

LELEGES, a collection of people from different nations, as the supposed etymology of their name, derived from λέγω, to gather, imports. They anciently occupied the territory adjoining to that of the people called by Homer Cilices or Cilicians; and when Achilles ravaged their country, which lay north-west of the gulf of Adramyttium, they passed over into Caria, and took possession of the environs of Halicarnassus. Their town was the metropolis of Caria, near Mylasa. They were a kind of robbers and vagabonds, who resembled the Cilicians in their disposition and manners. The first king of Laconia, according to Pausanias, was Lelex; and the country took the name of Lelegia from these people. Strab. 7 et 8.—Homer. Il. 21, 85.—Virg Æn. 8, 725.—Paus. 3, 1.

LELEX, an Egyptian, who came with a colony to Megara, where he reigned, about 200 years before the Trojan war. His subjects were called from him Leleges, and the place Lelegeon mœnia. Paus 3, 1.——A Greek, who was the first king of Laconia in Peloponnesus. His subjects were also called Leleges, and the country where he reigned Lelegia. Id.

LEMANIS PORTUS, or Lymo, a harbour of Britain, a little below Dover, where Cæsar is thought to have landed on his first expedition to this island, having set out from the Portus Itius in Gaul, a little south of Calais.

LEMANNUS, a lake in the country of the Allobroges. Its shape is nearly that of a crescent, the concave side of which is upwards of forty-five miles long. Its extreme breadth is about twelve miles, and its greatest depth about 1000 feet. Besides the Rhone, which traverses its whole length, it receives the waters of forty other streams. It is now called the lake of Geneva or Lausanne. Cæs. B. G. 1, 2 et 8.—Lucan. 1, 396.—Mela, 2, 5.

LEMNOS, an island in the Ægean sea, between Tenedos, Imbros, and Samothrace. It was sacred to Vulcan, called Lemnius pater, who fell there when kicked down from heaven by Jupiter (Vid. Vulcanus). It was celebrated for two horrible massacres; that of the Lemnian women murdering their husbands, (Vid. Hipsipyle,) and that of the Lemnians or Pelasgi, in killing all the children they had had by some Athenian women, whom they had carried away to become their wives. These two acts of cruelty have given rise to the proverb of Lemnian actions, which is applied to all barbarous and inhuman deeds. The first inhabitants of Lemnos were the Pelasgi, or rather the Thracians who were murdered by their wives. After them came the children of the Lemnian widows by the Argonauts, whose descendants were at last expelled by the Pelasgi, about 1400 years before the Christian era. Lemnos is about 112 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, who says, that it is often shadowed by mount Athos, though at the distance of eighty-seven miles. It has been called Hipsipylea, from queen Hipsipyle. It is famous for a certain kind of earth or chalk, called terra Lemnia, or terra sigillata, from the seal or impression which it can bear. As the inhabitants were blacksmiths, the poets have taken occasion to fix the forges of Vulcan in that island, and to consecrate the whole country to his divinity. Lemnos is also celebrated for a labyrinth, which, according to some traditions, surpassed those of Crete and Egypt. Some remains of it were still visible in the age of Pliny. The island of Lemnos, now called Stalimene, was reduced under the power of Athens by Miltiades, and the Carians, who then inhabited it, were obliged to emigrate. Virg. Æn. 8, 454.—*Homer. LEMURES, the manes of the dead. The ancients supposed that the souls after death, wandered all over the world, and disturbed the peace of its inhabitants. The good spirits were called Larres familiares, and the evil ones were known by the name of Larvæ, or Lemures. They terrified the good, and continually haunted the wicked and impious; and the Romans had the superstition to celebrate festivals in their honour, called Lemuria, or Lemuralia, in the month of May. They were first instituted by Romulus to appease the manes of his brother Remus, from whom they were called Remuria, and, by corruption, Lemuria. These solemnities continued three nights, during which the temples of the gods were shut, and marriages prohibited. It was usual for the people to throw black beans on the graves of the deceased, or to burn them, as the smell was supposed to be insupportable to them. They also muttered magical words, and, by beating kettles and drums, they believed that the ghosts would depart and no longer come to terrify their relations upon earth. Ovid. Fast 5, 421, &c.—Horat. 2, ep 2, 209.—Persius, 5, 185.

LEMURIA and LEMURALIA. Vid. Lemures.

LENÆUS, a surname of Bacchus, from ληνὸς, a wine press. There was a festival, called Lenæa, celebrated in his honour, in which the ceremonies observed at the other festivals of the god chiefly prevailed. There were, besides, poetical contentions, &c. Paus.—Virg. G. 2, 4. Æn. 4, 207.—Ovid Met. 4, 14.——A king of Pontus, said to have been left naked on the island of Leuce. Ovid Ib. 311

LENTULUS, a celebrated family at Rome, which produced many great men in the commonwealth. The most illustrious were L. Corn. Lentulus, a consul, A U C. 427, who dispersed some robbers who infested Umbria.——Batiatus Lentulus, a man who trained up some gladiators at Capua, who escaped from his school.——Corn. Lentulus surnamed Sura, joined in Catiline's conspiracy, and assisted in corrupting the Allobroges. He was convicted in full senate by Cicero, and put in prison, and afterwards executed.——A consul who triumphed over the Samnites.——Cn. Lentulus, surnamed Gætulicus, was made consul, A. D 26, and was, some time after, put to death by Tiberius, who was jealous of his great popularity. He wrote a history mentioned by Suetonius (Calig. 8.) and attempted also poetry.——L. Lentulus, a friend of Pompey, put to death in Africa.——P. Corn. Lentulus, a prætor, defeated by the rebellious slaves in Sicily.——Lentulus Spanthir, a senator who strongly promoted the recall of Cicero. He had the province of Cilicia, and endeavoured to be appointed to the restoring of Ptolemy to his throne. LEO, a native of Byzantium, who flourished 350 years before the Christian era. His philosophical and political talents endeared him to his countrymen, and he was always sent upon every important occasion as ambassador to Athens, or to the court of Philip king of Macedonia. This monarch, well acquainted with the abilities of Leo, was sensible that his views and claims to Byzantium would never succeed while it was protected by the vigilance of such a patriotic citizen. To remove him he had recourse to artifice and perfidy. A letter was forged, in which Leo made solemn promises of betraying his country to the king of Macedonia for money. This was no sooner known than the people ran enraged to the house of Leo and the philosopher, to avoid their fury, and without attempting his justification, strangled himself. He wrote some historical works, which are lost Phavorinus ascribes to him the dialogue entitled Alcyon, found among the works of Lucian. Plut. in Nicia. - Athen. 12.- Suidas ——Surnamed the Great, bishop of Rome, was born in Tuscany, [illegible] to the papacy A. D 440. He distinguished himself by his zeal against the Manicheans, Pelagians, and Priscillianists. When Attila marched against Rome, Leo met him, and prevailed upon him to return home. This pope afterwards saved the city also from being destroyed by Genseric. He died A. D. 461

LEOCORION, a monument and temple erected by the Athenians to Pasithea, Theope, and Eubule, daughters of Leos, who immolated themselves when an oracle had ordered that, to stop the raging pestilence, some of the blood of the citizens must be shed. Ælian. 12, 28.— Cic. N. D. 3, 19.

LEODAMAS, a son of Eteocles, one of the seven Theban chiefs who defended the city against the Argives. He killed Aglateus, and was himself killed by Alemæon. Apollod. 3.—A son of Hector and Andromache. Dictys Cret. 6.

LEON, a king of Sparta. Herod 7, 204.——A town of Sicily, near Syracuse. Liv. 24, 28.

LEONATUS, one of Alexander's generals. His father's name was Eunus. He distinguished himself in Alexander's conquest of Asia, and once saved the king's life in a dangerous battle. After the death of Alexander, at the general division of the provinces, he received for his portion that part of Phrygia which borders on the Hellespont. He was empowered by Perdiccas to assist Eumenes in making himself master of the province of Cappadocia, which had been allotted to him. Like the rest of the generals of Alexander he was ambitious of power and dominion. He aspired to the sovereignty of Macedonia, and secretly communicated to Eumenes the different plans which he meant to pursue to execute his designs He passed from Asia into Europe to assist Antipater against the Athenians, and was killed in a battle which was fought soon after his arrival. Historians have mentioned, as an instance of the luxury of Leonatus, that he employed a number of camels to procure some earth from Egypt to wrestle upon, as in his opinion, it seemed better calculated for that purpose. Plut. in Alex. - Curt. 3, 12. 6, 8.—C. Nep. in Eum.

LEONIDAS a celebrated king of Lacedæmon, of the family of the Eurysthenidæ, sent by his countrymen to oppose Xerxes, king of Persia, who had invaded Greece with about five millions of souls. He was offered the kingdom of Greece by the enemy, if he would not oppose his views; but Leonidas heard the proposal with indignation, and observed, that he preferred death for his country, to an unjust though extensive dominion over it. Before the engagement Leonidas exhorted his soldiers, and told them all to dine heartily as they were to sup in the realms of Pluto. The battle was fought at Thermopylæ, and the 300 Spartans who alone had refused to abandon the scene of action, withstood the enemy with such vigour, that the latter were obliged to retire wearied and conquered during three successive days, till Ephialtes, a Trachinian, had the perfidy to conduct a detachment of Persians by a secret path up the mountains, whence they suddenly fell upon the rear of the Spartans and crushed them to pieces. Two of the 300 Spartans, are said by Herodotus to have been afflicted with a violent disorder of the eyes, and with the permission of Leonidas to have left the camp previous to the day of the battle, and remained at Alpenus One of them, Eurytus, having heard of the circuit made by the Persians, called for his arms, met the enemy and was slain. The other one, Aristodemus, pusillanimously staid where he was, and after the battle returned to Sparta. Some assert that he was sent on business from the army, and might, if he had pleased have been present at the battle, but that he saved himself by lingering by the way. They add that his companion, employed on the same business, returned to the battle, and there fell. Aristodemus, on his return, was branded with infamy, no one would speak with him, no one would supply him with fire, and the opprobrious epithet of trembler (ὁ τρέσας) was annexed to his name; but he afterwards, at the battle of Platæa, effectually atoned for his conduct. This celebrated battle, which happened 480 years before the Christian era, taught the Greeks to despise the number of the Persians, and to rely upon their own strength and intrepidity. Temples were raised to the fallen hero, and festivals, called Leonidea, yearly celebrated at Sparta, in which freeborn youths contended. Leonidas, as he departed for the battle from Lacedæmon, gave no other injunction to his wife, but, after his death, to marry a man of virtue and honour, to raise from her children deserving of the name and greatness of her first husband. Herod 7, 120, &c.—*C. LEONTINI, a town of Sicily, situate about five miles from the sea-shore, on the south of Catana, between two small streams, the Lissus and Terias. It was built at the same time with Catana, by the Chalcidians, under the conduct of Theocles, an Athenian, in the first year of the 13th olympiad The adjacent territory was so fruitful, that it yielded, according to Pliny, crops of corn an hundred fold, and Cicero calls it the grand magazine of Sicily. Its wines were the most delicious of the whole island, but the inhabitants perverted the benefit into an occasion of intemperance, so that it became a proverbial saying, "the people of Leontini are always at their cups" This was the birth-place of the celebrated Gorgias Its quarrel with Syracuse led to the unfortunate expedition of the Athenians, whose aid the people of Leontini had solicited. The city at length fell under the Syracusan power. Thucyd. 6. – Plin. 18, 10.—Cic. in Verr. 5.

LEONTIUM, an Athenian courtezan, at one time noted for the licentiousness of her life, and afterwards distinguished by her application to the study of the Epicurean philosophy It is pretended that she did not desist from her intrigues after she commenced an attendant on Epicurus, but prostituted herself to the disciples of his school, and even to the philosopher himself It is not improbable, however, that she has been calumniated by these reports. She became the wife of Metrodorus, one of the chief disciples of Epicurus, and had a son by him, whom Epicurus commended to the notice and regard of his executors. Leontium applied with great diligence to the study of philosophy, and wrote, in defence of the Epicurean doctrines, against Theophrastus, one of the principal of the Peripatetic sect. The book is acknowledged by Cicero to have been written in a polite and elegant style, Cic. de Nat. D. 1, 33.

LEONTON or LEONTOPŌLIS, a town of Egypt, where lions were worshipped. Ælian. H An. 12, 7 —Plin. 5, 10.

LEOS, a son of Orpheus, who immolated his three daughters for the good of Athens. Vid. Leocorion.

LEOSTHENES, an Athenian general, who, after Alexander's death, drove Antipater to Thessaly, where he besieged him in the town of Lamia. The success which for a while attended his arms was soon changed by a fatal blow which he received from a stone thrown by the besieged, B. C. 323. The death of Leosthenes was followed by the total defeat of the Athenian forces The funeral oration over his body was pronounced at Athens by Hyperides, in the absence of Demosthenes, who had been lately banished for taking a bribe from Harpalus. (Vid Lamiacum Bellum.) Diod 17 et 18.

LEOTYCHIDES, a king of Sparta, son of Menares, of the family of the Proclida. He was set over the Grecian fleet, and, by his courage and valour, he put an end to the Persian war at the famous battle of Mycale. It is said that he cheered the spirits of his fellow soldiers at Mycale, who were anxious for their countrymen in Greece, by raising a report that a battle had been fought at Platæa, in which the barbarians had been defeated. This succeeded, and though the information was premature, yet a battle was fought at Platæa, in which the Greeks obtained the victory the same day that the Persian fleet was destroyed at Mycale. Leotychides was accused of a capital crime by the Ephori, and, to avoid the punishment which his guilt seemed to deserve, he fled to the temple of Minerva at Tegea, where he perished, B. C. 469, after a reign of twenty-two years. He was succeeded by his grandson Archidamus. Paus 3, 7 et 8 —— A son of Agis, king of Sparta, by Timæa. The legitimacy of his birth was disputed by some, and it was generally believed that he was the son of Alcibiades He was prevented from ascending the throne of Sparta by Lysander, though Agis had declared him upon his death-bed his lawful son and heir, and Agesilaus was appointed in his place. C. Nep. in Ages.—Paus. 3, 8.

LEPIDA, a noble woman, accused of attempts to poison her husband, from whom she had been separated for twenty years. She was condemned under Tiberius. Tacit. Ann 3, 22 ——Domitia, a daughter of Drusus and Antonia, great niece to Augustus, and aunt to the emperor Nero. She is described by Tacitus as a common prostitute, infamous in her manners, violent in her temper, and yet celebrated for her beauty. She was put to death by means of her rival Agrippina, Nero's mother. Tacit ——A wife of Galba the emperor

LEPIDUS, M. ÆMILIUS, a Roman, celebrated as being one of the triumvirs with Augustus and Antony. He was of an illustrious family, and like the rest of his contemporaries, he was remarkable for his ambition, to which were added a narrowness of mind, and a great deficiency of military abilities He was sent against Cæsar's murderers, and some time after he leagued with M. Antony, who had gained the hearts of his soldiers by artifice, and that of their commands by his address. When his influence and power among the soldiers had made him one of the triumvirs, he showed his cruelty, like his colleagues by his proscriptions, and even suffered his own brother to be sacrificed to the dagger of the triumvirate. He received Africa as his portion in the division of the empire. In dividing the Roman world between the members of the triumvirate, Lepidus was allowed a place chiefly by way of a connecting medium between the other two. After he had received Africa as his share, he brought a large force to Sicily, to aid Augustus in the war with Sextus Pompey, and shared in the victory obtained against that commander. The confidence he felt at being at the head of a large army, induced him to treat his colleague with haughtiness and neglect, but he had the mortification to see himself deserted by all his troops, who joined Augustus. He now supplicated his life of his rival, which being granted him, he retired into a kind of exile at Circeii, where he passed the remainder of his days in obscurity.——P. Æmilius, brother to the triumvir, placed at the head of the list which contained the names of those proscribed by the triumvirate. He was pardoned, however, and retired to Miletus, where he passed the rest of his days. Vell. Pat. 2, 67.——Son of the triumvir, who engaged in a conspiracy against Octavius. Mæcenas discovered the plot and had him put to death. Servilia, his wife, destroyed herself by swallowing burning coals. Vell Pat 2, 88.——M, a Roman officer, who obtained from Tiberius the command of a body of troops in the war against the Dalmatians and distinguished himself by his military skill and his valour. Vell. Pat. 2, 114, &c.——V. M, a companion of Caligula in his career of debauchery. The prince made him marry his sister Drusilla, and gave him hopes of being named as successor to the empire. Lepidus, however, who would seem to have reckoned but little after all on the promises of the emperor, conspired against him. The conspiracy was detected, and cost its author his life. He is supposed by some to have been the son of Julia, grand daughter of Augustus, and consequently cousin-german to Caligula. Tacit Ann 14, 2.

LEPONTII, a people of the Alps, near the source of the Rhone, on the south of that river. The Lepontine Alps separated Italy from the Helvetii. Cæs. B. Gall 4, 10.—Plin. 3, 20.—Strab. 4.

LEPTINES, a son of Hermocrates, and brother of Dionysius the elder. He was sent against Mago, general of the Carthaginians, with the whole fleet of the tyrant, B. C. 396. At first he gained some advantages, but having separated himself too much from the main body of the fleet, he was surrounded by the enemy, and lost a large number of his vessels. After having remained for some time in a state of disgrace, he recovered the favour of the tyrant, and married his daughter. He commanded the left wing at the battle of Cronium (B C. 383), where he fell fighting valiantly. His fall occasioned the defeat of the army. Plut.——A Syracusan, who, in conjunction with Callipus, took the city of Rhegium, occupied by the troops of Dionysius the younger. (351 B C) He was subsequently in the number of those who massacred this same Callipus, to avenge the death of Dion. Diod. Sic. 16, 45.——A tyrant of Apollonia and other cities of Sicily taken by Timoleon (B. C. 342) and exiled to Corinth.——An Athenian orator, who proposed that certain immunities from the burdensome offices of choragus, gymnasiarch, and hestiator, which used to be allowed to meritorious citizens, should be taken away. A law was passed in accordance with this. Demosthenes attacked it and procured its abrogation.——A Syrian, general of Demetrius, who put to death, at Laodicea, Octavius, a commissioner whom the Romans had sent into the east to arrange the affairs of Syria. He was sent to Rome to be delivered up, along with Isocrates, who was also a party to the murder, but the senate refused to receive him. Dod Sic. frag. 31.

LEPTIS, the name of two cities in Africa, distinguished by the epithets of Magna and Parva. The first was situate towards the Great Syrtis, at the south-east extremity of the district of Tripolis. It was founded by some Sidonians, who quitted their native city during a cabal, and it rose in the course of time to such importance, as to pay the Carthaginians, in whose territory it stood, a talent a day for tribute. It was the birth-place of the emperor Severus, and it was through him that, in later years, it obtained much of the favour bestowed upon it. It was destroyed about the seventh century, by the incursions of the Arabs, and it is now nothing but a heap of ruins. Its modern name is Lebida. The latter was in the district of Byzacium, or Emporiæ, about eighteen miles below Hadrumetum, on the coast. It is now Lempta. Lucan. 2, 251.—Plin. 5, 19.—Sallust Jug 77.—Mela, 1, 8.

LERINA, or PLANASIA, a small island in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, south of Nicæa. It is now St Marguerite.

LERNA, a country of Argolis, celebrated for a grove and a lake, where, according to the poets, the Danaides threw the heads of their murdered husbands. It was there also that Hercules killed the famous hydra. Virg. Æn. 6, 803. 12, 517.—Mela, 2, 3.—Ovid. Met. 1, 597.—Hist. Th. 4, 638.—Apollod. 2, 15.——There was a festival, called Lernæa, celebrated there in honour of Bacchus, Proserpine, and Ceres. The Argives used to carry fire to this solemnity from a temple upon mount Crathis, dedicated to Diana. Paus. 2, 3.

LEROS, a small island off the coast of Caria, and forming one of the cluster called Sporades. It was peopled from Miletus, and very probably belonged to that city. Strabo gives its inhabitants a character for dishonesty. Plin. 5, 31.—Strab 14.

LESBONAX, a philosopher of Mitylene, in the first century of the Christian era. A treatise ascribed to Lesbonax, "De Figuris Grammaticis," was printed at Leyden in 1739; and there are two Greek orations bearing his name, printed by Aldus in 1513.

LESBOS, now Metelin an island of the Ægean, lying off the coast of Mysia, at the entrance of the gulf of Adramyttium. It has been severally called Ægira, Lasia, Æthiope, and Pelasgia, from the Pelasgi by whom it was first peopled, Macaria, from Macareus who settled in it, and Lesbos, from the son-in-law and successor of Macareus, who bore the same name. The chief cities of Lesbos were Methymna and Mitylene. Lesbos was originally governed by kings, but it was afterwards subjected to the neighbouring powers. The wine which it produced was greatly esteemed by the ancients, and still is in the same repute among the moderns. The Lesbians were celebrated among the ancients for their skill in music, and their women for their beauty, but the general character of the people was so dissipated, that the epithet Lesbian was frequently applied to licentious extravagance. Lesbos has given birth to many illustrious persons, such as Arion, Terpander, &c. The best verses were by way of eminence often called Lesboum carmen, from Alcæus and Sappho, who distinguished themselves for their poetical compositions, and were also natives of the place. Dod 5.—Strab. 13—Virg. G. 2, 90.—Horat. 1, ep. 11, 1.—Herod 1, 160

LESBUS, or LESBOS, a son of Lapithas, grandson of Æolus, who married Mythymna daughter of Macareus. He succeeded his father-in law, and gave his name to the island over which he reigned.

LESCHES, a Greek poet of Lesbos, who flourished B C 600. Some suppose him to be the author of the little Iliad, of which only few verses remain, quoted by Pausanias, 10, 25.

LETHE, one of the rivers of hell, whose waters the souls of the dead drank after they had been confined for a certain space of time in Tartarus It had the power of making them forget whatever they had done, seen, or heard before, as the name implies λήθη, oblivion. There was also a river of that name in Spain Its true name, however, was the Bello, according to Strabo, or, according to Ptolemy, the Limius It was in the territory of the Callaci, a little below the Minius Its name Lethe, (or, as it should be rather termed ὁ τῆς λήθης, the river of forgetfulness) was given to it from the circumstance of the Celtæ and Turduli, who had gone on an expedition with united forces, losing here their common commander, becoming disunited, forgetting the object of their expedition, and returning to their respective homes. There was so much superstitious dread attached to this stream, that Brutus, in his expedition against the Callaci, could with great difficulty induce his soldiers to cross.

LEUCA, a town of Italy, in the country of the Salentini, and in the vicinity of the Iapygian promontory. Lucan. 5, 376.

LEUCÆ, a town of Ionia, west of the mouth of the Hermus, at the entrance of the Smyrnæus Sinus. It was situate on a promontory, which, according to Pliny, was anciently an island. Near this place, Aristonicus, the pretender to the crown of Pergamus, was defeated by the Roman consul Perperna. Plin. 5, 29.—Mela, 1, 17.

LEUCAS, or LEUCADIA, an island in the Ionian sea, now called Santa Maura, off the coast of Acarnania, famous for a promontory called Leucate, where desponding lovers threw themselves into the sea Sappho had recourse to this leap to free herself from the violent passion which she entertained for Phaon. The word is derived from λευκὸς, white, on account of the whiteness of its rocks. Apollo had a temple on the promontory, whence he is often called Leucadius. The island was formerly joined to the continent by a narrow isthmus, which the inhabitants dug through after the Peloponnesian war. Ovid Heroid. 15, 171.—Strab. 6, &c.—Ital. 15, 392—Virg. Æn. 3. 274 8, 677.

LEUCASPIS, a Lycian, one of the companions of Æneas, drowned in the Tyrrhene sea. Virg. Æn. 6, 334.

LEUCATE Vid. Leucas

LEUCE, an island in the Euxine sea, near the mouth of the Borysthenes. According to the poets, the souls of the ancient heroes were placed there as in the Elysian fields, where they enjoyed perpetual felicity, and reaped the repose to which their benevolence to mankind, and their exploits during life, seemed to entitle them. From that circumstance it has often been called the island of the blessed, &c. According to some accounts Achilles celebrated there his nuptials with Iphigenia, or rather Helen, and shared the pleasures of the place with the manes of Ajax, &c. Mela, 2, 7.——Q. Calab. 3, 773.—— One of the Oceanides whom Pluto carried into his kingdom. She died there, and the god to preserve her memory, raised a poplar tree in the Elysian fields, to which he gave her name. Servius ad Virg. Ecl 7, 61.

LEUCI, a people in the south-eastern quarter of Gallia Belgica, and to the south of the Mediomatrici. They are much commended for their skill in darting and shooting. Their principal town was Tullum, now Toul, on the Moselle. Cæs. B. G. 2, 13.—Turit Hist. 1, 64.—Plin. 4, 17. ——Mountains in the western part of the island of Crete, appearing at a distance like white clouds whence the name Strab. 10.

LEUCIPPE, one of the Oceanides

LEUCIPPIDES, the daughters of Leucippus Vid Leucippus.

LEUCIPPUS a philosopher of considerable eminence in the fifth century B. C The ancients are not agreed upon the place of his birth, but according to Diogenes Laertius, it took place at Elea All accounts, however, concur in attributing to him the first idea of the system of atoms, which was improved by his disciple Democritus, and adopted by Epicurus. He wrote a treatise concerning nature, now lost; and dissatisfied with the metaphysical subtleties of the Eleatic school, resolved to examine the real constitution of the material world, and inquire into the mechanical properties of bodies. His great object was to restore the alliance between reason and the senses, for which purpose he suggested the doctrine of indivisible atoms, having within themselves a principle of motion. By the help of this principle, a feeble and fanciful effort was made to account for the production of all natural bodies from physical causes, without the intervention of Deity, although it is not certain, that either he or his disciples intended to discard the notion of a divine nature from the universe Diog. Laert. 9. 30.—Cic. N. D. 1, 42.—Plut. de Plac Phil. 2, 7. 3, 12 ——A son of Perieres and Gorgophone. He was brother of Tyndareus king of Sparta, and married Philodice daughter of Inachus, by whom he had two daughters, Hilaira and Phœbe, known by the patronymic of Leucippides. They were carried away by their cousins Castor and Pollux, as they were going to celebrate their nuptials with Lynceus and Idas Ovid Fast. 5, 701.—Apollod 3, 10, &c. — Paus 3, 17 et 26 ——A son of Xanthus, descended from Bellerophon. He became deeply enamoured of one of his sisters, and when he was unable to restrain his unnatural passion, he resolved to gratify it He acquainted his mother with it, and threatened to murder himself if she attempted to oppose his views or remove the object of his affection. The mother, rather than lose a son whom she tenderly loved, cherished his passion, and by her consent her daughter yielded herself to the arms of her brother. Some time after the father resolved to give his daughter in marriage to a Lycian prince The future husband was informed that the daughter of Xanthus secretly entertained a lover, and he communicated the intelligence to the father. Xanthus upon this secretly watched his daughter, and when Leucippus had introduced himself to her bed, the father, in his eagerness to discover the seducer, occasioned a little noise in the room. The daughter was alarmed, and as she attempted to escape, she received a mortal wound from her father, who took her to be the lover. Leucippus came to her assistance, and stabbed his father in the dark, without knowing who he was. This accidental parricide obliged Leucippus to fly from his country. He came to Crete, where the inhabitants refused to give him an asylum, when acquainted with the atrociousness of his crime, and he at last came to Ephesus, where he died in the greatest misery and remorse. Hermesianax apud Parthen. 7.——A son of Œnomaus, who became enamoured of Daphne, and to obtain her confidence disguised himself in a female dress, and attended his mistress as a companion. He gained the affections of Daphne by his obsequiousness and attention, but his artifice at last proved fatal through the influence and jealousy of his rival Apollo, for when Daphne and her attendants were bathing in the Ladon, the sex of Leucippus was discovered, and he perished by the darts of the females. Parthen. Erotic 15.—Paus. 8. 20.——A son of Hercules by Marse, one of the daughters of Thespius. Apollod. 2. 7.

LEUCON, a tyrant of Bosphorus, who lived in great intimacy with the Athenians. He was a liberal patron of the useful arts, and greatly encouraged commerce. Dind. 14.

LEUCONOE, a daughter of Lycambes. The Leuconoe to whom Horace addresses his 1 od. 11, seems to be a fictitious name.——A nymph who relates the amours of Sol, &c. Ovid. Met. 4. 168.

LEUCOPETRA, a cape of Italy, in the territory of the Bruttii, and regarded by all ancient writers on the geography of that country, as the termination of the Apennines. Its modern name is Capo dell' Armi. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, 10.

LEUCOPHRYS, a temple of Diana, with a city of the same name, near the Mæander. The goddess was represented under the figure of a woman with many breasts, and crowned with victory.—An ancient name of Tenedos. Paus. 10, 14.

LEUCOSIA, a small island in the Sinus Pestanus. It was said to have derived its name from one of the Sirens. Dionysius calls it Leucasia. It is now known by the name of Licosa, and sometimes by that of Isola piana. Lycophr. 722, &c.—Strab. 6.—Dion. 1, 53.

LEUCOSYRII, the Greek form of a name applied by the Persians to the Cappadocians, and signifying White Syrians. The Persians called the Cappadocians by this appellation, because they considered them to be a branch of the great Syrian nation from the resemblance of their language, customs, and religion, and because they found that they possessed a fairer complexion than their swarthy brethren of the south. The Greek colonies on the coast of Pontus received this name from the Persians, and expressed it by the forms of their own language, but, in its application, restricted it to the inhabitants of the mountainous country, lying along the coast from the Promontorium Jasonium in the east, to the mouth of the Halys in the west, while they called the people in the interior of the country by the name of Cappadocians. The Leucosyri became in time blended into one people with the Paphlagonians. Herod. 1. 72. 5, 49. 7. 72.—Strab. 12.

LEUCOTHOE or LEUCOTHEA, the name of Ino the wife of Athamas, changed into a sea deity. (Vid. Ino.) She was called Matuta by the Romans, who raised her a temple, where all the people, particularly women, offered vows for their brother's children. They did not intreat the deity to protect their own children, because Ino had been unfortunate in hers. No female slaves were permitted to enter the temple; or if their curiosity tempted them to transgress this rule, they were beaten away with the greatest severity. To this supplicating for other people's children, Ovid alludes in these lines; Fast. 6.

Non tamen hanc pro stirpe sua pia mater adorat,
Ipsa parum felix in sua fasse parens.

Her divinity was also implored by sailors, to protect them against storms and the perils of the sea. Homer. Od. 5, 333.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 15 et 19. Tusc. 1, 11.—Ovid. Fast. 6, 545.—Plut. Symp. 5. Quæst 3.—Paus 1, 42.——A daughter of king Orchamus by Eurynome. Apollo became enamoured of her, and to introduce himself to her with greater facility, he assumed the shape and features of her mother. Their happiness was complete, when Clytia, who tenderly loved Apollo, and was jealous of his amours with Leucothoe, discovered the whole intrigue to her father, who ordered his daughter to be buried alive. The lover, unable to save her from death, sprinkled nectar and ambrosia on her tomb, which penetrating as far as the body, changed it into a beautiful tree which bears the frankincense. Ovid. Met 4, 196

LEUCTRA, a small town of Bœotia, south-east of Thespiæ, and west of Platææ, famous for the victory which Epaminondas the Theban general obtained over the superior force of Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, on the 8th of July, B. C 371. In this famous battle, 4000 Spartans were killed with their king Cleombrotus, and no more than 300 Thebans. From that time the Spartans lost the empire of Greece, which they had obtained for near 500 years. Paus. 9, 14.—Strab. 9.—Xen. Hist Gr. 6, 4.—Plut. Vit. Epam.

LEUCTRUM, a town of Messenia, on the coast, sixty stadia from Cardamyle. It was said to have been founded by Pelops. Its site still retains the name of Leutro. Paus. 4, 26.—Strab. 8.——A small town of Achaia, on the Sinus Corinthiacus, above Ægium, and in the vicinity of Rhypæ, on which latter place it was dependent. Paus 7, 24.——A town of Arcadia, below Megalopolis. Paus. 8, 27.

LEUCUS, one of the companions of Ulysses, killed before Troy by Antiphus son of Priam. Homer Il 4, 491.

LEUCYANIAS, a river of Peloponnesus, flowing into the Alpheus. Paus. 6, 21.

LEVANA, a goddess of Rome, who presided over the action of the person who took up from the ground a newly born child, after it had been placed there by the midwife. This was generally done by the father, and so religiously observed was this ceremony, that the legitimacy of a child could be disputed without it.

LEVINUS. Vid. Lavinus.

LEXOVII, a people of Gaul in Lugdunensis Secunda, near the mouth of the Sequana, and on its left banks. Their capital was Noviomagus now Lisieux. Cæs. B G. 3, 9.

LIBANIUS, a celebrated Greek sophist or rhetorician, was born of an ancient family at Antioch, about A. D 314. From his youth he devoted himself to literature, and pursued his studies at Athens. After he had finished his education, he collected disciples, and made himself known by various rhetorical compositions.

His reputation was high, both at Constantinople and Nicomedia, in which latter city he attracted the attention of Julian, who became acquainted with his writings, and imitated his style and manner. The jealousy of his rivals pursued him from place to place, until he finally returned to Antioch, when, about A D 360, he became preceptor to Basil and John Chrysostom, afterwards so celebrated in the Christian church On the accession of Julian he was invited by that emperor to a station near his person, which with true philosophic dignity he declined, but necessarily became warmly attached to a prince, who paid him so much attention. Julian admitted him to the equality of a literary friend, and is thought to have had his assistance in some of his own compositions. The death of that emperor was, therefore, a severe stroke upon Libanius, who had flattered himself with the restoration of the heathen worship and philosophy from his exertions. He survived to an advanced age, endangered by supposed disaffection to the succeeding emperor, and annoyed by the jealousy of rivals. The time of his death is not known, but he mentions the seventy sixth year of his age, A. D 390 The writings of Libanius are numerous, and many of them have reached posterity They are characterized by Gibbon as "for the most part the vain and idle compositions of an orator who cultivated the science of words, the productions of a recluse student, whose mind, regardless of his contemporaries, was incessantly fixed on the Trojan war, and the Athenian common wealth." Of the works of Libanius, two vols folio, Gr. and Lat were published at Paris, 1606—1627. These contain his declamations, orations, and dissertations, with his life, a vain and prolix narrative, written by himself The best collection of his epistles is that of Wolf, Amsterdam, folio, 1738.

LIBANUS, a chain of mountains in Syria, deriving their name from their white colour, the eastern part in particular being covered with perpetual snow. Some make the range commence from Mons Amanus, on the confines of Cilicia, and give the general name of Libanus to the entire chain of mountains running thence to the south; it is more accurate however, to make it begin near Aradus in Phœnicia, and, after forming the northern boundary of that country, run to the south, and end near Sidon. The western part of this chain of mountains is properly called Libanus; the eastern part is Antilibanus, and the valley between is Cœlosyria. Libanus consists of four ridges of mountains, which rise one above the other; the first of these is very fertile in grain and fruit; the second is barren and rocky, producing nothing but briers and thorns; the third, though still higher, is said to enjoy a constant verdure and spring, its gardens and orchards producing such a variety of herbs, fruits, &c that it hath been styled an earthly paradise; the last and loftiest is uninhabitable, by reason of its excessive coldness, being covered with deep snow almost all the year Libanus was celebrated for its cedars. Strab 6.

LIBENTINA, a surname of Venus, who had a temple at Rome, where the young women used to dedicate the toys and childish amusements of their youth, when arrived at nubile years. Varro L L 5, 6

LIBER, a surname of Bacchus, which signifies free. He received this name from his delivering some cities of Bœotia from slavery, or according to others, because wine, of which he was the patron, delivered mankind from their cares, and made them speak with freedom and unconcern. The word is often used for wine itself. Senec de Tranq. Anim

LIBERA, a goddess, the same as Proserpine. Cicero speaks of Liber and Libera as children of Ceres, to whom the Romans paid every mark of adoration. Cic in Ver 4, 48 et 53, 5, 14, N D 2, 24 ——A name given to Ariadne by Bacchus, or Liber, when he had married her. Ovid Fast. 3, 513

LIBERALIA, festivals yearly celebrated in honour of Bacchus the 17th of March. Young men then put on the toga virilis, and slaves were permitted to speak with freedom, and every thing bore the appearance of independence. They were much the same as the Dionysia of the Greeks Ovid Fast. 3, 713.—Cic. Ep ad Fam 12, 25. Ep ad Att. 14, 10

LIBERTAS, a goddess of Rome, who had a temple on mount Aventine, raised by T Gracchus, and improved and adorned by Pollio with many elegant statues and brazen columns, and a gallery in which were deposited the public acts of the state. She was represented as a woman in a light dress, holding a rod in one hand, and a cap in the other, both signs of independence, as the former was used by the magistrates in the manumission of slaves, and the latter was worn by slaves, who were soon to be set at liberty. Sometimes a cat was placed at her feet, as this animal is very fond of liberty, and impatient when confined. Liv 24, 16. 25, 7.—Ovid. Trist. 3, 1, 72.—Plut in Otac.

LIBETHRA, a town of Macedonia, situate on the declivity of Olympus, and not far from the tomb of Orpheus Paus. 9 ,30 ——A fountain of Thessaly, on mount Homole, in the district of Magnesia, at the northern extremity. Plin 4, 9. —Mel, 2, 3

LIBETHRIDES, a name given to the Muses. Vid Libethrius

LIBETHRIUS a mountain of Bœotia, forty stadia to the south of Coronea, and forming one of the summits of Helicon. It was sacred to the Muses and the nymphs called Libethrides. Paus. 9, 34.—Strab 9 ——A fountain on mount Libethrius.

LIBITINA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over funerals. According to some, she is the same as Venus, or rather Proserpine. She had a temple at Rome, where was lodged a certain piece of money for every person who died, whose name was recorded in a register called Libitinæ rotio. This practice was established by Servius Tullius, in order to obtain an account of the number of annual deaths in the city, and consequently the rate of increase or decrease of its inhabitants. Dionys. Hal 4.—Liv. 40, 19.— Val. Max 5, 2.— Plut Quæst. Rom.

LIBON, a Greek architect who built the famous temple of Jupiter Olympius. He flourished about 450 years before the Christian era.

LIBOPHŒNICES, the inhabitants of the district Byzacium, in Africa Propria. Their name indicates that they were a mixture of Libyans and Phœnicians. Diod. Sic. 20, 55.—Plin. 5, 4

LIBURNIA, a province of Illyricum, along the Adriatic sea, over against Italy, between Dalmatia on the south, and Istria on the north. Zara, anciently Iadera, and afterwards Diodora, was once its capital The ruins of Burnum, the Liburnia of Strabo, are to be seen on the right bank of the Titius, or Kerka, in the desert of Bukovina. The Liburnians were an Illyrian tribe, and their country now answers to part of Croatia. They are supposed to have sent forth a part of their number to Italy, and to have descended as far south as Iapygia, dividing into three tribes, the Iapyges, the Peucetii, and the Calabri. Some make them the most ancient inhabitants of Italy. The galleys of the Liburnians were remarkable for their light construction and swiftness, and it was to ships of this kind that Augustus was in a great measure indebted for his victory over Antony at Actium. Hence, after that time, the name of naves Liburnæ was given to all quick-sailing vessels, and few ships were built but of that construction The Liburnians were a stout, able-bodied race, and were much employed at Rome as porters, and sedan, or litter-carriers. Hence Martial, in describing the pleasures of a country life, exclaims, "procul horridus Liburnus." Strab 6 et 7.—Plin 3, 13.—Dio Cass. 29, 32.—*Hurat. LIBURNIDES, islands off the coast of Liburnia, said to amount to the number of forty. Strab 7.

LIBURNUM MARE, the sea which borders on the coasts of Liburnia.

LIBURNUS, a chain of mountains near Apulia, crossed by Hannibal in his march from Samnium and the Peligni into Apulia Polyb. 3, 101

LIBYA, a daughter of Epaphus and Cassiopea, who became mother of Agenor and Belus by Neptune Apollod 2, 1, 3, 1.—Paus 1, 44.—The name given by the Greek and Roman poets to what was otherwise called Africa In a more restricted sense the name has been applied to that part of Africa which contained the two countries of Cyrenaica and Marmarica, together with a very extensive region in the interior, of which little, if any thing, was known, and which was generally styled Libya Interior. From the word Libya, are derived the epithets of Libys Libystus, Libyus, Libystis, Libycus, Libystinus, Libystinus, Libystenus. Virg. Æn. 4, 106. 5, 37 Lucan 4.—Sallust &c LIBYCUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean which lies on the coast of Cyrene.

LIBYSSA, a small village of Bithynia, west of Nicomedia, on the northern shore of the Sinus Astacenus. It is rendered memorable for containing the tomb of Hannibal; whence, no doubt, its name. It is supposed to correspond with the modern Maldyrn, a few miles to the south of Ghebze. Plut. Vit. Flamin.—Ammian. Marcell. 22, 9.

LICATES, a people of Vindelicia, on the eastern bank of the Licus, in the modern Oberdonaukreis, to the north-east of Füssen. Plin. 3, 20

LICHADES, small islands near Cæneum, a promontory of Eubœa, called from Lichas. Vid Lichas. Ovid Met. 9, 153 et 218.

LICHAS, a servant of Hercules who brought him the poisoned tunic from Dejanira He was thrown by his master into the sea with great violence, and changed into a rock in the Euboean sea, by the compassion of the gods. Ovid. Met. 9, 211.

LICINIA LEX, was enacted by L Licinius Crassus, and Q. Mutius, consuls, A. U. C. 657. It ordered all the inhabitants of Italy to be enrolled on the list of citizens in their respective cities. —Another, by C. Licinius Crassus the tribune, A U. C. 608 It transferred the right of choosing priests from the college to the people It was proposed, but did not pass.—Another, by C. Licinius Stolo, the tribune. It forbade any person to possess 500 acres of land, or keep more than 100 head of large cattle, or 500 of small —Another, by P. Licinius Varus, A. U. C 545, to settle the day for the celebration of the Ludi Apollinares, which was before uncertain. —Another, by P. Licinius Crassus Dives. B. C. 110. It was the same as the Fannian law, and farther required that no more than thirty asses should be spent at any table on the calends, nones, or nundinæ, and only three pounds of fresh and one of salt meat, on ordinary days. None of the fruits of the earth were forbidden. —Another, de sodalitiis, by M. Licinius the consul A U. C. 692 It imposed a severe penalty on party clubs, or societies assembled or frequented for election purposes, as coming under the definition of ambitus, and of offering violence in some degree to the freedom and independence of the people.—Another, called also Æbutia, by Licinius and Æbutius the tribunes. It enacted, that when any law was proffered with respect to any office or power, the person who proposed the bill, as well as his colleagues in office, his friends and relations, should be declared incapable of being invested with the said office or power.

LICINIA, the wife of C Gracchus, who attempted to dissuade her husband from his seditious measures by a pathetic speech. She was deprived of her dowry after the death of Caius.—A vestal virgin accused of incontinence, but acquitted, A U C. 630.—Another vestal, put to death for her lasciviousness under Trajan —The wife of Mæcenas, distinguished for conjugal tenderness. She was sister to Proculeius, and bore also the name of Terentia. Horat. Od. 2, 12, 13.

LICINIUS, C. a tribune of the people, celebrated for the consequence of his family, for his intrigues and abilities. He was a plebeian, and was the first of that body who was raised to the office of a master of horse to the dictator. He was surnamed Stolo, or useless sprout, on account of the law which he caused to be enacted during his tribuneship. By this law no person was permitted to hold more than 500 acres of land, it being alleged, that when more was held by one proprietor, he would not have leisure to grub up the useless sprouts which grew from the roots of the trees. He afterwards carried a law which permitted the plebeians to share the consulate, dignity with the patricians, A. U. C. 388. He reaped the benefit of this law, and was one of the first plebeian consuls This law was proposed and passed by Licinius, as it is reported, at the instigation of his ambitious wife, daughter of M. Fabius Ambustus, who was jealous of her sister, who had married a patrician, and who seemed to be of a higher dignity in being the wife of a consul. Liv. 6, 34.—Plut.—C. Calvus, a celebrated orator and poet in the age of Cicero. He distinguished himself by his eloquence in the forum, and his poetry, which some of the ancients have compared to Catullus. His orations are greatly commended by Quintilian. Some believe that he wrote annals quoted by Dionysius of Halicarnassus. He died in the thirtieth year of his age. Quintil.—Cic. in Brut. 81.—Macer, a Roman accused by Cicero when prætor. He derided the power of his accuser, but when he saw himself condemned he grew so desperate that he killed himself. Val.—P. Crassus, a Roman, sent against Perseus king of Macedonia. He was at first defeated, but afterwards repaired his losses and obtained a complete victory, &c ——A consul sent against Annibal.——Another, who defeated the robbers that infested the Alps ——Caius Imbrex, a comic poet in the age of Africanus, preferred by some in merit to Ennius and Terence. His Nævia and Neæra are quoted by ancient authors, but of all his poetry only two verses are preserved Aul. Gell ——Crassus. (Vid Crassus)——Mucinianus, a Roman who wrote about the history and geography of the eastern countries, often quoted by Pliny He lived in the reign of Vespasian ——P. Tegula, a comic poet of Rome, about 200 years before Christ. He is ranked as the fourth of the best comic poets which Rome produced Few lines of his compositions are extant. He wrote an ode which was sung all over the city of Rome by nine virgins during the Macedonian war Liv. 31, 12 ——Muræna (Vid. Muræna)——C. Flavius Valerianus, a celebrated Roman emperor. His father was a poor peasant of Dalmatia and himself a common soldier in the Roman armies His valour had recommended him to the notice of Galerius Maximianus, who had once shared with him the inferior and subordinate offices of the army, and had lately been invested with the imperial purple by Diocletian Galerius loved him for his friendly services, particularly during the Persian war, and he showed his regard for his merit by taking him as a colleague in the empire, and appointing him over the province of Pannonia and Rhætia. Constantine, who was also one of the emperors, courted the favour of Licinius, and made his intimacy more durable by giving him his sister Constantia in marriage, A. D. 313. The continual successes of Licinius, particularly against Maximinus, increased his pride, and rendered him jealous of the greatness of his brother-in-law. The persecutions of the Christians, whose doctrines Constantine followed, soon caused a rupture, and Licinius had the mortification to lose two battles, one in Pannonia, and the other near Adrianopolis. Treaties of peace were made between the contending powers, but the restless ambition of Licinius soon broke them; and after many engagements a decisive battle was fought near Chalcedonia. Ill fortune again attended Licinius, he was conquered, and fled to Nicomedia, where the conqueror soon obliged him to surrender, and to resign the imperial purple. The tears of Constantia obtained a doubtful forgiveness for her husband, but Constantine knew what a turbulent and active enemy had fallen into his hands, therefore he ordered him to be strangled at Thessalonica, A D 324 His wretched family shared his fate. The avarice, licentiousness, and cruelty of Licinius, are as conspicuous as his misfortunes He was an enemy to learning, and this aversion totally proceeded from his ignorance of letters, and the rusticity of his education. His son by Constantia bore also the same name. He was honoured with the title of Cæsar, when scarce twenty months old. He was involved in his father's ruin, and put to death by order of Constantine.

LICINUS, a barber and freedman of Augustus, raised by his master to the rank and dignity of a senator, merely because he hated Pompey's family. Horat Art. P. 301.

LICYMNIUS, a son of Electryon and brother of Alcmena. He was so infirm in his old age, that when he walked, he was always supported by a slave. Triptolemus, son of Hercules, seeing the slave inattentive to his duty, threw a stick at him, which unfortunately killed Licymnius The murderer fled to Rhodes. Apollod. 2. 7.

LIGARIUS, Q a Roman deservedly popular as pro-consul of Africa, after Confidius. In the civil wars he followed the interest of Pompey, but by the interest of his friends he was pardoned when Cæsar had conquered his enemies Cæsar, however, and his adherents were determined upon the ruin of Ligarius, and Tubero was engaged to criminate him, but Cicero, by an eloquent oration, still extant, defeated his accusers, and he was acquitted. He became afterwards one of Cæsar's murderers. Cic. pro Lig.—Plut. in Cæsar.

LIGER, a Rutulian killed by Æneas. Virg Æn 10, 576

LIGER or LIGERIS, now La Loire, the largest river of Gaul, rising in Mons Cebenna, or Cevennes, and running first north, and then west, into the Sinus Aquitanicus, or Bay of Biscay. Cæs B. G. 3, 9 7, 5.—Lucan 1, 439

LIGURES, the inhabitants of Liguria. Vid. Liguria

LIGURIA, a country of Italy, bounded on the south by the sea, on the west by the Alps as far as the source of the Po, on the north by the Po, and on the east by the country of the Anamani, and by the little river Macra. It comprehended Genoa, that part of Piedmont which is south of the Po, and the greater part of the Imperial Fiefs of Pontremoli The Ligures, called by the Greeks Ligyes and Ligustæ, were probably of Celtic origin; they were a wild, unpolished, and deceitful people, although possessed of sufficient courage to resist the invasions of the Romans for a long period of years. Their dominions extended at one time from the Arnus to the Rhodanus, and in an earlier age as far westward as Spain. Strab 4.—Polyb. 2, 16 3, 60 —Thucyd 6. 2.—Liv. 40, 38 41, 12.—*Cic. LILÆA, a town of Achaia near the Cephissus Stat Theb 7, 348.

LILYBÆUM, a city of Sicily on the western coast south of Drepanum, and near a famous cape called also Lilybæum, now Cape Boeo. It was the principal fortress of the Carthaginians in Sicily, and the only city which resisted Pyrrhus, when he passed into the island. It had a port, which the Romans, in one of their sieges, endeavoured vainly to stop up. Its modern name is Marsala. Diod. Sic. 13, 54 22, 14.—Polyb. 1 41, &c —Cic. in Ver 5 ——The western one of the three famous capes of Sicily, now Cape Boeo. Strab. 6.

LIMNÆUM, a temple of Diana at Limnæ, from which the goddess was called Limnæa, and worshipped under that appellation at Sparta and in Achaia The Spartans wished to seize the temple in the age of Tiberius, but the emperor interfered and gave it to its lawful possessors the Messenians. Paus. 3, 14. 7, 20.—Tacit. Ann. 4, 43.

LIMNATIDIA, a festival in honour of Diana, surnamed Limnatis, from Limnæ, a school of exercise at Traezene, where she was worshipped; or from λίμνη, ponds, because she presided over fishermen LINDUM, a town of Britain, the capital of the Coritani, and on the main road from Londinum to Eboracum. It is now Lincoln.

LINDUS, now Lindo, a city on the eastern coast of the island of Rhodes, founded by Cercaphus son of Sol and Cydippe. Hercules had there a celebrated temple and likewise Minerva, which last had been built by the Danaides. Lindus is not only famed for the foundation of Gela in Sicily, by one of its colonies, but it gave birth to Cleobulus, one of the seven wise men, and to Chares and Laches, who were employed in making and finishing the famous Colossus of Rhodes. Strab. 14.—Homer Il. 2, 163.—Mela, 2, 7.—Plin. 34.—Herod. 7, 153.——A grandson of Apollo. Cic. de Nat D 3, 21.

LINGONES, a people of Gaul whose territories included Vogesus, Vosges, and consequently the sources of the rivers Mosa, or Meuse, and Matrona, or Marne. Their chief city was Andomadunum, afterwards Lingones, now Langres. Cæs. B. G. 1, 26.——A Gallic tribe in Gallia Cisalpina, occupying the extreme eastern portion of Gallia Cispadana. They were a branch of the Transalpine Lingones. Their capital was Ravenna. Polyb. 2, 17.

LINUS, a native of Chalcis, a son of Apollo and Terpsichore; according to others, of Amphimarus and Urania; and, according to others again, of Mercury and Urania. Apollodorus makes him a brother of Orpheus. The age of Linus is fixed by Archbishop Usher 1200 years before the Christian era. Eusebius speaks of him as having flourished before Moses. Herodotus represents him as being celebrated among the Egyptians from still more remote periods. He is mentioned by Homer, in the eighteenth book of the Iliad, or, at least, is understood to be commemorated by a hard introduced among the pictures on the shield of Achilles; and is said to have added the string Ichanos to the Mercurian lyre. Diodorus Siculus represents him as being the inventor of music and of poetry, or, at least, as having first introduced these arts into Greece. He is said also to have written treatises on religious rites, and to have composed a work in honour of Bacchus. The most common report of his death is that he taught Hercules to play upon the lyre, and was so enraged at the dulness or inattention of his pupil, that he struck him, which so incensed the youthful hero that he seized the lyre, and beat out the brains of his master. According to Diogenes Laertius, however, he was killed by Apollo for presuming to boast of equal merit with that deity. —— A son of Lycaon. Apollod. 3, 8, 1.

LIODES, one of Penelope's suitors, killed by Ulysses. Homer. Od. 21, 144. 22, 310.

LIPARA, the largest of the Æolian islands on the coast of Sicily, now called the Lipari. It had a city of the same name, which according to Diodorus it received from Liparus the son of Auson, king of these islands, whose daughter Cyane was married by his successor Æolus, according to Pliny. The inhabitants of this island were at one time powerful by the sea, and long withstood the attacks of the Etruscans. From the great tributes which they paid to Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, they may be called very opulent. The island was celebrated for the variety of its fruits, and its raisins are still in general repute It had some convenient harbours, and a fountain whose waters were much frequented on account of their medicinal powers. According to Diodorus, Æolus reigned at Lipara before Liparus. Ital. 5, 24.—Plin. 3, 9. —Ital. 11, 87.—Virg Æn 1, 56. 8, 416.—Mela, 2, 7. Strab 6.

LITHOBOLIA, a festival celebrated at Trœzene in honour of Lamia and Auxesia, who came from Crete, and were sacrificed by the fury of the seditious populace, and stoned to death. Hence the name of the solemnity, Λιθοβολια, lapidation.

LITHUBIUM, a town of Liguria. Liv 32, 29.

LITYERSAS, an illegitimate son of Midas king of Phrygia. He made strangers prepare his harvest, and afterwards put them to death. He was at last killed by Hercules. Theocrit. Id 10.

LIVIA, DRUSILLA, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of L. Drusus Calidianus. She married Tiberius Claudius Nero, by whom she had the emperor Tiberius and Drusus Germanicus. The attachment of her husband to the cause of Antony was the beginning of her greatness. Augustus saw her as she fled from the danger which threatened her husband, and he resolved to marry her, though she was then pregnant. He divorced his wife Scribonia, and, with the approbation of the augurs, he celebrated his nuptials with Livia. She now took advantage of the passion of Augustus, in the share that she enjoyed of his power and imperial dignity. Her children by Drusus were adopted by the complying emperor; and that she might make the succession of her son Tiberius more easy and undisputed, Livia is accused of secretly involving in one common ruin, the heirs and nearest relations of Augustus. Her cruelty and ingratitude are still more strongly marked, when she is charged with having murdered her own husband, to hasten the elevation of Tiberius. If she was anxious for the aggrandizement of her son, Tiberius proved ungrateful, and hated a woman to whom he owed his life, his elevation, and his greatness. Livia died in the eighty sixth year of her age, A. D. 29. Tiberius showed himself as undutiful after her death as before, for he neglected her funeral, and expressly commanded that no honours, either private or public, should be paid to her memory. Tacit. Ann. 1, 3. Suet. in Aug. et Tib.—Dion Cass.—Another. Vid Drusilla.

LIVIA LAWS, proposed by M. Livius Drusus, a tribune A. U. C. 663, about transplanting colonies to different places in Italy and Sicily, and granting corn to poor citizens at a low price; also, that the judices should be chosen indifferently from the senators and equites, and that the allied states of Italy should be admitted to the freedom of the city. Drusus was a man of great eloquence, and of the most upright intentions; but, endeavouring to reconcile those whose interests were diametrically opposite, he was crushed in the attempt, being murdered by an unknown assassin at his own house, upon his return from the forum, amidst a number of clients and friends. No inquiry was made about his death. The states of Italy considered this event as a signal of revolt, and endeavoured to extort by force what they could not obtain voluntarily. Above 300,000 men fell in the contest in the space of two years. At last the Romans, although upon the whole they had the advantage, were obliged to grant the freedom of the city, first to the allies, and afterwards to all the states of Italy. Appian de Bell. Civ. 1, 373, &c.—Vell. Pat. 2, 13, &c.—Flor. 3, 18.

LIVIUS, ANDRONICUS, a dramatic poet, who flourished at Rome about 240 years before the Christian era. He was the first who attempted to compose a drama in verse, which he himself sang and acted, while a player on the flute accompanied him in unison to keep him in tune. He was encored and obliged to repeat his pieces so often, that he lost his voice; and being unable to sing or declaim any longer, he was allowed to have a slave to sing, while he only acted the part behind him. Hence came the custom of dividing the declamation or melody of the piece, with which the Roman people were extremely delighted. Liv. 7, 2.—Cic Br. 18.—Horat Ep 2, 1.——M. Salinator, a Roman consul sent against the Illyrians. The success with which he finished the campaign, and the victory which some years after he obtained over Asdrubal, who was passing into Italy with a reinforcement for his brother Annibal, show how deserving he was to be at the head of the Roman armies. His surname of Salinator arose from his imposing an odious tax on salt while censor. Liv. 27, 46, &c.——Drusus, a tribune. (Vid Livius Leges.)——Titus, an eminent Roman historian, was a native of Patavium, and sprang from a family which had given several consuls to the Roman republic. He came to Rome in the reign of Augustus, and appears to have shared in the society of several persons of rank, including the emperor himself. He first made himself known by some literary dialogues; but his reputation is principally built upon his history of Rome, from the foundation of the city to the death of Drusus, in one hundred and forty two books. It was received with extreme applause, and no great was the fame of the author, during his life-time, that Pliny the younger mentions the journey of a Spaniard from Gades to Rome, in order to see Livy, and who, having gratified his curiosity, immediately departed. On the death of Augustus, he returned to Patavium, where he was received with every testimony of honour and respect, and where he died in the fourth year of the reign of Tiberius, at the age of seventy-six. Of Livy's history, unfortunately, only thirty-five books are extant, consisting of the first, third, fourth, and half of the fifth decades; but an epitome of the whole, with the exception of two books, is preserved, which however, gives no more than the heads of the matter. The history of Livy is highly praised by all the posterior Roman writers, and especially by Seneca, Pliny the elder, and Quintilian. His descriptions are singularly lively and picturesque; and there are few specimens of oratory superior to that of many of the speeches with which his narratives are copiously interspersed. He possesses not the philosophic spirit of Tacitus, and has been charged with credulity in recording the vulgar prodigies of every year, which, however, there is reason to believe, was merely in compliment to a prevailing custom. His style has been censured by Asinius Pollio as not entirely free from Patavinity, by which phrase it is presumed was meant the provincialism of his native country; and some modern critics have very uselessly employed themselves in endeavouring to detect the vestiges of this defect. The deep regret of men of letters, for the loss of so great a portion of his history, has instigated to much imposture in the way of pretended discovery, all of which has been ultimately detected. The best editions, of his remains are, that of Crevier, 6 vols. 4to, Paris, 1735-41; that of Drakenborch, 7 vols 4to, Amst. 1738-46, that of Ruddiman, 4 vols. 12mo, Edin. 1751; that of Ernesti, 4 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1769—1804, that of Homer, 6 vols. 8vo, Lond 1794; and that of Stroth, improved by Doering, 7 vols. 12mo, Goth. 1796—1813. Livy has been translated into English by Baker. Senec. Ep 100.—Suet. Claud. 41.—Plin. Ep 2, 3 et 8.—Tacit. Ann. 4, 34.—Quintil. 2, 5, 8; 1, 10, 1, &c.——A LOCRIS, a man who conspired against Alexander with Dymnus, &c. Curt 6, 7.

LOCRI, a people of Greece. The Greeks comprehended under the name of Locri three distinct tribes, surnamed Ozolæ, Epicnemidii, and Opuntii, who were all descended from the Leleges. The Locri Ozolæ occupied a narrow tract of country, situated on the northern shore of the Corinthian gulf, commencing at the Rhodian, Rhium, and terminating near Crissa To the west they touched upon Æolia, to the north upon Doris, and to the east upon Phocis. They are said to have been a colony from their more eastern brethren, and to have derived their name from the Greek word ὄζω olco, owing to the waters issuing from mount Taphiassus having been rendered fetid, in consequence of the centaur Nessus having been buried there. They are characterized as a wild and uncivilized race, addicted to theft and rapine The Locri Epicnemidii and Opuntii are generally classed under the common name of Locri. They occupied a small district between mount Cnemis and the Euboean sea, from Thermopylæ to the southern shores of the Sinus Opuntius now the Gulf of Talanda. They touched to the west on Phocis, and to the south on Bœotia The Epicnemidii derived their name from their situation under mount Cnemis, and they alone of all the Locrians were permitted to send members to the Amphictyonic council. The Locri Opuntii were so called from Opus, their metropolis Strab. 7 et 9.—Plut Quæst Græc 15. Thucyd 1, 5.—Hom. Il 2, 530.——A people of Magna Græcia, originally a colony of the Locri Opuntii from Greece. They first settled near the promontory Zephyrium, at the lower extremity of Bruttium, on the Ionian sea, and hence obtained the appellation of Epizephyrii, by which they were distinguished from the Locri of Greece. Here they built the city of Locri They removed, however, from this position, three or four years afterwards, and built another city on a height, named mount Esopis. Strabo, however, makes the Locri who settled in Bruttium to have been a division of the Ozolæ from the Crisæan gulf, and remarks, that Ephorus was incorrect in ascribing the settlement to the Locri Opuntii; but it is certain that this opinion of Ephorus seems to be supported by the testimony of many other writers, and, therefore, is generally preferred by modern critics. *Virg. LOCUSTA, a celebrated woman at Rome in favour with Nero. She poisoned Claudius and Britannicus, and at last attempted to destroy Nero himself, for which she was executed. Tacit Ann. 12. 66. &c.—Suet. in Ner. 33.

LOCUTIUS. Vid. Aius.

LOLLIA PAULLINA, a beautiful woman, daughter of M. Lollius, who married C. Memmius Regulus, and afterwards, after being forcibly divorced, Caligula. She was again divorced by the capricious monarch, and when proposed for wife to the emperor Claudius she was through envy put to death by means of Agrippina. Tacit. Ann. 12, 1, &c.—Plin. 9, 35.

LOLLIANUS SPURIUS, a general proclaimed emperor by his soldiers in Gaul, and soon after murdered, &c

LOLLIUS, M. a companion and tutor of C. Cæsar the son-in-law of Tiberius He was consul A. U. C. 733, and offended Augustus by his rapacity in the provinces Horace has addressed two of his epistles to him, but the partiality and regard of the poet seem to have been ill bestowed on a man, who, to a great violence of temper, united traitorous designs against the honour of his country. Lollius died a natural death, though Pliny mentions that he poisoned himself. Hor. Ep. 1, 2 et 18.—Dio. 54, 20.—Plutarc. 2, 97 et 103. —Plin 9, 35.

LONDINUM, or Londinium, called also Augusta, a city of the Trinobantes, in Britain, now London The place appears to have had a very remote antiquity, and already existed in the time of Cæsar, though, in consequence of his march being in a different direction, it remained unknown to him. Tacitus speaks of it as a place of great commerce, and, indeed, its favourable situation for trade must have given the place a very early origin Ancient Londinum is thought to have occupied that part of the modern city which lies on the north of the Thames, near the site of the present church of London. As, however, Ptolemy assigns it to the Cantii, many have been led to decide in favour of the borough of Southwark, on the south side of the river, or rather to the part immediately west of this, especially as here many remains of antiquity have been found. It is most probable, however, that Londinum lay on both sides of the river. Amm Marc 27, 10.—Tacit, Ann 14, 33.

LONGARENUS, a man guilty of adultery with Fausta, Sylla's daughter. Horat. Sat. 1, 2, 67.

LONGIMANUS, a surname of Artaxerxes the I., in Greek Μακρόχειρ. Plutarch states that this appellation was given him because his right hand was longer than his left, but Strabo says that he was so called from the extraordinary length of his arms, which on his standing straight could reach his knees. Strab., 15.

LONGINUS, Dionysius, a celebrated Greek philosopher and critic of Athens. After residing for some time in this seat of literature, he was invited to assume the honourable office of preceptor of the Greek language, to the children of Zenobia, the famous queen of Palmyra. whose secretary and confidential minister he soon became, but his ardent zeal and spirited activity in the cause, proved, at last, fatal to him. When the emperor Aurelian approached victorious the gates of Palmyra, Longinus returned to his summons a spirited letter which roused his severest indignation. The fortune of Rome prevailed, but when the city at last opened her gates, Zenobia and her secretary endeavoured to escape, but in vain. Dragged into the presence of the conqueror, the unfortunate queen forgot the heroism of her former character, and revealed that Longinus was the author of the letter which derided the attempts of the Roman arms. Aurelian could conquer but not forgive, and Longinus was immediately led to execution, and shamefully sacrificed to the fury of the Roman soldiers, A. D. 373. At the moment of death he showed himself great and resolute, and with a philosophical and unparalleled firmness of mind, he even repressed the tears and sighs of the spectators who pitied his miserable end. Among the numerous writings of Longinus, his treatise Περὶ Ὕψους ("On the Sublime,") is the only one remaining, and that in a mutilated state. It has always been greatly admired for its elevation of language and of sentiment; and Pope characterizes its author as being "himself the great sublime he draws." Much obscurity, however, dwells on his precepts, and he is rather to be praised for a lively sensibility to literary beauties, than for accuracy of investigation into their nature and causes. He is one of the few ancients who appear to have been acquainted with the Jewish Scriptures. The best editions of the treatise Περὶ Ὕψους are, that of Toup, Oxon. 1778, 8vo, and that of Weiske, Lips 1809, 8vo, re printed at London, 1820. Dr Smith has translated it faithfully into English.——Cassius, a tribune driven out of the senate for favouring the interest of J Cæsar. He was made governor of Spain by Cæsar, &c ——A lawyer whom, though blind and respected, Nero ordered to be put to death, because he had in his possession a picture of Cassius, one of Cæsar's murderers. Juv. 10, 16 —— A friend of the orator Antonius, well skilled in the history, politics, and jurisprudence of his country *Cic. LONGOBARDI. Vid. Langobardi.

LONGULA, a town of Latium on the borders of the Volsci. Liv. 2, 33 et 39. 9, 39.

LONGUNTICA, a maritime city of Hispania Tarraconensis Liv. 22 20.

LONGUS, author of a romance in Greek prose, entitled Ποιμενικὰ ("Pastorals"), and relating the loves of Daphnis and Chloe, is supposed to have lived as late as the reign of Theodosius the Great; but nothing is known of him, nor is he mentioned by any of the ancients. His work is a curious specimen of that kind of composition in its simplest form, and contains many descriptive beauties; but some of its scenes are such as the lowest modern writer would scarcely venture to paint. The best editions are, that of Villoison, Paris, 1778, 2 vols. 8vo, and that of Schaefer, Lips. 1803, 18mo.

LORYMA, a town of Doris. Liv 37, 17.

LOTIS or LOTUS, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Neptune. Priapus offered her violence, and to save herself from his importunities she implored the gods, who changed her into a tree called Lotus, consecrated to Venus and Apollo. Ovid. Met 9, 348

LOTOPHAGI, a people on the coast of Africa near the Syrtes. They received this name from their living upon the lotus. Ulysses visited their country at his return from the Trojan war. Homer says that whoever ate of the lotus lost all wish of returning home, and became desirous of remaining in the land that produced it. Homer. Od. 9, 94 —Herod 4, 177.—Plin. 5, 7. 13, 17.

LUA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over things which were purified by lustrations, whence the name (a luendo) She is supposed to be the same as Ops or Rhea Liv 8, 1. 45. 33

LUCA, a city of Etruria, north-east of Pisa, on the river Auser, or Serchio. It still preserves its situation and name. Liv. 21, 59. 41, 13.—Cic. ad Fam. 1, 9.

LUCANIUS, Q a centurion in Cæsar's army, &c Cæs. Bell G. 5.

LUCANUS, M. ANNÆUS, a native of Corduba in Spain. His father, Annæus Mela, a Roman knight, was the youngest brother of Seneca, the philosopher. He was early removed to Rome, where his rising talents and more particularly his lavished praises and panegyrics, recommended him to the emperor Nero. This intimacy was soon productive of honour, and Lucan was raised to the dignity of an augur and quæstor before he had attained the proper age. The poet had the imprudence to enter the lists against his imperial patron; he chose for his subject Orpheus, and Nero took the tragical story of Niobe. Lucan obtained an easy victory, but Nero became jealous of his poetical reputation, and resolved upon revenge. The insults to which Lucan was daily exposed, provoked at last his resentment, and he joined Piso in a conspiracy against the emperor. The whole was discovered, and the poet had nothing left but to choose the manner of his execution. He had his veins opened in a warm bath, and as he expired he pronounced with great energy the lines which, in his Pharsalia, (3 639—642,) he had put into the mouth of a soldier, who died in the same manner as himself. Some have accused him of pusillanimity, at the moment of his death, and say that, to free himself from the punishment which threatened him, he accused his own mother, and involved her in the crime of which he was guilty. This circumstance, which throws an indelible blot upon the character of Lucan, is not mentioned by some writers, who observe that he expired with all the firmness of a philosopher. He died in his twenty-sixth year, A D 65. Of the various poems of Lucan, the Pharsalia alone has reached modern times. This is an unfinished piece, relating the causes and events of the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey. Its title to the name of an epic poem has been disputed by some critics, who deem a supernatural agency essential to that species of composition. As to the merits of the poetry itself there are various opinions. Lucan certainly possesses neither the fire of Homer, nor the melodious numbers of Virgil. If he had lived to a maturer age, his judgment as well as his genius would have been improved, and he might have claimed a more exalted rank among the poets of the Augustan age. His expressions, however are bold and animated, his poetry entertaining, and it has been asserted that he was never perused without the warmest emotions by any whose minds were in unison with his own. The best editions of Lucan are, that of Cortius, Lips. 1726, 8vo, re-edited and completed by Weber, Lips 1828, 2 vols. 8vo; that of Oudendorp, Lugd. Bat. 1728, 2 vols 4to; that of Burmann, Lugd. Bat. 1740, 4to; and that published at Glasgow, 1816, with the notes of Bentley and Grotius. He has been translated into English verse by Rowe.——Ocellus, a Lucanian philosopher. Vid. Ocellus.

LUCARIA or LUCERIA, festivals at Rome, celebrated in a large grove between the Via Salaria and the Tiber, where the Romans hid themselves when besieged by the Gauls. Tacit Ann 1, 77.

LUCCEIUS, L. a celebrated historian, author of a history of the Marsic war, and of the civil wars of Marius and Sylla. Cicero, who knew and admired his abilities, requested him to give to the world a history of his consulship. He favoured the cause of Pompey, but was afterwards pardoned by J. Cæsar. Nothing of his compositions remains besides a consolatory letter to Cicero on the death of his daughter. *Cic. fl. LUCIANUS, a distinguished Greek writer, was a native of Samosata, the capital of Comagene, on the banks of the Euphrates. He was born in the reign of Trajan, or, as some think, early in that of Adrian His birth was lowly, and his father not being able to educate him, placed him under his brother in-law, to be brought up a sculptor Having contracted a disgust for this employment, he withdrew from his master, and went to Antioch, where he engaged in literary studies, and embraced the profession of a pleader Wearied, however, with the contention of the bar, he confined himself to the practice of eloquence as a sophist or rhetorician, in which capacity he visited several foreign countries, particularly Greece, Italy, Spain, and Gaul. The emperor M. Aurelius was sensible of his great merit, and appointed him register to the Roman governor of Egypt. He died about the year A. D. 180, when he had attained the great age of ninety. The works of Lucian, which are numerous, and written in the Attic dialect, consist partly of dialogues, in which he introduces differentcharacters, with much dramatic propriety. His style is easy, simple, elegant, and animated, and he has stored his compositions with many lively sentiments, and much of the true Attic wit. His frequent obscenities, and his vulgar manner of exposing to ridicule almost every kind of religion, have drawn upon him the censure of moralists in all ages. The best editions of Lucian are that of Hemsterhuys, completed by Reitz, Amst. 1750 36. 4 vols. 4to, edited in a more complete manner by Gesner, Amst 1743, 3 vols. 4to, and to which must be added the Lexicon Lucianeum of C. R. Reitz, brother to the former, Ultraj. 1746, 4to; that of the Bipont editors, 1789-93, 10 vols. 8vo; and that of Lehman, Lips. 1822-25, of which five volumes have appeared. Lucian has been translated into English, by Carr, Franklin, and Tooke.

LUCIFER, the name of the planet Venus, or morning star. It is called Lucifer, when appearing in the morning before the sun; but when it follows it, and appears some time after its setting, it is called Hesperus. According to some mythologists, Lucifer was son of Jupiter and Aurora, and he had the care of harnessing the horses of Apollo Hesiod. Th. 381 —Virg Æn. 2, 801.—*Ovid. He refused to join in communion with those Arian bishops who renounced their errors; and being followed in this resolution by some other prelates, he formed a sect of Separatists, who were called by his name Yet the church of Rome has enrolled him in the catalogue of saints. He died A D. 370. His works were printed at Paris, in 1568; and at Venice, in 1780, folio.

LUCILIUS, C a Roman poet was born at Suessa in the country of the Aurunci, about B C. 148. He was of a good family and was grand-uncle to Pompey the Great. In the Numantine war he bore arms under Scipio Africanus the younger, with whom and his friend Lælius he lived upon familiar terms. He is looked upon as the founder of satire and as the first considerable writer of satires among the Romans. From Horace, who refers to them several times in his own satires, it appears that he imitated the old Greek comedians in marking out by his censure individuals notorious for their vices, even those of the very highest rank. Though superior to his poetical predecessors at Rome, and though he wrote with great roughness and inelegance, he gained many admirers. By Horace he is compared to a river which rolls upon its waters precious sand, accompanied with mire and dirt. Of his thirty books of verses only a few scattered fragments are come down to modern times. He died at Naples about B C. 103 His fragments have been collected and published with notes by Fr. Douza, 4to, Lugd. Bat. 1595, and lastly by the Vulpii, 8vo, Patav 1713 Vell. Paterc. 2, 9.—Quintil 10, 1.—Cic de Orat —2 —*Horat. LUCILLA, a daughter of M Aurelius, celebrated for the virtues of her youth, her beauty, debaucheries, and misfortunes.

LUCINA, a goddess, daughter of Jupiter and Juno, or according to others, of Latona As her mother brought her into the world without pain, she became the goddess whom women in labour invoked, and she presided over the birth of children She receives this name either from lucus, or from lux, as Ovid explains it:

Gratia Lucinæ, dedit hæc tibi nomina lucus;
Aut quia principium tu, Dea, lucis habes.

Some suppose her to be the same as Diana and Juno because these two goddesses were also sometimes called Lucina, and presided over the labours of women. She is called Ilithya by the Greeks. She had a famous temple at Rome, raised A. U. C. 396. Varr. de L. L. 4.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, 27.—Ovid. Fast 2, 449.—Horat Carm. Sec.

LUCIUS The word Lucius is a prænomen common to many Romans, of whom an account is given under their family names

LUCRETIA, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of Lucretius, and wife of Tarquinius Collatinus. Her accomplishments unhappily proved fatal to her, and the praises which a number of young nobles at Ardea, among whom were Collatinus and the sons of Tarquin, bestowed upon the domestic virtues of their wives at home, were productive of a revolution in the state. While every one was warm with the idea, it was universally agreed to leave the camp and to go to Rome, to ascertain the veracity of their respective assertions. Collatinus had the pleasure to see his expectations fulfilled in the highest degree, and, while the wives of the other Romans were involved in the riot and dissipation of a feast, Lucretia was found at home, employed in the midst of her female servants, and easing their labours by sharing it herself. The beauty and innocence of Lucretia inflamed the passion of Sextus, the son of Tarquin, who was a witness of her virtues and industry. He cherished his flame, and he secretly retired from the camp, and came to the house of Lucretia, where, as the friend of her husband, he met with a kind reception. He soon, however, showed himself unworthy of such a treatment, and, in the dead of night, he introduced himself to Lucretia, who refused to his intreaties what her fear of shame at last granted to his threats She yielded to her ravisher, when he threatened to murder her, and to slay one of her slaves, and put him in her bed, that this apparent adultery might seem to have met with the punishment it deserved. Lucretia, thus dishonoured, in the morning, sent for her husband and her father, and, after she had revealed to them the indignities she had suffered from the son of Tarquin, and intreated them to avenge her wrongs, she stabbed herself with a dagger which she had previously concealed under her clothes This fatal blow was the signal of rebellion. The body of the virtuous Lucretia was exposed to the eyes of the senate, and of the people, and the violence and barbarity of Sextus, joined with the unpopularity and oppression of his father, so irritated the Roman populace, that that moment they expelled the Tarquins for ever from Rome. Brutus, who was present at the tragical death of Lucretia, kindled the flames of rebellion, and the republican or consular government was established at Rome, A. U. C 244. Liv. 1, 57, &c.—*Dionys. LUCRETILIS, now Libretti, a mountain in the country of the Sabines, hanging over a pleasant valley, near which the house and farm of Horace were situate. Horat. Od. 1, 17, 1.

LUCRETIUS CARUS, T. an eminent Latin poet and philosopher, was a Roman, but whether of the ancient Lucretian family, is uncertain. He was born about B. C. 96, and being sent early to Athens, studied under Zeno, a noted Epicurean His celebrated poem, "De rerum Natura," was written during the intervals of reason, which alleviated an insanity to which he was subjected by the administration of an amatory philtre by his wife. It forms the first account of the Epicurean philosophy in the Latin language, and affords a striking example of the great freedom with which opinions contradictory to the established religion were at that time maintained, as the writer has more pointedly controverted the popular notions of heathenism, or even the fundamental points of all other religion, such as the existence of a Creator, a providence, and an immortal state. His language and versification partake of the rudeness of an early period of literature; but when the subject admits of elevated sentiment, or descriptive beauty, no Latin poet has taken loftier flights, or exhibited greater sublimity His morality is also generally pure, although he is sometimes descriptively licentious. The inconsistency of his system being now no longer injurious, the gravest characters in modern times have not scrupled to become his editors and commentators. He is said to have died by his own hand, at the age of forty-four. The best editions of his poem are, that of Creech, Oxon. 1695, 8vo; that of Wakefield, Lond. 1796, 4to, 3 vols; and Glasg 1813, 8vo, 4 vols, and that of Eichstädt, Lips 1801, 8vo. LUCRINUS, a lake in Italy near Cumæ, on the coast of Campania. According to Dio Cassius there were three lakes in this quarter lying one behind the other. The outermost was called Tyrrhenus, the middle one Lucrinus, and the innermost Avernus. The Lucrine was shut in from the outermost lake or bay by a dike raised across the narrow inlet. This work, according to Strabo, was eight stadia in length, and of a chariot's breadth: tradition ascribed it to Hercules. Agrippa cut a communication between these lakes and the sea, and built at the opening, cut between and uniting the Lucrine and Avernian lakes, the famous Julian harbour. The object in doing this chiefly was to procure a place along the coast fit for exercising and training a body of seamen previous to the contest with Sextus Pompeius. The woods, also, which surrounded Avernus in particular, were cut down, and the stagnant vapour being thus dissipated, the vicinity was rendered healthy. By this operation much land was reclaimed, which before had been covered by these lakes, an outlet being afforded to their waters into the sea. The shores of the Lucrine lake were famous for their oysters. In the year 1538, an earthquake formed a hill, called Monte Nuovo, near two miles in circumference, and 200 feet high, consisting of lava, burned stones, scoria, &c., which left no appearance of a lake, but a morass, filled with grass and rushes. Dio Cass. 48, 50.—Strab. 5.—Suet Aug. 16.—Vell Paterc. 2, 79

LUCULLUS, LUCIUS LICINIUS, a Roman celebrated for his fondness of luxury and for his military talents. He was born about 115 years before the Christian era, and soon distinguished himself by his proficiency in the liberal arts, particularly eloquence and philosophy. His first military campaign was in the Marsian war, where his valour and cool intrepidity recommended him to public notice. His mildness and constancy gained him the admiration and confidence of Sylla, and from this connexion he derived honour, and during his quæstorship in Asia, and prætorship in Africa, he rendered himself more conspicuous by his justice, moderation, and humanity. He was raised to the consulship A. U. C. 680, and intrusted with the care of the Mithridatic war, and first displayed his military talents in rescuing his colleague Cotta, whom the enemy had besieged in Chalcedonia. This was soon followed by a celebrated victory over the forces of Mithridates, on the borders of the Granicus, and by the conquest of all Bithynia. His victories by sea were as great as those by land, and Mithridates lost a powerful fleet near Lemnos. Such considerable losses weakened the enemy, and Mithridates retired with precipitation towards Armenia, to the court of king Tigranes, his father-in-law. His flight was perceived, and Lucullus crossed the Euphrates with great expedition, and gave battle to the numerous forces which Tigranes had already assembled to support the cause of his son-in-law. According to the exaggerated account of Plutarch, no less than 100,000 foot, and near 55,000 horse, of the Armenians, lost their lives in that celebrated battle. All this carnage was made by a Roman army amounting to no more than 18,000 men, of whom only five were killed and 100 wounded during the combat. The taking of Tigranocerta, the capital of Armenia, was the consequence of this immortal victory, and Lucullus there obtained the greatest part of the royal treasures. This continual success, however, was attended with serious consequences. The severity of Lucullus, and the haughtiness of his commands, offended his soldiers, and displeased his adherents at Rome. Pompey was soon after sent to succeed him, and to continue the Mithridatic war, and the interview which he had with Lucullus began with acts of mutual kindness, and ended in the most inveterate reproaches, and open enmity. Lucullus was permitted to retire to Rome, and only 1600 of the soldiers who had shared his fortune and his glories were suffered to accompany him. He was received with coldness at Rome, and he obtained with difficulty a triumph which was deservedly claimed by his fame, his successes, and his victories. In this ended the days of his glory; he retired to the enjoyment of ease and peaceful society, and no longer interested himself in the commotions which disturbed the tranquillity of Rome. He dedicated his time to studious pursuits, and to literary conversation. His house was enriched with a valuable library, which was opened for the service of the curious, and of the learned. Lucullus fell into a delirium in the last part of his life, and died in the sixty-seventh or sixty-eighth year of his age. The people showed their respect for his merit by their wish to give him an honourable burial in the Campus Martius; but their offers were rejected, and he was privately buried, by his brother, on his estate at Tusculum. Lucullus has been admired for his many accomplishments, but he has been censured for his severity and extravagance. The expenses of his meals were immoderate, his halls were distinguished by the different names of the gods; and when Cicero and Pompey attempted to surprise him, they were astonished at the costliness of a supper which had been prepared upon the word of Lucullus, who had merely said to his servant that he would sup in the hall of Apollo. In his retirement Lucullus was fond of artificial luxury; subterraneous caves and passages were dug under the hills on the coast of Campania, and the sea water was conveyed round the house and pleasure grounds, where the fishes flocked in such abundance, that not less than 25,000 pounds' worth were sold at his death. In his public character Lucullus was humane and compassionate, and he showed his sense of the vicissitudes of human affairs by shedding tears at the sight of one of the cities of Armenia, which his soldiers reduced to ashes. He was a perfect master of the Greek and Latin languages, and he employed himself for some time in writing a concise history of the Marsic war in Greek hexameters. Such are the striking characteristics of a man who meditated the conquest of Parthia, and, for a while, gained the admiration of all the inhabitants of the east, by his justice and moderation, and who might have disputed the empire of the world with a Cæsar or Pompey, had not, at last, his fondness for retirement withdrawn him from the reach of ambition. Cic. pro Arch. 4. *Quæst. LUCUMO, the first name of Tarquinius Priscus, afterwards changed into Lucius. The word is Etrurian; it signifies prince or chief, and was generally applied to the twelve kings of Etruria. Plut. in Rom.

LUGDUNENSIS GALLIA, a part of Gaul, which received its name from Lugdunum, the capital city of the province. It was anciently called Celtica. Vid Gallia.

LUGDUNUM, now Lyons, a city of Gaul situate near the confluence of the Rhodanus, or Rhone, and the Arar, or Saone. Under Augustus, Munatius Plancus assembled at Lugdunum the inhabitants of Vienna, or Vienne, who had been driven from their country by the Allobroges. It became subsequently the metropolis of Lugdunensis, the second city in Gaul (Narbo Martius, or Narbonne, being the first,) and the place where the governors of the whole country resided. The emperor Claudius was born here. Plin. 4, 18. —Dio Cass 46 50.—Strab 4.—A city of the Batavi, in Germania Inferior, now Leyden. The modern name is said to be derived from that of Lethis, which it took in the middle ages.

LUNA, (the Moon,) was the daughter of Hyperion and Terra, and was the same, according to some mythologists, as Diana. She was worshipped by the ancient inhabitants of the earth with many superstitious forms and ceremonies. It was supposed that magicians and enchantress, particularly those of Thessaly, had an uncontrollable power over the moon, and that they could draw her down from heaven at pleasure by the mere force of their incantations. Her eclipses, according to their opinion, proceeded from thence; and, on that account, it was usual to beat drums and cymbals to ease her labours, and to render the power of magic less effectual. The Arcadians believed that they were older than the moon. Ovid. Met 12. 263, &c.—Tibull. 1, 8, 21. —Hesiod Theog.—Virg. Ecl. 8, 69.

LUPA, (a she-wolf,) was held in great veneration at Rome, because Romulus and Remus, according to an ancient tradition, were suckled and preserved by one of these animals. This fabulous story arises from the surname of Lupa, prostitute, which was given to the wife of the shepherd Faustulus, to whose care and humanity these children owed their preservation. Ovid. Fast. 2, 412.—Plut. in Romul.

LUPERCAL, a cave at the foot of mount Aventine, sacred to Pan, where festivals called Lupercalia were yearly celebrated, and where the she-wolf was said to have brought up Romulus and Remus. Virg Æn. 8, 343.

LUPERCALIA, a yearly festival observed at Rome the 15th of February, in honour of the god Pan. It was usual first to sacrifice two goats and a dog, and to touch with a bloody knife the foreheads of two illustrious youths, who always were obliged to smile while they were touched. The blood was wiped away with soft wool dipped in milk. After this the skins of the victims were cut into thongs, with which whips were made for the youths. With these whips the youths ran about the streets all naked except the middle, and whipped freely all those whom they met Women in particular were fond of receiving the lashes, as they superstitiously believed that they removed barrenness, and eased the pains of childbirth. This excursion in the streets of Rome was performed by naked youths, because Pan is always represented naked, and a goat was sacrificed because that deity was supposed to have the feet of a goat. A dog was added, as a necessary and useful guardian of the sheepfold This festival, as Plutarch mentions, was first instituted by the Romans in honour of the she-wolf which suckled Romulus and Remus This opinion is controverted by others, and Livy, with Dionysius of Halicarnassus, observes that they were introduced into Italy by Evander The name seems to be borrowed from the Greek name of Pan, Lycæus, from λύκος, a wolf, not only because these ceremonies were like the Lycæan festivals observed in Arcadia, but because Pan, as god of shepherds, protected the sheep from the rapacity of the wolves. The priests who officiated at the Lupercalia were called Luperci. Augustus forbade any person above the age of fourteen to appear naked, or to run about the streets during the Lupercalia. Cicero, in his Philippics, reproaches Antony for having disgraced the dignity of the consulship by running naked, and armed with a whip, about the streets It was during the celebration of these festivals that Antony offered a crown to J. Cæsar, which the indignation of the populace obliged him to refuse. Ovid. Fast 2, 427.—Varro L. L. 5, 3.

LUPERCI, a number of priests at Rome, who assisted at the celebration of the Lupercalia, in honour of the god Pan, to whose service they were dedicated. This order of priests was the most ancient and respectable of all the sacerdotal offices. It was divided into two separate colleges, called Fabiani and Quintiliani, from Fabius and Quintilius, two of their high priests. The former were instituted in honour of Romulus, and the latter of Remus. To these two sacerdotal bodies J. Cæsar added a third, called, from himself, the Julii, and this action contributed not a little to render his cause unpopular, and to betray his ambitious and aspiring views. (Vid. Lupercalia.) Plut. in Rom.—Dio. Cass. 45.—Virg. Æn. 8, 663.

LUPERCUS, a poet, who appears to have lived during the later periods of the western empire. He has left an elegy "On Cupidity," and a sapphic ode "On Old Age."

LUPIA, or LIPPIA, a small river in Germany, flowing into the Rhine, now the Lippe. Mela, 3, 3.—Vell. Paterc. 2, 105.——A town near the confluence of the Lupia and Rhine.

LUPUS, a general of the emperor Severus —— A governor of Britain.——A comic writer of Sicily, who wrote a poem on the return of Menelaus and Helen to Sparta, after the destruction of Troy. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, 16, 26.——P. Rut. a considerable man in the Roman state, but noted for his wickedness and impiety, and severely lashed, in consequence, by the poet Lucilius.

LUSITANIA, a part of ancient Hispania, on the Atlantic coast. It was bounded on the south and west by the Atlantic; on the north by the Durius; and on the east by an irregular line stretching from the north-eastern extremity of Portugal to the western limits of New Castile, whence to the ocean the Anas separated it from Bætica It anciently extended from the Tagus to the Northern Ocean, but under Augustus its limits were as above. It contained the Portuguese provinces of Beira, Estremadura, Alentejo, and Algarve together with the northern half of Spanish Estremadura and Southern Leon. The Lusitani, properly so called, were cantoned in the north-western part of Lusitania. They extended from the Tagus to the Durius, and occupied parts of Beira and Portuguese Estremadura. The Vettones occupied eastern Lusitania from the Durius to the Anas, and dwelt in parts of Leon, Beira, and Spanish Estremadura. The Celtici inhabited southern Lusitania, and dwelled in Algarve, Alentejo, and parts of both Estremaduras. The inhabitants of Algarve and southern Alentejo were termed Cunei, from the Latin word cuneus, signifying a wedge, owing to the shape of their country. Strab 3

LUSIUS, a river of Arcadia. Cic. de Nat D 3, 22.

LUSONES, a people of Spain, near the Iberus.

LUTETIA, a town of Belgic Gaul, on an island in the Sequana, or Seine, which received its name, as some suppose, from the quantity of clay, lutum, which is in its neighbourhood. J. Cæsar fortified and embellished it, from which circumstance some authors call it Julii Civitas. Julian the Apostate resided there some time. It is now Paris, the capital of France. Cæs. B. G 6 et 7. —Strab 4.—Ammian. 20.

LUTORIUS PRISCUS, C. a Roman knight, put to death by order of Tiberius, because he had written a poem in which he had bewailed the death of Germanicus, who then laboured under a severe illness. Tacit. Ann. 3, 49, &c.

LYÆUS, a surname of Bacchus. It is derived from λύειν, solvere, because wine, over which Bacchus presides, gives freedom to the mind, and delivers it from all cares and melancholy. The word is often used for wine. Horat. Od. 1, 8, 3, 21, 14, 5, 9, 33.—Virg. Æn. 1, 690.—Lucan. 1, 675.

LYCÆBAS, an Etrurian, who had been banished from his country for murder. He was one of those who offered violence to Bacchus, and who were changed into dolphins. Ovid. Met. 3, 624.——One of the Lapithæ, who ran away from the battle which was fought at the nuptials of Pirithous. Id. 12, 302.——An Assyrian killed by Perseus. Id. 5, 60.

LYCABETTUS, a mountain near Athens. Stat. Theb. 12, 631.

LYCÆA, festivals in Arcadia, in honour of Pan, the god of shepherds. They are the same as the Lupercalia of the Romans.——A festival at Argos in honour of Apollo Lycæus, who delivered the Argives from wolves, &c.

LYCÆUS, now Diaforti, a mountain in the south-western angle of Arcadia, where the Arcadians contended that Jupiter was born. Here an altar was erected to the god, and sacrifices were performed in the open air. The temenus, or sacred enclosure, was inaccessible to living creatures, since if any crossed its precincts, they died within the space of a year. It was also sacred to Pan, whose temple was surrounded by a thick grove. Paus. 8, 28.—Strab 8.—Plut. de Rep. 8.—Theocr. Idyl. 1, 123.—Virg G. 1, 16. Æn. 8, 344.

LYCAMBES, the father of Neobule. He promised his daughter in marriage to the poet Archilochus, and afterwards refused to fulfil his engagement when she had been courted by a man whose opulence had more influence than the fortune of the poet. This irritated Archilochus; he wrote a bitter invective against Lycambes and his daughter, and rendered them both so desperate by the satire of his composition, that they hanged themselves. Horat. Ep. 6, 13.—Ovid. in Ib. 52.—Aristot Rhet. 3.

LYCAON, the first king of Arcadia, son of Pelasgus and Melibœa. He built a town called Lycosura on the top of mount Lycæus, in honour of Jupiter. He had many wives, by whom he had a daughter, called Callisto, and fifty sons. He was succeeded on the throne by Nyctimus, the eldest of his sons. He lived about 1820 years before the Christian era. Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab 176.—Catull. ep 76.—Paus. 8, 2, &c.——Another king of Arcadia, celebrated for his cruelties. He was changed into a wolf by Jupiter, because he offered human victims on the altars of the god Pan. Some attribute this metamorphosis to another cause. The sins of mankind, as they relate, were become so enormous, that Jupiter visited the earth to punish their wickedness and impiety. He came to Arcadia, where he was announced as a god, and the people began to pay proper adoration to his divinity. Lycaon, however, who used to sacrifice all strangers to his wanton cruelty, laughed at the pious prayers of his subjects, and to try the divinity of the god, he served up human flesh on his table. This impiety so irritated Jupiter, that he immediately destroyed the house of Lycaon, and changed him into a wolf. Ovid. Met. 1, 196, &c.——These two monarchs are often confounded together, though it appears that they were two different characters, and that not less than an age elapsed between their reigns.——A son of Priam and Lacthoe. He was taken by Achilles and carried to Lemnos, whence he escaped. He was afterwards killed by Achilles in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 21, 24. 23, 746.——The father of Pandarus, killed by Diomedes before Troy. Homer Il. 2, 823 5, 276.——A Gnossian artist, who made the sword which Ascanius gave to Eurysaki. Virg. Æn. 9, 304.

LYCAONIA, a district of Asia Minor, forming the south-eastern quarter of Phrygia. The origin of its name is lost in the darkness of antiquity. The Greeks derived it from Lycaon of Arcadia, who is said to have set out hither with a band of colonists, and founded a city to which he communicated his name. Its first limits varied considerably from those which were afterwards assigned to it, extending originally into Cappadocia as far as the district of Cataonia, but stopping on the west at Iconium. When these boundaries were altered, the territory, which Lycaonia lost on the eastern side, was made up to it by a large accession to the north and west, so that it touched upon the province of Galatia; its size, therefore, was probably altered but little, how much soever its limits may have been changed. The whole district was an elevated plain, and well adapted for the feeding of sheep; it suffered much from the want of fresh water, the greater part of the springs being salt. Strab. 12.—Mela, 1, 2.—Liv 37, 54. 38, 39.——Arcadia bore also that name from Lycaon, one of its kings. Dionys. Hal.—Justin. 27, 1.—Quint. Curt 4, 5.

LYCAS, a priest of Apollo in the interest of Turnus. He was killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, 315.——Another officer of Turnus. Id. 10, 561.

LYCASTUS, an ancient town of Crete, in the vicinity of Gnossus, by the inhabitants of which place it was destroyed. Strab. 10.—Homer. Il. 2, 647.

LYCASTUS, a son of Minos I. He was father of Minos II. by Ida, the daughter of Corybas. Dion. 4.——A son of Minos and Pitthonome, daughter of Nyctimus. He succeeded his father on the throne of Arcadia. Paus. 8, 5 et 4.

LYCHE, a town of Macedonia. Liv. 31, 39.

LYCEUM, a sacred enclosure at Athens, dedicated to Apollo, and ornamented with fountains, plantations, and buildings. It was the usual place of resort for the Athenian youths, who devoted themselves to military pursuits, as well as for philosophers, and such as addicted themselves to study. It was the favourite walk of Aristotle and his followers, who thence obtained the name of Peripatetics. It was situated on the right bank of the Ilissus, and nearly opposite to the church of Petros Stauromenos, which is thought to answer to the temple of Diana Agrotera, on the other side of the river. Paus. 1, 19.—Xen. Hipparch.—Cic. Acad Quæst. 1, 4.

LYCHNIDUS, a city of Illyria, situate at the foot of mount Bermius, on the eastern shore of the Palus Lychnitis, a few miles to the south of the modern Ochrida. Liv. 43, 9.

LYCHNITIS PALUS, a lake of Illyria, on which Lychnidus was situate. It was formed principally by the waters of what is now the black Drino, and was a considerable expanse of water about twenty miles in length and eight in breadth. It abounded in fish, which were cured by the inhabitants of the surrounding country. Diod. 16, 8.—Strab. 7.

LYCIA, a country of Asia Minor, bounded on the east by Pisidia and Pamphylia, on the north by Phrygia, on the west by Caria, and on the south by the Mediterranean. It was the smallest amongst the provinces of Asia Minor. It is first mentioned under the name of Milyas, and its inhabitants the Solymi were accounted aborі-ginal. But when Sarpedon was driven from Crete, by his brother Minos, he and his party are stated to have fled hither, and taking possession of the coasts of Lycia, to have compelled the Solymi to retire inland. These Cretans were called Termilæ, a name which they preserved amongst the Carians and neighbouring nations for many ages, they themselves changed it for that of Lycii, which they derived from Lycus, the son of the Athenian king, Pandion, who took refuge amongst them with some of his followers. The Phœnicians formed settlements at a very early period on the coasts of the province. After the Cretan invasion, the name of Milyas was confined to the mountain district on the borders of Lycia, Pamphylia, Phrygia, and Caria, and it is here that the dwellings of the Solymi must be sought until their name disappears from history: their territory was invaded on the eastern side by the Pisidæ, who there created their principality of Cabalia. The Lycians were admirable archers, and are much commended for their sobriety and love of justice, their country was very mountainous, but tolerably fertile, and famous for its cedars, which almost equalled those of Lebanon. Hom. Il. 6. 150—10, 430. 12, 330.—Herod. 1, 173. 7, 92.—Strab. 14.

LYCIDAS, a centaur, killed by the Lapithæ at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, 310. ——A shepherd's name. Virg. Ecl.——A beautiful youth, the admiration of Rome in the age of Horace. Horat. Od. 1, 4, 19.

LYCIMNIA, a slave, mother of Helenor by a Lydian prince. Virg. Æn. 9, 546.

LYCISCUS, an Athenian archon.——A Messenian of the family of the Æpytidæ. When his daughters were doomed by lot to be sacrificed for the good of their country, he fled with them to Sparta, and Aristodemus upon this cheerfully gave his own children, and soon after succeeded to the throne. Paus. 4, 9.——A youth of whom Horace was enamoured. Ep. 14, 38.

LYCIUS, a son of Lycaon.——An epithet given to Apollo from his temple in Lycia, where he gave oracles, particularly at Patara, where the appellation of Lycius sortes was given to his answers, and even to the will of the Fates. Virg. Æn. 4, 346.——A surname of Danaus.

LYCOMEDES, a king of Scyros, an island in the Ægean sea, son of Apollo and Parthenope. He was secretly intrusted with the care of young Achilles, whom his mother Thetis had disguised in woman's clothes, to remove him from the Trojan war, where she knew he must unavoidably perish. Lycomedes has rendered himself infamous for his treachery to Theseus, who had implored his protection when driven from the throne of Athens by the usurper Mnesthus. Lycomedes, as it is reported, either envious of the fame of his illustrious guest, or bribed by the emissaries of Mnesthus, led Theseus to an elevated place, on pretence of showing him the extent of his dominions, and perfidiously threw him down a precipice, where he was killed. Plut. in Thes.—Pans. 1, 17. 7, 4.—Apollod. 3, 13.——An Arcadian, who, with 500 chosen men put to flight 1000 Spartans, and 500 Argives, &c. Diod. 15.——An Athenian, the first who took one of the enemy's ships at the battle of Salamis. Plut.

LYCON, an Athenian, who flourished about 405 B. C., and who, together with Anytus and Melitus, was concerned in the prosecution instituted against Socrates.——A peripatetic philosopher a native of Troas, and the pupil and successor of Strato of Lampsacus. He flourished about 270 B. C., and was for forty years at the head of the peripatetic school at Athens. He was greatly esteemed by Attalus and Rumenes, and distinguished himself so much by his eloquence that he received the surname of Glycon, expressive of the sweetness and power of his words. He appears to have been the author of a treatise on the sovereign good. Diog. Laert. 5, 66.—Cic. Tusc. 5, 37.

LYCONE, a mountain of Argolis, between Argos and Tegea. Paus. 8, 28.

LYCOPHRON, a son of Periander, king of Corinth. The murder of his mother Melissa by his father had such an effect upon him, that he resolved never to speak to a man who had been so wantonly cruel against his relations. This resolution was strengthened by the advice of Procles, his maternal uncle, and Periander at last banished to Corcyra a son whose disobedience and obstinacy had rendered him odious. Cypselus, the eldest son of Periander, being incapable of reigning, Lycophron was the only surviving child who had any claim to the crown of Corinth. But, when the infirmities of Periander obliged him to look for a successor, Lycophron refused to come to Corinth while his father was there, and he was induced to leave Corcyra, only on promise that Periander would come and dwell there while he remained master of Corinth. This exchange, however, was prevented. The Corcyreans, who were apprehensive of the tyranny of Periander, murdered Lycophron before he left that island. Herod. 3.—Aristot.——A brother of Thebe, the wife of Alexander tyrant of Pheræ. He assisted his sister in murdering her husband, and he afterwards seized the sovereignty. He was dispossessed by Philip of Macedonia. Plut.—Diod. 16.——A general of Corinth, killed by Nicias. Plut. in Nic.——A native of Cythera, son of Master. He went to the Trojan war with Ajax, the son of Telamon, after the accidental murder of one of his citizens. He was killed, &c. Homer. Il. 15, 440.——A famous Greek poet and grammarian, born at Chalcis, in Eubœa. He was one of the poets, who flourished under Ptolemy Philadelphus, and who, from their number, obtained the name of Pleiades. Lycophron died by the wound of an arrow. He wrote tragedies, the titles of twenty of which have been preserved. The only remaining composition of this poet is called Cassandra or Alexandra. It contains 1474 verses, whose obscurity has procured the epithet of Tenebrosus to its author. It is a mixture of prophetical effusions, which, as he supposes, were given by Cassandra during the Trojan war. The best editions of Lycophron are that of Basil 1546, fol., enriched with the Greek commentary of Tzetzes: that of Canter, 8vo, apud Commelin, 1596; and that of Potter, fol. Oxon. 1702. Since the edition of archbishop Potter, two others have appeared, that of Reichard, 8vo, Lips. 1788; and that of Sebastian, 4to, Rom. 1804. Ovid. in Ib. 533.—Stat. Sylv. 5, 3.

LYCOPOLIS, a town of Upper Egypt, on the western side of the Nile, north-west of Antæopolis. It derived its name from the worship here paid to the wolf (Λύκος), or from a number of these animals, which were said to have repelled an army of Ethiopians, who invaded Egypt. It is thought to correspond with the modern Sioût or Osiout. Diod. 1.—Strab. 17.

LYCORPA, one of the earliest names of Parnassus. The modern name of the mountain is Lykoura.—A small town on one of the highest summits of Parnassus. It appears to have been a place of the highest antiquity, since it is stated by the Arundelian marbles to have been once the residence of Deucalion. Strabo also affirms that it was more ancient than Delphi. Among other etymologies, Pausanias states, that the neighbouring people fled to it during the deluge of Deucalion, being led thither by the howling of wolves (λυκοι). Strab. 9. - Paus. 10, 6.

LYCOREUS, the supposed founder of Lycorea, on mount Parnassus, was son of Apollo and Corycia Hygin. fab 161

LYCORIAS, one of the attendant nymphs of Cyrene. Virg. G. 4, 333.

LYCORIS, a freedwoman of the senator Volumnius, also called Cytheris, and Volumnia, from her master. She is celebrated for her beauty and intrigues. The poet Gallus was greatly enamoured of her, and his friend Virgil in his tenth eclogue comforts him for the loss of the favours of Cytheris, who followed M. Antony's camp, and was become the Aspasia of Rome. The charms of Cleopatra, however, prevailed over those of Cytheris, and the unfortunate courtezan lost the favours of Antony and of all the world at the same time. Lycoris was originally a comedian. Virg. Ecl. 10.—Ovid. A. 1, 3, 537. Trist 2, 445.

LYCORMAS, a river of Ætolia, whose sands were of a golden colour. It was afterwards called Evenus from king Evenus, who threw himself into it. Ovid. Met 2, 245.

LYCORTAS, the father of Polybius, who flourished B. C 184. He was chosen general of the Achæan league, and he revenged the death of Philopœmen, &c. Plut LYCOSURA, a town of Arcadia on the slope of mount Lycæus, said by Pausanias to be the oldest city in the world. Its site seems to agree with that of Agios Georgios, near the village of Stala. Paus. 8, 38.

LYCTUS, now Hieraki, a city of Crete, situate to the north-east of Præsus, and at no great distance from the sea. It was the country of Idomeneus, who led its inhabitants to the Trojan war. It was colonized by the Spartans, and stood at the foot of mount Ægæus, where Hesiod represents Jupiter to have been brought up. It was engaged in frequent hostilities with the Gnossians, and was at length destroyed by them. Strab. 10.—Virg. Æn. 3, 401.—Homer. Il. 2, 647. 17, 611.—Hesiod. Theog 477.—Aristot. Polit. 2, 8. —Polyb 4, 53 et 54.

LYCURGIDES, annual days of solemnity, appointed in honour of the lawgiver of Sparta.—A patronymic of a son of Lycurgus. Ovid in Ib. 305.

LYCURGUS, a king of Nemæa, in Peloponnesus. He was raised from the dead by Æsculapius. Stat. Theb. 5. 535.—A giant killed by Osiris in Thrace. Lucan. 3.—A king of Thrace, son of Dryas. He has been represented as cruel and impious, on account of the violence which he offered to Bacchus. He, according to the opinion of the mythologists, drove Bacchus out of his kingdom, and abolished his worship, for which impiety he was severely punished by the gods. He put his own son Dryas to death in a fury, and he cut off his own legs, mistaking them for vine boughs. He was put to death in the greatest torments by his subjects who had been informed by the oracle that they should not taste wine till Lycurgus was no more. This fable is explained by observing, that the aversion of Lycurgus for wine, over which Bacchus presided, arose from the filthiness and disgrace of intoxication, and, therefore, the monarch wisely ordered all the vines of his dominions to be cut down, that himself and his subjects might be preserved from the extravagance and debauchery which are produced by too free an use of wine. Hygin. fab. 132.—Homer. Il. 6, 130. Apollod 3, 5.- Oenl. Myt. 4, 22.—Virg. Æn. 3, 14 - Horat. Od. 2, 19.—A son of Hercules and Praxithea, daughter of Thespius. Apollod. 2, 7.—A son of Phereс, the son of Cretheus. Id. 1, 9.—An Athenian orator, who was the contemporary of Demosthenes, and died about 325 B. C. He studied under Plato and Isocrates, and, as a magistrate, was distinguished by the severity of his administration. He was one of the thirty orators, whom the Athenians refused to deliver to Alexander. The oration of his against Leocrates is extant. Dion. 16. —A king of Tegea, son of Aleus, by Neæra, the daughter of Perseus. He married Cleophile, called also Eurynome, by whom he had Amphidamias, &c. Apollod. 3, 9.—Homer. Il 7, 142.—A celebrated lawgiver of Sparta, son of king Eunomus, and brother to Polydectes. He succeeded his brother on the Spartan throne; but when he saw that the widow of Polydectes was pregnant, he kept the kingdom not for himself, but till Charilaus, his nephew, was arrived to years of maturity. He had previously refused to marry his brother's widow, who wished to strengthen him on his throne by destroying her own son Charilaus, and leaving him in the peaceful possession of the crown. The integrity with which he acted, when guardian of his nephew Charilaus, united with the disappointment and the resentment of the queen, raised him many enemies, and he at last yielded to their satire and malevolence and retired to Crete. He travelled like a philosopher, and visited Asia and Egypt without suffering himself to be corrupted by the licentiousness and luxury which prevailed there. The confusion which followed his departure from Sparta, had now made his presence totally necessary, and he returned home at the earnest solicitations of his countrymen. The disorders which reigned at Sparta induced him to reform the government; and the more effectually to execute his undertaking he had recourse to the oracle of Delphi. He was received by the priestess of the god with every mark of honour, his intentions were warmly approved by the divinity, and he was called the friend of gods, and himself rather god than man. After such a reception from the most celebrated oracle of Greece, Lycurgus found no difficulty in reforming the abuses of the state, and all were equally anxious in promoting a revolution which had received the sanction of heaven. This happened 884 years before the Christian era. Lycurgus first established a senate, which was composed of twenty-eight senators, whose authority preserved the tranquillity of the state, and maintained a due and just equilibrium between the kings and the people, by watching over the intrusions of the former, and checking the seditious turbulence of the latter. All distinctions were destroyed, and by making an equal and impartial division of the land among the members of the commonwealth, Lycurgus banished luxury, and encouraged the useful arts. The use of money, either of gold or silver, was totally forbidden, and the introduction of heavy brass and iron coin, brought no temptations to the dishonest, and left every individual in the possession of his effects without any fears of robbery or violence. All the citizens dined in common, and no one had greater claims to indulgence or luxury than another. The intercourse of Sparta with other nations was forbidden, and few were permitted to travel. The youths were intrusted to the public master, as soon as they had attained their seventh year, and their education was left to the wisdom of the laws. They were taught early to think, to answer in a short and laconic manner, and to excel in sharp repartee. They were instructed and encouraged to carry off things by surprise, but if ever the theft was discovered they were subjected to a severe punishment. Lycurgus was happy and successful in establishing and enforcing these laws, and by his prudence and administration the face of affairs in Lacedæmon was totally changed, and it gave rise to a set of men distinguished for their intrepidity, their fortitude, and their magnanimity. After this, Lycurgus retired from Sparta, to Delphi, or according to others, to Crete, and before his departure he bound all the citizens of Lacedæmon by a solemn oath, that neither they nor their posterity would alter, violate, or abolish the laws which he had established, before his return. He soon after put himself to death, and he ordered his ashes to be thrown into the sea, fearful lest if they were carried to Sparta, the citizens would call themselves freed from the oath which they had taken, and empowered to make a revolution. The wisdom and the good effect of the laws of Lycurgus have been firmly demonstrated at Sparta, where for 700 years they remained in full force, but the legislator has been censured as cruel and impolitic. He has shown himself inhumane in ordering mothers to destroy such of their children, whose feebleness or deformity in their youth seemed to promise incapability of action in maturer years, and to become a burden to the state. His regulations about marriage must necessarily be censured, and no true conjugal felicity can be expected from the union of a man with a person whom he perhaps never knew before, and whom he was compelled to choose in a dark room, where all the marriageable women in the state assembled on stated occasions. The peculiar dress which was appointed for the females, might be termed improper; and the law must, for ever, be called injudicious, which ordered them to appear naked on certain days of festivity, and wrestle in a public assembly, promiscuously with boys of equal age with themselves These things indeed contributed as much to corrupt the morals of the Lacedæmonians, as the other regulations seemed to be calculated to banish dissipation, riot, and debauchery. Lycurgus has been compared to Solon, the celebrated legislator of Athens, and it has been judiciously observed, that the former gave his citizens morals conformable to the laws which he had established, and that the latter had given the Athenians laws, which coincided with their customs and manners. The office of Lycurgus demanded resolution, and he showed himself inexorable and severe. In Solon artifice was requisite, and he showed himself mild and even voluptuous. The moderation of Lycurgus is greatly commended, particularly when we recollect that he treated with the greatest humanity and confidence Alcander, a youth who had put out one of his eyes in a seditious tumult. Lycurgus had a son called Antiorus, who left no issue. The Lacedæmonians showed their respect for their great legislator, by yearly celebrating a festival in his honour, called Lycurgidæ or Lycurgides. The introduction of money into Sparta in the reign of Agis the son of Archidamus, was one of the principal causes which corrupted the innocence of the Lacedæmonians, and rendered them the prey of intrigue and of faction. The laws of Lycurgus were abrogated by Philopœmen, B. C. 188, but only for a little time, as they were soon after re-established by the Romans. Plut. in Vita.—Justin 3, 2. &c.—Strab. 8, 10, 15, &c.—Dionys Hal. 2.—Paus 3, 2.

LYCUS, a king of Bœotia, successor to his brother Nycteus, who left no male issue. He was intrusted with the government only during the minority of Labdacus the son of the daughter of Nycteus. He was farther enjoined to make war against Epopeus, who had carried away by force Antiope the daughter of Nycteus. He was successful in this expedition. Epopeus was killed, and Lycus recovered Antiope and married her though she was his niece. This new connexion highly displeased his first wife Dirce, and Antiope was delivered to the unfeeling queen and tortured in the most cruel manner. Antiope at last escaped, and intreated her sons Zethus and Amphion, to avenge her wrongs The children, incensed on account of the cruelties which their mother had suffered, besieged Thebes, killed Lycus, and tied Dirce to the tail of a wild bull which dragged her till she died. Paus 9, 5. —Apollod. 3, 5 ——A king of Libya, who sacrificed whatever strangers came upon his coast, when Diomedes, at his return from the Trojan war, had been shipwrecked there. the tyrant seized him and confined him. LYDIA, a country of Asia Minor, bounded on the south by the Mæander, on the west by the Ægæan sea, on the north by a range of hills dividing the waters of the Hermus from the Caicus, and on the east by an irregular line from the source of the latter river to Hierapolis on the Mæander. To the north it bordered on Mysia, to the east on Phrygia, and to the south on Caria. According to some of the Greek writers, it was divided between two nations, the Mæonians and Lydians; the former inhabiting the northern part of the province about the Hermus and mount Tmolus, while the latter occupied the district watered by the Caystrus. It appears, however, that they were one and the same people, and hat the name of Lydians was first assumed by them under their king Lydus. Lydia was governed by monarchs, who after the fabulous ages reigned for 249 years in the following order: Ardysus began to reign, 797 B. C.; Alyattes, 761; Meles, 747; Candaules, 735; Gyges, 718; Ardysus second, 680; Sadyattes, 631; Alyattes second, 619, and Cresus, 562, who was conquered by Cyrus, B. C. 548, when the kingdom became a province of the Persian empire. There were three different races that reigned in Lydia, the Atyadæ, Heraclidæ, and Mermnadæ. The history of the first is obscure and fabulous, the Heraclidæ began to reign about the Trojan war, and the crown remained in their family for about 505 years, and was always transmitted from father to son. Candaules was the last of the Heraclidæ; and Gyges the first, and Cresus the last, of the Mermnadæ. The Lydians were anciently brave and warlike, being accounted the best horsemen in the known world. They were celebrated for their skill in music, and other arts. They are said to have invented games, and to have been the first to coin money. Herod. 1 et 6. 3, 90. 7, 74.—Strab. 2, 5, et 13.—Mela, 1, 2.—Plin. 3, 5.—*Dionys. LYMIRE, a town of Lycia. Ovid Met fab. 12.

LYNCESTIUS, a river of Macedonia, whose waters were of an intoxicating quality. Ovid. Met. 15. 329.

LYNCEUS, son of Aphareus, was among the hunters of the Calydonian boar, and one of the Argonauts. He was so sharp-sighted that, as it is reported, he could see through the earth, and distinguish objects at the distance of above nine miles. He stole some oxen with his brother Idas and they were both killed by Castor and Pollux, when they were going to celebrate their nuptials with the daughters of Leucippus. Apollod 1 et 3.—Hygen fab. 4.—Paus. 4, 2.—*Ovid. LYNCUS, LYNCÆUS, or LYNX, a cruel king of Scythia, or according to others, of Sicily. He received, with feigned hospitality, Triptolemus, whom Ceres had sent all over the world to teach mankind agriculture, and as he was jealous of his commission he resolved to murder this favourite of the gods in his sleep. As he was going to give the deadly blow to Triptolemus, he was suddenly changed into a lynx, an animal which is the emblem of perfidy and ingratitude. Ovid. Met. 5, 650.

LYRNESSUS, a city of Cilicia, the native country of Briseis, called from thence Lyrnessus. It was taken and plundered by Achilles and the Greeks at the time of the Trojan war, and the booty divided among the conquerors. Homer Il. 2, 197.—Ovid Met. 12, 108. Heroid. 3, 5. Trist. 4, 1, 15.

LYSANDER, a celebrated general of Sparta, in the last years of the Peloponnesian war. He drew Ephesus from the interest of Athens, and gained the friendship of Cyrus the younger. He gave battle to the Athenian fleet, consisting of 120 ships, at Ægospotamos, and destroyed it all, except three ships, with which the enemy's general fled to Evagoras king of Cyprus. In this celebrated battle, which happened 405 years before the Christian era, the Athenians lost 3000 men, and with them their empire and influence among the neighbouring states. Lysander well knew how to take advantage of his victory, and the following year, Athens, worn out by a long war of twenty seven years, and discouraged by its misfortunes, gave itself up to the power of the enemy, and consented to destroy the Piræus, to deliver up all its ships, except twelve, to recall all those who had been banished and in short to be submissive in every degree to the power of Lacedæmon. Besides these humiliating conditions, the government of Athens was totally changed, and thirty tyrants were set over it by Lysander. This glorious success, and the honour of having put an end to the Peloponnesian war, increased the pride of Lysander. He had already begun to pave his way to universal power by establishing aristocracy in the Grecian cities of Asia, and now he attempted to make the crown of Sparta elective. In the pursuit of his ambition he used prudence and artifice; and as he could not easily abolish a form of government which ages and popularity had confirmed, he had recourse to the assistance of the gods. His attempts, however, to corrupt the oracles of Delphi, Dodona, and Jupiter Ammon, proved ineffectual, and he was even accused of using bribes by the priests of the Libyan temple. The sudden declaration of war against the Thebans saved him from the accusations of his adversaries, and he was sent together with Pausanias against the enemy. The plans of his military operations were discovered, and the Hellenians, whose ruin he secretly meditated, attacked him unexpectedly, and he was killed in a bloody battle, which ended in the defeat of his troops, 394 years before Christ. His body was recovered by his colleague Pausanias, and honoured with a magnificent funeral. Lysander has been commended for his bravery, but his ambition deserves the severest censure, and his cruelty and his duplicity have greatly stained his character He was arrogant and vain in his public as well as private conduct, and he received and heard with the greatest avidity the hymns which his courtiers and flatterers sung to his honour. Yet in the midst of all his pomp, his ambition, and intrigues, he died extremely poor, and his daughters were rejected by two opulent citizens of Sparta, to whom they had been betrothed during the life of their father This behaviour of the lovers was severely punished by the Lacedæmonians, who protected from injury the children of a man whom they hated for his sacrilege, his contempt of religion, and his perfidy The father of Lysander, whose name was Aristocles or Aristocrates, was descended from Hercules, though not reckoned of the race of the Heraclidæ. *Plut. et C. LYSANDRA, a daughter of Ptolemy Lagus, who married Agathocles the son of Lysimachus She was persecuted by Arsinoe, and fled to Seleucus for protection Paus 1, 9, &c.

LYSIAS, a celebrated orator, son of Cephalus, a native of Syracuse. His father left Sicily and went to Athens, where Lysias was born and carefully educated. In his fifteenth year he accompanied the colony which the Athenians sent to Thurium, and after a long residence there he returned home in his forty-seventh year Though possessed of great abilities, he was not engaged in the service of the state through the hatred or jealousy of the thirty tyrants, but his powers of oratory rendered him truly illustrious As the friend and companion of Socrates he attended him in his imprisonment, and wrote an elegant oration in his defence, which the philosopher read with satisfaction but declined to use, nobly sensible that if public services and innocence of manners cannot defend life, no efforts of art or persuasion will prevail Lysias, known to the Grecian states by his eloquence, and by the simplicity, correctness, and purity of his diction, wrote no less than 425 orations according to Plutarch, though the number may with more probability be reduced to 230. Of these thirty-four are extant, the best editions of which are that of Taylor, 8vo, Cantab. 1740; that of Auger, 2 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1783; that of Reiske, in the Corpus Oratorum Græcorum, 2 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1772; and that of Dobson, in the Oratores Attici, 2 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1828. He died in the eighty-first year of his age, 378 years before the Christian era. Plut. de Orat.—Cic. de Orat. 2, 52. In Brut. 17.—Quintil. 3, 8. 10, 1.—Diog 2.——An Athenian general, &c ——A town of Phrygia. Strab.——Another of Syria, now Bersiech, near Emesa.——A tyrant of Tarsus, B. LYSIMACHIA, a city in the Thracian Chersonese, built by Lysimachus, who transferred hither the inhabitants of Cardia and Pactya. In a much later age it obtained the name Heraclium, corrupted now into Esereul, from the width of the isthmus on which it stood. Diod. Sic. 20, 29.—Plin. 4, 11.—Amm. Marcell. 22, 8. ——A town of Ætolia, near a lake named Hydra, and between Arsinoe and Pleuron. Strab. 10.

LYSIMACHUS, king of Thrace, one of the captains of Alexander the Great, rose from a mean condition to the favour of that prince At the partition of the empire of Alexander, B. C 323, Thrace, the Chersonese, and the countries adjacent to the Euxine, were allotted to Lysimachus. When Antigonus had rendered himself formidable to the other sharers, Lysimachus joined in the league against him, with Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Cassander. By a subsequent treaty, Thrace was confirmed to him; and in imitation of other captains, he took the title of king. He founded the city of Lysimachia, B. C. 309, and made it his capital. In conjunction with Seleucus, he gained the great battle of Ipsus. He afterwards seized upon Macedonia, having first expelled Pyrrhus from the throne; but his cruelty rendered him truly odious, and the murder of his son Agathocles so offended his subjects, that the most opulent and powerful revolted from him, and abandoned the kingdom. He pursued them into Asia, and declared war against Seleucus, who had given them a kind reception. He was killed in a bloody battle, B. C. 281, in the eightieth year of his age His body was found in the heaps of slain by the fidelity of his dog, which had carefully watched near it With great courage and abilities, he was characterized by a cruel and ferocious disposition, which rendered him unworthy of his high fortune. Justin mentions a curious fact concerning him, viz that having offended Alexander, he was, as a punishment, thrown into the den of a furious lion; and when the ravenous animal darted upon him, he wrapped his hand in his mantle, and boldly thrust it into the lion's mouth, and by twisting his tongue, killed an adversary ready to devour him Thus act of courage in self-defence recommended him to the monarch, who pardoned and took him into his favour. Justin. 15, 3,&c.—Paus. 1, 10.

LYSINOE, a town of Pisidia Liv 38, 15.

LYSIPPUS, a celebrated sculptor and statuary, was born at Sicyon, and flourished in the time of Alexander the Great. He was originally a worker in brass, and then applied himself to painting, till his talents and inclination led him to fix on the profession of a sculptor. He worked with such extraordinary diligence and facility, that he is said to have left 1500 performances, all of such excellence, that any one of them singly might have conferred celebrity on him as an artist. He attained to so high a reputation, that Alexander forbade any sculptor but Lysippus to make his statues. Lysippus improved the art of statuary by a better imitation of the hair, and by an attentive study of symmetry, in which he considered how the human figure appeared to the eye, not what were its exact proportions. The most admirable of his works were the statues of Alexander, of which he executed a series, beginning from his childhood; and one of a man coming out of a bath, placed by Agrippa before his public baths, and which, being removed by Tiberius to his own chamber, caused such great clamours on the part of the populace, that the emperor thought it prudent to return it to its former situation. A chariot of the sun at Rhodes was one of his great works, which was, however, surpassed by a colossus at Tarentum, forty cubits high. His statue of Socrates, and those of the twenty-five horsemen who were drowned in the Granicus, were so highly valued, that, in the age of Augustus, they were sold for their weight in gold. Plut. in Alex.—Cic. in Brut. 164. Ad Her.

LYSIS, a Pythagorean philosopher, preceptor to Epaminondas. He flourished about 388 years before the Christian era. He is supposed by some to be the author of the golden verses which are attributed to Pythagoras. C. Nep. in Epam. 2.—Cic. Orat 3, 34. Off. 1, 44.

LYSISTRĀTUS, a brother of Lysippus. He was the first artist who ever made a statue with wax. Plin. 34, 8 35, 12.

LYSO, a friend of Cicero, deservedly commended for his kindness and hospitality. He was born at Patræ, in Achaia. Cic. Fam. 13, 19.

LYSTRA, a city of Asia Minor, placed by Ptolemy in Isauria; but, according to Pliny, Hierocles, and St Luke, it belonged to Lycaonia It was in the vicinity of Derbe.

M

MACÆ, a people of Africa who occupied the coast to the north-west of and near the Greater Syrtis. They are thought to have been the same with those named Syrtites by Pliny. Herodotus states that they had a curious custom of leaving only a tuft of hair in the centre of their head, carefully shaving the rest, and that when they went to war, they used the skins of ostriches instead of shields. The river Cinyps flowed through their territory. Herod 4, 175.—A people of Arabia Deserta on a projection of land where the Sinus Persicus is narrowest. Ptolemy calls the promontory Assabo: its modern name, however, cape Mussendom, bears some faint resemblance to that of the Macæ.

MACARĒUS, a son of Æolus, who debauched his sister Canace, and had a son by her. The father being informed of the incest, ordered the child to be exposed, and sent a sword to his daughter, and commanded her to destroy herself. Macareus fled to Delphi, where he became priest of Apollo Ovid. Met. Herod. 11. In Ib. 563.—One of the companions of Ulysses, left at Caieta in Italy, where Æneas found him. *Ovid. MACARIA, a daughter of Hercules and Dejanira. After the death of Hercules, Eurystheus made war against the Heraclidæ, whom the Athenians supported, and the oracle declared that the descendants of Hercules should obtain the victory if any one of them devoted himself to death. This was cheerfully accepted by Macaria, who refused to endanger the life of the children of Hercules by suffering the victim to be drawn by lot, and the Athenians obtained a victory. Great honours were paid to the patriotic Macaria, and a fountain of Marathon was called by her name. Paus. 1, 32.—An ancient name of Cyprus.

MACĀRIS, an ancient name of Crete.

MACEDO, a son of Osiris, who had a share in the divine honours which were paid to his father. He was represented clothed in a wolf's skin, for which reason the Egyptians held that animal in great veneration. Diod. 1.—Plut. in Isid. et Os.—A man who gave his name to Macedonia. Some supposed him to be the same as the son or general of Osiris, whilst others consider him as the grandson of Deucalion by the mother's side. Diod. 1.

MACEDONIA, a country of Europe. Its limits varied exceedingly at different periods of its history. In the times of Philip and Alexander they were, to the north the chain of Orbelus and Scomius, to the east the river Nestus, to the south the Ægean sea and the Cambunian mountains, and to the west a chain of mountains known by the names of Bermius and Canalovii. The river Strymon was the eastern boundary of Macedonia before the time of Philip, who added the territory between it and the Nestus to his dominions. On its conquest by the Romans these boundaries remained for some time unaltered; but at length the western frontier was extended to the Adriatic, and it then included what was before known as Grecian Illyria, and named in a much later age Epirus Nova. Macedonia considered under these limits touched to the north on Illyricum and Mœsia, to the east on Thrace, and to the south on Thessaly and Epirus. It included the northern part of Albanie and Macedonia. The Macedonians are said in mythology to have obtained their name from Macedo, a son of Jupiter, and the founder of their nation. But they probably derived both their name and their origin from the descendants of Japhet, though the learned are not agreed as to which of his sons may be looked upon as their ancestor. Some trace their origin to the Kittim, who were the grandsons of Japhet, observing that Macetia is not unfrequently used to denote this country, and Macetæ its inhabitants: others, however, are of opinion that they derived their name from Madai, a son of Japhet, and think this the more probable from Emathia having been the ancient name of Macedonia. The Macedonian dynasty is said by the Greek authors to have derived its origin from Perdiccas, the youngest of three brothers, who were descended from Temenus, son of Hercules. They left their native city Argos in company with a body of colonists, and went in quest of fortune amongst the Illyrians, who, though they allowed them at first to dwell in their country, became jealous of their increasing strength, and drove them into Macedonia. Here they seized upon the district of Emathia, and its capital Edessa, then governed by Midas, and founded the Macedonian kingdom B. C. 814, the first ruler of which was Perdiccas. It continued in existence 646 years, till the defeat of its last king, Perseus, by the Romans at Pydna, when it became subject to that ambitious people. The Macedonians were naturally brave and warlike; under the reigns of Philip and Alexander they signalized themselves by their valour and extensive conquests, their phalanx was famed for its irresistible strength. Macedonia is sometimes mentioned under the names of Emathia, Paonia, Mygdonia, Æmonia, Edonia and Bistonia. Justin. 7, 1.—Plin. 4, 10. —Gen. 10, 4.—Isaiah. 23.—Aul. Gell. 9, 3.—Herod. 8, 137.—Thucyd. 2. 99.

MACEDONICUM BELLUM, was undertaken by the Romans against Philip, king of Macedonia, some few months after the second Punic war, B. C. 200. The cause of this war originated in the hostilities which Philip had exercised against the Achæans, the friends and allies of Rome. The consul Flaminius had the care of the war, and he conquered Philip on the confines of Epirus and afterwards in Thessaly The Macedonians were also defeated; Eubœa was taken, and Philip, after continual losses, sued for peace, which was granted him in the fourth year of the war The ambition and cruelty of Perseus, the son and successor of Philip soon irritated the Romans Another war was undertaken in which the Romans suffered two defeats This, however, did not discourage them, Paulus Æmilius was chosen consul in the 60th year of his age, and intrusted with the care of the war He came to a general engagement near the city of Pydna. The victory sided with the Romans and 20,000 of the Macedonian soldiers were left on the field of battle This decisive blow put an end to the war, which had already continued for three years 168 years before the Christian era Perseus and his sons Philip and Alexander were taken prisoners and carried to Rome to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. About fifteen years after, new seditions were raised in Macedonia, and the false pretensions of Andriscus who called himself the son of Perseus, obliged the Romans to send an army to quell the commotions Andriscus at first obtained many considerable advantages over the Roman forces till at last he was conquered and delivered to the consul Metellus, who carried him to Rome After these commotions which are sometimes called the third Macedonian war Macedonia was finally reduced into a Roman province and governed by a regular proconsul, about 148 years before the Christian era

MACEDONICUS a surname given to Metellus, from his conquests in Macedonia It was also given to such as had obtained any victory in that province

MACELLA, a town of Sicily taken by the consul Duilius, Liv 26 21

MACER, a Latin poet a native of Verona. He was the author of a poem on birds entitled Ornithogonia and of another on snakes, under the title of Theriaca This last was an imitation in some degree, of the Theriaca of Nicander We have no remains of either of these works The poem De Herbarum Virtutibus commonly ascribed to him is now regarded as a production of the middle ages Quintil 10 1 ——A friend of Ovid's who wrote a continuation of the Iliad and also an Ambhomerica He has been frequently confounded with the preceding but flourished in truth at a later period The former died in Asia, B C 17

MACHANIDAS a man who made himself absolute at Sparta He was killed by Philopœmen after being defeated at Mantinea, B C 208 Nabis succeeded him Plut —Liv 27, 30 28, 5 31 2.

MACHAON a celebrated physician son of Æsculapius and brother to Podalirius He went to the Trojan war with the inhabitants of Trica, Œchonia, and Œchalia. According to some he was king of Messenia As physician to the Greeks, he healed the wounds which they received during the Trojan war and was one of those concealed in the wooden horse. Some suppose that he was killed before Troy by Eurypylus the son of Telephus. He received divine honours after death, and had a temple in Messenia. Il nar II 2, 239 4 103. — Ovid ex Pont. 3, 4 Quint Smyr 6, 402.—Virg. Æn. 2, 263 et 426.

MACRINUS Titus Julius Julius an Egyptian of obscure birth who from a private soldier, rose to the highest command in the army, and proclaimed himself emperor of Rome, when Valerian had been made prisoner by the Persians A D 260 His liberality supported his usurpation his two sons Macrianus and Quietus were invested with the imperial purple and the enemies of Rome were severally defeated either by the emperors or their generals. When he had supported his dignity for a year in the eastern parts of the world Macrianus marched towards Rome to crush Gallienus, who had been proclaimed emperor He was defeated in Illyricum by the lieutenant of Gallienus and put to death with his son, at his own express request A D 262

MACRINUS M Opilius Severus a native of Africa who rose from the most ignominious condition to the rank of præfect of the prætorian guards, and at last of emperor after the death of Caracalla, whom he inhumanly sacrificed to his ambition A D 217 The beginning of his reign was popular; the abolition of the taxes and an affable and compassionate behaviour endeared him to his subjects These promising appearances did not long continue, and the timidity which Macrinus betrayed in treating the peace of the Persians by a large sum of money soon rendered him odious, and while he affected to imitate the virtues Aurelius, without possessing the good qualities of his heart, he became contemptible and insignificant This affectation irritated the minds of the populace and when severe punishments had been inflicted on some of the disorderly soldiers the whole army mutinied and their tumult was increased by their consciousness of their power and numbers which Macrinus had the imprudence to betray by keeping almost all the military force of Rome encamped together in the plains of Syria. Heliogabalus was proclaimed emperor and Macrinus attempted to save his life by flight He was however seized in Cappadocia, and his head was cut off and sent to his successor June 7th A D 218. Macrinus reigned about two months and three days His son, called Diadumenianus shared his father's fate ——A friend of the poet Terentius to whom his second satire is inscribed

MACRO a favourite of the emperor Tiberius, celebrated for his intrigues, perfidy and cruelty He destroyed Sejanus and raised himself upon the ruins of that unfortunate favourite He was accessary to the murder of Tiberius, and conciliated the good opinion of Caligula by prostituting to him his own wife called Ennia. MACROBII a people of Æthiopia, celebrated for their justice and the innocence of their manners. They generally lived to their 120th year some say to a thousand and indeed, from the longevity they have obtained their name (μακρὸς β ος, long life), to distinguish them more particularly from the other inhabitants of Æthiopia,

After so long a period spent in virtuous actions, and freed from the indulgences of vice, and from maladies, they dropped into the grave as in sleep, without pain and without terror. Orph Argon. 1105 — Herod 3, 14 — Mela, 3, 9 — Plin 7 48 — Val Max 8, 3e

MACROBIUS a Latin writer and eminent critic, who flourished towards the close of the 4th century He is supposed to have been a Greek but the place of his birth is not known. He is claimed indeed, by the people of Parma, who shew his tomb but he refers his birth place to a country in which the Latin language was not vernacular He undoubtedly lived at Rome; but whether he was the same Macrobius who was grand chamberlain under Honorius and Theodosius II is uncertain The supposition that he held that office has probably been the only ground for imagining him to have been a Christian since the language of his writings, and the interlocutors in the dialogues are entirely heathen He wrote a commentary on Cicero's Somnium Scipionis, from which it appears he was a Platonist, and a dialogue entitled Saturnalia supposed to have been held at the festival of Saturn by a company of learned persons, whose names are those of some of the most eminent characters of that time The questions treated of —Jure Pontificio antiquity, mythology, history and poetry discussed in a miscellaneous way, with many references to the works of ancient authors and to the laws and customs of the Romans and although the style is by no means pure and the composition is without skill yet the work is of much utility as a help to classical erudition The best edition of this author is that of Gronovius Svo Lugd Bat 1670

MÆVIUS, a poet of inferior note in the Augustan age, who made himself known by ineffectual attacks on the character of the first writers of his time, as well as by his affected compositions. His name would have sunk in oblivion if Virgil had not ridiculed him in his third eclogue, and Horace in his tenth epode.

MAGAS, a king of Cyrene in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He reigned fifty years, and died B. C 257 Polyæn 2

MAGI, a religious sect among the eastern nations of the world, and particularly in Persia They had great influence in the political as well as religious affairs of the state, and a monarch seldom ascended the throne without their previous approbation. Zoroaster was founder of their sect. They paid particular homage to fire, which they deemed a deity, as pure in itself, and the purifier of all things In their religious tenets they had two principles, one good, the source of every thing good; and the other evil, from whence sprang all manner of ills Their professional skill in the mathematics and philosophy rendered every thing familiar to them, and from their knowledge of the phenomena of the heavens, the word Magi was applied to all learned men; and in process of time, the Magi, from their experience and profession, were confounded with the magicians who impose upon the superstitious and credulous. Hence the word Magi and Magicians became synonymous among the vulgar. Smerdis, one of the Magi, usurped the crown of Persia after the death of Cambyses, and the fraud was not discovered till the seven noble Persians conspired against the usurper, and elected Darius king From this circumstance there was a certain day on which none of the Magi were permitted to appear in public, as the populace had the privilege of murdering whomsoever of them they met. Strab.— Cic. de Div. 1, 23 et 41 —Herod 3, 62, &c.

MAGNA MATER, a name given to Cybele.

MAGNENTIUS, a German by birth, but who, from being a private soldier, rose to the chief employments in the Roman empire. He owed his distinguished station to the circumstance of his having been made a prisoner of war. To free himself from chains he joined the Roman troops, and became distinguished for valour. He was commander of the Jovian and Herculean bands stationed to guard the banks of the Rhine, at the time when Constans I. had incurred the contempt of the army on account of his indolence and voluptuousness. In 350 A. D. he ascended the throne, and, on the murder of Constans, was left without a rival in the Gallic and Italian prefectures At Rome he acted with great tyranny, and by his extortions was enabled to levy a very powerful army to maintain his usurped authority. So formidable did he appear, that Constantius, emperor of the east, and brother of the deceased Constans, sought a peace, on the terms of leaving him in possession of Gaul, Spain, and Britain, but his proposals were rejected. A war ensued, and Magnentius was totally defeated He fled to Aquileia, and afterwards obtained a victory over the van of the pursuing army at Ticinum Another defeat, however, soon followed, and Magnentius took refuge in Lyons, where he despatched himself with his own sword.

MAGNES, a shepherd of mount Ida, who found himself detained by the iron nails which were under his shoes as he walked over iron-ore This was no other than the magnet, which received its name from the person who had been first sensible of its power Some say that Magnes was a slave of Medea, whom that enchantress changed into a magnet. Orph. de Lajad. 10, 7.——A son of Æolus and Anaretta, who married Nais, by whom he had Pierus, &c. Apollod. 1, 7 ——A poet and musician of Smyrna, in the age of Gyges, king of Lydia.

MAGNESIA, a city of Lydia, described by Strabo as situate in a plain, at the foot of a mountain called Thorax, and not far from the Mæander. Hence, for distinction sake from Magnesia near mount Sipylus, it was usually styled Magnesia ad Mæandrum. In its immediate neighbourhood flowed the small stream Lethæus, which issued from mount Pactyas lying to the north, and joined the Mæander not far from this place. Magnesia, according to Pliny, was fifteen miles, and according to Artemidorus, 120 stadia, from Ephesus. Strabo makes it a city of Æolian origin, which is not contradicted by another statement of the same writer, when he makes the Magnetes to have been descended from the Delphians who occupied the Montes Didymi of Thessaly. Magnesia was sacked by the Cimmerians during their inroads into Asia Minor. It was afterwards held by the Milesians, and was one of the cities assigned, for his support, to Themistocles, by the king of Persia. The site of Magnesia answers to that of Inekbazar. Strab 14 - Plin. 5, 29.——A city in the northern part of Lydia, south-east of Cumæ, and in the immediate vicinity of the Hermus. It lay close to the foot of mount Sipylus, and hence for distinction's sake from the other Magnesia, was called Magnesia ad Sipylum. Its founder is not known, nor its earlier history. It was first brought into notice by the battle fought in its neighbourhood between Antiochus and the Romans. (187 B.C.) It was not a place of much importance under the Roman dominion, as the main road from Pergamus to Sardis passed on one side of it. At the close of the Mithridatic war the Romans gave it its freedom. It was frequently injured by earthquakes, and was one of the twelve cities destroyed by the earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, which that emperor, however, quickly rebuilt. It became afterwards the seat of a bishopric. The modern name is Mamina. Tacit Ann 2, 47.—Plin. 2, 84.——A district of Thessaly. The Greeks gave the name of Magnesia to that narrow portion of Thessaly which is confined between the Peneus and the Pagasæan bay to the north and south, and between the chain of Ossa and the sea on the west and east. The people of this district were called Magnetes, and appear to have been in possession of it from a very remote period. Strab. 9.—Plin. 4, 9.—Homer. Il. 2, 756.—Prud. Pyth. 4, 140 Aem. 5, 50.——A city of Magnesia, on the coast, opposite the island of Sciathus. It was conquered by Philip, son of Amyntas Demosth Olynth 1.

MAGO, a Carthaginian general sent against Dionysius tyrant of Sicily. He obtained a victory and granted peace to the conquered. In a battle which soon after followed this treaty of peace, Mago was killed His son of the same name succeeded to the command of the Carthaginian army but he disgraced himself by flying at the approach of Timoleon, who had come to assist the Syracusans. He was accused in the Carthaginian senate, and he prevented by suicide the execution of the sentence justly pronounced against him. His body was hung on a gibbet, and exposed to public ignominy ——A brother of Annibal the Great. He was present at the battle of Cannæ, and was deputed by his brother to carry to Carthage the news of the celebrated victory which had been obtained over the Roman armies. His arrival at Carthage was unexpected, and more powerfully to astonish his countrymen on account of the victory of Cannæ, he emptied in the senate-house the three bushels of golden rings which had been taken from the Roman knights slain in battle He was afterwards sent to Spain, where he defeated the two Scipios, and was himself, in another engagement, totally ruined. He retired to the Baleares, which he conquered; and one of the cities there still bears his name, and is called Portus Magonis (Port Mahon.) After this he landed in Italy with an army, and took possession of part of Insubria. He was defeated in a battle by Quintilius Varus, and died of a mortal wound 203 years before the Christian era. Liv 22, 46. 23, 12 30, 18. C. Nepos (Ann 8) gives a very different account of his death, and says, he either perished in a shipwreck, or was murdered by his servants. Perhaps Annibal had two brothers of that name ——A Carthaginian more known by the excellence of his writings than by his military exploits. He wrote twenty eight volumes upon husbandry, these were preserved by Scipio, at the taking of Carthage, and presented to the Roman senate. They were translated into Greek by Cassius Dionysius of Utica, and into Latin by order of the Roman senate, though Cato had already written so copiously upon the subject; and the Romans, as it has been observed, consulted the writings of Mago with greater earnestness than the books of the Sibylline verses. Cic. Or. 1, 58.—Plin. 18, 3.—Columella.—— A Carthaginian sent by his countrymen to assist the Romans against Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, with a fleet of 120 sail. This offer was politely refused by the Roman senate. This Mago was father of Asdrubal and Hannibal. Val. Max.

MAJORIANUS, Jul Valerius, an emperor of the western Roman empire, raised to the imperial throne, A D 457 He signalized himself by his private as well as public virtues He was massacred after a reign of thirty seven years by one of his generals, who envied in his master the character of an active, virtuous, and humane emperor.

MALA FORTUNA, the goddess of evil fortune, was worshipped among the Romans. Cic. de Nat D. 3

MALEA, a promontory in the south-eastern part of the island of Lesbos, now Cape St Marie.——A promontory in the Peloponnesus, forming the extreme point to the south-east, and separating the Laconic from the Argolic gulf. Strabo reckons 670 stadia from thence to Tænarus, including the sinuosities of the coast. Cape Malea was accounted by the ancients the most dangerous point in the circumnavigation of the peninsula, even as early as the days of Homer. Hence arose the proverbial expression, 'After doubling Cape Malea forget your country." It is now usually called Cape St Angelo, but sometimes Cape Malio. Strab. 8.— Hom. Od. 1, 80. 3, 287 —— A city of Phthiotis. Vid Malia.

MAMERTINI, a mercenary band of soldiers which passed from Campania into Sicily, at the request of Agathocles When they were in the service of Agathocles, they claimed the privilege of voting at the election of magistrates at Syracuse, and had recourse to arms to support their unlawful demands. The sedition was appeased by the authority of some leading men, and the Campanians were ordered to leave Sicily In their way to the coast they were received with great kindness by the people of Messana, and soon returned perfidy for hospitality They conspired against the inhabitants, murdered all the males in the city, and married their wives and daughters, and rendered themselves masters of the place. After this violence they assumed the name of Mamertini, and called their city Mamertina, from a provincial word, which in their language signified martial or warlike. The Mamertines were afterwards defeated by Hiero, and totally disabled from repairing their ruined affairs. Plut. in Pyrrh. &c.

MAMILIA LEX, de hominibus, A. U. C 642, whence the author of it, C. Mamilius, a tribune, got the surname of Limetanus. It ordained that there should be an uncultivated space of five feet broad left between farms, and if any dispute happened about this matter, that arbiters should be appointed by the prætor to determine it. The law of the twelve tables required three MAMILII, a plebeian family at Rome, descended from the Aborigines. They first lived at Tusculum, from whence they came to Rome. When he heard that Scipio the Roman commander was ill, he raised commotions in the provinces, for which he was severely reprimanded, and at last after repeated provocations, he destroyed himself. Liv 22, 21 26, 49. 27, 19. 28, 24. 29, 2 et 3.

MANDUBII, a people of Gaul, whose country lay near the sources of the Sequana, or Seine,

Their chief town was Alesia, or Alise. Cæs. B. G. 7, 78.

MANDUBRATIUS, a young Briton who came over to Cæsar in Gaul; his father Immanuentius was king in Britain, and had been put to death by order of Cassivelaunus. Cæs B. G. 5, 20.

MANDURIA, a city of Apulia, between Tarentum and Brundusium, where Archidamus, the Spartan king, was killed in a battle, whilst assisting the Tarentines against the Lucanians. It still retains its ancient name. Plut. Vit. Agid.—Athen. 12, 9.—Strab. 6.

MANES, a name generally applied by the ancients to the souls when separated from the body. They were reckoned among the infernal deities, and generally supposed to preside over the burying places, and the monuments of the dead. They were worshipped with great solemnity, particularly by the Romans, and the number three was considered as sacred to them, in consequence of which all invocations to them were repeated three times and with becoming solemnity. The augurs always invoked them when they proceeded to exercise their sacerdotal offices. Virgil introduces his hero as sacrificing to the infernal deities, and to the Manes, a victim whose blood was received in a ditch. The word manes is supposed to be derived from Mania, who was by some reckoned the mother of those tremendous deities. Others derive it from manare, quod per omnia ætheres terrenaque manabant, because they filled the air, particularly in the night, and were intent to molest and disturb the peace of mankind. Some say, that manes comes from manis, an old Latin word which signified good or propitious. The word manes is differently used by ancient authors, sometimes it is taken for the infernal regions, and sometimes it is applied to the deities of Pluto's kingdom, whence the epitaphs of the Romans were always superscribed with D M Dis Manibus, to remind the sacrilegious and profane, not to molest the monuments of the dead, which were guarded with such sanctity. Propert 1, 19.—Virg G. 4, 469. Æn. 3, &c.—Horat Sat. 1, 8, 29.

MANETHO, an ancient Egyptian historian, who was high priest of Heliopolis, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, about B C 304. He wrote in Greek a history of Egypt, from the earliest times to the last year of Nectanebis, and pretended that he had taken it from the sacred pillars of the first Hermes Trismegistus, the inscriptions on which, after the flood, were translated into Greek, but written in the sacred characters, and deposited in the sacred recesses of Egypt. The manifest absurdity of this pretension induces several writers to think, that some mistake or corruption has taken place in the passage of Eusebius which relates it. The work of Manetho, which is lost, consisted of three parts, the first of which contained the history of the gods or heroes, and the second and third that of thirty dynasties of kings, which, having been epitomized by Julius Africanus, are recorded by Eusebius. Several fragments of Manetho are preserved by Josephus, in his work against Apion.

MANIA, a goddess, supposed to be the mother of the Lares and Manes.

MANILIA LEX, by Manilius the tribune, A. U. C. 678. It required that all the forces of Lucullus and his province, together with Bithynia, which was then under the command of Glabrio, should be delivered to Pompey, and that this general should, without any delay, declare war against Mithridates, and still retain the command of the Roman fleet, and the empire of the Mediterranean, as before.—Another, which permitted all those whose fathers had not been invested with public offices, to be employed in the management of affairs.—A woman notorious for her debaucheries. Juv. 6, 24.

MANILIUS, Marcus, a Latin poet and astronomer, supposed to have lived in the first century of the Christian era. Nothing is known, with certainty, of his family or country, but it is probable that he was a native of Rome. He wrote a poem, entitled Astronomicon, of which five books are extant, treating of the fixed stars; and there appears to have been a sixth, relating to the planets. The best editions of this work are, that of Bentley, 8vo, Lond. 1739, and that of Pingré, 2 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1786. Creech gave a translation of it into English verse.—An epigrammatic poet, one of whose epigrams is cited by Varro.—Marcus, a Roman consul, A. U. C. 605. He left a work on the Civil Law, and another entitled Manilii Monumenta.

MANLIA LEX, by the tribune P. Manlius, A. U. C. 577. It revived the office of treceri epulones, first instituted by Numa. The epulones were priests, who prepared banquets for Jupiter and the gods at public festivals, &c.

MANLIUS TORQUATUS, a celebrated Roman, whose youth was distinguished by a lively and cheerful disposition. These promising talents were, however, impeded by a difficulty of speaking, and the father, unwilling to expose his son's timidity at Rome, detained him in the country. The behaviour of the father was publicly censured, and Marius Pomponius the tribune cited him to answer for his unfatherly behaviour to his son. Young Manlius was informed of this, and with a dagger in his hand he entered the house of the tribune, and made him solemnly promise that he would drop the accusation. This action of Manlius endeared him to the people, and soon after he was chosen military tribune. In a war against the Gauls, he accepted the challenge of one of the enemy, whose gigantic stature and ponderous arms had rendered him terrible and almost invincible in the eyes of the Romans. The Gaul was conquered, and Manlius stripped him of his arms, and from the golden chain (torques) which he took from the enemy's neck, he was ever after surnamed Torquatus. Manlius was the first Roman who was raised to the dictatorship, without having been previously consul. The severity of Torquatus to his son has been deservedly censured. This father had the courage and heart to put to death his son, because he had engaged one of the enemy, and obtained an honourable victory, without his previous permission. This uncommon rigour displeased many of the Romans; and though Torquatus was honoured with a triumph, and commended by the senate for his services, yet the Roman youth showed their disapprobation of the consul's severity, by refusing him at his return the homage which every other conqueror received. Some time after the censorship was offered to him, but he refused it, observing, that the people could not bear his severity, nor he the vices of the people. From the rigour of Torquatus, all edicts, and actions of severity and justice have been called Manliance edicta. Liv. 7, 10.—Val. Max. 6, 9.—Marcus, a celebrated Roman, whose valour was displayed in the field of battle, even at the early age of sixteen. When Rome was taken by the Gauls, Manlius with a body of his countrymen fled into the Capitol, which he defended when it was suddenly surprised in the night by the enemy. This action gained him the surname of Capitolinus, and the geese, which by their clamour had awakened him to arm himself in his own defence, were ever after held sacred among the Romans. A law which Manlius proposed, to abolish the taxes on the common people, raised the senators against him. The dictator C. Cossus, seized him as a rebel, but the people put on mourning, and delivered from prison their common father. This did not, in the least, check his ambition; he continued to raise factions, and even secretly attempt to make himself absolute, till at last the tribunes of the people themselves became his accusers. He was tried in the Campus Martius; but when the distant view of the Capitol which Manlius had saved, seemed to influence the people in his favour, the court of justice was removed, and Manlius was condemned. He was thrown down from the Tarpeian rock. A. U. C. 371 and to render his ignominy still greater, none of his family were afterwards permitted to bear the surname of Marcus, and the place where his house had stood was deemed unworthy to be inhabited. Liv. 5, 31. 6. 5.—Flor. 1, 13 et 26.—*Val. He was honoured with a triumph at his return though it was at first strongly opposed. Flor. 3, 11.—Liv. 38, 12, &c.——Caius, or Aulus, a senator sent to Athens to collect the best and wisest laws of Solon. He died of a wound which he had received in a battle.——Another, who in his prætorship reduced Sardinia. He was afterwards made dictator.——Another, who was defeated by a rebel army of slaves in Sicily.——Another, who conspired with Catiline against the Roman republic, and was slain in the battle against Petreius. Cic. Cat. 3, 6.—Sall. Cat. 27. 32, 59 et 60.——A Roman appointed judge between his son Silanus and the province of Macedonia. When all the parties had been heard, the father said, "It is evident that my son has suffered himself to be bribed therefore I deem him unworthy of the republic and of my house, and I order him to depart from my presence." Silanus was so struck at the rigour of his father, that he hanged himself. Val. Max. 5, 5.

MANNUS, the son of the German god Tuiston, of whom that nation believed themselves to be the descendants. Tacit. G. 2.

MANSUETUS, J., a friend of Vitellius, who entered the Roman armies, and left his son, then very young, at home. The son was promoted by Galba, and soon after met a detachment of the partisans of Vitellius in which his father was. A battle was fought, and Mansuetus was wounded by the hand of his son, &c. Tacit. Hist. 3. 25.

MANTINEA, one of the most ancient and celebrated cities of Arcadia, said to have received its name from Mantineus, the son of Lycaon. It was situated at the foot of mount Artemisius on the borders of Argolis, and on the banks of the little river Ophis. It is famous for the battle which was fought there between Epaminondas at the head of the Thebans, and the combined forces of Lacedæmon, Achaia, Elis, Athens and Arcadia, about 363 years before Christ. The Theban general was killed in the engagement, and from that time Thebes lost its power and consequence among the Grecian states. Paus. 8, 8.—Xen. Hell. 7, 5, 14.—*Diod. MANTINŒUM OPPIDUM, a town of Corsica, now supposed to be Bastia.

MANTO, a daughter of the prophet Tiresias, endowed with the gift of prophecy. She was made prisoner by the Argives when the city of Thebes fell into their hands, and as she was the worthiest part of the booty, the conquerors sent her to Apollo, the god of Delphi, as the most valuable present they could make. Manto, often called Daphne, remained for some time at Delphi, where she officiated as priestess, and where she gave oracles. From Delphi she came to Claros in Ionia where she established an oracle of Apollo. Here she married Rhadius the sovereign of the country, by whom she had a son called Mopsus. Manto afterwards visited Italy, where she married Tiberinus the king of Alba, or, as the poets mention, the god of the river Tiber. From this marriage sprang Ocnus, who built a town in the neighbourhood, which in honour of his mother, he called Mantua. Manto, according to a certain tradition, was struck at the misfortunes which afflicted Thebes, her native country, that she gave way to her sorrow, and was turned into a fountain. Some suppose her to be the same who conducted Æneas into hell, and who sold the Sibylline books to Tarquin the Proud. She received divine honours after death. Virg. Æn. 1, 199. 10, 199.—*Ovid. MANTUA, a city of Gallia Cisalpina, situate on an island in the Mincius, south east of Brixia, and south of the lake Benacus. It was of Tuscan origin, and was founded by Ocnus, the son of the prophetess Manto in honour of whom it received its name. When Cremona, which had followed the interest of Brutus, was given to the soldiers of Octavius, Mantua also, which was in the neighbourhood, shared the common calamity, though it had favoured the party of Augustus, and many of the inhabitants tyrannically deprived of their possessions. Virgil, who was among them, and a native of the town, and from thence often called Mantuanus, applied for redress to Augustus, and obtained it by means of his poetical talents. Strab. 5.—*Virg. MARATHON, a village of Attica, ten mile, from Athens, celebrated for the victory which the 10,000 Athenians and 1000 Platæans, under the command of Miltiades, gained over the Persian army, consisting of 100,000 foot and 10,00 horse, or, according to Val. Maximus, of 300,00 or, as Justin says, of 600 000, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes, on the 28th of Sept 490, B. C. In this battle, according to Herodotus, the Athenians lost only 192 men, and the Persians 6,300. Justin has raised the loss of the Persians, in this expedition and in the battle, to 200,000 men. To commemorate this immortal victory of their countrymen, the Greeks raised small columns, with the names inscribed on the tombs of the fallen heroes. It was also in the plains of Marathon that Theseus overcame a celebrated bull, which ravaged the neighbouring country. Erigone is called Marathonia virgo, as being born at Marathon Stat. Sylv. 5, 3, 74.—C. Nep. in Milt.—Herod. 6, &c.—Justin. 2, 9.—Val. Max. 5, 3.—Plut. in Parall.

MARCELLA, a daughter of Octavia the sister of Augustus by Marcellus. She married Agrippa

MARCELLINUS AMMIANUS, a Roman historian of the fourth century, but of Greek parentage, and, as appears by a letter addressed to him by Libanius, born at Antioch. In his youth he followed the profession of arms, and was enrolled among the Protectores Domestici, or household guards, consisting chiefly of young men of family. He served in the East, in Gaul, and in the Persian expedition of Julian. In the year 374 he visited Rome, where he wrote his history of Roman affairs, from Nerva to the death of Valens in 378. The whole consisted of thirty-eight books, of which eighteen alone remain, and begin at the seventeenth year of Constantius, A. D. 353. The style of Ammianus is diffuse and rude; which is not extraordinary, considering that he was a Greek who wrote in the Latin language, and one who had passed much of his life in active pursuits. The candid manner in which he speaks of Christianity has induced some writers to deem him a christian, but the emperor Julian and Paganism are treated of by him in terms which would be still more extraordinary in a christian. The probability is, that Ammianus was zealous in neither belief, and addressing himself to all parties, spoke with moderation on religious points of difference, which a sensible pagan might readily do. His general accuracy and honesty have received the unqualified suffrage of Gibbon, and, indeed, of most other writers. The best editions of Ammianus are that of Ernesti, Lips. 1773, 8vo, and that of Wagner, completed by Erfurdt, Lips. 1808, 3 vols 8vo

MARCELLUS, Marcus Claudius a famous Roman general, who, after the first Punic war, had the management of an expedition against the Gauls of Insubria, where he obtained the Spolia opima, by killing with his own hand Viridomarus the king of the enemy. Such success rendered him popular, and soon after he was intrusted to oppose Annibal in Italy. He was the first Roman who obtained some advantage over this celebrated Carthaginian, and showed his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible. The troubles which were raised in Sicily by the Carthaginians at the death of Hieronymus, alarmed the Romans, and Marcellus, in his third consulship, was sent with a powerful force against Syracuse. He attacked it by sea and land, but his operations proved ineffectual, and the invention and industry of a philosopher (Vid. Archimedes) were able to baffle all the efforts, and to destroy all the great and stupendous machines and military engines of the Romans, during three successive years. The perseverance of Marcellus at last obtained the victory. The inattention of the inhabitants during their nocturnal celebration of the festivals of Diana, favoured his operations; he forcibly entered the town, and made himself master of it. The conqueror enriched the capital of Italy with the spoils of Syracuse, and when he was accused of rapaciousness, for stripping the conquered city of all its paintings and ornaments, he confessed that he had done it to adorn the public buildings of Rome, and to introduce a taste for the fine arts and elegance of the Greeks among his countrymen. After the conquest of Syracuse, Marcellus was called upon by his country to oppose a second time Annibal. In this campaign he behaved with greater vigour than before; the greatest part of the towns of the Samnites, which had revolted, were recovered by force of arms, and 3000 of the soldiers of Annibal made prisoners. Some time after an engagement with the Carthaginian general proved unfavourable; Marcellus had the disadvantage; but on the morrow a more successful skirmish vindicated his military character, and the honour of the Roman soldiers. Marcellus, however, was not sufficiently vigilant against the snares of his adversary. He imprudently separated himself from his camp, and was killed in an ambuscade in the sixtieth year of his age, in his fifth consulship, A. U. C. 546. His body was honoured with a magnificent funeral by the conqueror, and his ashes were conveyed in a silver urn to his son. Marcellus claims our commendation for his private as well as public virtues; and the humanity of the general will ever be remembered, who, at the surrender of Syracuse, wept at the thought that many were going to be exposed to the avarice and rapaciousness of an incensed soldiery, which the policy of Rome and the laws of war rendered inevitable. Virg. Æn. 6, 855.—Paterc. 2, 38.—Plut. in Vita, &c.—One of his descendants, who bore the same name, signalized himself in the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey, by his firm attachment to the latter. He was banished by Cæsar, but afterwards recalled at the request of the senate. Cicero undertook his defence in an oration which is still extant.—The grandson of Pompey a friend rendered himself popular by his universal benevolence and affability. He was son of Marcellus by Octavia the sister of Augustus. He married Julia that emperor's daughter, and was publicly intended as his successor. The suddenness of his death, at the early age of eighteen, was the cause of much lamentation at Rome, particularly in the family of Augustus, and Virgil procured himself great favours by celebrating the virtues of this amiable prince. (Vid. Octavia.) Marcellus was buried at the public expense Virg Æn. 6, 883.—Suet. in Aug.—*Plut in Marcell Senec. MARCIA LEX, by Marcus Censorinus. It forbade any man to be invested with the office of censor more than once.

MARCIA, the wife of Regilus. When she heard that her husband had been put to death at Carthage in the most excruciating manner, she retorted the punishment, and shut up some Carthaginian prisoners in a barrel, which she had previously filled with sharp nails. The senate was obliged to stop the wantonness of her cruelty. Dion. 24.—A favourite of the emperor Commodus, whom he poisoned.—A vestal virgin, punished for her incontinence.—A daughter of Philip, who married Cato the censor. Her husband gave her to his friend Hortensius for the sake of procreating children, and after his death he took her again to his own house.——A daughter of Cato of Utica.

MARCIANA, a sister of the emperor Trajan, who, on account of her public and private virtues and her amiable disposition, was declared Augusta and empress by her brother. She died A. D. 112.

MARCIANOPOLIS, a city of Mœsia Inferior, to the west of Odessus, founded by Trajan, and named in honour of his sister Marcia. It is now Pravadi. Ammian. Marcell. 27, 4.

MARCIANUS, a native of Thrace, born of an obscure family. After he had for some time served in the army as a common soldier, he was made private secretary to one of the officers of Theodosius. His winning address and uncommon talents raised him to higher stations; and on the death of Theodosius the second, A. D. 450, he was invested with the imperial purple in the east. The subjects of the Roman empire had reason to be satisfied with their choice. Marcianus showed himself active and resolute, and when Attila, the barbarous king of the Huns asked of the emperor the annual tribute, which the indolence and cowardice of his predecessors had regularly paid, the successor of Theodosius firmly said, that he kept his gold for his friends, but that iron was the metal which he had prepared for his enemies. In the midst of universal popularity Marcianus died, after a reign of six years, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, as he was making warlike preparations against the barbarians that had invaded Africa. His death was lamented, and indeed his merit was great, since his reign has been distinguished by the appellation of the golden age. Marcianus married Pulcheria, the sister of his predecessor. It is said, that in the years of his obscurity he found a man who had been murdered, and that he had the humanity to give him a private burial, for which circumstance he was accused of the homicide and imprisoned. He was condemned to lose his life, and the sentence would have been executed, had not the real murderer been discovered, and convinced the world of the innocence of Marcianus.——Capella a writer. Vid. Capella.

MARCIUS, SARINUS M was the progenitor of the Marcian family at Rome. He came to Rome with Numa, and it was he who advised Numa to accept of the crown which the Romans offered to him. He attempted to make himself king of Rome, in opposition to Tullus Hostilius, and when his efforts proved unsuccessful, he killed himself. His son, who married a daughter of Numa, was made high priest by his father-in-law. He was father of Ancus Marcius. Plut. in Numa.—Liv. 1, 32.——A Roman who accused Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, of misdemeanour, in the Roman senate.——A Roman consul, defeated by the Samnites. He was more successful against the Carthaginians, and obtained a victory, &c.——Rutilus, a consul who obtained a victory over the Etrurians, and triumphed without the authority of the senate. He was four times consul. Liv. 7 17, &c.——Lucius, a Roman knight, who, after the murder of the Scipios, took the command of the armies in Spain, and distinguished himself by his valour and great prudence of mind. Scipio the younger, who superseded him, highly esteemed him, though the Romans were jealous of his success and of his services. Liv. 25 et 26, &c.——Q. Rex, a consul with Metellus, A. U. C. 686, who married the sister of Clodius. He was appointed over Cilicia, but either through resentment or disaffection, he did not second the efforts of Lucullus in the Mithridatic war, and in vain claimed a triumph on his return to Rome. During Catiline's conspiracy, he went to Pesaro to support the authority of the senate. Dio 35, 4, &c.—Cic. Pis 4.—Sallust. Cat. 30, &c.——A orator, who built a famous aqueduct called aqua Marcia, which conveyed excellent salubrious waters to the city from the mountains of the Peligni, about sixty miles from Rome. From Tibur to the city this celebrated aqueduct was raised on arches for nine miles, and long remained a monument of Roman ingenuity and national perseverance. Plin. 31, 3. 36, 15.—Dio 49, 42.—*Slat. MARCOMANNI, a nation of Germany, in the south eastern part of the country. According to some authorities their original seats were in Mo ravia, whence, on being hard pressed by the Romans, they retired into what is now Bohemia. Other writers, however, such as Cluver, Adelung, Marcay, &c., make them to have lived between the Maine and Neckar, previous to their departure for Bohemia. They were subdued by the emperors Trajan and Antoninus. Their name denotes "borderers," i. e. men of the marches. Vell. Paterc. 2, 109.—Tacit. Ann. 2, 46 et 62. G. 42.

They are represented as a plundering race. Herod. 1, 125.—Arrian. Hist. Ind. 40.—A nation dwelling to the south of Bactriana and to the north of the chain of Paropamisus. Pliny says they extended from Caucasus to Bactriana, in which he evidently followed the historians of Alexander, who, out of flattery to that prince, called the Paropamisus by the name of Caucasus. Plin. 6, 16.

MARDIA, a place of Thrace, famous for a battle between Constantine and Licinius, A. D. 315.

MARDONIUS, a general of Xerxes, who, after the defeat of his master at Thermopylæ and Salamis, was left in Greece with an army of 300,000 chosen men, to subdue the country, and reduce it under the power of Persia. His operations were rendered useless by the courage and vigilance of the Greeks; and, in a battle at Platæa, Mardonius was defeated and left among the slain, B. C. 479. He had been commander of the armies of Darius in Europe, and it was chiefly by his advice that Xerxes invaded Greece. He was son in-law of Darius. Plut. in Arist.—Herod. 6, 7 et 8.—Diod. 11.—Justin. 2, 13, &c.

MARDUS, a river of Media, falling into the Caspian sea.

MARE MORTUUM, a salt lake in Judea, into which the Jordan discharges itself, together with some smaller streams. On the east and west it is inclosed between two ranges of mountains. According to the ancient authorities, it is seventy-two miles in length, and between eighteen and nineteen in breadth at the widest part; but if modern observations may be depended upon, it has not at present half that extent. It rises and falls at different seasons of the year, according to the greater or smaller volume of water which the Jordan and the other streams bring down from the mountains; and its dimensions undergo a corresponding change; but it would seem never now to reach its ancient limit, a sandy wall which traverses the valley at its southern extremity, and prevents the waters from flowing, as they are supposed originally to have done, into the Red sea. The water of the lake is transparent, but extremely bitter, saline, and pungent, being impregnated with the muriates of soda, magnesia, and lime, in the proportion of twenty-four to a hundred grains of the water, a degree of density not to be found in any other natural water, and which renders it remarkably buoyant to the swimmer. Bitumen is continually thrown up to the surface of the sea, which floats and is driven ashore by the winds. The Arabs then gather it for medicinal use or sale. We learn from the Mosaic history, that the vale of Siddim, which is now occupied by the lake, was full of pits of bitumen. The surrounding plain is strewed with large fragments of rock-salt, nitre, and fine sulphur brought down by the rains from the hills, which are composed partly of salt and partly of a soft sandstone. The very materials are thus at hand, which were employed as the instrument of the miraculous destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and it would appear that the whole plain underwent a convulsion, the effect, perhaps, of a bituminous explosion, simultaneous with the shower of inflamed sulphur poured upon the cities, to which the lake owes its formation. In Scripture, it is called the Sea of the Plain, the Salt Sea, and the East Sea, by Josephus and the classic writers, the Asphaltic (or Bituminous) lake, by the Arabs, it is still called Bahr Louth and Bahr el Amout (the sea of Lot or of the dead). Plin. 5, 6.—*Joseph. MAREOTIS, a lake of Egypt, to the south of Alexandria, now called Maréout. It had been for ages dried up, when, in 1801, the English cut the walls of the old canal which formed a dike, separating the low ground from the lake of Aboukir on the east, when the Mareotic lake was re produced, the water in the former basin falling six feet, and more than forty villages were overwhelmed by a flood of salt water rushing in from the sea. *Virg. MARGIANA, a country of Asia, touching to the south on Aria to the east on Bactriana, to the north on Sogdiana and Scythia, and to the west upon Hyrcania and Parthia. It derived its name from the river Margus, which rises in the range of Paropamisus, and flows into the Oxus. Though surrounded by deserts, it was exceedingly fertile, its vines were said to grow to such an uncommon size, that two men could scarcely grasp one stem, and the clusters of grapes measured more than two feet long. Margiana was formerly considered as a district of Hyrcania, and was first raised into a province by the successors of Alexander. The Romans who were taken prisoners after the defeat of Crassus, were sent hither and dispersed over the country, where many of them settled and intermarried with the inhabitants; hence they were unwilling to return home, and several of them even hid themselves from those who were sent, during the reign of Augustus, to take them back to Rome. Plol. 5. —Plin. 6, 16.—Strab. 11.—Horat. Od. 3, 5, 5.

MARGITES, a man against whom, as some suppose, Homer wrote a poem, to ridicule his superficial knowledge, and to expose his affectation. When Demosthenes wished to prove Alexander an inveterate enemy to Athens, he called him another Margites.

MARGUS, a river of Mœsia Superior, which rises in mount Scomius, and after receiving the waters of the Angrus, falls into the Danube to the west of Viminacium. It is now the Morava. ——A river of Margiana, rising in the range of Paropamisus, and flowing into the Oxus north-west of Nissæa. Now the Murghab. Plin. 6, 16.

MARIANA, a city of the Caingli, in the south-eastern part of Arabia Felix, thirteen miles north-east of Muza. It is now Mureb. ——A city of the Sabæi, in Arabia Felix. Plin 6, 28.

MARIA LEX, by C. Marius, the tribune, A. U. C. 633. It ordered the planks called pontes, on which the people stood up to give their votes in the comitia to be narrower, that no other might stand there to hinder the proceedings of the assembly by appeal, or other disturbances. ——Another, called also Porcia, by L. Marius and Porcius, tribunes, A. U. C. 691. It fined a certain sum of money such commanders as gave a false account to the Roman senate of the number of the slain in a battle. It obliged them to swear to the truth of their return when they entered the city, according to the best computation.

MARIANA FOSSA, a canal cut by Marius from the river Rhone, through the Campus Lapideus, into the lake Mastramela. It was probably near the modern Martigues. Mela, 2, 5.—Plin 3, 4.

MARIANDINI, a people of Bithynia, in the east of the river Sangarius. In the north-eastern part of their district was the powerful city of Heraclea Pontica, and to the north-west of this was a small peninsular promontory, called Acherusia Chersonesus. Through a cavern in this promontory Hercules was fabled to have dragged Cerberus from hell. Mela, 1, 19.—Val. Flacc. Arg. 4, 171.—Herod. 1, 28. 7, 72.

MARIANUS, a surname given to Jupiter from a temple built to his honour by Marius. It was in this temple that the Roman senate assembled to recal Cicero, a circumstance communicated to him in a dream. Val. Max. 1, 7.

MARICA, a nymph of the river Liris, near Minturnæ. She married king Faunus, by whom she had king Latinus, and she was afterwards called Fauna and Fatua, and honoured as a goddess. The nymph Marica had a grove and temple near Marica; hence the words Maricæ littora are used by Horace as a designation for the region round the city itself. Some suppose the nymph Marica to have been the same with Circe. Virg. Æn. 7, 47.—Lucan. 2, 424.—Liv. 27, 37.—Horat. Od. 3, 17, 7.

MARIS, a river of Scythia. ——A son of Armisodares, who assisted Priam against the Greeks, and was killed by Antilochus. Hom. Il. 16, 317.

MARITA LEX. Vid. Julia Lex de Maritandis.

MARISUS, a river of Dacia, falling into the Tibiscus. It is now the Maros. Strab. 7.

MARIUS, C. a celebrated Roman, who, from a peasant, became one of the most powerful and cruel tyrants that Rome ever beheld during her consular government. He was born at Arpinum, of obscure and illiterate parents. His father bore the same name as himself, and his mother was called Fulcinia He forsook the meaner occupations of the country for the camp, and signalized himself under Scipio at the siege of Numantia. The Roman general saw the courage and intrepidity of young Marius, and foretold the era of his future greatness By his assiduous and intrigues at Rome, while he exercised the inferior offices of the state, he rendered himself known; and his marriage with Julia, who was of the family of the Cæsars, contributed in some measure to raise him to consequence. He passed into Africa as lieutenant to the consul Metellus against Jugurtha, and after he had there ingratiated himself with the soldiers, and raised enemies to his friend and benefactor, he returned to Rome, and canvassed for the consulship. The extravagant promises which he made to the people, and his malevolent insinuations about the conduct of Metellus, proved successful He was elected, and appointed to finish the war against Jugurtha. He showed himself capable in every degree to succeed to Metellus. Jugurtha was defeated and afterwards betrayed into the hands of the Romans by the perfidy of Bocchus. No sooner was Jugurtha conquered than new honours and fresh trophies awaited Marius The provinces of Rome were suddenly invaded by an army of 300,000 barbarians, and Marius was the only man whose activity and boldness could resist so powerful an enemy He was elected consul, and sent against the Teutones The war was prolonged, and Marius was a third and fourth time invested with the consulship. At last two engagements were fought, and not less than 200,000 of the barbarian forces of the Ambrones and Teutones were slain in the field of battle, and 90,000 made prisoners The following year was also marked by a total overthrow of the Cimbri, another horde of barbarians, in which 140,000 were slaughtered by the Romans, and 60,000 taken prisoners. After such honourable victories, Marius, with his colleague Catulus, entered Rome in triumph, and for his eminent services, he deserved the appellation of the third founder of Rome. He was elected consul a sixth time; and, as his intrepidity had delivered his country from its foreign enemies, he sought employment at home, and his restless ambition began to raise seditions and to oppose the growing power of Sylla. This was the cause and the foundation of a civil war Sylla refused to deliver up the command of the forces with which he was empowered to prosecute the Mithridatic war, and he resolved to oppose the authors of a demand which he considered as arbitrary and improper He advanced to Rome, and Marius was obliged to save his life by flight The unfavourable winds prevented him from seeking a safer retreat in Africa, and he was left on the coasts of Campania, where the emissaries of his enemy soon discovered him in a marsh, where he had plunged himself in the mud, and left only his mouth above the surface for respiration He was violently dragged to the neighbouring town of Minturnæ, and the magistrates, all devoted to the interest of Sylla, passed sentence of immediate death on their magnanimous prisoner. A Gaul was commanded to cut off his head in the dungeon, but the stern countenance of Marius disarmed the courage of the executioner, and, when he heard the exclamation of Tune homo, audes occidere Caium Marium, the dagger dropped from his hand. Such an uncommon adventure awakened the compassion of the inhabitants of Minturnæ. They released Marius from prison, and favoured his escape to Africa, where he joined his son Marius, who had been arming the princes of the country in his cause. Marius landed near the walls of Carthage, and he received no small consolation at the sight of the venerable ruins of a once powerful city, which, like himself, had been exposed to calamity, and felt the cruel vicissitude of fortune. This place of his retreat was soon known, and the governor of Africa, to conciliate the favours of Sylla, compelled Marius to fly to a neighbouring island. He soon after learned that Cinna had embraced his cause at Rome when the Roman senate had stripped him of his consular dignity and bestowed it upon one of his enemies This intelligence animated Marius; he set sail to assist his friend, only at the head of a thousand men. His army, however, gradually increased, and he entered Rome like a ferocious conqueror. His enemies were inhumanly sacrificed to his fury, Rome was filled with blood and he who had once been called the father of his country, marched through the streets of the city, attended by a number of assassins, who immediately slaughtered all those whose salutations were not answered by their leader. Such were the signals for bloodshed When Marius and Cinna had sufficiently gratified their resentment, they made themselves consuls, but Marius, already worn out with old age and infirmities, died sixteen days after he had been honoured with the consular dignity for the seventh time, B C 86 His end was probably hastened by the uncommon quantities of wine which he drank when labouring under a dangerous disease, to remove, by intoxication, the stings of a guilty conscience. Such was the end of Marius, who rendered himself conspicuous by his victories, and by his cruelty As he was brought up in the midst of poverty and among peasants, it will not appear wonderful that he always betrayed rusticity in his behaviour, and despised in others those polished manners and that studied address which education had denied him. He hated the conversation of the learned only because he was illiterate, and, if he occasionally appeared an example of sobriety and temperance, he owed these advantages to the years of obscurity which he had passed at Arpinum. His countenance was stern, his voice firm and imperious, and his disposition untractable. He always betrayed the greatest timidity in the public assemblies, as he had not been early taught to make eloquence and oratory his pursuit. He was in the seventieth year of his age when he died, and Rome seemed to rejoice at the fall of a man whose ambition had proved fatal to so many of her citizens. His only qualifications were those of a great general, and with these he rendered himself the most illustrious and powerful of the Romans, because he was the only one whose ferocity seemed capable to oppose the barbarians of the north. The manner of his death, according to some opinions, remains doubtful, though some have charged him with the crime of suicide Among the instances which are mentioned of his firmness this may be recorded: a swelling in the leg obliged him to apply to a physician, who urged the necessity of cutting it off. Marius gave it, and saw the operation performed without a distortion of the face, and without a groan. The physician asked the other, and Marius gave it with equal composure. Plut. in Vita.—Patere.

He made himself consul in the twenty-fifth year of his age, and murdered all the senators who opposed his ambitious views. He was defeated by Sylla, and fled to Praeneste, where he was slain in attempting to escape, or as others say he killed himself. Flut in Mario.——Priscus, a governor of Africa, accused of extortion in his province by Pliny the younger, and banished from Italy. Plin. 2, ep 11.—Juv. 1, 48.——One of the Greek fathers of the fifth century, whose works were edited by Garner, 2 vols fol Paris, 1673; and by Baluze, Paris, 1683.——M Aurelius, a native of Gaul, who, from the mean employment of a blacksmith, became one of the generals of Gallienus, and at last caused himself to be saluted emperor. Three days after this elevation, a man who had shared his poverty without partaking of his more prosperous fortune, publicly assassinated him, and he was killed by a sword which he himself had made in the time of his obscurity. Marius has been often celebrated for his great strength, and it is confidently reported that he could stop with one of his fingers only the wheel of a chariot in its most rapid course.——Maximus, a Latin writer, who published an account of the Roman emperors from Trajan to Alexander, now lost. His compositions were entertaining, and executed with great exactness and fidelity. Some have accused him of inattention, and complain that his writings abounded with many fabulous and insignificant stories.——Celsus, a friend of Galba, saved from death by Otho, &c. *Tacit. MARON, a priest of Apollo in Thrace, near Maronea. Homer. Od. 9, 179.——A follower of Osiris, well acquainted with the art of rearing the vine. Athenæus makes him a follower of Bacchus. He was fabled to have been the founder of Maronea in Thrace. Dod. Sic. 1, 18.—Athen 1, 2.

MARONEA, now Maro na, a town of Thrace, south-east of the Bistonis Palus, on the coast. It is said to have been founded by Maron, a follower of Bacchus It was famous for its wine. Herod. 7, 109.—Dod. Sic. 1, 18.—Plin. 14, 4.

MARPESIA, a celebrated queen of the Amazons, famed for her conquests. Justin 2, 4.

MARPESSA, a daughter of the Evenus who married Idas, by whom she had Cleopatra, the wife of Meleager. Marpessa was tenderly loved by her husband; and when Apollo endeavoured to carry her away, Idas followed the ravisher with a bow and arrows, resolved on revenge. Apollo and Idas were separated by Jupiter, who permitted Marpessa to go with the one of the two lovers whom she most approved of. She returned to her husband. Homer. Il. 9, 559.—*Ovid. Hence the expression of Virgil, Marpesia cautes. This mountain was situate to the west of the harbour of Marmora. Virg. Æn. 6, 471.—Plin. 36, 4 et 19

MARRUCINI, a people of Italy, occupying a narrow slip of territory, on the right bank of the river Aternus, between the Vestini to the north, and the Frentani to the south, and between the Peligni and the sea towards the west and east. They were said to be descended from the Marsi. Their chief town was Teate, now Chieti, a populous and flourishing place. Polyb. 2, 24.—Sil. Ital. 8, 522.

MARRUVIUM, a town of the Sabines, corresponding with the modern Morro Vecchio.——The chief city of the Marsi, situate on the eastern shore of the Lacus Fucinus, and answering to the modern San Benedetto. Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, 12.

MARS, the god of war among the ancients, was the son of Jupiter and Juno, according to Hesiod, Homer, and all the Greek poets, or of Juno alone, according to Ovid. This goddess, as the poet mentions, wished to become a mother without the assistance of the other sex, like Jupiter, who had produced Minerva all armed from his head, and she was shown a flower by Flora in the plains near Olenus, whose very touch made women pregnant. (Vid. Juno.) The education of Mars was intrusted by Juno to the god Priapus, who instructed him in dancing and in every manly exercise. His trial before the celebrated court of the Areopagus, according to the authority of some authors, for the murder of Halirrhothius, forms an interesting epoch in history. (Vid Areopagita.) The amours of Mars and Venus are greatly celebrated. The god of war gained the affections of Venus, and obtained the gratification of his desires; but Apollo, who was conscious of their familiarities, informed Vulcan of his wife's debaucheries, and awakened his suspicions. Vulcan secretly laid a net around the bed, and the two lovers were exposed, in each other's arms to the ridicule and satire of all the gods, till Neptune prevailed upon the husband to set them at liberty. This unfortunate discovery so provoked Mars, that he changed into a cock his favourite Alectryon, whom he had stationed at the door to watch against the approach of the sun, (Vid. Alectryon) and Venus also showed her resentment by persecuting with the most inveterate fury the children of Apollo. In the wars of Jupiter and the Titans, Mars was seized by Otus and Ephialtes, and confined for fifteen months, till Mercury procured him his liberty. During the Trojan war Mars interested himself on the side of the Trojans, but whilst he defended these favourites of Venus with uncommon activity, he was wounded by Diomedes, and hastily retreated to heaven to conceal his confusion and his resentment, and to complain to Jupiter that Minerva had directed the unerring weapon of his antagonist. The worship of Mars was not very universal among the ancients, his temples were not numerous in Greece, but in Rome he received the most unbounded honours, and the warlike Romans were proud of paying homage to a deity whom they esteemed as the patron of their city, and the father of the first of their monarchs. His most celebrated temple at Rome was built by Augustus after the battle of Philippi. It was dedicated to Mars ultor, or the avenger. His priests among the Romans were called Salii; they were first instituted by Numa, and their chief office was to guard the sacred ancilia one of which, as was supposed, had fallen down from heaven Mars was generally represented in the naked figure of an old man, armed with a helmet, a pike, and a shield. Sometimes he appeared in a military dress, and with a long flowing beard, and sometimes without He generally rode in a chariot drawn by furious horses which the poets called Flight and Terror. His altars were stained with the blood of the horse, on account of his warlike spirit, and of the wolf, on account of his ferocity Magpies and vultures were also offered up to him, on account of their greediness and voracity The Scythians generally offered him asses, and the people of Caria dogs. The weed called dog grass was sacred to him, because it grows, as it is commonly reported, in places which are fit for fields of battle, or where the ground has been stained with the effusion of human blood The surnames of Mars are not numerous. He was called Gradivus, Mavors, Quirinus, Salisubsulus, among the Romans The Greeks called him Ares, and he was the Envalus of the Sabines, the Camulus of the Gauls, and the Mamers of Carthage. Mars was father of Cupid, Anteros, and Harmonia, by the goddess Venus He had Ascalaphus and Ialmenus by Astyoche; Alcippe by Agraulos; Cycnus by Pelopeia, Tereus by Bostonis, Molus, Pylus, Evanus, and Thestius, by Demonice, the daughter of Agenor. Besides these, he was the reputed father of Romulus, Œnomaus, Bythis, Thrax, Diomedes of Thrace, Lycus, &c. He presided over gladiators, and was the god of hunting, and of whatever exercises or amusements have something manly and warlike Among the Romans it was usual for the consul, before he went on an expedition, to visit the temple of Mars, where he offered his prayers, and in a solemn manner shook the spear which was in the hand of the statue of the god, at the same time exclaiming, "Mars vigila! god of war, watch over the safety of this city." *Ovid. MARSÆUS, a Roman, ridiculed by Horace, 1 Sat. 2, 35. for his prodigality to courtezans.

MARSI, a people in the north western part of Germany, belonging to the great tribe of the Istævones. They appear to have originally settled on both banks of the Lippe whence they spread south to the Tenecteri Weakened by the Roman arms, they retired into the interior of Germany, and from this period disappeared from history.—A nation of Italy, whose territory lay to the south-east of Latium, and south east of the country of the Sabini. They were, probably, descended from the Sabini, although Marsus, the son of Circe, or Marsyas, a Phrygian, is said to have been the founder of their race. They at first proved very inimical to the Romans, but, in process of time, they became their firmest supporters. They are particularly celebrated for the civil war in which they were engaged, and which from them has received the name of the Marsian war. The large contributions which they made to support the interest of Rome, and the number of men which they continually supplied to the republic, rendered them bold and aspiring, and they claimed, with the rest of the Italian states, a share of the honours and privileges which were enjoyed by the citizens of Rome, B. C. 91 This petition, though supported by the interest, the eloquence, and the integrity of the tribune Drusus, was received with contempt by the Roman senate; and the Marsi, with their allies, showed their dissatisfaction by taking up arms Their resentment was increased when Drusus, their friend at Rome, had been basely murdered by the means of the nobles; and they erected themselves into a republic, and Corfinium was made the capital of their new empire A regular war was now begun, and the Romans led into the field an army of 100,000 men, and were opposed by a superior force. Some battles were fought in which the Roman generals were defeated, and the allies reaped no inconsiderable advantages from their victories. A battle, however, near Asculum, proved fatal to their cause, 6000 of them were left dead on the spot, their general, Francus, a man of uncommon experience and abilities, was slain, and such was escaped from the field perished by hunger in the Apennines, where they had sought a shelter. After many defeats, and the loss of Asculum, one of their principal cities, the allies, grown dejected and tired of hostilities which had already continued for three years, sued for peace one by one, and tranquillity was at last re established in the republic, and all the states of Italy were made citizens of Rome. The armies of the allies consisted of the Marsi, Peligni, Vestini, Hirpini, Pompeiani, Marrucini, Picentes, Venusini, Frentani, Apuli Lucani, and Samnites. The Marsi were greatly addicted to magic. Horat ep. 5. 76 ep. 27. 29. — Appian. — Val. Max. 8. — Patere. 2.— Plut in Sert, Mario, &c.— Cic pro Balb — Strab.— *Tacit. MARSYAS, a celebrated piper of Celænæ in Phrygia, son of Olympus, or of Hyagnis, or Oagrus He was so skilful in playing on the flute, that he is generally deemed the inventor of it According to the opinion of some, he found it when Minerva had thrown it aside on account of the distortion of her face when she played upon it Marsyas was enamoured of Cybele, and he travelled with her as far as Nysa, where he had the imprudence to challenge Apollo to a trial of his skill as a musician. The god accepted the challenge, and it was mutually agreed that he who was defeated should be flayed alive by the conqueror The Muses, or according to Diodorus, the inhabitants of Nysa, were appointed umpires. Each exerted his utmost skill, upon the victory, with much difficulty, was adjudged to Apollo. The god, upon this, tied his antagonist to a tree, and flayed him alive. The death of Marsyas was universally lamented; the Fauns, Satyrs, and Dryads, wept at his fate, and from their abundant tears, arose a river of Phrygia, well known by the name of Marsyas. It seems, according to the ancient mythological writers, that in the contest above alluded to, Apollo played at first a simple air on his instrument, but Marsyas, taking up his pipe, struck the audience so much with the novelty of its tone, and the art of his performance, that he seemed to be heard with more pleasure than his rival. Having agreed upon a second trial of skill, it is said that the performance of Apollo, by his accompanying the lyre with his voice, was allowed greatly to excel that of Marsyas upon the flute alone Marsyas with indignation protested against the decision of his judges, urging that he had not been fairly vanquished according to the rules stipulated, because the dispute was concerning the excellence of their respective instruments, not their voices, and that it was unjust to employ two arts against one. Apollo denied that he had taken any unfair advantage, since Marsyas had employed both his mouth and fingers in performing on his instrument, so that if he was denied the use of his voice, he would be still more disqualified for the contention On a third trial, Marsyas was again vanquished, and met with the fate already mentioned. A statue of Marsyas, representing him in the act of being flayed, stood in the Roman forum, in front of the rostra. The story of Marsyas presents a remarkable instance of well-merited punishment inflicted on reckless presumption; and as this feeling is nearly allied to, if not actually identified with that arrogant and ungovernable spirit which formed the besetting sin of the ancient democracies, we need not wonder that, in many of the cities of antiquity, it was customary to erect a group of Apollo and Marsyas, in the vicinity of their courts of justice, both to indicate the punishment which such conduct merited, and to denote the omnipotence of the law. Hygin fab. 165.—*Ovid. The Marsyas is supposed therefore to be the same with the modern Chana. Herod. 5, 118.——A native of Pella, brother of Antigonus who was subsequently king. He wrote, in ten books, a History of the kings of Macedon, from the origin of the monarchy to the founding of Alexandria, and also a work on the Education of Alexander, with which prince he had been brought up. The loss of both these works, but particularly the latter, is much to be regretted.——An Egyptian, who commanded the armies of Cleopatra against her brother Ptolemy Physcon, whom she attempted to dethrone

MARTIALES LUDI, games celebrated at Rome in honour of Mars.

MARTIALIS, Marcus Valerius, a native of Bilbilis, in Spain, where he was educated, and remained till he had arrived at man's estate, when he came to Rome. He was sent thither to study the law, but he was too much addicted to poetry to settle to a profession that requires great labour and severe study. His fine talents and taste for polite literature ingratiated him with the principal literary characters then in Rome, and even procured for him imperial patronage. Flattered with the notice taken of him, he became the panegyrist of the emperors, and in his turn gained the greatest honours, and was rewarded in the most liberal manner. Domitian gave him the tribuneship, but the poet, unmindful of the favours which he had received, after the death of his benefactor, exposed to ridicule the vices and cruelties of a monster, whom, in his lifetime, he had extolled as the pattern of virtue, goodness, and excellence. Trajan treated the poet with coldness; and Martial, after he had passed 30 years in the capital of the world, in the greatest splendour and affluence, retired to his native country, where he had the mortification to be the object of malevolence, satire, and ridicule. He received some favours from his friends, and his poverty was alleviated by the liberality of Pliny the younger, whom he had immortalized in his poems. Martial died in the 104th year of the Christian era, and in the 75th year of his age. He is unquestionably the most eminent of the epigrammatists, and is looked to as the sole model of that species of composition He wrote fourteen books of epigrams, which are described by himself as "some good, some middling, and more bad;"

Sunt bona, sunt quædam mediocria, sunt mala plura"

this is thought by the best judges of compositions of the kind as sufficiently modest. The licentiousness of many of his epigrams deserves the strongest censure: the poet has in many instances shown himself a declared enemy to decency, and the book is to be read by young persons with the utmost caution, as its tendency is often to corrupt the purity of morals, and initiate the votaries of virtue into the mysteries of vice The best editions of Martial are, that of Raderus, Ingolst 1602, 1611, fol. et Mogunt. 1627, that of Scriverius, Lugd. Bat. 12mo 1619; and that of Smidsius, Amst. 8vo. 1701. A good edition, however, is still a desideratum.

MARTINA, a woman skilled in the knowledge of poisonous herbs, &c. Tacit. Ann 2, 79, &c.

MARTINIANUS, an officer, made Cæsar by Licinius, to oppose Constantine. He was put to death by order of Constantine.

MARULLUS, a tribune of whom Plutarch makes mention in his life of Julius Cæsar. Marullus and another of his colleagues, named Flavius, when the statues of Cæsar were seen adorned with royal diadems, went and tore them off. They also found out the persons who had saluted Cæsar king, and committed them to prison. The people followed with joyful acclamations, calling the tribunes Brutuses. Cæsar, highly irritated, deposed them from office Plut. Vit. Cæs

MASÆSYLII, or MASSÆSYLI, a people in the western part of Numidia, on the coast, between the river Mulucha and the promontory Masythum, or Musulubium. They were under the dominion of Syphax The promontory of Tretum, now Sebda Ras, or the seven capes, separated this nation from the Massyli, or subjects of Masinissa. Polyb 3, 33. Dionys Perieg 5, 197 —Sallust Jugurth. 92

MASINISSA son of Gula, was king of a small part of Africa, and assisted the Carthaginians in their wars against Rome. He proved a most indefatigable and courageous ally, but an act of generosity rendered him amicable to the interests of Rome. After the defeat of Asdrubal, Scipio, the first Africanus, who had obtained the victory, found, among the prisoners of war, one of the nephews of Masinissa. He sent him back to his uncle loaded with presents, and conducted him with a detachment for the safety and protection of his person. Masinissa was struck with the generous action of the Roman general, he forgot all former hostilities, and joined his troops to those of Scipio This change of sentiments was not the effect of a wavering or unsettled mind, but Masinissa showed himself the most attached and the firmest ally the Romans ever had. It was to his exertions they owed many of their victories in Africa, and particularly in that battle which proved fatal to Asdrubal and Syphax. The Numidian conqueror, charmed with the beauty of Sophonisba, the captive wife of Syphax, carried her in triumph and married her, but when he perceived that this new connexion displeased Scipio, he sent poison to his wife, and recommended her to destroy herself, since he could not preserve her life in a manner which became her rank, her dignity and fortune, without offending his Roman allies. In the battle of Zama, Masinissa greatly contributed to the defeat of the great Annibal, and the Romans, who had been so often spectators of his courage and valour, rewarded his fidelity with the kingdom of Syphax, and some of the Carthaginian territories. At his death Masinissa showed the confidence which he had in the Romans, and the esteem he entertained for the rising talents of Scipio Æmilianus by intrusting him with the care of his kingdom, and empowering him to divide it among his sons. Masinissa died in the 97th year of his age, after a reign of above sixty years, 149 years before the Christian era He experienced adversity as well as prosperity, and, in the first years of his reign, he was exposed to the greatest danger, and obliged often to save his life by seeking a retreat among his savage neighbours. But his alliance with the Romans was the beginning of his greatness, and he ever after lived in the greatest affluence. He is remarkable for the health which he long enjoyed. In the last years of his life he was seen at the head of his armies, behaving with the most indefatigable activity, and he often remained for many successive days on horseback, without a saddle under him, or a covering upon his head, and without showing the least mark of fatigue. This strength of mind and body he chiefly owed to the temperance which he observed. He was seen eating brown bread at the door of his tent, like a private soldier, the day after he had obtained an immortal victory over the armies of Carthage. He left fifty-four sons, three of whom were legitimate, Micipsa, Gulussa, and Mastanabal. The kingdom was fairly divided among them by Scipio, and the illegitimate children received, as their portion very valuable presents. The death of Gulussa and Manastabal soon after left Micipsa sole master of the large possessions of Masinissa Strab 17.—*Polyb. Appian Lybic. Oros. MASSAGETÆ, a nation of Scythia, placed by the ancient writers to the east of the river Iaxartes Their country is supposed to answer to the modern Turkestan. The Macedonians sought for the Massagetæ, in the northern regions of Asia, judging from the history of Cyrus's expedition against these barbarians, by which some definiteness was given to the position which they occupied They roused, indeed, the true Massagetæ, but the term became a general one for the northern nations of Asia, like that of Scythia. Larcher considers the term Massagetæ equivalent probably to "Eastern Getæ" According to Herodotus the Massagetæ occupied a level tract of country to the east of the Caspar. Horat Od. 1, 35, 10 Dionys Per. 738.—Herod 1, 201.—Strab 1.—Mela, 1, 2.—Lucan 2, 50.—Justin. 1, 8.

It was bounded on the north by the straits of Gibraltar and the Mediterranean, on the east by Numidia, on the south by Getulia, and on the west by the Atlantic. It was, properly speaking, in the time of Bœchus, the ally and betrayer of Jugurtha bounded by the river Mocucha, or Molochath, now Malva, and corresponded nearly to the present kingdom of Fez; but, in the time of the emperor Claudius, the western part of Numidia was added to this province under the name of Mauritania Cæsariensis, the ancient kingdom of Mauritania being called Tingitana, from its principal city Tingis, or Old Tangier, on the west of the straits. Plin 5, 1.— *Cæs Bell. MAUSOLUS, a king of Caria. His wife Artemisia was so disconsolate at his death, which happened B. C. 354, that she drank up his ashes, and resolved to erect one of the grandest and noblest monuments of antiquity, to celebrate the memory of a husband whom she tenderly loved. This famous monument, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world, was called Mausoleum, and from it all other magnificent sepulchres and tombs have received the same name. It was built by four different architects. Scopas erected the side which faced the east, Timotheus had the south, Leochares had the west, and Eruxis the north Pythis was also employed in raising a pyramid over this stately monument, and the top was adorned by a chariot drawn by four horses The expenses of this edifice were immense, and this gave an occasion to the philosopher Anaxagoras to exclaim, when he saw it, How much money changed into stones! (Vid Artemisia) Herod 7, 99. - Strab 14. — Diod. 16 —Plin. 8, 16.—Flor. 4, 11.—Gell. 10, 18 —Propert 3, 2, 21 —*Suet. MAXENTIUS, Marcus Aurelius Valerius, a son of the emperor Maximianus Hercules. Some suppose him to have been a supposititious child The voluntary abdication of Diocletian, and of his father, raised him in the state, and he declared himself independent emperor, or Augustus, A D. 306. He afterwards incited his father to re assume his imperial authority, and in a perfidious manner destroyed Severus, who had delivered himself into his hands, and relied upon his honour for the safety of his life. His victories and successes were impeded by Galerius Maximianus, who opposed him with a powerful force. The defeat and voluntary death of Galerius soon restored peace to Italy, and Maxentius passed into Africa, where he rendered himself odious by his cruelty and oppression. He soon after returned to Rome, and was informed that Constantine was come into Italy. He gave his adversary battle near Rome, and, after he had lost the victory, he fled back to the city. The bridge over which he crossed the Tiber was in a decayed state, and he fell into the river and was drowned, on the 24th of September, A. D 312. The cowardice and luxuries of Maxentius are as conspicuous as his cruelties He oppressed his subjects with heavy taxes to gratify the cravings of his pleasures or the avarice of his favourites He was debauched in his manners, and neither virtue nor innocence were safe whenever he was inclined to voluptuous pursuits. He was naturally deformed, and of an unwieldy body. To visit a pleasure ground, or to exercise himself under a marble portico, or to walk on a shady terrace, was to him a Herculean labour, which required the greatest exertions of strength and resolution.

CORN. MAXIMILIANA, a vestal virgin buried alive for incontinency, A D. 94.

MAXIMIANUS, Herculius Marcus Aurelius Valerius, a native of Sirmium, in Pannonia, who served as a common soldier in the Roman armies. When Diocletian had been raised to the imperial throne, he remembered the valour and courage of his fellow-soldier Maximianus, and rewarded his fidelity by making him his colleague in the empire, and by ceding to him the command of the provinces of Italy, Africa, and Spain, and the rest of the western territories of Rome. Maximianus showed the justness of the choice of Diocletian by his victories over the barbarians. In Britain success did not attend his arms; but in Africa he defeated and put to death Aurelius Julianus, who had proclaimed himself emperor. Soon after Diocletian dedicated the imperial purple, and obliged Maximianus to follow his example, on the 1st of April, A. D. 304. Maximianus reluctantly complied with the command of a man to whom he owed his greatness; but, before the first year of his resignation had elapsed, he was roused from his indolence and retreat by the ambition of his son Maxentius. He re-assumed the imperial dignity, and showed his ingratitude to his son by wishing him to resign the sovereignty, and to sink into a private person. This proposal was not only rejected with the contempt which it deserved, but the troops mutinied against Maximianus, and he fled for safety to Gaul, to the court of Constantine, to whom he gave his daughter Faustina in marriage. Here he again acted a perfidious character, and re-assumed the imperial power, which his misfortunes had obliged him to relinquish. This offended Constantine. But, when open violence seemed to frustrate the ambitious views of Maximianus, he had recourse to artifice. He prevailed upon his daughter Faustina, to leave the doors of her chamber open in the dead of night, and, when she promised faithfully to execute his commands, he secretly introduced himself to her bed, where he stabbed to the heart the man who slept by the side of his daughter. This was not Constantine, Faustina, faithful to her husband, had apprized him of her father's machinations, and a eunuch had been placed in his bed. Constantine watched the motions of his father-in-law, and, when he heard the fatal blow given to the eunuch, he rushed in with a band of soldiers, and secured the assassin. Constantine resolved to destroy a man who was so inimical to his nearest relations, and nothing was left to Maximianus but to choose his own death. He strangled himself at Marseilles, A. D. 310, in the sixtieth year of his age. His body was found fresh and entire in a leaden coffin about the middle of the eleventh century.

—Galerius Valerius, a native of Dacia, who, in the first years of his life, was employed in keeping his father's flocks. He entered the army, where his valour and bodily strength recommended him to the notice of his superiors, and particularly to Diocletian, who invested him with the imperial purple in the east, and gave him his daughter Valeria in marriage. Galerius deserved the confidence of his benefactor. He conquered the Goths, and Dalmatians, and checked the insolence of the Persians. In a battle, however, with the king of Persia, Galerius was defeated; and, to complete his ignominy, and render him more sensible of his disgrace, Diocletian obliged him to walk behind his chariot arrayed in his imperial robes. This humiliation stung Galerius to the quick; he assembled another army, and gave battle to the Persians. He gained a complete victory, and took the wives and children of his enemy. This success elated Galerius to such a degree, that he claimed the most dignified appellations, and ordered himself to be called the son of Mars. Diocletian himself dreaded his power, and even, it is said, abdicated the imperial dignity by means of his threats. This resignation, however, is attributed by some to a voluntary act of the mind, and to a desire of enjoying solitude and retirement. As soon as Diocletian had abdicated, Galerius was proclaimed Augustus, A. D. 304, but his cruelty soon rendered him odious, and the Roman people, offended at his oppression, raised Maxentius to the imperial dignity the following year, and Galerius was obliged to yield to the torrent of his unpopularity, and to fly before his more fortunate adversary. He died in the greatest agonies, A. D. 311. The bodily pains and sufferings which preceded his death, were, according to the Christian writers, the effects of the vengeance of an offended Providence for the cruelty which he had exercised against the followers of Christ. In his character Galerius was wanton and tyrannical, and he often feasted his eyes with the sight of dying wretches, whom his barbarity had delivered to beasts and other wild beasts. His aversion to learned men arose from his ignorance of letters; and, if he was deprived of the benefits of education, he proved the more cruel and the more inexorable. Lactant. de M. P. 33.—Eusebius 8, 16.

MAXIMINUS, Caius Julius Verus, the son of a peasant in Thrace. He was originally a shepherd, and, by heading his countrymen against the frequent attacks of the neighbouring barbarians and robbers, he inured himself to the labours and to the fatigues of a camp. He entered the Roman armies, where he gradually rose to the first offices; and on the death of Alexander Severus he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, A. D. 235. The popularity which he had gained when general of the armies, was at an end when he ascended the throne. He was delighted with acts of the greatest barbarity, and no less than 400 persons lost their lives on the false suspicion of having conspired against the emperor's life. They died in the greatest torments, and, that the tyrant might the better entertain himself with their sufferings, some were exposed to wild beasts, others expired by blows, some were nailed on crosses, while others were shut up in the bellies of animals just killed. The noblest of the Roman citizens were the objects of his cruelty; and, as if they were more conscious than others of his mean origin, he resolved to spare no means to remove from his presence a number of men whom he looked upon with an eye of envy, and who, as he imagined, hated him for his oppression, and despised him for the poverty and obscurity of his early years. Such is the character of the suspicious and tyrannical Maximinus. In his military capacity he acted with the same ferocity; and, in an expedition in Germany, he not only cut down the corn, but he totally ruined and set fire to the whole country, to the extent of 400 miles. Such a monster of tyranny, at last provoked the people of Rome. The Gordians were proclaimed emperors, but their innocence and pacific virtues were unable to resist the fury of Maximinus. After their fall, the Roman senate invested twenty men of their number with the imperial dignity, and intrusted into their hands the care of the republic. These measures so highly irritated Maximinus, that, at the first intelligence, he howled like a wild beast, and almost destroyed himself by knocking his head against the walls of his palace. When his fury was abated, he marched to Rome, resolved on slaughter. His bloody machinations were stopped, and his soldiers, ashamed of accompanying a tyrant whose cruelties had procured him the name of Busiris, Cyclops, or Phalaris, assassinated him in his tent before the walls of Aquileia, A. D. 236, in the 65th year of his age. The news of his death was received with the greatest rejoicings at Rome, public thanksgivings were offered, and whole hecatombs flamed on the altars. Maximinus has been represented by historians as of a gigantic stature, he was eight feet high, and the bracelets of his wife served as rings to adorn the fingers of his hand. His voracity was as remarkable as his corpulence, he generally ate forty pounds of flesh every day, and drank eighteen bottles of wine. His strength was proportionable to his size, he could alone draw a loaded wagon, and, with a blow of his fist, he often broke the teeth in a horse's mouth, he crushed the hardest stones between his fingers, and cleft trees with his hand. Herodianus. Jornand de Reb Get Capitol. ——Maximinus made his son of the same name, emperor, as soon as he was invested with the purple, and his choice was unanimously approved by the senate, by the people, and by the army. ——Galerius Valerius, a shepherd of Thrace, who was raised to the imperial dignity by Diocletian, A. D 305. He was nephew to Valerius Maximianus, by his mother's side, and to him he was indebted for his rise and consequence in the Roman armies. As Maximinus was ambitious and fond of power, he looked with an eye of jealousy upon those who shared the dignity of emperor with himself. He declared war against Licinius, his colleague on the throne, but a defeat, which soon after followed, on the 30th of April, A. D 313, between Heraclea and Adrianopolis, left him without resources and without friends. His victorious enemy pursued him, and he fled beyond mount Taurus, forsaken and almost unknown. He attempted to put an end to his miserable existence, but his efforts were ineffectual, and, though his death is attributed by some to despair, it is more universally believed that he expired in the greatest agonies, of a dreadful distemper which consumed him, day and night, with inexpressible pains, and reduced him to a mere skeleton. This miserable end according to the ecclesiastical writers, was the visible punishment of heaven, for the barbarities which Maximinus had exercised against the followers of Christianity, and for the many blasphemies which he had uttered. Lactant.—Euseb. ——A minister of the emperor Valerian. ——One of the ambassadors of young Theodosius to Attila, king of the Huns.

MAXIMUS, Magnus, a native of Spain, who proclaimed himself emperor, A. D. 383. The unpopularity of Gratian favoured his usurpation, and he was acknowledged by his troops. Gratian marched against him, but he was defeated, and soon after assassinated. Maximus refused the honours of a burial to the remains of Gratian; and, when he had made himself master of Britain, Gaul, and Spain, he sent ambassadors into the east, and demanded of the emperor Theodosius to acknowledge him as his associate on the throne. Theodosius endeavoured to amuse and delay him, but Maximus resolved to support his claim by arms, and crossed the Alps. Italy was laid desolate, and Rome opened her gates to the conqueror. Theodosius now determined to revenge the audaciousness of Maximus, and had recourse to artifice. He began to make a naval armament, and Maximus, not to appear inferior to his adversary, had already embarked his troops, when Theodosius, by secret and hastened marches, fell upon him, and besieged him at Aquileia. Maximus was betrayed by his soldiers, and the conqueror, moved with compassion at the sight of his fallen and dejected enemy, granted him life; but the multitude refused him mercy, and instantly struck off his head, A. D 388. His son Victor, who shared the imperial dignity with him, was soon after sacrificed to the fury of the soldiers. —— Petronius, a Roman, descended of an illustrious family. He caused Valentinian III. to be assassinated, and ascended the throne; and to strengthen his usurpation, he married the empress, to whom he had the weakness and imprudence to betray that he had sacrificed her husband to his love for her person. This declaration irritated the empress, she had recourse to the barbarians to avenge the death of Valentinian, and Maximus was stoned to death by his soldiers, and his body thrown into the Tiber, A. D 455. He reigned only seventy-seven days. ——Tyrius, a native of Tyre, distinguished for his eloquence, and who obtained some degree of celebrity also as a philosopher of the New-Platonic school. According to Suidas, he lived under Commodus; but, according to Eunebius and Syncellus, under Antoninus Pius. The accounts of these chronologers may be reconciled, by supposing that Maximus flourished under Antoninus, and reached the time of Commodus. Although he was frequently at Rome, he probably spent the greater part of his time in Greece. Several writers suppose him to have been the preceptor, of whom the emperor Marcus Antoninus speaks under the name of Maximus; but it is more probable, that this was some other philosopher of the Stoical sect. That Maximus Tyrius possessed the most captivating powers of eloquence, sufficiently appears from his elegant Dissertations. They are for the most part written upon Platonic principles, but sometimes lean towards scepticism. The best edition of them is that of Davies, Lond. 1740, 4to, enriched with some excellent observations by Markland. It had been preceded by a smaller edition in 8vo, Cantab. 1703, also by Davies. The larger edition was reprinted at Leipsic in 1774, in 2 vols. 8vo, under the editorial care of Reiske. ——A native of Ephesus, and philosopher of the New-Platonic school. According to Eunapius, he was appointed by the emperor Constantius preceptor to Julian, surnamed the Apostate; but according to the Christian historians, he introduced himself to that emperor at Nicomedia, either while he was pursuing his studies there, or during his expedition into the east. Whichever account be true, it is certain he was a great favourite with Julian, and had such an influence over his mind, as to excite in him the most determined hatred to Christianity, while he inspired him with an ardent attachment and enthusiasm in favour of heathen superstitions, and the practice of pretended magical arts. Such, at length, was the folly of the deluded emperor, that he seemed to place an entire confidence in the predictions of Maximus. When the emperor designed to make war against Persia, he had recourse to his divinations, which flattered him with the idea, that he was born to rival Alexander in the glory of conquest. The event showed the vanity of the prophet, and the emperor fell a sacrifice to his credulity. During the reign of Jovian, Maximus was treated with respect; but under the government of Valentinian and Valens he was seized and prosecuted for the crime of magic, of which he was convicted and sentenced to a long imprisonment. In 373, he was put to death by the proconsul Festus, the distinguished minister of the emperor Valens' cruelties. Amm. Marcell 29, 1. - *Socrat. Hist. MECÆNAS or MECŒNAS, C Cilnius, a celebrated Roman knight descended from the kings of Etruria. He has rendered himself immortal by his liberal patronage of learned men and of letters; and to his prudence and advice Augustus acknowledged himself indebted for the security which he enjoyed His fondness for pleasure removed him from the reach of ambition, and he preferred living, as he was born, a Roman knight, to all the honours and dignities which either the friendship of Augustus or his own popularity, could heap upon him. It was from the result of his advice, against the opinion of Agrippa, that Augustus resolved to keep the supreme power in his hands, and not by a voluntary resignation to plunge Rome into civil commotions. The emperor received the private admonitions of Mecœnas in the same friendly manner as they were given, and he was not displeased with the liberty of his friend, who threw a paper to him with these words, Descend from the tribunal, thou butcher! while he sat in the judgment seat, and betrayed revenge and impatience in his countenance. He was struck with the admonition, and left the tribunal without passing sentence of death on the criminals. To the interference of Mecœnas Virgil owed the restitution of his lands, and Horace was proud to boast that his learned friend had obtained his forgiveness from the emperor, for joining the cause of Brutus at the battle of Philippi. Mecœnas was himself fond of literature, and, according to the most received opinion, he wrote a history of animals, a journal of the life of Augustus, a treatise on the different natures and kinds of precious stones, besides the two tragedies of Octavia and Prometheus, and other things, all now lost. He died eight years before Christ; and, on his death-bed he particularly recommended his poetical friend Horace to the care and confidence of Augustus. Seneca, who has liberally commended the genius and abilities of Mecœnas, has not withheld his censure from his dissipation, indolence, and effeminate luxury. From the patronage and encouragement which the princes of heroic and lyric poetry among the Latins, received from the favourite of Augustus, all patrons of literature have ever since been called Mecœnates Virgil dedicated to him his Georgics, and Horace his odes . Suet in Aug. 66, &c — Plut in Aug. — Herodian. 7.— Senec. ep 19 et 92

MEDEA, a celebrated magician, daughter of Æetes king of Colchis Her mother's name, according to the more received opinion of Hesiod and Hyginus, was Idyia, or according to others, Ephyre, Hecate, Asterodia, Antiope, and Neræa. She was the niece of Circe. When Jason came to Colchis in quest of the golden fleece, Medea became enamoured of him, and it was to her well-directed labours that the Argonauts owed their preservation. Vid. Jason and Argonautæ.] Medea had an interview with her lover in the temple of Hecate, where they bound themselves by the most solemn oaths, and mutually promised eternal fidelity. No sooner had Jason overcome all the difficulties which Æetes had placed in his way, than Medea embarked with the conquerors for Greece. To stop the pursuit of her father, she tore to pieces her brother Absyrtus, and left his mangled limbs in the way, through which Æetes was to pass This act of barbarity some have attributed to Jason and not to her. When Jason reached Iolchos, his native country, the return and victories of the Argonauts were celebrated with universal rejoicings; but Æson, the father of Jason, was unable to assist at the solemnity, on account of the infirmities of his age Medea, at her husband's request, removed the weakness of Æson, and by drawing away the blood from his veins, and filling them again with the juice of certain herbs, she restored him to the vigour and sprightliness of youth This sudden change in Æson astonished the inhabitants of Iolchos, and the daughters of Pelias were also desirous to see their father restored, by the same power, to the vigour of youth Medea, willing to revenge the injuries which her husband's family had suffered from Pelias, increased their curiosity, and by cutting to pieces an old ram and making it again, in their presence, a young lamb, she totally determined them to try the same experiment upon their father's body. They accordingly killed him of their own accord, and boiled his flesh in a caldron, but Medea refused to perform the same friendly offices to Pelias which she had done to Æson, and he was consumed by the heat of the fire, and even deprived of a burial. This action greatly irritated the people of Iolchos, and Medea, with her husband, fled to Corinth to avoid the resentment of an offended populace. Here they lived for ten years with much conjugal tenderness; but the love of Jason for Glauce, the king's daughter, at last interrupted their mutual harmony, and Medea was divorced. Medea revenged the infidelity of Jason by causing the death of Glauce, and the destruction of her family. (Vid. Glauce.) This action was followed by another still more atrocious. Medea killed two of her children in their father's presence, and, when Jason attempted to punish the barbarity of the mother, she fled through the air upon a chariot drawn by winged dragons. From Corinth Medea came to Athens, where, after she had undergone the necessary purification of her murder, she married king Ægeus, or, according to others, lived in an adulterous manner with him. From her connexion with Ægeus Medea had a son, who was called Medus. Soon after, when Theseus wished to make himself known to his father, (Vid Ægeus.) Medea, jealous of his fame, and fearful of his power, attempted to poison him at a feast which had been prepared for his entertainment. Her attempts, however, failed of success, and the sight of the sword which Theseus wore by his side, convinced Ægeus that the stranger against whose life he had so basely conspired was no other than his own son. The father and the son were reconciled, and Medea, to avoid the punishment which her wickedness deserved, mounted her winged chariot, and disappeared through the air. She came to Colchis, where, according to some, she was reconciled to Jason, who had sought her in her native country after her sudden departure from Corinth. She died at Colchis, as Justin mentions, when she had been restored to the confidence of her family. After death she married Achilles in the Elysian fields, according to the traditions mentioned by Simonides. The murder of Mermerus and Pheres, the youngest of Jason's children by Medea, is not attributed to their mother, according to Ælian, but the Corinthians themselves assassinated them in the temple of Juno Acræa. To avoid the resentment of the gods, and to deliver themselves from the pestilence which visited their country after so horrid a massacre, they engaged the poet Euripides, for five talents, to write a tragedy, which cleared them of the murder, and represented Medea as the cruel assassin of her own children. And besides, that this opinion might be the better credited, festivals were appointed, in which the mother was represented with all the barbarity of a fury murdering her own sons. MEDIA, an extensive country of Asia, bounded on the south by Susiana and Persis, on the west by Assyria, on the north by Armenia and the Caspian sea, and on the east by Hyrcania and Parthia. It corresponded nearly with the modern province of Irak, or as it is sometimes called Irak Ajemi, in contradistinction to Irak Arabi. It is thought to have derived its name from Madai, a descendant of Shem, though the Greeks asserted that it was called Aria, till Medus, the son of the enchantress Medea, gave it the name of Media. The province of Media was first raised into a kingdom by its revolt from the Assyrian monarchy, B. C. 820; and after it had for some time enjoyed a kind of republican government, Deioces, by his artifice, procured himself to be called king, 700 B. C. After a reign of fifty-three years he was succeeded by Phraortes, B. C. 647; who was succeeded by Cyaxares, B. C. 625. His successor was Astyages, B. C. 595, in whose reign Cyrus became master of Media, B. C. 551, and ever after the empire was transferred to the Persians. The Medes were warlike in the primitive ages of their power, they encouraged polygamy, and were remarkable for the homage which they paid to their sovereigns, who were styled kings of kings. This title was afterwards adopted by their conquerors, the Persians, and it was still in use in the age of the Roman emperors. Justin 1, 5.—Herod. 1, &c.—Polyb. 5 et 10.—Curt 5, &c.—*Diod. MEDIOLANUM, a city of Cisalpine Gaul, among the Insubres, now Milan. It was situate on a small river, now the Olona, in a beautiful plain between the Ticinus, or Ticino, and the Addua, or Adda. It was a flourishing city in the time of Strabo, towards the end of the fourth century, it ranked as the sixth town in the Roman empire, and a century and a half later, was considered inferior only to Rome in population and extent. Liv. 5, 34.—Plin. 3, 17.—Strab. 5.——A city of the Santones in Gallia Aquitanica, now Saintes.——A city of the Aulerci Eburovices, in Gallia Lugdunensis, now Evreux.——A town of the Ordovices in Britain, near the present town of Ellesmeere.

MEDIOMATRICES, a people of Gallia Belgica on the Moselle, or Moselle. The Treviri were their neighbours on the north. Their chief city was Divodurum, afterwards Mediomatrici, now Metz. Cæs. B. G. 4, 10.—Plin. 4, 17.—Tacit. Hist. 1, 63 Hist 4, 70.

MEDITERRANEUM MARE, a sea which divides Europe and Asia Minor from Africa. It is 2300 miles long, and between 400 and 500 broad, and contains about 852,000 square miles. It receives its name from its situation, medio terræ, situate in the middle of the land. It has a communication with the Atlantic by the columns of Hercules, and with the Euxine through the Ægean. The word Mediterraneum does not occur in the classics; but it is sometimes called internum, or nostrum, and is frequently denominated in Scripture the Great Sea. The first naval power that ever obtained the command of it, as recorded in the fabulous epochs of the writer Castor, is Crete, under Minos. Afterwards it passed into the hands of the Lydians, B. C. 1179; of the Pelasgi, 1038; of the Thracians, 1000; of the Rhodians, 916; of the Phrygians, 895; of the Cyprians, 868; of the Phœnicians, 826; of the Egyptians, 757; of the Milesians, 753, of the Carians, 754, and of the Lesbians, 676, which they retained for sixty-nine years. According to the learned Buffon, the Mediterranean Sea was originally a lake of small extent, and had received, in remote ages, a sudden and prodigious increase, at the time when the Black Sea opened a passage for itself through the Bosporus, and at that period when the sinking of the land which united Europe to Africa, in the part that is now the straits of Gibraltar, permitted the water of the ocean to rush in. It was also his opinion that most of the islands of the Mediterranean made part of the continent, before the great convulsions that have taken place in this quarter. Sonnini, at his request, and with a view to ascertain the correctness of this opinion sounded the depth of the sea between Sicily and Malta and found it from twenty-five to thirty fathoms, and, in the middle of the channel where the water is deepest, never exceeding a hundred fathoms. On the other hand, between the island of Malta and Cape Bon in Africa there is less water, the lead indicating no more than from twenty-five to thirty fathoms throughout the whole breadth of the channel which separates the two lands. Horat Od 1, 3, 46.—Plin 2, 68 Sallust Jug 17.—*Cæs B. [Vid Medea.] He came to Colchis, where he was seized by his uncle Perses, who usurped the throne of Æetes, his mother's father, because the oracle had declared that Perses should be murdered by one of the grandsons of Æetes. Medus assumed another name, and called himself Hippotes, son of Creon. Meanwhile Medea arrived in Colchis, disguised in the habit of a priestess of Diana, and when she heard that one of Creon's children was imprisoned, she resolved to hasten the destruction of a person whose family she detested To effect this with more certainty, she told the usurper, that Hippotes was really a son of Medea, sent by his mother to murder him She begged Perses to give her Hippotes, that she might sacrifice him to her resentment Perses consented Medea discovered that it was her own son, and she instantly armed him with the dagger which she had prepared against his life, and ordered him to stab the usurper. He obeyed, and, Medea discovered who she was, and made her son Medus sit on his grandfather's throne Hesiod. Theog. 994.—Paus 2, 3.—Apollod 1.—Justin 42, 2 et 3.—Senec in Med.—Diod 4

MEDUSA, one of the three Gorgons, daughter of Phorcus and Ceto. She was the only one of the Gorgons who was subject to mortality She is celebrated for her personal charms and the beauty of her locks Neptune became enamoured of her, and obtained her favours in the temple of Minerva. This violation of the sanctity of the temple provoked Minerva, and she changed the beautiful locks of Medusa, which had inspired Neptune's love, into serpents. According to Apollodorus and others, Medusa and her sisters came into the world with snakes on their heads, instead of hair, with yellow wings and brazen hands Their bodies were also covered with impenetrable scales, and their very looks had the power of killing or turning to stones. Perseus rendered his name immortal by his conquest of Medusa. He cut off her head, and the blood that dropped from the wound produced the innumerable serpents that infest Africa The conqueror placed Medusa's head on the ægis of Minerva, which he had used in his expedition. The head still retained the same petrifying power as before, as it was fatally known in the court of Cepheus [Vid Andromeda.] Some suppose, that the Gorgons were a nation of women, whom Perseus conquered [Vid Gorgones.] Apollod. 2, 4.—Hesiod Theog 278.—Ovid Met. 4, 618.—Lucan. 9, 634.—Apollon. 4.—Hygin. fab. 151, et 164.——A daughter of Priam.——A daughter of Sthenelus Apollod.

MEGALOPÓLIS, a town of Arcadia in Peloponnesus, built by Epaminondas, as a check upon the Spartans It joined the Achæan league B. C 242, and was taken and ruined by Cleomenes, king of Sparta. The inhabitants thereupon retired to Messenia. They afterwards returned to Arcadia, and, by the advice and urging of Philopœmen, they rebuilt their city. Polybius states that next to Athens it was the most splendid city of Greece. It is now Sinano Pasa 8, 25, 27 et 32.—Diod Sic. 15.—Polyb 1, 40 2, 55 10, 24, 24, 9.

MEGANIRA, the wife of Celeus, king of Eleusis in Attica. She was mother to Triptolemus, to whom Ceres, as she travelled over Attica, taught agriculture. She received divine honours after death, and had an altar raised to her near the fountain where Ceres had first been seen when she arrived in Attica. Paus. 1, 39

MEGAPENTHES, an illegitimate son of Menelaus, who, after his father's return from the Trojan war, was married to a daughter of Alector, a native of Sparta. His mother's name was Teridæ, a slave of Menelaus. Homer. Odyss. 4, 8.—Apollod 3.

MEGÁRA, a daughter of Creon, king of Thebes, given in marriage to Hercules, because he had delivered the Thebans from the tyranny of the Orchomenians [Vid Erginus.] When Hercules went to hell by order of Eurystheus violence was offered to Megara by Lycus, a Theban exile, and she would have yielded to her ravisher, had not Hercules returned that moment and punished him with death. This murder displeased Juno, and she rendered Hercules so delirious, that he killed Megara and the three children he had by her in a fit of madness, thinking them to be wild beasts Some say that Megara did not perish by the hand of her husband, but that he afterwards married her to his friend Iolas. The names of Megara's children by Hercules were Creontiades, Therimachus, and Deicoon Hygin, fab 32.—Apollod 2, 6.

MEGARA, (æ, and pl orum,) a city of Greece, the capital of a district called Megaris, not far from the shores of the Sinus Saronicus, with which it communicated by means of its port Nisæa. It possessed considerable splendour, and was defended by two citadels on the hills above it, the walls of which were destroyed by Minos, but restored by Alcathous, the son of Pelops, with the assistance of Apollo. Its importance gradually diminished with that of the neighbouring cities, till at last, in the days of Alaric, its destruction was completed. It was equidistant from Athens and Corinth, and was the only Grecian city which Hadrian did not restore, in consequence of its inhabitants having murdered an Athenian herald. It was celebrated for the Megaric school of philosophy founded by Euclid, a disciple of Socrates, who, when the Athenians had forbidden all the inhabitants of Megara on pain of death to enter their city, disguised himself in women's clothes that he might attend the lectures of his master. Strab. 9. *Ov. MEGARIS, a small territory of Greece, lying to the west and north-west of Attica. It is said to have obtained its name from Megareus, a son of Apollo, or Neptune, who was buried there. It is represented as an existing kingdom at a very early period. Pylas, one of its sovereigns, abdicated his crown in favour of Pandion, son of Cecrops, king of Athens, by which event Megaris became annexed to the latter state, and is therefore not mentioned by Homer, who includes its inhabitants under the general title of Ionians. The government of Megaris, was, by the advice of an oracle, changed to a republican form, but still dependent on the Athenians, from whom, however, it was wrested in the reign of their last king Codrus, by a Peloponnesian force; and a colony having been established there by the Corinthians and Messenians, it ceased to be considered as of Ionian origin, assuming the language and political institutions of a Dorian republic. Some time after this, it was engaged in a war with Athens about the possession of Salamis, which, after an obstinate contest, it was obliged to resign to the latter power. During the Peloponnesian war, and in the times anterior to it, it was exposed to the intrigues and tumultuous factions engendered by such a struggle, but yet maintained its affected independence amidst them all. The cause of this was no doubt to be found in the jealous rivalry of the powerful nations by whom it was surrounded; this enabled it to retain its independence and to live in peace, though possessing but an insignificant force, and constantly threatened by the armies of Peloponnesus, Athens, and Thebes. Paus. 1, 39, 40 et 43.—Strab. 9.—Thucyd. 4, 66, &c.—Isocr de Pace.

MEGASTHENES, a Greek historian and geographical writer in the age of Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria, about 300 years before Christ He was sent by Seleucus to Palibothra in India, to renew and confirm a previous treaty with Sandrocottus, monarch of the Prasii. He remained there many years, and after his return, he wrote, under the title of Indica (Ἰνδικά), an account of whatever he had seen or heard during his travels. His work is lost; but Strabo, Josephus, Arrian, and Ælian, have preserved some fragments of it. He was the first who made the western nations acquainted with the countries beyond the Ganges, and with the manners of their inhabitants Strabo has decreed him as a fabulous writer, but often unjustly, and Robertson, on the other hand, has acknowledged the utility and justice of many of the observations made by Megasthenes.

MELAMPUS a celebrated soothsayer and physician of Argos, son of Amythaon and Idomenea, or Doripe. He lived at Pylos in Peloponnesus. His servants once killed two large serpents which had made their nests at the bottom of an oak, and Melampus paid so much regard to these two reptiles, that he raised a funeral pile and burned them upon it. He also took particular care of their young ones, and fed them with milk. Some time after this the young serpents crept to Melampus as he slept on the grass near the oak, and as it sensible of the favours of their benefactor, they wantonly played around him, and softly licked his ears This awoke Melampus, who was astonished at the sudden change which his senses had undergone. He found himself acquainted with the chirping of the birds, and with all their rude notes, as they flew around him. He took advantage of this supernatural gift, and soon made himself perfect in the knowledge of futurity, and Apollo also instructed him in the art of medicine. He had soon after the happiness of curing the daughters of Proetus, by giving them hellebore, which from this circumstance has been called melampodium, and as a reward for his trouble he married the eldest of these princesses. (Vid. Proetides.) The tyranny of his uncle Neleus, king of Pylos, obliged him to leave his native country, and Proetus, to show himself more sensible of his services, gave him part of his kingdom, over which he established himself. About this time the personal charms of Pero the daughter of Neleus, had gained many admirers, but the father promised his daughter only to him who brought into his hands the oxen of Iphiclus. This condition displeased many, but Bias, who was also one of her admirers, engaged his brother Melampus to steal the oxen, and deliver them to him. Melampus was caught in the attempt, and imprisoned, and nothing but his services as a soothsayer and physician to Iphiclus would have saved him from death All this pleased in favour of Melampus, but when he had taught the childless Iphiclus how to become a father, he not only obtained his liberty, but also the oxen, and with them he compelled Neleus to give Pero in marriage to Bias. A severe distemper, which had rendered the women of Argos insane, was to ally removed by Melampus, and Anaxagoras who then sat on the throne, rewarded his merit by giving him part of his kingdom, where he established himself, and where his posterity reigned during six successive generations. He received divine honours after death, and temples were raised to his memory. Homer Od. 11, 287, 15, 225. Herod 2 et 9 - Apollod. 2, 2 Paus 2, 18, 4, 3 - *Hyg. MELEAGER, a celebrated hero of antiquity, son of Œneus king of Ætolia, by Althea daughter of Thestius. The Fates were present at the moment of his birth, and predicted his future greatness. Clotho said, that he would be brave and courageous, Lachesis foretold his uncommon strength, and Atropos declared that he should live as long as that firebrand, which was on the fire, remained entire and unconsumed. Althæa no sooner heard this, than she snatched the stick from the fire, and kept it with the most anxious care, as the life of her son was destined to depend upon its preservation. The fame of Meleager increased with his years, he signalized himself in the Argonautic expedition, and afterwards delivered his country from the neighbouring inhabitants, who made war against his father, at the instigation of Diana whose altars Œneus had neglected. [Vid. Œneus.] No sooner were they destroyed than Diana punished the negligence of Œneus by a greater calamity. She sent a huge wild boar, which laid waste all the country, and seemed invincible on account of its immense size. It became soon a public concern, all the neighbouring princes assembled to destroy this terrible animal, and nothing became more famous in mythological history, than the hunting of the Calydonian boar. The princes and chiefs that assembled, and who are mentioned by mythologists, are Meleager son of Œneus, Idas and Lynceus, sons of Aphareus, Dryas son of Mars Castor and Pollux, sons of Jupiter and Leda, Pirithous son of Ixion, Theseus son of Ægeus, Ancæus and Cepheus, sons of Lycurgus, Admetus son of Pheres, Jason son of Æson, Peleus and Telamon, sons of Æacus, Iphicles son of Amphitryon, Eurytion son of Actor, Atalanta daughter of Schœneus, Iolas the friend of Hercules, the sons of Thestius, Amphiaraus son of Oileus Protheus, Cometes, the brothers of Alchæa Hippothous son of Cercyon, Leucippus, Adrastus, Cæneus, Phileus, Echeon, Lelex, Phœnix son of Amyntor, Panopeus, Hyleus, Hippasus, Nestor, Mecistius, the father of Patrocles, Amphycides, Laertes the father of Ulysses, and the four sons of Hippocoon. This troop of armed men attacked the boar with unusual fury and it was at last killed by Meleager. The conqueror gave the skin and the head to Atalanta, who had first wounded the animal. This partiality to a woman irritated the others, and particularly Toxeus and Plexippus, the brothers of Althæa, and they endeavoured to rob Atalanta of the honourable present. Meleager defended a woman, of whom he was enamoured, and killed his uncles in the attempt. Meantime the news of this celebrated conquest had already reached Calydon, and Althæa went to the temple of the gods to return thanks for the victory which her son had gained. As she went she met the corpses of her brothers that were brought from the chace, and at this mournful spectacle she filled the whole city with her lamentations. She was upon this informed that they had been killed by Meleager, and in the moment of resentment, to revenge the death of her brothers, she threw into the fire the fatal stick on which her son's life depended, and Meleager died as soon as it was consumed. Homer does not mention the firebrand, who one some have imagined that this fable is posterior to that poet's age. But he says that the death of Toxeus and Plexippus so irritated Althæa, that she uttered the most horrible curses and imprecations upon the head of her son. Meleager married Cleopatra, the daughter of Idas and Marpessa, as also Atalanta, according to some accounts. Apollod. 1, 8.—Paus. 10, 31. —Hygin. 14.—Ovid. Met. 8, 442.—*Homer. C. 280 years. He was but two months invested with the regal authority.——A Greek poet in the reign of Seleucus, the last of the Seleucidæ. He was a native of Gadara, and a resident at Tyre, but he died in the isle of Cos, whither he had removed in the latter part of his life. His compositions, consisting of short pieces or epigrams, are among the most beautiful relics preserved in the Grecian Anthology, and in the simple elegance of their style and sentiment they are finely contrasted with the productions of more recent bards in the same collection. Some of the verses of Meleager have been presented to the public in an English dress, by the Rev. R. Bland, and others, in "Selections from the Anthology."

MELEAGRIDES, the sisters of Meleager, daughters of Œneus and Althæa. They were so disconsolate at the death of their brother Meleager, that they refused all aliments, and were, at the point of death, changed into birds called Meleagrides, whose feathers and eggs, as it is supposed, are of a different colour. The youngest of the sisters, Gorge and Dejanira, who had been married, escaped this metamorphosis. Apollod. 1, 8 — Ovid. Met. 8, 540. — Plin 10, 26.

MELEAGANDER, an Athenian general who died B. C. 414

MELES (Πλής), a river of Asia Minor, in Ionia, near Smyrna. Some of the ancients supposed that Homer was born on the banks of that river, from which circumstance they call him Melesigenes, and his compositions Meletes chariae It is even supported that he composed his poems in a cave near the source of that river. Strab. 12. — Stat Sylv. 2, 7, 34 — Tibull. 4, 1, 201 —A king of Lydia, who succeeded his father Alyattes, about 747 years before Christ. He was father to Candaules

MELIBŒA, a town of Thessaly, in the district of Estiœotis, near Ithome Liv 36, 13 —A city of Thessaly, in the district of Magnesia. According to Livy it stood at the base of mount Ossa, in that part which stretches towards the plains of Thessaly above Demetrias. Homer assigns it to the dominions of Philoctetes, hence called "Melibœus dux" by Virgil. Melibœa was attacked in the Macedonian war by M. Popilius, a Roman commander, at the head of 5000 men, but the garrison being reinforced by a detachment from the army of Perseus, the enterprise was abandoned We know from Apollonius that it was a maritime town. Liv. 44, 13 — *Homer. MELIBŒUS, a shepherd introduced in Virgil's Eclogues

MELICERTA MELICERTES, or MELICERTUS, a son of Athamas and Ino. He was saved by his mother, from the fury of his father, who prepared to dash him against a wall as he had done his brother Learchus. The mother was so terrified that she threw herself into the sea, with Melicerta in her arms. Neptune had compassion on the misfortunes of Ino and her son, and changed them both into sea deities. Ino was called Leucothoe or Matuta, and Melicerta was known among the Greeks by the name of Palæmon, and among the Latins by that of Portumnus. Some suppose that the Isthmian games were in honour of Melicerta. (Vid. Isthmia.) Apollod 1, 9, 3, 4 — Paus 1, 44. — Hygin fab 1 et 2. — Ovid Met 4, 529, &c. — Plut. de Symp 5

MELIGUNIS, one of the earlier names of Lipara

MELISSA, a daughter of Melissus, king of Crete, who, with her sister Amalthæa, fed Jupiter with the milk of goats. She first found out the means of collecting honey; whence some have imagined that she was changed into a bee, as her name is the Greek word for that insect. Columell. 100 — One of the Oceanides who married Inachus by whom she had Phoroneus and Ægialus. Apollod. 2 — A daughter of Procles, who married Periander, the son of Cypselus, by whom, in her pregnancy, she was killed with a blow of his foot, by the false accusation of his concubines. Diog. Laert — Paus. 1, 28. — A woman of Corinth, who refused to initiate others in the festivals of Ceres, after she had received admission. She was torn to pieces upon this disobedience, and the goddess made a swarm of bees rise from her body.

MELISSUS, a philosopher of Samos, of the Eleatic sect, who flourished about 440 B. C. He was a disciple of Parmenides, to whose doctrines he closely adhered. As a public man, he was conversant with affairs of state, and acquired great influence among his countrymen, who had a high veneration for his talents and virtues. Being appointed by them to the command of a fleet, he obtained a great naval victory over the Athenians. As a philosopher, he maintained that the principle of all things is one and immutable, or, that whatever exists is one being; that this one being includes all things, and is infinite, without beginning or end; that there is neither vacuum nor motion in the universe, nor any such things as production or decay; that the changes which it seems to suffer are only illusions of our senses, and that we ought not to lay down any thing positively concerning the gods, since our knowledge of them is so uncertain Themistocles is said to have been one of his pupils Diog Laert 9, 24

MELITA, an island in the Mediterranean, sixty miles south-east of Sicily, now Malta. It had several convenient harbours, and was famed for its fertility and its wool. It was first colonized by the Phœnicians; it fell afterwards into the hands of the Carthaginians, from whom it was taken by the Romans. The apostle Paul suffered shipwreck here, though some critics are of opinion that he was cast on shore at Melita in the Adriatic sea Diod. Sic 5, 12 — Cic. in Ver 4, 46. — An island in the Adriatic north-west of Epidaurus, and lying off the coast of Dalmatia. It was famed for a species of lap-dog. Its modern name is Meleda. Plin. 6. — An ancient name of Samothrace. Strab. 10. — One of the Nereides. Virg Æn. 5, 826

MELITENE, a district of Asia Minor, in the south-eastern part of Armenia Minor, and lying along the Euphrates. Its capital was Melitene, now Malatia, on a branch of the river Melas Plin 5 24.

MELITUS, one of the accusers of Socrates. After he had prevailed, and Socrates had been put ignominiously to death, the Athenians repented of their severity to the philosopher. Melitus was condemned to death; and Anytus, another of the accusers, to escape a similar fate, went into voluntary exile. Diog Laert 2.

MELIUS, SP. a Roman knight accused of aspiring to tyranny, on account of his uncommon liberality to the populace. He was summoned to appear by the dictator L. Q. Cincinnatus, and when he refused to obey, he was put to death by Ahala, the master of horse, A U C 314. — Vars. de L. L 4 — Val. Max 6, 3

MELLA or MELA, a small river of Cisalpine Gaul, falling into the Allius, and with it into the Po. Catull. 68, 33. — Virg. G. 4, 278

MELOS, now Milo, an island in the Ægean sea, forming one of the group of the Cycladeś It was situate, according to Strabo, about 700 stadia to the south-east of Cape Scyllæum, and nearly as many, in a north eastern direction, from the Dictynnæan promontory in Crete. It was estimated at about 60 miles in compass, and, according to Pliny, it was almost round. This island, though small, made a very considerable figure in the flourishing ages of Greece. It enjoyed liberty, says Thucydides, 700 years before the Peloponnesian war The inhabitants were originally Lacedæmonians, and therefore, in the time of the war just mentioned, refused to join the Athenians, declaring that they would maintain a strict neutrality. They suffered severely for their attachment to Lacedæmon All who were able to bear arms were put to the sword; the women and children were carried into Attica, and sold for slaves. The island being thus desolated, a new colony was sent thither from Athens. But not long after, Lysander, the Lacedæmonian general, having obliged the Athenians, in their turn, to surrender at discretion, released the captive Melians, and restored them to their native country, after having expelled the Athenian colony. Melos afterwards experienced the common fate of the other islands of the Ægean sea, being reduced, with them, to a Roman province. This island abounded with iron mines, and was formerly famous for its wine and honey. The pastures and mineral waters of this island were also commended, and the alum of Melos was in great repute among the Romans, and preferred by them to that of any other country, except the Egyptian Strab. 5 —Plin. 4, 12 35, 15 —Herod. 6, 48 —Thucyd 3, 91 5, 84 &c

MELPES, a river of Lucania, flowing into the sea to the south-east of the promontory of Palinurus It is now the Malpa Plin 3, 5.

MELPOMENE, one of the Muses daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. Her name is derived from μέλπομαι, canto. She presided over tragedy. Horace has addressed the finest of his odes to her, as to the patroness of lyric poetry She was generally represented as a young woman with a serious countenance. Her garments were splendid; she wore a buskin, and held a dagger in one hand, and in the other a sceptre and crowns Horat Od. 3, 3 —Hesiod Theog 52 et 915.

MEMMIUS, a Roman citizen, accused of ambitus. Cic ad Fratrem 3,——Caius, a Roman knight, who rendered himself illustrious for his eloquence and poetical talents. He was accused of improper intrigues during his canvassing for the consulship, for which he was condemned and banished to Athens. It is supposed that he had an improper intercourse with the wives of Lucullus and Pompey Lucretius dedicated his poem to him Cic in Brut 70 Att. 1, 18. 4, ep 16 et 18 6, ep. 1 ——A tribune who severely inveighed against the pride and corruption of the nobility during the Jugurthine war. MEMNON, a king of Æthiopia, son of Tithonus and Aurora. He came with a body of 10 000 men to assist his uncle Priam, during the Trojan war, where he behaved with great courage, and killed Antilochus, Nestor's son. The aged Nestor gave the Æthiopian monarch a challenge, but Memnon refused it on account of the venerable age of Nestor, and accepted that of Achilles. He was killed in the combat, in the sight of the Grecian and Trojan armies. Aurora was so disconsolate at the death of her son, that she flew to Jupiter all bathed in tears, and begged the god to grant her son such honours as might distinguish him from other mortals Jupiter consented, and immediately a numerous flight of birds issued from the burning pile on which the body was laid, and after they had flown three times round the flames, they divided themselves into two separate bodies, and fought with such acrimony, that above half of them fell down into the fire, as victims to appease the manes of Memnon. These birds were called Memnonides, and it has been observed by some of the ancients, that they never failed to return yearly to the tomb of Memnon, in Troas, and repeat the same bloody engagement, in honour of the hero, from whom they received their name. The Æthiopians or Egyptians, over whom Memnon reigned, erected a celebrated statue to the memory of their monarch This statue, which was 52 feet high, and cut out of a solid stone, had the wonderful property, as it was said, of uttering a melodious sound, like the snapping of a harp string, as soon as the first rays of the morning fell upon it, but at the setting of the sun, and during the night it uttered very lugubrious sounds Cambyses, king of Persia, during the havoc which he made amongst the temples of Egypt when he invaded the country wreaked his vengeance on the person whom this statue represented, by causing it to be broken and thrown upon the ground, but its wonderful power of speech still remained, and the superstition of the people was more firmly rivetted to it than ever, when, even in its mutilated state, it did not cease to welcome the first smile of its beautiful Mother, nor to bemoan her absence during the gloomy watches of the night. This extraordinary phenomenon was witnessed by some of the most exalted and illustrious men in the world, who inscribed their names upon the pedestal of the statue, in attestation of their having heard the sound, amongst others may be mentioned the name of the geographer Strabo, who has been, however, ingenuous enough to acknowledge his inability to determine whether the voice proceeded from the head of the statue, or from its base, or even from some of the people, who were crowding round it to listen to the wonder The upper part of this famous colossus has been brought to London, and may be seen in the gallery of the British Museum. Memnon was the inventor of the alphabet, according to Antediluvians, a writer mentioned by Pliny, 7, 56 Month in Rom——Gent Mel 13, 578, &c.—Ælian 5, 1 Paus 1, 42, 10, 31 —Jus. 15, 5, Philostr. in Apollon ——A general of the Persian forces, when Alexander invaded Asia He distinguished himself for his attachment to the interest of Darius, his valour in the field, the soundness of his counsels, and his great sagacity He defended Miletus against Alexander, and died in the midst of his successful enterprises, B C. 333. His wife Barsine was taken prisoner with the wife of Darius Died 16 —— A Greek historian, who appears to have flourished in the time of Augustus He wrote a history of the affairs of Heraclea in Pontus, whereof books of which were epitomized by Photius. He bears the character of a sensible and perspicuous writer. A Latin translation of his history was published at Oxford in 1597.

MEMNONIUM, the citadel of Susa. The city also bore the epithet of "Memnonian." Herod. 5, 54, 7, 151.

MEMPHIS, a famous city of Egypt, built at a very early period by king Menes, but completed by his successor Uchoreus. It stood originally on the right bank of the Nile, but Menes, by erecting a dam in the river, compelled it to take a more easterly course, and thus leave the city on its left bank. It grew rapidly in wealth and importance, especially after the union of the Egyptian kings, who then chose it for their residence, and made it the metropolis of the whole country. It was 150 stadia in circumference, and contained many magnificent buildings; particularly two temples of Vulcan and Apis, the latter deity being worshipped here with special veneration. Upon the conquest of Egypt by the Persians, Memphis began to decline, and subsequently lost all its dignity, when the Ptolemies built Alexandria, and made it their great seat of government. It still remained a considerable city until the Arabs, in the seventh century, pulled down its splendid edifices to run up the mosques and other public buildings in their own new capital. Its ruins now cover a great space of ground round Mongat Musa and Mit Rahenu Tshuli. 1, 7, 25. Sol. 11. 166. – Strab. 17 Mela, 1, 9. – Diod. 1, 50. Plut. in Isid. – Herod. 2, 10, &c. – *Joseph. MEMPHITIS, a son of Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt. He was put to death by his father.

MENA or MENES, the first king of Egypt according to some accounts. Vid Menes.

MENALCAS, a shepherd in Virgil's eclogues.

MENALIPPE, a sister of Antiope, queen of the Amazons, taken by Hercules when that hero made war against this celebrated nation. She was ransomed, and Hercules received in exchange the arms and belt of the queen. Just. 2, 4. —A daughter of the centaur Chiron, beloved and ravished by Æolus, son of Hellen. She retired into the woods to hide her disgrace from the eyes of her father, and when she had brought forth she intreated the gods to remove her totally from the pursuits of Chiron. She was changed into a mare, and called Orrhoe. Some suppose that she assumed the name of Menalippe, as I lost that of Orrhoe. She became a constellation after death, called the horse. Some authors call her Hippe or Evippe. Hygin. P. A. 2, 18. – Pollux, 4.

MENALIPPUS. Vid. Melanippus.

MENANDER, a celebrated comic poet of Athens, educated under Theophrastus. He was universally esteemed by the Greeks, and received the appellation of Prince of the New Comedy. He did not disgrace his compositions like Aristophanes, by mean and indecent reflections and illiberal satire, but his writings were replete with elegance, refined wit, and judicious observations. So great was the public opinion with regard to his poetical merit, that not only Greece honoured the productions of his genius, but the kings of Egypt and Macedonia, with a liberality which reflects honour on the memory, sent ambassadors to invite him to their courts, and prepared fleets to convey him with every mark of respect and hospitable distinction. Of 108 comedies which he wrote, nothing remains but a few fragments. It is said, that Terence translated all these, and indeed we have cause to lament the loss of such valuable remains, when we are told by the ancients that the elegant Terence, so much admired, was in the opinion of his countrymen reckoned inferior to Menander. It is said that Menander drowned himself in the fifty-second year of his age, B. C. 293, because the compositions of his rival Philemon obtained more applause than his own. Only eight of his numerous comedies were rewarded with a poetical prize. The name of his father was Diopythus, and that of his mother Hegistrata. His fragments have been several times published. The best edition is that of Meineke, Berolini, 1823, 8vo. Quintil. 10, 1. Patercl. 1, 16. —A native of Laodicea, who lived about 130 B. C. He was the author of a treatise περὶ ἐπιδεικτικῶν, "concerning discourses delivered for mere display."

MENAPII, a powerful tribe of Belgic Gaul, between the Mosa or Meuse and the Scaldis, or Scheldt. Their chief town was Menaptorum Castellum, now Kessel. Cæs. B. G. 4, 4. —A Celtic tribe who migrated into Hibernia, and settled in part of the modern province of Leinster.

MENAS, a freedman of Pompey the Great, who distinguished himself by the active and perilous part which he took in the civil wars which were kindled between the younger Pompey and Augustus. When Pompey invited Augustus to his galley, Menas advised his master to seize the person of his enemy, and at the same time the Roman empire, by cutting the cables of his ship. No, replied Pompey, I would have approved of the measure if you had done it without consulting me, but I scorn to break my word. Horace with great virulence and animosity has ridiculed the pride of Menas, and recalled to his mind his former meanness and obscurity. It is said that Menas revolted from Pompey to Augustus, and from Augustus to Pompey, and again a second time betrayed his master, carrying with him part of his fleet. Augustus acknowledged his services and admitted him with every mark of cordiality to his table, an honour which never was bestowed on any other freedman. Suet Aug. 74. – Plut. in Ant. —*Appian. MENCHERES, the twelfth king of Memphis.

MENDES, a city of Egypt, in the Delta Parvum, north-east of Sebennytus, and near the coast. It was the chief city of, and gave name to, the Mendesian nome. From it also the Mendesian mouth of the Nile, (Ostium Mendesium) now the canal of Achmun, derived its appellation. The goat was here an object of adoration, and Herodotus states that both this animal and the god Pan were called in the Egyptian language Mendes. Pan was worshipped at this place with the visage and feet of a goat; though what the Greek writers here call Pan answers more correctly to the deity Priapus or the generative attribute considered abstractedly. At Mendes female goats were also held sacred. The fable of Jupiter having been suckled by a goat, probably arose from some emblematic composition, the true explanation of which was known only to the initiated. The city of Mendes gradually disappeared from history, and in its immediate vicinity rose the city of Thmuis, where the goat was still worshipped as at Mendes. The ruins of Mendes are in the neighbourhood of the modern town of Achmun. Herod. 2, 46.

MENECLES, a native of Barce in Cyrenaica, who wrote an historical work on the Athenians.

MENECRATES, a native of Ephesus, in Æolis, contemporary with Heraclæus. Strabo cites his work "on the origin of cities," (περὶ κτίσεων,) and his "Description of the Heel-spout" (Χαλαοστομικὸς περίοδος.)——An historian of Nicæa, cited by Plutarch in his life of Theseus.—— Tiberius Claudius, a physician, who resided at Rome during the reign of Tiberius. He was the author of 155 works on the healing art.——A physician of Syracuse, famous for his vanity and arrogance. He was generally accompanied by some of his patients whose disorders he had cured. He disguised one in the habit of Apollo, and the other in that of Æsculapius, while he reserved for himself the title and name of Jupiter, whose power was extended over these inferior deities. He crowned himself like the master of the gods, and in a letter which he wrote to Philip king of Macedon, he styled himself, in these words, Menecrates Jupiter to king Philip, greeting. The Macedonian monarch answered, Philip to Menecrates, greeting, and better sense. Philip also invited him to one of his feasts, but when the meats were served up, a table was put separate for the physician, on which he was served only with perfumes and frankincense, like the father of the gods. This entertainment displeased Menecrates, he remembered that he was a mortal, and hurried away from the company. He lived about 360 years before the Christian era. The book which he wrote on cures is lost. Ælian. V. H. 10, 51.

MENEDEMUS, a Greek philosopher, a native of Eretria, who flourished towards the close of the fourth century before Christ. He was of the Eliac school, which he afterwards transferred to his native city, and gave it the name of Eretrian. Though nobly descended, he was obliged, through poverty, to submit to a mechanical employment, either as tent-maker or mason. He formed an early intimacy with Asclepiades, who was a fellow-labourer with him in his humble occupation. Having minds more adapted to study than manual labour, they resolved to devote themselves to the pursuit of philosophy. For this purpose, they left their native country, and went to Athens, where Plato presided in the Academy. (Vid Asclepiades.) In his own school at Eretria he neglected those forms which were commonly observed in places of this kind, and allowed his hearers and disciples to attend him in whatever posture they pleased, standing, walking, or sitting. At first Menedemus was received by the Eretrians with great contempt, and, on account of the vehemence with which he disputed, obtained the appellations of cur and madman. But he afterwards rose into high esteem, and was intrusted with a public office, to which was annexed an annual stipend of 200 talents. He discharged the trust with fidelity and reputation, but accepted only of a fourth part of the salary attached to the appointment. He was sent upon several embassies to Ptolemy, Lysander, and Demetrius, and rendered his countrymen essential services, by obtaining a diminution of their tribute, and rescuing them from other burdens. Antigonus entertained a personal respect for him, and professed himself one of his disciples. His intimacy with this prince created a suspicion among his countrymen, that he had a secret intention to betray their city into his hands. To save himself he fled to Antigonus, and soon after died, in the 84th year of his age. It is thought he precipitated his death by abstaining from food, being oppressed with grief at the ingratitude of his countrymen, and on being unable to persuade Antigonus to restore the lost liberties of his country. Diog Laert. 2, 125, &c.——A native of Lampsacus, in whom the spirit of the Cynic sect degenerated into downright madness. Dressed in a black cloak, with an Arcadian cap upon his head, on which were drawn the figures of the twelve signs of the zodiac, with tragic buskins on his legs, with a long beard and with an ashen staff in his hand, he went about like a maniac, saying that he was a spirit returned from the lower world to admonish the living. He lived in the reign of Antigonus, king of Macedon. Diog Laert 6, 102.

MENELAI PORTUS, a city and harbour on the coast of Africa, between Cyrene and Egypt. C Nep in Ages 8.—Herod. 4, 169.

MENELAIA, a festival celebrated at Therapnæ in Laconia, in honour of Menelaus. He had there a temple, where he was worshipped with his wife Helen as one of the supreme gods.

MENELAUS, a king of Sparta, brother to Agamemnon. His father's name was Atreus, according to Homer, or according to the more probable opinion of Hesiod, Apollodorus, &c. he was the son of Plisthenes and Ærope. [Vid. Plisthenes.] He was educated with his brother Agamemnon in the house of Atreus, but soon after the death of this monarch, Thyestes his brother usurped the kingdom and banished the two children of Plisthenes. Menelaus and Agamemnon came to the court of Œneus king of Calydonia, who treated them with tenderness and paternal care. From Calydonia they went to Sparta, where, like the rest of the Grecian princes, they solicited the marriage of Helen the daughter of king Tyndarus. By the artifice and advice of Ulysses, Helen was permitted to choose a husband, and she fixed her eyes upon Menelaus, and married him after her numerous suitors had solemnly bound themselves by an oath to defend her, and protect her person against the violence or assault of every intruder. [Vid. Helena.] As soon as the nuptials were celebrated, Tyndarus resigned the crown to his son-in law, and their happiness was complete. This was, however, of short duration; Helen was the fairest woman of the age, and Venus had promised Paris the son of Priam to reward him with such a beauty. [Vid. Paris.] The arrival of Paris in Sparta was the cause of great revolutions. The absence of Menelaus in Crete gave opportunities to the Trojan prince to corrupt the fidelity of Helen, and to carry away home what the goddess of beauty had promised to him as his due. This action was highly resented by Menelaus, he reminded the Greek princes of their oath and solemn engagements when they courted the daughter of Tyndarus, and immediately all Greece took up arms to defend his cause. The combined forces assembled at Aulis in Bœotia where they chose Agamemnon for their general, and Calchas for their high priest; and after their applications to the court of Priam for the recovery of Helen had proved fruitless, they marched to meet their enemies in the field. During the Trojan war Menelaus behaved with great spirit and courage and Paris must have fallen by his hand, had not Venus interposed and redeemed him from certain death He also expressed his wish to engage Hector, but Agamemnon hindered him from fighting with so powerful an adversary. In the tenth year of the Trojan war, Helen, as it is reported, obtained the forgiveness and the good graces of Menelaus by introducing him with Ulysses, the night that Troy was reduced to ashes, into the chamber of Deiphobus whom she had married after the death of Paris. This perfidious conduct totally reconciled her to her first husband; and she returned with him to Sparta, during a voyage of eight years He died some time after his return. He had a daughter called Hermione, and Nicostratus, according to some, by Helen, and a son called Megapenthes by a concubine. Some say that Menelaus went to Egypt on his return from the Trojan war to obtain Helen who had been detained there by the king of the country. (Vid Helena.) The palace which Menelaus once inhabited was still entire in the days of Pausanias, as well as the temple which had been raised to his memory by the people of Sparta. *Homer. MENENIUS, Agrippa, a celebrated Roman who appeased the Roman populace in the infancy of the consular government by repeating the well-known fable of the belly and limbs. He flourished 495 B C:——Titus, son of the preceding, was chosen consul with C Horatius, A U C. 277, when he was defeated by the Tusci, and being called to an account by the tribunes for this failure, was sentenced to pay a heavy fine He died of grief soon after. Liv. 2, 51, &c.

MENES, considered by most as the founder of the Egyptian empire, is supposed to have reigned 117 years after the birth of Phaleg, son of Heber, which was the year of the dispersion of the people throughout the earth He built the town of Memphis, and, in the prosecution of his work, stopped the course of the Nile near it, by constructing a causeway several miles broad, and caused it to run through the mountains. For his ability and popularity he was deified after death. He is supposed to be the Misraim of Scripture. Bishop Clayton, however, contends that Menes was not the first king of Egypt, but that he only transferred the seat of empire from Thebes to Memphis Herod. 2, 1 et 99.—Diod 1.

MENESTHEI PORTUS, a harbour, not far from Gades, on the coast of Spain, in the territory of Bætica. An oracle of Menestheus was said to have been in or near the place. The modern Puerto de Santa Maria is thought to correspond to the ancient spot.

MENESTHEUS, or Menesteus, or Mnestheus a son of Perœus, who so insinuated himself into the favour of the people of Athens, that, during the long absence of Theseus, he was elected king The lawful monarch at his return home was expelled, and Mnestheus established his usurpation by his popularity and great moderation As he had been one of Helen's suitors, he went to the Trojan war at the head of the people of Athens, and died on his return in the island of Melos. He reigned twenty three years, B. C. 1205, and was succeeded by Demophoon the son of Theseus. Plut in Thes.—*Homer. MENESTHEUS, a Greek killed by Paris in the Trojan war (Homer. Il. 7, 8.——A son of the Sperchius and Polydora who accompanied Achilles to the Trojan war. Hom Il. 16, 173

MENINX, an island off the coast of Africa, in the vicinity of the Syrtis Minor, and forming part of its southern side. It was also named Lotophagitis, and is famous from the mention made of it as the favourite dwelling of the Lotophagi, so called from the Greek words λωτος lotus, and φαγειν edere, owing to their living upon the lotus. This delightful fruit is said to have been so intoxicating to the taste, that whosoever partook of it straightway forgot his own country, and cared only to spend his life in the happy regions where it was produced it was described as being something in taste like the date, but of a saffron colour, no bigger than a bean, and growing in bunches like a myrtle-berry. It is still found on the whole coast hereabouts, and, being in great repute, is sold in all the markets; the Arabs call it Jugeb Meninx had several cities, one of which, called Girba, has given the modern name of Jerba to the whole island the emperor Vibius Gallus was born here. Herod. 2, 92 4, 177,—Polyb 12, 2.

MENIPPUS, a cynic who was a native of Gadara, in Palestine, and the disciple of Menedemus. He was such a severe satirist, that Lucian calls him the most snarling of all the dogs of his sect His satires were partly in prose, and partly in verse He is said to have hung himself, on account of the loss of his riches, which he had gathered by usury MENNIS, a city of Assyria, in the district of Adiabene to the south of Arbela. The adjacent country abounded with bitumen Mannert supposes it to have been near the modern Dus Churmalu.

MENODŌTUS, a physician of the empiric school born at Nicomedia He was a disciple of Antiochus of Laodicea in Lycia, and flourished about the middle of the second century.

MENŒCEUS, a Theban, father of Hipponome, Jocasta, and Creon ——A young Theban, son of Creon He offered himself to death when Tiresias, to ensure victory on the side of Thebes against the Argive forces, ordered the Thebans to sacrifice one of the descendants of those who sprang from the dragon's teeth, and he killed himself near the cave where the dragon of Mars had formerly resided. The gods required this sacrifice because the dragon had been killed by Cadmus, and no sooner was Creon dead than his countrymen obtained the victory. Apollod 3, 6 —Cic. Tusc 1, 98.

MENŒTES, the pilot of the ship of Gyas, at the naval games exhibited by Æneas at the anniversary of his father's death. He was thrown into the sea by Gyas for his inattention, and saved himself by swimming to a rock. Virg. Æn 5, 161, &c ——An Arcadian, killed by Turnus in the war of Æneas. Id 12, 517.

MENŒTIUS, a son of Actor and Ægina after her amour with Jupiter He left his mother and went to Opus, where he had, by Sthenele, or according to others, by Philomela, or Polymela, Patroclus, often called from him Menœtiades. Menœtius was one of the Argonauts. Apollod. 3, 13.—Homer Il 1, 307.—Hygin. fab. 97.

MENON, a Thessalian commander in the expedition of Cyrus the younger against his brother Artaxerxes. He commanded the left wing in the battle of Cunaxa. He was taken along with the other generals after the battle of Tissaphernes, but was not put to death with them. Xenophon states that he lived in entire year, after having had some personal punishment inflicted on him, and then met with an end of his existence. Diodorus states that he was not punished with the other generals, because it was thought that he was inclined to betray the Greeks, and he was therefore allowed to escape unhurt. Marcellinus, in his life of Thucydides, accuses Xenophon of calumniating Menon, on account of his enmity towards Plato, who was a friend of Menon. —*Xen. MERA or MŒRA, one of the Atlantides who married Tegeates son of Lycaon. She had a monument at Tegea in Arcadia. —Hom. Odyss. 11, 325.—Paus. 8, 48.

MERCURII PROMONTORIUM, the name with the Hermæum Promontorium. A promontory of Africa, on the coast of Zeugitana, now Cape Bon MERCURIUS, a celebrated god of antiquity, called Hermes by the Greeks. There were no less than five of this name according to Cicero; a son of Cœlus and Lux, a son of Valens and Coronis; a son of the Nile, a son of Jupiter and Maia; and another called by the Egyptians Thaut. Some add a sixth, a son of Bacchus and Proserpine. To the son of Jupiter and Maia, the actions of all the others have been probably attributed, as he is the most famous, and the best known. Mercury was the messenger of the gods, and of Jupiter in particular, he was the patron of travellers and of shepherds, he conducted the souls of the dead into the infernal regions, and not only presided over orators, merchants, declaimers, but he was also the god of thieves, pickpockets and all dishonest persons. His name is derived a mercibus, because he was the god of merchandise among the Latins. He was born, according to the more received opinion, in Arcadia, on mount Cyllene, and in his infancy he was intrusted to the care of the Seasons. The day that he was born, or more probably the following day, he gave an early proof of his craftiness and dishonesty in stealing away the oxen of Admetus which Apollo tended. He gave another proof of his thievish propensity, by taking also the quiver and arrows of the divine shepherd, and he increased his fame by robbing Neptune of his trident, Venus of her girdle, Mars of his sword, Jupiter of his sceptre, and Vulcan of many of his mechanical instruments. These specimens of his art recommended him to the notice of the gods and Jupiter took him as his messenger, interpreter, and cup-bearer in the assembly of the gods. This last office he discharged till the promotion of Ganymede. He was presented by the king of heaven with a winged cap called petasus, and with wings for his feet called talaria. He had also a short sword called harpe, which he lent to Perseus. With these he was enabled to go into whatever part of the universe he pleased with the greatest celerity, and besides he was permitted to make himself invisible, and to assume whatever shape he pleased. As messenger of Jupiter he was intrusted with all his secrets. He was the ambassador and plenipotentiary of the gods, and he was concerned in all alliances and treaties. He was the confidant of Jupiter's amours, and he often was set to watch over the jealousy and intrigues of Juno. The invention of the lyre and its seven strings is ascribed to him. This he gave to Apollo, and received in exchange the celebrated caduceus, with which the god of poetry used to drive the flocks of king Admetus. (Vid Caduceus.) In the wars of the giants against the gods, Mercury showed himself brave, spirited, and active. He delivered Mars from the long confinement which he suffered from the superior power of the Aloides. He purified the Danaides of the murder of their husbands, he tied Ixion to his wheel in the infernal regions, he destroyed the hundred eyed Argus, he sold Hercules to Omphale the queen of Lydia, he conducted Priam to the tent of Achilles to redeem the body of his son Hector, and he carried the infant Bacchus to the nymphs of Nysa. Mercury had many surnames and epithets. He was called Cyllenius, Caduceator, Acacetos, from Acacus, an Arcadian; Acacesius, Tricephalos, Tripter, Chthonius, Camillus, Agoneus, Delius, Arcas, &c. His children are also numerous as well as his amours. He was father of Autolycus, by Chione; Myrtillus, by Cleobula, Libya, by Libya; Echion and Eurytus, by Antianira; Cephalus, by Creusa; Pylia, by Issa, and of Priapus, according to some. He was also father of Hermaphroditus, by Venus, of Eudorus, by Polymela; of Pan, by Dryope, or Penelope His worship was well established, particularly in Greece, Egypt, and Italy. He was worshipped at Tanagra, in Bœotia, under the name of Criophorus, and represented as carrying a ram on his shoulders, because he delivered the inhabitants from a pestilence by telling them to carry a ram in that manner round the walls of their city. The Roman merchants yearly celebrated a festival on the 15th of May, in honour of Mercury, in a temple near the Circus Maximus A pregnant sow was then sacrificed and sometimes a calf, and particularly the tongues of animals were offered After the votaries had sprinkled themselves with water with laurel leaves, they offered prayers to the divinity, and intreated him to be favourable to them, and to forgive whatever artful measures, false oaths or falsehoods they had used or uttered in the pursuit of gain. Sometimes Mercury appears on monuments with a large cloak round his arm, or tied under his chin. The chief ensigns of his power and offices are his caduceus, his petasus, and his talaria Sometimes he is represented sitting upon a scaly fish, holding in one hand his caduceus, and in the other the claws of the fish At other times he is like a young man without a beard, holding in one hand a purse, as being the tutelary god of merchants, with a cock on his wrists as an emblem of vigilance, and at his feet a goat, a scorpion, and a fly Some of his statues represented him as a youth fascino erecto Sometimes he rests his foot upon a tortoise. In Egypt his statues represented him with the head of a dog, whence he was often confounded with Anubis, and received the sacrifice of a stork. Offerings of milk and honey were made because he was the god of eloquence, whose powers were sweet and persuasive. The Greeks and Romans offered tongues to him by throwing them into the fire, as he was the patron of speaking, of which the tongue is the organ. Sometimes his statues represent him as without arms, because, according to some, the power of speech can prevail over every thing even without the assistance of arms. Homer Od 1 &c. Il 1, &c Hymn. in Merc —*Lucian in Mort. MERMNADÆ, a race of kings in Lydia, of which Gyges was the first. They sat on the Lydian throne till the reign of Cœsus, who was conquered by Cyrus king of Persia. They were descendants of the Heraclidæ, and probably received the name of Mermnadæ from Mermnas, one of their own family They were descended from Lemnos, or according to others, from Agelaus the son of Omphale by Hercules. Herod. 1, 7 et 14.

MEROE, an island of Æthiopia. It was formed by the Nile, and by two of its tributaries named Astaboras and Astapus. Of these the Astaboras Tacazze or Abara the eastern boundary of the island, rises in Abyssinia not far from the lake Tzana and flows into the Nile 60 miles below the city of Meroe. About the same distance above the city the Nile is joined by the river Astapus Abara, Bahr el-Asergue, or Blue Nile: it rises in the western part of Abyssinia, traverses lake Pseboa or Colne now Tzana or Dembea, and sweeps round to its junction with the Bahr-el-Abiad or White Nile The branches of these two rivers were united in the upper part of their course, either artificially or naturally, and thus caused Meroe to become an island; the communication between them still exists, and is called Fahaty The shape of the island was compared to a shield, its length amounting to 3,000 stadia, and its average width to 1,000. It is said to have been formerly called Saba, but its modern name is Abara, which it has derived from the river Abara or Astoboras, its eastern boundary. The island was exceedingly fertile, and is said to have abounded in silver, gold, and other precious metals. the people were much commended for their social character and simplicity of manners The city of Meroe stood upon the Nile at the north western side of the island, and its extensive ruins may still be seen at a place called Gebbanny Mela, 1, 9 3, 9 —Paus 1, 33.—Juv 13, 163.—Strab. 17 —Herod. 2, 31.—Plin 2, 173.—Lucan. 4, 323. 10, 161, 237, et 303.

MEROPE, one of the Atlantides. She married Sisyphus son of Æolus, and, like her sisters, was changed into a constellation after death. [Vid. Pleiades.] It is said, that in the constellation of the Pleiades the star of Merope appears more dim and obscure than the rest, because she, as the poets observe, married a mortal, while her sisters married some of the gods or their descendants. Ovid. Fast. 4 175.—Hygin. fab. 192.—Apollod. 1, 9 —A daughter of Cypselus who married Cresphontes, king of Messenia, by whom she had three children. Her husband and two of her children were murdered by Polyphontes. The murderer wished her to marry him, and she would have been obliged to comply, had not Epytus, or Telephontes, her third son, revenged his father's death by assassinating Polyphontes. Apollod. 2, 6. —Paus. 4, 3 ——A daughter of Œnopion beloved by Orion. Apollod. 1, 4.——A daughter of the Cebrenus who married Æsacus, the son of Priam.——A daughter of Erechtheus mother of Daedalus. Plut. in Thes MEROPS, a king of the island of Cos, who married Clymene, one of the Oceanides He was changed into an eagle and placed among the constellations. *Ovid. MESENE, an island in the Tigris, where Apamea was built It is now Diget. Plin. 6, 31 ——Another enclosed between the canal of Naara and the Pasitigris, and which is called in the oriental writers Pharat Mascan, or "the Mesene of the Euphrates," to distinguish it from the Mesene of the Tigris. The term Mesene is a Greek one, and refers to land enclosed between two streams.

MESOMEDES, a lyric poet in the age of the emperor Antoninus.

MESOPOTAMIA, a country of Asia, bounded on the north by mount Masius, on the east by the river Tigris, on the west by the Euphrates, and on the south by a little stream which nearly connects these two great rivers To the north it bordered on Armenia, to the east upon Assyria to the south on Babylonia, and Arabia, and to the west upon Syria. Mesopotamia derived its name from the Greek words μεσος medius and ποταμος fluvius, owing to its situation between two great rivers; from this circumstance it is sometimes called Syria inter fluvios The Hebrews distinguished it by the appellation Aram-Naharaim or Aram between the rivers, it being part of that country which fell to the lot of Aram: it is still called Al Gezira or The Island. Mesopotamia was divided by the river Chaboras into two parts, the northern and southern. The former of these was exceedingly fertile, and is therefore distinguished in scripture by the peculiar title of Padan-Aram, and Sedan Aram, both signifying the fertile Aram. Mesopotamia formed part of the great Assyrian monarchy, and fell with it into the hands of the Medes and subsequently of the Persians; it is hence frequently included in the general names of Assyria and Babylonia After this it came into the power of the Macedonians and the Seleucidæ, and was finally seized upon by the Romans in the Mithradatic war, although it was not till the time of Trajan that they constituted it a province: it was the scene of some of their most bloody battles with the Parthians and Persians Upon the death of Julian, the emperor Jovian found himself compelled to resign the greater part of the province to the Persians, only retaining that portion of it which lies between the Chaboras and Euphrates, and it is to this alone that in the latter ages the name of Mesopotamia was confined. Strab. 2.– Mela, 1, 11.– Cic. de Nat. D. 2, 52.— Dion. 1. – Plut. 5, 18.

MESSALA, M Valerius Corvinus, an illustrious Roman, of an ancient and noble family, who distinguished himself in youth by his eloquence and patriotism, and joined the republican army under Brutus and Cassius against the triumvirs. He is described in very high terms by Cicero, in a letter to Brutus, as being almost, or altogether unequaled for integrity, constancy, and the affection which he displayed for the commonwealth. Of his eloquence, Quintilian says, it is splendid, fair, and bearing the stamp of his nobility. At the battle of Philippi he had a distinguished command, and with his legion was the first that turned the left wing commanded by Octavianus Cæsar After the death of the two republican chiefs, he made his peace with the victor, and, according to one of the historians of Rome, there was no circumstance of his victory more pleasing to Cæsar than the preservation of Messala, nor did any man ever give proof of greater attachment and gratitude than Messala towards Cæsar Yet, to his honour, it is asserted, that he never, and on no occasion, was backward in showing his regard to the memory of his earlier friends, and his decided preference of their cause. When he recommended Strato to Cæsar, he said, with tears flowing from his eyes, "this, sir, is the man who performed the last kind office for my beloved friend Brutus;" and at another time, when Cæsar reminded him that he had been no less zealous for him at Actium, than against him at Philippi, he answered, "I always espoused the most just side of every question." In the year 31 B C. he was the emperor's colleague in the consulate, and was sent as his legate into Asia a year or two afterwards. In 27 he obtained a triumph over the Aquitanians; after this, he for a short time held the office o prefect, which he resigned, finding it ill adapted to his habits. He was addicted to literary pursuits, and was a patron of literary persons, particularly of Tibullus, who commemorates him in his elegies, and has left an express panegyric upon him. In old age he composed a work "De Familiis Romanis," cited by Pliny. At the age of seventy, about two years prior to his decease, the faculties of his mind underwent a total decay, and his memory so completely failed him, that he forgot his own name. Horat. 1, Sat. 6, 42 Sat 10, 85 3, od. 21. Art 371 — Quintil. 10, 1 —Tibull 1, el. 1, &c.— *Tacit. MESSALINA, Valeria, a daughter of Messala Barbatus She married the emperor Claudius and disgraced herself by her cruelties and scandalous incontinence. Her hu band's palace was not the only seat of her lasciviousness, but she even prostituted herself in the most public manner. Her extravag ances at last irritated Claudius so much, that he was obliged to summon her to answer to all the accusations which were brought against her, upon which she attempted to destroy herself, and when her courage failed, one of the tribunes dispatched her with his sword, A. D 48 The satirist, in speaking of her, says, Et lassata viris, nondum satiata recessit.

Jun — Tacit Ann. 11, 37. Suet in Claud —— Another called also Statilia. She was descended from a consular family, and married the consul Atticus Vestinus, whom Nero murdered She received with tokens of tenderness her husband's murderer, and married him. She had married four hu bands before she came to the imperial throne, and after the death of Nero retired to literary pursuits and peaceful occupations Otho, after this, paid his addresses to her, but before the consummation of marriage he destroyed himself. In his dying moments he wrote her a pathetic and very consolatory letter. Tacit. Ann MESSALINUS, M VALERI a Roman officer in the reign of Tiberius He was appointed governor of Dalmatia, and rendered himself known by his opposition to Piso, and by his attempts to persuade the Romans of the necessity of suffering women to accompany the camps on their different expeditions Tacit Ann. 3 ——One of Domitian's informers ——A flatterer of the emperor Tiberius.

MESSANA, an ancient and celebrated town of Sicily on the straits which separate Italy from Sicily. It was anciently called Zancle, and was founded 1000 years before the Christian era. The inhabitants, being continually exposed to the depredations of the people of Cuma, implored the assistance of the Messenians of Peloponnesus, and with them repelled the enemy. After this victorious campaign, the Messenians entered Zancle, and lived in such intimacy with the inhabitants that they changed their name, and assumed that of the Messenians, and called their city Messana. Another account says, that Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium, made war against the Zancleans with the assistance of the Messenians of Peloponnesus and that after he had obtained a decisive victory, he called the conquered city Messana in compliment to his allies, about 494 years before the Christian era. After this revolution at Zancle, the Mamertini took possession of it and made it the capital of the neighbouring country (Vid. Mamertini) It afterwards fell into the hands of the Romans, and was for some time the chief of their possessions in Sicily The inhabitants were called Messanii, Messanienses, and Mamertini The straits of Messana have always been looked upon as very dangerous, especially by the ancients, on account of the rapidity of the currents, and the irregular and violent flowing and ebbing of the sea. Strab 6 — Mela, 2, 7. — Plin. 4, 23. — Dion. 4 — Thucyd. 1, &c — Herod 6, 23, 7, 28.

MESSAPIA, a country of Italy in Magna Græcia, commonly supposed to have been the same with Iapygia, but forming, in strictness, the part of Italy The town of Messapia, mentioned by Pliny is thought to have communicated its name to the Messapian nation. The generality of Italian topographers identify the site of this ancient town with that of Mesagne, between Oria and Brindisi. Plin 3, 11

MESSENE, a daughter of Triopas king of Argos who married Polycaon son of Lelex, king of Laconia. She encouraged her husband to levy troops, and to seize a part of Peloponnesus, which, after it had been conquered, received her name. She received divine honours after her death, and had a magnificent temple at Ithome, where her statue was made half of gold and half of Parian marble Paus. 4 1 et 3.

MESSENE, or MESSENA, now Mauro Vatra a city in the Peloponnesus, the capital of the country called Messenia. The inhabitants have rendered themselves famous for the war which they carried on against the Spartans, and which received the appellation of the Messenian war. The first Messenian war arose from the following circumstances; the Messenians offered violence to some Spartan women who had assembled to offer sacrifices in a temple, which was common to both nations, and which stood on the borders of their respective territories, and besides they killed Teleclus, the Spartan king, who attempted to defend the innocence of the females. This account, according to the Spartan traditions, is contradicted by the Messenians, who observe that Teleclus with a chosen body of Spartans assembled at the temple, before mentioned, disguised in women's clothes, and all secretly armed with daggers. This hostile preparation was to surprise some of the neighbouring inhabitants, and in a quarrel which soon after arose, Teleclus and his associates were all killed These quarrels were the cause of the first Messenian war, which began, B. C 743 years. It was carried on with vigour and spirit on both sides, and after many obstinate and bloody battles had been fought and continued for 19 years, it was at last finished by the taking of Ithome by the Spartans. This place stood a siege of ten years, and was defended with all the power of the Messenians, but in the conquest the inveteracy of Sparta was manifested in the solemn oath by which her soldiers bound themselves, not to return home till they had reduced the last stronghold of their rivals. The insults to which the conquered Messenians were continually exposed, at last excited their resentment, and they resolved to shake off the yoke. They suddenly revolted, and the second Messenian war was begun 685 B. C. and continued 14 years. The Messenians at first gained some advantages, but a fatal battle in the third year of the war so totally disheartened them that they fled to Ira, where they resolved to maintain an obstinate siege against their victorious pursuers. The Spartans were assisted by the Samians in besieging Ira, and the Messenians were at last obliged to submit to the superior power of their adversaries The taking of Ira, by the Lacedæmonians, after a siege of 11 years, put an end to the second Messenian war. Peace was re established for some time in Peloponnesus, but after the expiration of 300 years, the Messenians attempted a third time to free themselves from the power of Lacedæmon, B. C 465. At that time the Helots had revolted from the Spartans, and the Messenians, by joining their forces to these wretched slaves, looked upon their respective calamities as common, and thought themselves closely interested in each other's welfare. The Lacedæmonians were assisted by the Athenians, but they soon grew jealous of one another's power, and their political connexion produced the most inveterate enmity, and at last ended in open war Ithome was the place in which the Messenians had a second time gathered all their forces and though ten years had already elapsed, both parties seemed equally confident of victory The Spartans were afraid of storming Ithome, as the oracle of Delphi had threatened them with the greatest calamities, if they offered any violence to a place which was dedicated to the service of Apollo. The Messenians, however, were soon obliged to submit to their victorious adversaries, B. C. 453, and they consented to leave their native country, and totally to depart from the Peloponnesus, solemnly promising that if they ever returned into Messenia, they would suffer themselves to be sold as slaves. The Messenians upon this, miserably exiled, applied to the Athenians for protection, and were permitted to inhabit Naupactus, whence some of them were afterwards removed to take possession of their ancient territories in Messenia, during the Peloponnesian war The third Messenian war was productive of great revolutions in Greece, and though originally merely a private quarrel it soon engaged the attention of all the neighbouring states, and kindled the flames of dissension every where Every state took up arms as if in its own defence, or to prevent additional power and dominion from being lodged in the hands of its rivals. The descendants of the Messenians at last returned to Peloponnesus, B C. 370, after a long banishment of 300 years. Paus Mes. &c.—Justin. 3. 4, &c.—Strab. 6, &c.—Thucyd 1, &c —Diod 11, &c.—Plut. in Cyn &c.—Polyæn 3.—Polyb 4, &c

METAGITNIA, a festival in honour of Apollo, celebrated by the inhabitants of Melite, who migrated to Attica. It receives its name from its being observed in the month called Metagitnion.

METAPONTUM, a town of Lucania in Italy, on the coast of the Sinus Tarentinus, founded about 1261 years B. C. by Metabus, the father of Camilla, or Epeus, one of the companions of Nestor. Pythagoras retired there for some time, and perished in a sedition. Annibal made it his head-quarters when in that part of Italy, and its attachment to Carthage was afterwards severely punished by the Roman conquerors, who destroyed its liberties and independence. A few broken pillars of marble are now the only vestiges of Metapontum. Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, 4. —Justin. 12, 2.—Liv. 1, 8, 23, 27, &c.

METELLA, the wife of Sylla.

METELLI, the surname of the family of the Cæcilii at Rome, the most known of whom were —A general who defeated the Achæans, took Thebes, and invaded Macedonia, &c.—Q. Cæcilius, who rendered himself illustrious by his successes against Jugurtha the Numidian king, from which he was surnamed Numidicus. He took, in this expedition, the celebrated Marius, as his lieutenant, and he had soon cause to repent of the confidence he had placed in him. Marius raised himself to power by defaming the character of his benefactor, and Metellus was recalled to Rome. L. Apuleius Saturninus, a tribune of the commons, summoned him, after his return, to trial, because he had not sworn to observe the Agrarian law, which this tribune had carried by force; and, although all good citizens supported him, to prevent contention he went into voluntary exile at Rhodes, where he spent his time in reading, and in conversing with illustrious men. Marius pronounced sentence of banishment against him, B. C. 104, two years after which he was recalled with the highest approbation of the state He received this information at Tralles, when witnessing some games, and he continued till the end of the exhibition, not indicating the least joy, but retaining his countenance unaltered, and showing, says the historian the same strength of mind in prosperity which he had done in adversity. Liv Epit 65 —Eutrop. 4. 27.—*Val. He lost his sight and one of his arms in doing it, and the senate, to reward his zeal and piety, permitted him always to be drawn to the senate-house in a chariot, an honour which no one had ever before enjoyed. He also gained a great victory over the Carthaginians in the first Punic war, and led in his triumph 13 generals, and 120 elephants taken from the enemy. METHODIUS, bishop of Tyre, suffered martyrdom in the Diocletian persecution, A. D. 303. He wrote a work against Porphyry; a Treatise on the Resurrection against Origen, Commentaries, and several other pieces, the fragments of which were printed at Paris in 1644. Afterwards "The Banquet of Virgins," by this writer, was found entire, and printed, with a Latin version, in 1657, folio.

METHONE, now Leuterochori, a city of Macedonia, about forty stadia north of Pydna. It is said to have received its name from a daughter of Æneas, or from the rock Methon, at the entrance of its harbour. It is identified by some with Pedasus, one of the seven towns offered by Agamemnon to Achilles. It is now called Modon. Paus. 4. 35. Strab. 8.—Hom. Il. 9. 294.——or Methana, a peninsula of Argolis, within the district of Trœzene, formed by the harbour or bay of Pogon on one side, and the curvature of the Epidamian gulf on the other. It was connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus, which the Athenians occupied and fortified in the seventh year of the Peloponnesian war. Diodorus Siculus says it was taken by the same people under Tolmides, in the interval between the Persian and Peloponnesian wars, and this is perhaps the meaning of Thucydides, when he says, that, on peace being made, or rather a truce for thirty years, Trœzene, among other towns was restored to the Peloponnesians. Within the peninsula was a small town, also called Methone, which possessed a temple of Isis. About thirty stadia from the town were to be seen some hot springs, produced by the eruption of a volcano in the reign of Antigonus Gonatas. Thucyd. 1, 115 4, 45.—Diod. Sic. 12.—Paus. 2, 34.

METHYMNA, a city of Lesbos, lying opposite to Assos in Troas, and situate on the northernmost point of the island. It was the birthplace of Arion the musician, and of Myrsilus the historian. The territory of this town was contiguous to that of Mitylene, a circumstance which appears to have created a considerable degree of rivalry between them, and probably induced the Methymnæans to adhere to the Athenians, while their neighbours were bent on detaching themselves from that power. As a reward for their fidelity, the Methymnæans were exempted from contributions in money. Towards the close of the Peloponnesian war, Methymna fell into the power of the Spartan commander, Callicratidas, who, though urged to treat the citizens with severity, and to sell them as slaves, refused to comply with the advice, declaring, that as long as he was admiral, no Greek, as far as by in his power, should be enslaved. The wine of Methymna was held in great estimation, hence Bacchus is frequently called the god of Methymna. The remains of this city are to be seen near the village of *Molivo. METILIA LEX, was enacted A. U. C. 536, that Minucius, master of the horse, should be equal in command with Fabius the dictator.

METIS, one of the Oceanides. She was Jupiter's first wife, celebrated for her great prudence and sagacity above the rest of the gods. Jupiter, who was afraid lest she should bring forth into the world a child more cunning and greater than himself, devoured her in the first month of her pregnancy. Some time after this adventure the god had his head opened, from which issued Minerva armed from head to foot. According to Apollodorus, (1, 2) Metis gave a portion to Saturn, and obliged him to throw up the children whom he had devoured. Hesiod Theog. 890. Apollod. 1, 3.—Hygin.

METIUS, Curtius one of the Sabines, who fought against the Romans, on account of the stolen virgins.——Suffetius, a dictator of Alba, in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. He fought against the Romans, and at last, finally to settle their disputes, he proposed a single combat between the Horatii and Curiatii. The Albans were conquered, and Metius promised to assist the Romans against their enemies. In a battle against the Veientes and Fidenates, Metius showed his infidelity by forsaking the Romans at the first onset, and retired to a neighbouring eminence, to wait for the event of the battle, and to fall upon whatever side proved victorious. The Romans obtained the victory, and Tullus ordered Metius to be tied between two chariots, which were drawn by four horses two different ways, and his limbs were torn away from his body, about 669 years before the Christian era. Liv. 1, 23, &c.—Flor. 1, 3.—*Virg. METROLA, festivals instituted by Theseus in commemoration of the people of Attica having removed to Athens.

METON, a celebrated astronomer of Athens, who flourished 432 B. C., was the son of Pau-samias. He observed, in the first year of the 87th Olympiad, the solstice at Athens, and published his cycle of 19 years by which he endeavoured to adjust the course of the sun and moon, and to make the solar and lunar years begin at the same point of time. This is called the Metonic period, or cycle. It is also called the golden number, from its great use in the calendar. It is known that Meton was living about the year 412 B C, for when the Athenian fleet was sent to Sicily, he escaped from being embarked on that disastrous expedition by counterfeiting an appearance of idiotism Vitruv 1. – Plut. in Nicia

METRA, the daughter of Eresichthon, a Thessalian prince, beloved by Neptune. When her father had spent all his fortune to gratify the canine hunger under which he laboured, she prostituted herself to her neighbours, and received for reward oxen, goats, and sheep, which she presented to Eresichthon. Some say that she had received from Neptune the power of changing herself into whatever animal she pleased, and that her father sold her continually to gratify his hunger, and that she instantly assumed a different shape, and became again his property Ovid Met 8, Ash 21

METRODORUS, an intimate friend of Epicurus. He first attached himself to that philosopher at Lampsacus, and continued with him till his death He maintained the cause of his friend and master with great intrepidity, both by his discourses and his writings, against the Sophists and Dialectics, and consequently partook largely of the obloquy which fell upon his sect. Plutarch charges him with having reprobated the folly of his brother Timocrates in aspiring to the honours of wisdom, whilst nothing was of any value but eating and drinking, and indulging the animal appetites But it is probable that this calumny originated with Timocrates himself, who, from a personal quarrel with Metrodorus, deserted the sect, and therefore can deserve little credit Cic Fine Quæst 2, 3 De Fin 2, 3. Plut adv Colot.—A physician of Chios, B C 441 He was a disciple of Democritus, and had Hippocrates among his pupils. He was sent to Paulus Æmilius, who, after the conquest of Perseus, demanded of the Athenians a philosopher and a painter the former to instruct his children, and the latter to make a painting of his triumphs. MIDAS, a king of Phrygia, son of Gordius, or Gorgias. In his infancy according to a Phrygian tradition, as he was asleep, a number of ants entered into his mouth, and made there a large deposit of their treasures in the greatest security This was considered as a sign of his future prosperity, which seemed to be verified when he accidentally found a large treasure, which thus proved the origin of his greatness and opulence. The hospitality which he showed to Silenus the preceptor of Bacchus, who had been brought to him by some peasants, was liberally rewarded; and Midas, when he conducted back the old man to the god, was permitted to choose whatever recompence he pleased. He had the imprudence and the avarice to demand of the god that whatever he touched might be turned into gold. His prayer was granted, but he was soon convinced of his injudicious choice; and when the very meats which he attempted to eat became gold in his mouth, he begged Bacchus to take away a present which must prove so fatal to the receiver. He was ordered to wash himself in the river Pactolus, whose sands were turned into gold by the touch of Midas. Some time after this adventure, Midas had the imprudence to support that Pan was superior to Apollo in singing and in playing upon the flute, for which rash opinion the offended god changed his ears into those of an ass, to show his ignorance and stupidity. This Midas attempted to conceal from the knowledge of his subjects, but one of his servants saw the length of his ears, and being unable to keep the secret, and afraid to reveal it, apprehensive of the king's resentment, he opened a hole in the earth, and after he had whispered there that Midas had the ears of an ass, he covered the place as before, as if he had buried his words in the ground. On that place, as the poets mention, grew a number of reeds, which, when agitated by the wind, uttered the same sound that had been buried beneath, and published to the world that Midas had the ears of an ass. Some explain the fable of the ears of Midas, by the supposition that he kept a number of informers and spies, who were continually employed in gathering every seditious word that might drop from the mouths of his subjects. Midas, according to Strabo, died by drinking bull's hot blood. This he did, as Plutarch mentions, to free himself from the numerous ill dreams which continually tormented him. Midas, according to some, was son of Cybele. He built a town, which he called Ancyra. According to some authorities, Midas was king of the Bryges, a Thracian nation who dwelt near Macedonia, and migrated with his subjects to Asia Minor, where they settled in that part which, from them, by a slight alteration of letters, was called Phrygia. The scene of the story respecting Silenus was in Thrace, but succeeding writers transferred it to Phrygia, and Xenophon, in his account of the younger Cyrus, mentions a fountain called that of Midas, near which, he adds, however, that Midas himself caught the satyr Silenus by mingling wine in its waters. The fable respecting Midas and the sands of the Pactolus has been attempted to be explained as follows: Midas, frugal to avarice, reigned over a very rich country, and made considerable sums by the sale of his corn, wine, and cattle. His avarice afterwards changed its object, and having learned that the Pactolus furnished gold-dust, he abandoned the care of the country, and employed his subjects in gathering the gold of that river, which brought him a new and ample supply. Midas, on account of his attention to religion among his people, was reckoned a second Numa according to Justin. He appears to have been versed in the ceremonies and mysteries of Orpheus, which no doubt he learned in Thrace. Xenophon places the castle of Midas on the road near Thymbrium. — *Ovid. MILETUS, a son of Apollo, by Aria, or Acacallis, who fled from Crete to avoid the wrath of Minos, whom he meditated to dethrone. He came to Caria, where he built a city which he called by his own name, and where he married Eidothea the daughter of Eurytus, a prince of the country, by whom he had Caunus and Byblis. Some suppose that he only conquered a city there, called Anactoria, which assumed his name. They farther say, that he put the inhabitants to the sword, and divided the women among his soldiers. Cyanea, daughter of the Mæander, fell to his share. Ovid. Met. 9, 446 — Paus. 7, 2. Apollod. 3, 1.—— A celebrated town of Asia Minor, the capital of all Ionia. It was situate on the southern shore of the gulf into which the Mæander emptied itself, but this river gradually accumulated its deposit in this gulf, so that Miletus was removed in process of time more than a league inland. It was founded by a Cretan colony under Miletus, or, according to others, by Neleus, the son of Codrus, or by Sarpedon, Jupiter's son. It was anciently called Lelegeis, from the Leleges, afterwards Pityusa, from the quantity of pines which its territory produced; at a later period Anactoria, and last of all Miletus. The inhabitants, called Milesii, were warlike and powerful, and defended themselves bravely against the kings of Lydia. They applied themselves early to navigation, and are said to have founded no fewer than 30 colonies in different parts of the world. Miletus was famed for its excellent wool. It was the birth place of Thales, one of the seven contemporary wise men of Greece, and of his scholar Anaximander, of Pittacus, another of the sages, of Anaximenes, the mathematician; Hecatæus, the historian, and Timotheus the musician. MILO, a celebrated athlete of Crotona in Italy. His father's name was Diotimus. He early accustomed himself to carry the greatest burdens, and by degrees became a monster in strength. It is said that he carried on his shoulders a young bullock four years old, for above 40 yards, and afterwards killed it with one blow of his fist, and eat it up in one day. He was seven times crowned at the Pythian games, and six at Olympia. He presented himself a seventh time, but no one had the courage or boldness to enter the lists against him. He was one of the disciples of Pythagoras, and to his uncommon strength the learned preceptor and his pupils owed their life. The pillar which supported the roof of the school suddenly gave way, but Milo supported the whole weight of the building, and gave the philosopher and his auditors time to escape. In his old age Milo attempted to pull up a tree by the roots and break it. He partly effected it, but his strength being gradually exhausted, the tree when half cleft re-united, and his hands remained pinched in the body of the tree. He was then alone, and being unable to disentangle himself, he was eaten up by the wild beasts of the place, about 500 years before the Christian era. Ovid. Met. 15.— Cic. de Senect.— Val. Max 9, 12. - Strab 16.—Paus. 6, 14.——T. Annius, a native of Lanuvium, who attempted to obtain the consulship at Rome by intrigue and seditious tumults. Clodius the tribune opposed his views, yet Milo would have succeeded, had not an unfortunate event totally frustrated his hopes. As he was going into the country, attended by his wife and a numerous retinue of gladiators and servants, he met on the Appian road his enemy Clodius, who was returning to Rome with three of his friends and some domestics completely armed. A quarrel arose between the servants. Milo supported his attendants, and the dispute became general. Clodius received many severe wounds, and was obliged to retire to a neighbouring cottage. Milo pursued his enemy in his retreat, and ordered his servants to despatch him. Eleven of the servants of Clodius shared his fate, as also the owner of the house who had given them a reception. The body of the murdered tribune was carried to Rome, and exposed to public view. The enemies of Milo inveighed bitterly against the violence and barbarity with which the sacred person of a tribune had been treated. Cicero undertook the defence of Milo, but the continual clamours of the friends of Clodius, and the sight of an armed soldiery, which surrounded the seat of judgment, so terrified the orator, that he forgot the greatest part of his arguments, and the defence he made was weak and injudicious. Milo was condemned, and banished to Massilia. Cicero soon after sent his exiled friend a copy of the oration which he had delivered in his defence, in the form in which we have it now; and Milo, after he had read it, wrote, according to Dio Cassius, a letter to Cicero, in which he stated that it was a fortunate thing for himself that Cicero had not pronounced the oration which he sent, since otherwise he (Milo) would not then have been eating such fine mullets at Marseilles. This city was the place of his exile. It has been sometimes stated, that Cicero owed his recall in a great measure to the active exertions of Milo, who had himself been restored to his country. This, however is altogether erroneous. Velleius Paterculus and Dio [illegible] both contradict the fact of Milo's return, as [illegible] we find in their respective histories. According to Dio Cassius, Milo was the only one of the exiles whom Cæsar refused to recall, because, as is supposed, he had been active in exciting the people of Marseilles to resist Cæsar. Velleius Paterculus states that Milo returned without permission to Italy, and there busily employed himself in raising opposition to Cæsar during that commander's absence in Thessaly against Pompey. He adds that Milo was killed by the blow of a stone while laying siege to Compsa, a town of the Hirpini. Cic. pro Milon. —Paterc. 2, 47 et 68 —— A general of the forces of Pyrrhus. MILTAS, a soothsayer, who assisted Dion in explaining prodigies, &c.

MILTIADES, an Athenian, son of Cypselus, who obtained a victory in a chariot race at the Olympic games, and led a colony of his countrymen to the Chersonesus. The causes of this appointment are striking and singular. The Thracian Dolonci, harassed by a long war with the Absynthians, were directed by the oracle of Delphi to take for their king the first man they met in their return home, who invited them to come under his roof and partake of his entertainments. The Dolonci, after receiving the oracle, returned by the sacred way, passed through Phocis and Bœotia, and, not being invited by either of these people, turned aside to Athens. Miltiades, as he sat in this city before the door of his house, observed the Dolonci passing by, and as by their dress and armour he perceived they were strangers, he called to them, and offered them the rites of hospitality. They accepted his kindness, and being hospitably treated, revealed to him all the will of the oracle, with which they entreated his compliance. Miltiades, disposed to listen to them, because weary of the tyranny of Pisistratus, first consulted the oracle of Delphi, and the answer being favourable, he went with the Dolonci. He was invested by the inhabitants of the Chersonese with sovereign power. The first measure he took was to stop the further incursions of the Absynthians, by building a strong wall across the Isthmus. When he had established himself at home, and fortified his dominions against foreign invasion, he turned his arms against Lampsacus. His expedition was unsuccessful; he was taken in an ambuscade, and made prisoner. His friend Crœsus, king of Lydia, was informed of his captivity, and he procured his release by threatening the people of Lampsacus with his severest displeasure. He lived a few years after he had recovered his liberty. As he had no issue, he left his kingdom and possessions to Stesagoras the son of Cimon, who was his brother by the same mother. The memory of Miltiades was greatly honoured by the Dolonci, and they regularly celebrated festivals and exhibited shows in commemoration of a man to whom they owed their greatness and preservation. Some time after Stesagoras died without issue, and Miltiades, the son of Cimon, and the brother of the deceased, was sent by the Athenians with one ship to take possession of the Chersonesus. At his arrival Miltiades appeared mournful, as if lamenting the recent death of his brother. The principal inhabitants of the country visited the new governor to condole with him; but their confidence in his sincerity proved fatal to them. Miltiades seized their persons, and made himself absolute in Chersonesus, and to strengthen himself he married Hegesipyla, the daughter of Olorus the king of the Thracians. His prosperity however was of short duration. In the third year of his government his dominions were threatened by an invasion of the Scythian Nomades, whom Darius had some time before irritated by entering their country. He fled before them, but as their hostilities were but momentary, he was soon restored to his kingdom. Three years after he left Chersonesus and set sail for Athens, where he was received with great applause. He was present at the celebrated battle of Marathon, in which all the chief officers ceded their power to him, and left the event of the battle to depend upon his superior abilities. He obtained an important victory [Vid Marathon] over the more numerous forces of his adversaries; and when he had demanded of his fellow-citizens an olive crown as the reward of his valour in the field of battle, he was not only refused, but severely reprimanded for presumption. The only reward, therefore that he received for a victory which proved so beneficial to the interests of universal Greece was in itself simple and inconsiderable, though truly great in the opinion of that age He was represented in the front of a picture among the rest of the commanders who fought at the battle of Marathon, and he seemed to exhort and animate his soldiers to fight with courage and intrepidity Some time after Miltiades was intrusted with a fleet of seventy ships, and ordered to punish those islands which had revolted to the Persians He was successful at first, but a sudden report that the Persian fleet was coming to attack him, changed his operations as he was besieging Paros He raised the siege and returned to Athens, where he was accused of treason, and particularly of holding a correspondence with the enemy. The falsity of these accusations might have appeared, if Miltiades had been able to come into the assembly A wound which he had received before Paros detained him at home, and his enemies taking advantage of his absence, became more eager in their accusations and louder in their clamours He was condemned to death but the rigour of the sentence was retracted on the recollection of his great services to the Athenians, and he was put into prison till he had paid a fine to defray the expenses of the state. His inability to discharge so great a sum detained him in confinement, and soon after his wounds became mortified and he died about 489 years before the Christian era His body was ransomed by his son Cimon, who was obliged to borrow and pay the fifty talents, to give his father a decent burial The crimes of Miltiades were probably aggravated in the eyes of his countrymen, when they remembered how he made himself absolute in Chersonesus, and in condemning the barbarity of the Athenians towards a general, who was the source of their military prosperity, we must remember the jealousy which ever reigns among a free and independent people, and how watchful they are in defence of the natural rights which they are wrested from others by violence and oppression. Cornelius Nepos has written the life of Miltiades the son of Cimon, but his history is incongruous and not authentic; and the author, by confounding the actions of the son of Cimon with those of the son of Cypselus, has made the whole dark and unintelligible Greater reliance in reading the actions of both the Miltiades is to be placed on the narration of Herodotus, whose veracity is confirmed, and who was indisputably more informed and more capable of giving an account of the life and exploits of men who flourished in his age, and of which he could see the living monuments Herodotus was born about six years after the famous battle of Marathon, and C. MIMNERMUS, a Greek elegiac poet, was native of Colophon, and flourished about 590 B. C He is said to have been a musician as well as a poet, and the flute was the instrument on which he performed In his poetical capacity the invention of pentameter verse, or of the elegiac measure is attributed to him His compositions were chiefly of the elegiac kind according to the ancient conception of that word, which by no means confined it to mournful topics, the contrary, this poet was a distinguished votary of love and pleasure thus Propertius speaks of him as at the head of amorous poetry:

Plus in amore valet Mimnermi versus Homero and Horace makes him the teacher of voluptuous morality

Sic Mimnermus uti censet, sine amore iocisque
Nil est puncundum, vivas in amore jocisque

His manners appear to have been corresponding to his philosophy He was much addicted to the pleasures of the table, and in his old age fell in love with a music-girl, named Nanno Of his poems only a few fragments remain, which are to be found in the collections of Stephens, Orsini, Winterton, Brunck, Gaisford, and Boissonade. Stob I et II —Pans 9, 29 —*Dion. MINEIDES the daughters of Minyas of Orchomenus, in Bœotia were three in number, Leuconoe, Leucippe, and Alcithoe. Ovid calls the two first Clymene and Iris. They derided the orgies of Bacchus which impiously the god inspired them with an unconquerable desire of eating human flesh They drew lots which of them should give up her son as food to the rest The lot fell upon Leucippe, and she gave up her son Hippasus, who was instantly devoured by the three sisters They were changed into bats. In commemoration of this bloody crime, it was usual among the Orchomenians for the high priest, as soon as the sacrifice was finished, to put one, with a drawn sword, all the women who had entered the temple, and even to kill the first he came up to. Ovid Met 4, fab 12. Plut Quest Gr 38.

MINERVA, the goddess of wisdom, war, and all the liberal arts, was produced from Jupiter's brain without a mother. The god, as it is reported, married Metis, whose superior prudence and sagacity above the rest of the gods, made him apprehend that the children of such a union would be of a more exalted nature, and more intelligent than their father. To prevent this Jupiter devoured Metis in her pregnancy, and, one time after, to relieve the pains which he suffered in his head, he ordered Vulcan to cleave it open. Minerva came all armed and grown up from her father's brain, and immediately was admitted into the assembly of the gods, and made one of the most faithful counsellors of her father. The power of Minerva was great in heaven; she could hurl the thunderbolts of Jupiter, belong the life of men, bestow the gift of prophecy, and, indeed, she was the only one of all the divinities whose authority and consequence were equal to those of Jupiter The actions of Minerva are numerous, as well as the kindnesses by which she endeared herself to mankind. She quarrelled with Neptune concerning the right of giving a name to the capital of Cecropia, deserves attention. The assembly of the gods settled the dispute by pronouncing the preference to whichever of the two gave the most useful and necessary present to the inhabitants of the earth Neptune, upon this, struck the ground with his trident, and immediately a horse issued from the earth. Minerva produced the olive, and obtained the victory by the unanimous voice of the gods, who observed, that the olive, as the emblem of peace, is far preferable to the horse, symbol of war and bloodshed. The victorious called the capital Athenæ, and became a great goddess of the place Minerva was very jealous of her power, and the manner which she punished the presumption of Arachne was well known [Vid Arachne.] The goddess had Vulcan to offer her violence, are instances of her virtue Jupiter had sworn by Styx to give to Vulcan, who had made a complete suit of armour, whatever he demanded. Minerva, and the other gods, who had permitted Minerva to live a perpetual celibacy consented, but presented his daughter to make all the resistance could to frustrate the attempts of Vulcan. The prayers and the force of Vulcan proved ineffectual, and her chastity was not violated. [Vid Erichthonius.] Minerva was the first who built a ship, and it was her zeal for navigation, and her care for the Argonauts, which placed the prophetic tree of Dodona beneath the ship Argo, when going to Colchis. She was well known among the ancients by many names. She was called Athena Pallas [Vid Pallas], Tritonis, from her remaining in perpetual celibacy, Tritonia, because worshipped near the lake Triton, Glaucopis, from the blueness of her eyes, Agorea, from her presiding over markets, Hippia, because she first taught mankind how to manage the horse, Strategia and Area, from her martial character, Coryphagenes, because born from Jupiter's brain, Sais because worshipped at Sais, &c Some attributed to her the invention of the flute, whence she was surnamed Aulon, Lusegus, Musica, Saliguga, &c She, as it is reported once amused herself in playing upon her favourite flute before Juno and Venus, but the goddesses ridiculed the distortion of her face in blowing the instrument Minerva, convinced of the justness of their remarks by looking at herself in a fountain near mount Ida, threw away the musical instrument, and denounced a melancholy death against him who found it. Marsyas was the miserable proof of the veracity of her expressions. The worship of Minerva was universally established, she had magnificent temples in Egypt, Phœnicia, all parts of Greece, Italy, Gaul, and Sicily. Sais, Rhodes, and Athens, particularly claimed her attention, and it is even said, that Jupiter rained a shower of gold upon the island of Rhodes, which had paid so much veneration, and such an early reverence to the divinity of his daughter. The festivals celebrated in her honour were solemn and magnificent. [Vid Panathenæa.] She was invoked by every artist, and particularly such as worked in wool, embroidery, painting, and sculpture. It was the duty of almost every member of society to implore the assistance and patronage of a deity who presided over sense, taste, and reason Hence the poets have had occasion to say,

Te nihil invita dicas faxere Minerva,
(i. e. against the bent of your nature or natural genius,) and,
Qui bene placarit Pallada, docta erit

Minerva was represented in different ways, according to the different characters in which she appeared. She generally appeared with a countenance full more of masculine firmness and composure, than of softness and grace. Most usually she was represented with a helmet on her head, with a large plume nodding in the air. In one hand she held a spear, and in the other a shield with the dying head of Medusa upon it. Sometimes this Gorgon's head was on her breast plate, with living serpents writhing round it, as well as round her shield and helmet. In most of her statues she is represented as sitting and sometimes she holds in one hand a distaff, instead of a spear When she appeared as the goddess of the liberal arts, she was arrayed in a variegated veil, which the ancients called peplum. Sometimes Minerva's helmet was covered at the top with the figure of a cock, a bird which, on account of his great courage, is properly sacred to the goddess of war Some of her statues represented her helmet with a sphinx in the middle, supported on either side by gryphins. In some medals, a chariot drawn by four horses, or sometimes a dragon or a serpent, with winding spires, appear at the top of her helmet. She was partial to the olive tree, the owl and the cock were her favourite birds, and the dragon among reptiles was sacred to her. The functions, offices, and actions of Minerva, seem so numerous, that they undoubtedly originate in more than one person. Cicero speaks of five persons of this name; a Minerva, mother of Apollo; a daughter of the Nile who was worshipped at Sais, in Egypt a third, born from Jupiter's brain, a fourth, daughter of Jupiter and Coryphe; and a fifth, daughter of Pallas, generally represented with winged shoes This last put her father to death because he attempted her virtue. Pous 1, 2, 3, &c — Horat Od. 1, 16 3, 4 — *Virg. MINERVÆ, Promontorium, a promontory of Campania, closing the bay of Naples to the south-west. It was sometimes called Surrentinum Promontorium, from the town of Surrentum, in its vicinity and also not unfrequently the Sirens Cape It is now Punta della Campanella The name of Minervæ Promontorium was given it from a temple of that goddess which stood here, and which was said to have been raised by Ulysses. Strab 5.

MINERVALIA, festivals at Rome in honour of Minerva, celebrated in the months of March and June. During the solemnity scholars obtained some relaxation from their studious pursuits, and the present, which it was usual for them to offer to their masters, was called Minerval, in honour of the goddess Minerva, who patronised literature Varro de R. R. 3, 2.—Ovid. Trist. 3, 809.

MINNÆI, a people in the southern extremity of Arabia Felix Their country was called Minnæa, and their capital Carana The name of the latter is preserved in Almakarana, which is a strong fortress. Dion. 3, 42.—Plin. 6, 28.

MINOA, a town of Sicily, built by Minos, when he was pursuing Dædalus, and called also Heraclea ——A town of Peloponnesus.——A town of Crete.

MINOIS, belonging to Minos. Crete is called Minoia regna, as being the legislator's kingdom. Virg. Ecl. 6, 14.——A patronymic of Ariadne. Ovid. Ars 3, 15.

MINOS, a king of Crete, son of Jupiter and Europa, who gave laws to his subjects, B. C. 1100, which still remained in full force in the age of the philosopher Plato. His justice and moderation procured him the appellation of the favourite of the gods, the confidant of Jupiter, the wise legislator, in every city of Greece, and, according to the poets, he was rewarded for his equity, after death, with the office of supreme and absolute judge in the infernal regions In this capacity he is represented sitting in the middle of the shades and holding a sceptre in his hand. The dead plead their different causes before him, and the impartial judge shakes the fatal urn, which is filled with the destinies of mankind. He married Ithona, by whom he had Lycastes, who was the father of Minos second Homer Od 19, 178.—Virg Æn 6, 132.—Apollod 3, 1.—Hygin. fab. 41.—Diod. 4.—Horat. Od. 1, 28.——The second was a son of Lycastes, the son of Minos I. and king of Crete. He married Pasiphae, the daughter of Sol and Perseis, and by her he had many children. He increased his paternal dominions by the conquest of the neighbouring islands, but he showed himself cruel in the war which he carried on against the Athenians, who had put to death his son Androgeus. [Vid Androgeus.] He took Megara by the treachery of Scylla, [Vid Scylla], and not satisfied with a victory, he obliged the vanquished to bring him yearly to Crete seven chosen boys, and the same number of virgins, to be devoured by the Minotaur. [Vid. Minotaurus.] This bloody tribute was at last abolished when Theseus had destroyed the monster. [Vid Theseus.] When Dædalus, whose industry and invention had fabricated the labyrinth, and whose imprudence in assisting Pasiphae in the gratification of her unnatural desires, had offended Minos, fled from the place of his confinement with wings, [Vid. Dædalus], and arrived safe in Sicily, the incensed monarch pursued the offender, resolved to punish his infidelity. Cocalus, king of Sicily, who had hospitably received Dædalus, entertained his royal guest with dissembled friendship, and, that he might not deliver to him a man whose ingenuity and abilities he so well knew, he put Minos to death. Some say that it was the daughters of Cocalus who put the king of Crete to death, by detaining him so long in a bath that he fainted, after which they suffocated him. Minos died about thirty-five years before the Trojan war. He was father of Androgeus Glaucus, and Deucalion, and two daughters, Phædra and Ariadne. Many authors have confounded the two monarchs of this name, the grandfather and the grandson, but Homer, Plutarch, and Diodorus prove plainly that they were two different persons. Plut in Thes.—Hygen. fab. 41.—Ovid Met. 8, 141.—Virg Æn. 6, 21.—Plut in Plin.

MINOTAURUS, a celebrated monster, half a man and half a bull, according to this verse of Ovid. (A. A. 2, 24.)

Semibovemque virum, semivirumque bovem.

It was the fruit of Pasiphae's amour with a bull. Minos refused to sacrifice a white bull to Neptune, an animal which he had received from the god for that purpose This offended Neptune, and he made Pasiphae, the wife of Minos, enamoured of this fine bull, which had been refused to his altars Dædalus prostituted his talents in being subservient to the queen's wishes, and, by his means, Pasiphae obtained her object, and the Minotaur came into the world. Minos confined in the labyrinth a monster which reflected disgrace upon his family. The Minotaur usually devoured the chosen young men and maidens, whom the tyranny of Minos yearly exacted from the Athenians. Theseus delivered his country from this shameful tribute, when it had fallen to his lot to be sacrificed to the voracity of the Minotaur, and, by means of Ariadne, the king's daughter, he destroyed the monster, and made his escape from the windings of the labyrinth. The fabulous traditions of the Minotaur, and of the infamous commerce of Pasiphae with a favourite bull have been often explained. Some suppose that Pasiphae was enamoured of one of her husband's courtiers, called Taurus, and that Dædalus favoured the passion of the queen by suffering his house to become the retreat of the two lovers Pasiphae, some time after, brought twins into the world, one of whom greatly resembled Minos and the other Taurus In the natural resemblance of their countenances with that of their supposed fathers originated their name, and consequently the fable of the Minotaur. *Ovid, Met 8, fab 2.—Hygin fab 40.—Plut. in Thes.—Palephat.—Virg. MINTHE, a daughter of Cocytus, loved by Pluto. Proserpine discovered her husband's amour, and changed his mistress into an herb, called by the same name, mint. Ovid. Met. 10, 729.

MINTURNÆ, a town of Latium, on the river Liris, and only three or four miles from its mouth. It was in the marshes, in its neighbourhood, that Marius concealed himself in the mud, to avoid the partisans of Sylla. The people condemned him to death, but when his voice alone had terrified the executioner, they showed themselves compassionate and favoured his escape. Marius was worshipped here, hence Marice regna applied to the place. Strab 2.—Mela. 2, 4. Liv. 8, 10 10, 21. 27, 38.—Paterc. 2, 14.—Lucan. 2, 424.

He was killed at the battle of Cannæ. Liv. 22, 5.—C Aug. in Jun.——A Roman consul who defended Corcyra from the insults of the people &c.——An officer under Cæsar, in Gaul, who afterwards became one of the conspirators against his patron. *Cæs. D. He was educated to the profession of the law, and became an eminent pleader at Rome, where he renounced the heathen religion, and embraced that of Christ He was author of an excellent defence of Christianity, entitled Octavius, written in the form of a dialogue between a heathen and a Christian, in which Minutius himself sits as judge or moderator. By this contrivance he replies to the objections and arguments brought forward by the adversary, and refutes the calumny cast upon Christianity by the heathen philosophers, and at the same time exposes the absurdities of their creed and worship, powerfully demonstrating the reasonableness and excellence of the Christian religion This work was, for a considerable time, attributed to Arnobius; but in the year 1560, Francis Baldwin, a learned lawyer, published it at Heidelberg, and made the discovery, in a preliminary dissertation, that Minutius was its true author. It has, since that time, gone through many editions of which the best are that of Gronovius, Lugd. Bat, 1709, 8vo, and that of Davis, Cant. 1712, 8vo

MINYÆ, a name given to the inhabitants of Orchomenus, in Bœotia, from Minyas, king of the country Orchomenus, the son of Minyas, gave his name to the capital of the country and the inhabitants still retained their original appellation in contradistinction to the Orchomenians of Arcadia. A colony of Orchomenians passed into Thessaly and settled in Iolchos; from which circumstance the people of the place, and particularly the Argonauts, were called Minyæ This name they received, according to the opinion of some, not because a number of Orchomenians had settled among them, but because the chief and noblest of them were descended from the daughters of Minyas. Part of the Orchomenians accompanied the sons of Codrus when they migrated to Ionia. The descendants of the Argonauts, as well as the Argonauts themselves, received the name of Minyæ They first inhabited Lemnos, where they had been born from the Lemnian women who had murdered their husbands They were driven from Lemnos by the Pelasgi about 1160 years before the Christian era, and came to settle in Laconia, from whence they passed into Calliste with a colony of Lacedæmonians Hygin fab. 14.—Paus. 9, 6.—Apollon Arg. 1.—Herod 4, 145

MISENUM, Promontorium, a promontory of Campania, forming the upper extremity of the bay of Naples, now Cape Miseno It was so named, according to Virgil from Misenus, the trumpeter of Æneas, who was drowned and interred here. Other accounts speak of Misenus as a companion of Ulysses. Virg Æn 6, 234.—Strab 5 —A town and harbour on the promontory of the same name Misenum was probably first used by the Cumæans as a harbour. In the reign of Augustus it became one of the great naval stations of the Romans, and was the rendezvous for the fleet which guarded the Tuscan sea In process of time a town grew up around the harbour the inhabitants of which were called Misenenses. In the neighbourhood of this place was the villa of C. Marius, bought afterwards by Lucullus, and which finally belonged to the emperor Tiberius, who died there. *Dion. MITHRIUS, a Roman, celebrated for his virtues and his misfortunes. He was father-in-law to the emperor Gordian, whose counsels and actions he guided by his prudence and moderation. He was sacrificed to the ambition of Philip, a wicked senator who succeeded him as prefect of the prætorian guards. He died A D 243, and left all his possessions to be appropriated for the good of the public.

MITHRAS, a god of Persia, supposed to be the sun, or according to others, Venus Urania His worship was introduced at Rome, and the Romans raised him altars, on which was this inscription, Deo Sab Mithræ, or Soli Deo invicto Mithræ. He is generally represented as a young man, whose head is covered with a turban, after the manner of the Persians. He supports his knee upon a bull that lies on the ground, and one of whose horns he holds in one hand, while with the other he plunges a dagger into his neck. Stat Theb 1, 720.—Curt. 4, 13.—Claudian de Laud Stil 1 ordered to put young Cyrus to death. He refused, and educated him at home as his own son. &c. Herod.—Justin.

MITHRIDATES 1st, was the third king of Pontus. He was tributary to the crown of Persia, and his attempts to make himself independent proved fruitless. He was conquered in a battle, and obtained peace with difficulty. Xenophon calls him merely a governor of Cappadocia. He was succeeded by Ariobarzanes, B. C 363 Diod.—Xenoph ——The second of that name, king of Pontus was grandson to Mithridates I. He made himself master of Pontus, which had been conquered by Alexander, and had been ceded to Antigonus at the general division of the Macedonian empire among the conqueror s generals. He reigned about twenty-six years, and died at the advanced age of eighty four years, B. C 302 He was succeeded by his son Mithridates III Some say that Antigonus put him to death, because he favoured the cause of Cassander. Appian. Mith —Diod ——The III was son of the preceding monarch. He enlarged his paternal possessions by the conquest of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia and died after a reign of thirty-six years Diod ——The IV. succeeded his father Ariobarzanes, who was the son of Mithridates III ——The V. succeeded his father Mithridates IV. and strengthened himself on his throne by an alliance with Antiochus the Great, whose daughter Laodice he married. He was succeeded by his son Pharnaces ——The VI succeeded his father Pharnaces He was the first of the kings of Pontus who made alliance with the Romans He furnished them with a fleet in the third Punic war, and assisted them against Aristonicus, who had laid claim to the kingdom of Pergamus. This fidelity was rewarded; he was called Euergetes, and received from the Roman people the province of Phrygia Major, and was called the friend and ally of Rome. He was murdered B. C 123 Appian. Mithr.—Justin. 37. &c.——The VII. surnamed Eupator, and The Great, succeeded his father Mithridates VI though only at the age of eleven years. The beginning of his reign was marked by ambition, cruelty, and artifice. He murdered his own mother, who had been left by his father co-heiress of the kingdom, and he fortified his constitution by drinking antidotes against the poison with which his enemies at court attempted to destroy him He early inured his body to hardship, and employed himself in many manly exercises, often remaining whole months in the country, and making the frozen snow and the bare earth the place of his repose. Naturally ambitious and cruel, he spared no pains to acquire himself power and dominion. He murdered the two sons whom his sister Laodice had had by Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, and placed one of his own children, only eight years old, on the vacant throne These violent proceedings alarmed Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who had married Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes. He suborned a youth to be king of Cappadocia, as the third son of Ariarathes, and Laodice was sent to Rome to impose upon the senate, and assure them that her third son was still alive, and that his pretensions to the kingdom of Cappadocia were just and well grounded. Mithridates used the same arms of dissimulation He also sent to Rome Gordius, the governor of his son, who solemnly declared before the Roman people, that the youth who sat on the throne of Cappadocia was the third son and lawful heir of Ariarathes, and that he was supported as such by Mithridates. This intricate affair displeased the Roman senate, and, finally to settle the dispute between the two monarchs, the powerful arbiters took away the kingdom of Cappadocia from Mithridates, and Paphlagonia from Nicomedes These two kingdoms being thus separated from their original possessors, were presented with their freedom and independence, but the Cappadocians refused it, and received Ariobarzanes for king Such were the first seeds of enmity between Rome and the king of Pontus. [Bid Mithridaticum bellum.] Mithridates never lost an opportunity by which he might lessen the influence of his adversaries; and, the more effectually to destroy their power in Asia, he ordered all the Romans that were in his dominions to be massacred This was done in one night, and, no less than 150,000, according to Plutarch, or 80,000 Romans, as Appian mentions, were made, at one blow, the victims of his cruelty. This universal massacre called aloud for revenge. Aquillius, and soon after Sylla, marched against Mithridates with a large army. The former was made prisoner, but Sylla obtained a victory over the king's generals, and another decisive engagement rendered him master of all Greece, Macedonia, Ionia, and Asia Minor, which had submitted to the victorious arms of the monarch of Pontus. This ill-fortune was aggravated by the loss of about 200 000 men, who were killed in the several engagements that had been fought, and Mithridates, weakened by repeated ill success by sea and land, sued for peace from the conqueror, which he obtained on condition of defraying the expences which the Romans had incurred by the war, and of remaining satisfied with the possessions which he had inherited from his ancestors. While these negociations of peace were carried on, Mithridates was not unmindful of his real interests His poverty, and not his inclinations, obliged him to wish for peace. He immediately took the field with an army of 140,000 infantry, and 16,000 horse, which consisted of his own forces and those of his son-in-law Tigranes, king of Armenia. With such a numerous army, he soon made himself master of the Roman provinces in Asia; none dared to oppose his conquests, and the Romans, relying on his fidelity, had withdrawn the greatest part of their armies from the country. The news of his warlike preparations was no sooner heard, than Lucullus, the consul, marched into Asia, and, without delay, he blocked up the camp of Mithridates, who was then besieging Cyzicus. The Asiatic monarch escaped from him, and fled into the heart of his kingdom. Lucullus pursued him with the utmost celerity, and would have taken him prisoner after a battle, had not the avidity of his soldiers preferred the plundering of a mule loaded with gold, to the taking of a monarch who had exercised such cruelties against their countrymen, and shown himself so faithless to the most solemn engagements. After this escape, Mithridates was more careful about the safety of his person, and he even ordered his wives and sisters to destroy themselves, fearful of their falling into the enemy's hands. The appointment of Glabrio to the command of the Roman forces, instead of Lucullus, was favourable to Mithridates, and he recovered the greatest part of his dominions. The sudden arrival of Pompey, however, soon put an end to his victories. A battle, in the night, was fought near the Euphrates, in which the troops of Pontus laboured under every disadvantage The engagement was by moonlight, and, as the moon then shone in the face of the enemy, the lengthened shadows of the arms of the Romans having induced Mithridates to believe that the two armies were close together, the arrows of his soldiers were darted from a great distance, and their efforts rendered ineffectual. An universal overthrow ensued, and Mithridates bold in his misfortunes, rushed through the thick ranks of the enemy, at the head of 800 horsemen, 500 of which perished in the attempt to follow him. He fled to Tigranes, but that monarch refused an asylum to his father-in-law, whom he had before supported with all the collected forces of his kingdom Mithridates found a safe retreat among the Scythians, and, though destitute of power, friends, and resources, yet he meditated the destruction of the Roman empire, by penetrating into the heart of Italy by land. These wild projects were rejected by his followers, and he sued for peace It was denied to his ambassadors, and the victorious Pompey declared, that to obtain it, Mithridates must ask it in person. He scorned to trust himself into the hands of his enemy, and resolved to conquer or to die. His subjects refused to follow him any longer, and they revolted from him, and made his son Pharnaces king. The son showed himself ungrateful to his father, and even, according to some writers, he ordered him to be put to death This unnatural treatment broke the heart of Mithridates; he obliged his wife to poison herself, and attempted to do the same himself. It was in vain; the frequent antidotes he had taken in the early part of his life, strengthened his constitution against the poison, and, when this was unavailing, he attempted to stab himself The blow was not mortal, and a Gaul, who was then present, at his own request, gave him the fatal stroke, about sixty-three years before the Christian era, in the seventy-second year of his age. Such were the misfortunes, abilities, and miserable end of a man, who supported himself so long against the power of Rome, and who, according to the declaration of the Roman authors, proved a more powerful and indefatigable adversary to the capital of Italy, than the great Annibal, than Pyrrhus, Perseus, or Antiochus. Mithridates has been commended for his eminent virtues, and censured for his vices. As a commander he deserves the most unbounded applause, and it may create admiration to see him waging war with such success during so many years, against the most powerful people on earth, led to the field by a Sylla, a Lucullus, and a Pompey. He was the greatest monarch that ever sat on a throne, according to the opinion of Cicero; and, indeed, no better proof of his military character can be produced, than the mention of the great rejoicings which happened in the Roman armies and in the capital at the news of his death No less than twelve days were appointed for public thanksgivings to the immortal gods, and Pompey, who had sent the first intelligence of his death to Rome, and who had partly hastened his fall, was rewarded with the most uncommon honours. [Vid. Ample lex.] It is said, that Mithridates conquered twenty-four nations, whose different languages he knew, and spoke with the same ease and fluency as his own. As a man of letters he also deserves attention. He was acquainted with the Greek language, and even wrote in that dialect a treatise on botany. His skill in physic is well known, and even now there is a celebrated antidote which bears his name, and is called Mithridate Superstition, as well as nature, had united to render him great, and if we rely upon the authority of Justin, his birth was accompanied by the appearance of two large comets, which were seen for seventy days successively, and whose splendour eclipsed the mid-day sun, and covered the fourth part of the heavens. Justin. 37, 1, &c Flor 3, 5, &c.—Plut. in *Syll. MITHRIDATICUM BELLUM, begun eighty-nine years B. C. was one of the longest and most celebrated wars ever carried on by the Romans against a foreign power. The ambition of Mithridates, from whom it receives its name, may be called the cause and origin of it. His views upon the kingdom of Cappadocia, of which he was stripped by the Romans, first engaged him to take up arms against the republic Three Roman officers, L. Cassius, the pro consul, M. Aquilius, and Q. Oppius, opposed Mithridates with the troops of Bithynia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Gallo-graecia. The army of these provinces, together with the Roman soldiers in Asia, amounted to 70,000 men, and 6000 horse. The forces of the king of Pontus were greatly superior to these; he led 250,000 foot, 40,000 horse, and 130 armed chariots into the field of battle, under the command of Neoptolemus and Archelaus. His fleet consisted of 400 ships of war, well manned and provisioned. In an engagement, the king of Pontus obtained the victory, and dispersed the Roman forces in Asia. He became master of the greatest part of Asia, and the Hellespont submitted to his power. Two of the Roman generals were taken, and M. Aquilius, who was principally intrusted with the conduct of the war, was carried about in Asia, and exposed to the ridicule and insults of the populace, and at last put to death by Mithridates, who ordered melted gold to be poured down his throat, as a slur upon the avidity of the Romans. The conqueror took every possible advantage; he subdued all the islands of the Ægean sea, and, though Rhodes refused to submit to his power, yet all Greece was soon overrun by his general Archelaus, and made tributary to the kingdom of Pontus. Meanwhile the Romans, incensed against Mithridates on account of his perfidy, and of his cruelty in massacring 80,000 of their countrymen in one day all over Asia, appointed Sylla to march into the east. Sylla landed in Greece, where the inhabitants readily acknowledged his power; but Athens shut her gates against the Roman commander, and Archelaus, who defended it, defeated, with the greatest courage, all the efforts and operations of the enemy. This spirited defence was of short duration Archelaus retreated into Bœotia, where Sylla soon followed him The two hostile armies drew up in a line of battle near Chærones, and the Romans obtained the victory, and, of the almost innumerable forces of the Asiatics, no more than 10,000 escaped. Another battle in Thessaly, near Orchomenos, proved equally fatal to the king of Pontus. Dorylaus, one of his generals, was defeated, and he soon after sued for peace. Sylla listened to the terms of accommodation, as his presence at Rome was now become necessary to quell the commotions and cabals which his enemies had raised against him. He pledged himself to the king of Pontus to confirm him in the possession of his dominions, and to procure him the title of friend and ally of Rome; and Mithridates consented to relinquish Asia and Paphlagonia, to deliver Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, and Bithynia to Nicomedes, and to pay to the Romans 2000 talents to defray the expenses of the war, and to deliver into their hands seventy galleys, with all their rigging. Though Mithridates seemed to have re-established peace in his dominions, yet Fimbria, whose sentiments were contrary to those of Sylla, and who made himself master of the army of Asia by intrigue and oppression, kept him under continual alarms, and rendered the existence of his power precarious. Sylla, who had returned from Greece to ratify the treaty which had been made with Mithridates, rid the world of the tyrannical Fimbria, and the king of Pontus, awed by the resolution and determined firmness of his adversary, agreed to the conditions, though with reluctance. The hostile preparations of Mithridates, which continued in the time of peace, became suspected by the Romans, and Murena, who was left as governor of Asia in Sylla's absence, and who wished to make himself known by some conspicuous action, began hostilities by taking Comana and plundering the temple of Bellona. Mithridates did not oppose him, but he complained of this breach of peace before the Roman senate. Murena was publicly reprimanded, but, as he did not cease from hostilities, it was easily understood that he acted by the private directions of the Roman people. The king upon this marched against him, and a battle was fought, in which both the adversaries claimed the victory. This was the last blow which the king of Pontus received in this war, which is called the second Mithridatic war, and which continued for about three years. Sylla, at that time, was made perpetual dictator at Rome, and he commanded Murena to retire from the kingdom of Mithridates. The death of Sylla changed the face of affairs, the treaty of peace between the king of Pontus and the Romans, which had never been committed to writing, demanded frequent explanations, and Mithridates at last threw off the mask of friendship, and declared war. Nicomedes, at his death, left his kingdom to the Romans, but Mithridates disputed their right to the possessions of the deceased monarch, and entered the field with 120,000 men, besides a fleet of 400 ships in his ports, 16,000 horsemen to follow him, and 100 chariots armed with scythes. Lucullus was appointed over Asia, and intrusted with the care of the Mithridatic war. His valour and prudence showed his merit; and Mithridates, in his vain attempts to take Cyzicum, lost no less than 300,000 men. Success continually attended the Roman arms. The king of Pontus was defeated in several bloody engagements, and with difficulty saved his life, and retired to his son-in law Tigranes, king of Armenia. Lucullus pursued him, and, when his applications for the person of the fugitive monarch had been despised by Tigranes, he marched to the capital of Armenia, and terrified, by his sudden approach, the numerous forces of the enemy. A battle ensued. The Romans obtained an easy victory, and no less than 100,000 foot of the Armenians perished, and only five men of the Romans were killed. Tigranocerta, the rich capital of the country, fell into the conqueror's hands. After such signal victories, Lucullus had the mortification to see his own troops mutiny, and to be dispossessed of the command by the arrival of Pompey. The new general showed himself worthy to succeed Lucullus. He defeated Mithridates, and rendered his affairs so desperate, that the monarch fled for safety into the country of the Scythians, where, for a while, he meditated the ruin of the Roman empire, and, with more wildness than prudence, secretly resolved to invade Italy by land, and march an army across the northern wilds of Asia and Europe to the Apennines. Not only the kingdom of Mithridates had fallen into the enemy's hands, but also all the neighbouring kings and princes were subdued, and Pompey saw prostrate at his feet Tigranes himself, that king of kings, who had lately treated the Romans with such contempt. Meantime, the wild projects of Mithridates terrified his subjects, and they, fearful to accompany him in a march of above 2000 miles across a barren and uncultivated country, revolted, and made his son king. The monarch, forsaken in his old age, even by his own children, put an end to his life (Eutr. Mithridates VI.), and gave the Romans cause to rejoice, as the third Mithridatic war was ended in his fall, B. C. 63. Such were the unsuccessful struggles of Mithridates against the power of Rome. He was always full of resources, and the Romans had never a greater or more dangerous war to sustain. The duration of the Mithridatic war is not precisely known. According to Justin, Orosius, Florus, and Eutropius, it lasted for 40 years; but the opinion of others, who fix its duration to 30 years, is far more credible; and, indeed, by proper calculation, there elapsed no more than 26 years from the time that Mithridates first entered the field against the Romans till the time of his death. Appian in Mithrid.—Justin 37, &c.—Flor. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut. in Luc. &c.—Oros.—Patere.—Dion.

MITYLENE or MITYLENE, the capital city of the island of Lesbos which receives its name from Mitylene, the daughter of Macareus, a king of the country. It was greatly commended by the ancients for the stateliness of its buildings, and the fruitfulness of its soil; but more particularly for the great men whom it produced. Pittacus, Alcæus, Sappho, Terpander, Theophanes, Hellenicus, &c., were all natives of Mitylene. It was long a seat of learning, and, with Rhodes and Athens, it had the honour of having educated many of the great men of Greece and Rome. In the Peloponnesian war the Mitylenians suffered greatly for their revolt from the power of Athens, and, in the Mithridatic wars, they had the boldness to resist the Romans, and disdain the treaties which had been made between Mithridates and Sylla. *Cæs. de Leg. He was the last of the 300 kings from Menes to Sesostris, and reigned sixty-eight years. Herod. 2, 13.——A lake of Egypt, supposed to have been the work of a king of the same name, concerning the situation and extent, and even the existence of which authors have differed It has been represented as the noblest and most wonderful of all the works of the kings of Egypt, and, accordingly, Herodotus considers it superior even to the pyramids or labyrinth. As to its situation, Herodotus and Strabo mark it out by placing the labyrinth on its borders, and by fixing the towns which were round it, such as Acanthus to the south, Aphroditopolis towards the east, and Arsinoe to the north. Diodorus and Pliny confirm this statement by placing it at twenty-four leagues from Memphis, between the province of that name and Arsinoe. The position thus indicated is supposed to answer to the modern Birket Caroun, a lake more than fifty leagues in circumference. Herodotus makes the lake Mœris 3600 stadia in circumference, and its greatest depth 200 cubits. Bossuet has vindicated the statement of its large extent, against the raillery of Voltaire. Rollin, however, deeming it to be incredible, adopts the opinion of Pomponius Mela, and makes it 20,000 paces. D'Anville, with a view of reconciling the contending parties, has marked on his map of Egypt two lakes of this name, one of which is in fact a canal running parallel with the Nile; this he makes the Mœris of Herodotus and Diodorus, while the other is situate to the northwest, and corresponds, according to him, with the Mœris of Strabo and Ptolemy. This last is the Birket Caroun mentioned above; the former, which still subsists, is known by the name of Bahr Jousef, or Joseph's river. It opens near Tarout Eccheriff, and ends near Birket-Caroun. The explanation given by Malte-Brun is, however, the simplest. He supposes that the canal dignified with the name of Joseph, like many other remarkable works, was executed by king Mœrus. The waters then filled the basin of the lake Birket-Caroun, which received the name of the prince who effected this great change. Thus a reason is given why the ancients say that the lake was of artificial formation, while the Birket-Caroun gives no evidence of any such operation. If we listen, however, merely to the relation of Herodotus, the lake Mœris was entirely the work of human art, and, to show this, two pyramids were to be seen in its centre, each of which was 200 cubits above, and as many below the water, while on the summit of each was a colossus in a sitting posture. The object of the excavation was to regulate the inundations of the Nile When the waters of the rivers were high, a large portion was carried off by the canal to the lake, in order that it might not remain too long on the soil of Egypt (lower at that time than in our days), and occasion sterility; when the inundation had declined, a second one was produced by the waters in lake Mœris. The lapse of nearly 1200 years has made a great change in this as in the other Egyptian works of art. Mœris is now nearly fifty leagues in circumference. It might still, however, be made to answer its ancient purposes, if the canal of Joseph were cleared of the immense quantity of mud collected in it, and the dykes restored. The pyramids in this lake were no longer visible in the time of Strabo. The lake itself is said to have afforded a most abundant supply of fish. The profits of this fishery were appropriated to furnish the queen with clothes and perfumes. Herod. 2, 149.—Strab. 17.—Diod. 1, 52.—Plin. 5, 9.—Mela, 1, 9

MŒSIA, called also Mysia, a country of Europe, bounded on the north by the Danube, on the west by Pannonia and Illyricum, on the south by Macedonia and Thrace, and on the east by the Euxine Sea. It corresponded generally with the modern provinces of Servia and Bulgaria. It formed originally a portion of the great district of Thrace, and is said to have first obtained the name of Mœsia on its subjugation by the Romans under M. Crassus. This latter appelation was probably used originally as a collective one for all the Thracian tribes between the Hæmus and Danube, and was supposed by the ancient heathens to have been communicated by them to the province of Mysia in Asia Minor; but there seems better ground for supposing that the Asiatic Mysi were the ancestors of the European Mysi, or at all events that they were originally a colony from Madai, Japhet's son, and did not pass over from Europe into Asia The name of Mœsia was not applied in its full extent to the European province till the time of Augustus, who included within its limits the possessions of the Dardani and Triballi. It was, in a later age, divided by the little river Cebrus, or Zibritza, into Superior and Inferior, so called with respect to the Danube, the former touching on Illyricum and Macedonia, the latter on Thrace and the Euxine Sea. This partition of Mœsia lasted till the time of Aurelian, who formed within it his province of Dacia, bounded on the north by the Danube from the Cataract to the Utus, or Vid, on the east by the latter river, on the south by the mountains, and on the west by the upper course of the river Marcus, or Morava. Dio Cass. 38, 10.—*Amm. MOLOSSI, a people of Epirus, who inhabited that part of the country which was called Molossia, or Molottis, from king Molossus. This country had the bay of Ambracia on the south, and the country of the Perrhæbeans on the east The dogs of the place were famous, and received the name of Molossi among the Romans Dodona was the capital of the country according to some writers. Others, however, reckon it as the chief city of Thesprotia. Lucret 5, 10. 62 Lucan 4, 140 —Strab 7 Luc. 8, 21 —Justin 7, 6. C. Nep. 2, 8.—Virg G. 3, 405.—Horat Sat 6, 114.

MOLOSSIA, or MOLOSSIS. Vid. Molossi.

MOLOSSUS, a son of Pyrrhus and Andromache. He reigned in Epirus, after the death of Helenus, and part of his dominions received the name of Molossia from him Paus. 1, 11 — A surname of Jupiter in Epirus

MOLPUS an author who wrote a history of Lacedæmon,

MOLYCRIUM, or Molycreia, a town of Ætolia, on the borders of the Locri, and in the immediate vicinity of Antirrhium According to Thucydides, it was situate close to the sea. This place had been colonised by the Corinthians, who were expelled by the Athenians, and was afterwards taken by the Ætolians and Peloponnesians under Eurylochus The spot on which it stood is now called Cavrolimne, where its remains are yet perceptible. Paus. 5, 3 — Thucyd. 2, 84. 3, 102

MOMUS, the god of finding faults and pleasantry among the ancients, son of Nox, according to Hesiod. He was continually employed in satirizing the gods, and whatever they did was freely turned to ridicule. He blamed Vulcan, because in the human form which he had made of clay, he had not placed a window in his breast, by which whatever was done or thought there, might be easily brought to light. He censured the house which Minerva had made, because the goddess had not made it movable, by which means a bad neighbourhood might be avoided. In the bull which Neptune had produced, he observed that his blows might have been surer if his eyes had been placed near his horns. Venus herself was exposed to his satire; and when the sneering god had found no fault in the body of the naked goddess, he observed as she retired, that the noise of her feet was too loud and greatly ungraceful in the goddess of beauty These illiberal reflections upon the gods were the cause that Momus was driven from heaven He is generally represented raising a mask from his face, and holding a small figure in his hand. Hesiod in Theog. 213 — Lucian. in Herm.

MONA, an island between Britain and Hibernia, now the Isle of Man It was also called Monœda or Monapia. Cæs. B. G. 5, 13. Plin. 4, 16. — An island off the coast of Britain, and facing the territory of the Ordovices, of which in strictness it formed a part, It was situate to the south-east of the former, and is now the Isle of Anglesey. It was remarkable as having been one of the principal seats of the Druids, who were cruelly persecuted by the Romans. Tacit. Ann. 14, 29, &c Vit. Agric. 14 et 18.

MONÆSES, a Parthian noble, who fled to Antony after Phraates had taken possession of the kingdom. Phraates sent him afterwards assurances of his safety, and Monæses therefore returned. Plut. Vit. Ant.——A Parthian officer of the time of Corbulo. Dio Cass. 62, 13. – Tacit. Ann. 15, 2.

MONDA, a river on the western coast of Lusitania, between the Durius and Tagus. It is now the Mondego, Mela, 3, 1. – Plin. 4, 22.

MONETA, a surname of Juno among the Romans. She received it because she advised them to sacrifice a pregnant sow to Cybele, to avert an earthquake. (Cic. de Div. 1, 15.) Livy says (7, 28) that a temple was vowed to Juno, under this name, by the dictator Furius, when the Romans waged war against the Auruncr, and that the temple was raised in the goddess by the censor on the spot where the house of Manlius Capitolinus had formerly stood. Suidas, however, says that Juno was surnamed Moneta from a saying the Romans, when in the war against Pyrrhus they complained of want of pecuniary resources, that money could never fail to those who cultivated justice.

MONIMA, a beautiful woman of Miletus, whom Mithridates the Great married. When his affairs grew desperate, Mithridates ordered his wives to destroy themselves. Monima attempted to strangle herself but when her efforts were unavailing, she ordered one of her attendants to stab her. Plut. in Luc.

MONÔDUS, a son of Prusias. He had one continued bone instead of a row of teeth, whence his name (μόνος ὀδούς). Plin. 7, 16.

MONOECUS. Vid. Hercules Monoecus Portus.

MONOPHAGE, sacrifices in Arcana.

MONS SACER, a low range of sandstone hills, extending along the right bank of the Anio, and about three miles from Rome. It is celebrated in Roman history for two secessions of the people first, when they retired from the oppressions of the patricians, A. U. C. 260; and again from the decemviri, A. U. C. 305. Liv. 2, 32. – Ovid. Met. 2, 661.

MONTANUS, a poet who wrote in hexameter and elegiac verses. Ovid ex Pont. 4. — An orator under Vespasian. — A favourite of Messalina. — One of the senators whom Domitian consulted about boiling a turbot. Juv. 4. — A Phrygian in the 2d century, the founder of a new sect, which from him were called Montanists. By severity of discipline, and a studied zeal and imposing address, assisted by the gold and the prophecies of Priscilla and Maximilla, two females of wealth and distinction who espoused his tenets, he prevailed upon several churches to adopt his wild views, and to consider him as a messenger particularly favoured by the immediate inspiration of God. It is said, that he at last hanged himself, and thus proved himself to be rather an enthusiastic madman, than a religious impostor.

MONYCHUS, a powerful giant, who could root up trees and hurl them like a javelin. Juv. 1, 11. – Ovid. Pet. 12, 499, &c.

MOPSIUM, an eminence between Larissa and Tempe, on the southern bank of the Peneus. A severe skirmish took place in its vicinity between the troops of Perseus and the Romans. Liv. 42, 61 et 67.

MOPSOPIA an ancient appellation for Attica, supposed to be derived from the hero Mopsopus or Mopsops. Strab. 9.

MOPSUHESTIA, a town of Cilicia near the sea, on the banks of the Pyramus. It is said to have been called Mopsuhestia from being the residence of Mopsus, the diviner, who retired hither from the neighbouring Mallus, which had been founded by him and Amphilochus, shortly after the siege of Troy. Strab. 14.

MOPSUS, a celebrated prophet, son of Manto and Apollo, during the Trojan war. He was consulted by Amphimachus, king of Colophon, who wished to know what success would attend his arms in a war which he was going to undertake. He predicted the greatest calamities; but Calchas, who had been a soothsayer of the Greeks during the Trojan war, promised the greatest successes. Amphimachus followed the opinion of Calchas, but the prediction of Mopsus was fully verified. This had such an effect upon Calchas that he died soon after. His death is attributed by some to another mortification of the same nature. The two soothsayers, jealous of each other's fame, came to a trial of their skill in divination. Calchas first asked his antagonist how many figs a neighbouring tree bore; ten thousand except one, replied Mopsus, and one single vessel can contain them all. The figs were gathered, and his conjectures were true. Mopsus, now to try his adversary, asked how many young ones a certain pregnant sow would bring forth. Calchas confessed his ignorance, and Mopsus immediately said, that the sow would bring on the morrow ten young ones, of which only one should be a male, all black, and that the females should all be known by their white streaks. The morrow proved the veracity of his prediction, and Calchas died by excess of the grief which this defeat produced. Mopsus after death was ranked among the gods, and had an oracle at Mallus, celebrated for the true and decisive answers which it gave. Paus. 7, 3. — Amm. Marc. 14, 8. – Plut. de orac. defect. — A son of Ampix and Chloris, born at Titaresus in Thessaly. He was the prophet and soothsayer of the Argonauts, and died at his return from Colchis by the bite of a serpent in Libya. Jason erected to him a monument on the sea shore, where afterwards the Africans built him a temple in which he gave oracles. He has often been confounded with the son of Manto, as their professions and their names were alike. Hygin. fab. 14, 128, 175. — A shepherd of that name in Virg. Ecl.

MORGANTIUM (or IA), a town of Sicily, south-east of Agyrium, and nearly due west from Catana. It lay in the neighbourhood of the river Symaethus. The village of Mandri Bianchi as present occupies a part of its site. Cic. in Ver. 3, 18.

MORIMORUSA, a name applied by the Cimbri to the Northern Ocean, and which means "the Dead sea." Plin. 4, 27.

MORINI, a people of Belgic Gaul, on the shores of the British ocean, and occupying what would correspond to the northern part of Picardy. Their name is derived from the Celtic Mor, which signifies "the sea," and denoted a people dwelling along the sea coast. The Portus Itius, or Iectus, lay within their territories, and the passage from hence to Britain was considered as the shortest. Virgil calls them "extrema hominum," with reference to their remote situation on the coast of Belgic Gaul. Their cities were, Civitas Morinorum, now Therouenne, and Castellum Morinorum, now Montcauel. Virg. Aen. 8, 727. — Cars. B. G. 4 et 21.

MORITASGUS, a king of the Senones at the arrival of Cæsar in Gaul. Cæs. B. G.

MORPHEUS, the son and minister of the god Somnus, who naturally imitated the grimaces, gestures, words, and manners, of mankind. He is sometimes called the god of sleep. He is generally represented as a sleeping child of great corpulence, and with wings. He holds a vase in one hand, and in the other are some poppies. He is represented by Ovid as sent to inform by a dream and a vision the unhappy Halcyone of the fate of her husband Ceyx Ovid. Met 11, fab. 10

MORS, one of the infernal deities born of Night, without a father. She was worshipped by the ancients, particularly by the Lacedæmonians, with great solemnity, and represented not as an actually existing power, but as an imaginary being Euripides introduces her in one of his tragedies on the stage The moderns represent her as a skeleton armed with a scythe and a scymetar.

MORTUUM MARE, Vid. Mare Mortuum.

MORYS, a Trojan killed by Meriones during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 13. 792. 14, 514

MOSA, a river of Gallia Belgica, on the confines of Germania Cisrhenana. It rises in mount Vogesus, and joins the Vahalis. It is now the Meuse or Maas. Cæs. B. G. 4, 10 — Tacit. Ann 2, 6.—Mosæ Pons, otherwise called Trajectus Mosæ, is the modern Maestricht.

MOSCHA, now Morebat a harbour of Arabia Felix, at the mouth of the Sinus Persicus. It was much frequented on account of the Sachalitic incense obtained there Arrian Peripl.

MOSCHI, a people of Asia, dwelling in the vicinity of the Hyrcanian sea. They are thought to have derived both their appellation and their origin from Meshech, the son of Japhet, an opinion which is somewhat strengthened from the Seventy Interpreters having read the Hebrew vowels differently, and rendered the same name Mosoch. Mela, 1, 2 3, 5 - Lucan. 3, 270

MOSCHION, a physician, whose era is not ascertained. A treatise on "Female Complaints," (Περὶ τῶν γυναικείων παθῶν) is commonly ascribed to him. The best edition is that of Dewes, Vindob. 1793, 8vo.

MOSCHUS, a philosopher of Sidon, and the most ancient name remaining on the list of Phœnician philosophers If we are to credit Iamblichus, he lived before the time of Pythagoras. After Posidonius, many writers ascribe to him a system of philosophy, which afterwards rose into great celebrity under the Grecian philosophers, Leucippus and Epicurus, called the Atomic. Iamb. Vit. Pythag 3, 14.—Strab. 16.—Laert. 8, 140.——A Greek pastoral poet, born at Syracuse. It is not clearly ascertained in what period he lived. Some authors make him a pupil of Bion, but Suidas and others speak of him as the friend of Aristarchus, who flourished about 160 years before the birth of Christ The tenderness with which he speaks of Bion in his beautiful elegy on that poet is mentioned as a proof of his personal acquaintance with him. In the time of the latter Greeks all the ancient idylls were collected and attributed to Theocritus; but the claims of Moschus and Bion have been admitted with respect to a few little pieces. Moschus possesses great elegance of style, and more delicacy and ingenuity in his conceptions than is usual among bucolic poets. His works are generally printed with those of Theocritus and Bion. The best edition is that of Valckenaer, Lugd Bat. 1810, 8vo.——A Greek rhetorician of Pergamus in the age of Horace, defended by Torquatus in an accusation of having poisoned some of his friends. Horat. Ep. 1, 5, 9.

MOSELLA, a river of Belgic Gaul, rising in the range of mount Vogesus, and running through the territories of the Leuci, Mediomatrici, and Treviri, into the Rhine at Confluentes. It is now the Moselle. Tac. Ann. 13, 53 —Amm. Marcell 16, 3 —Flor 3, 10

MOSES, a celebrated legislator among the Jews well known in sacred history. He was born in Egypt, 1571 B C. and after he had performed his miracles before Pharaoh, conducted the Israelites through the Red Sea, and given them laws and ordinances, during their peregrination of forty years in the wilderness of Arabia, he died at the age of one hundred and twenty.

MOSYCHLUS, a mountain in Lemnos, and the earliest volcano known to the Greeks It was situate on the eastern side of the island, and is thought to have sunk in the sea a short time after the age of Alexander, together with the island Chryse. When the west in parts of Europe became better known to the Greeks, and Ætna with the Æolian isles attracted their attention, they seem to have transferred the forges of Vulcan to this quarter. According to other mythological fables, Typhon or Typhœus lay buried beneath Ætna, or, as others relate, Enceladus; and the battle ground between the gods and giants was placed by some in Sicily, by others near Cumæ in Italy. Almost every volcanic situation, however, in the ancient world, seems to have had this honour in succession conferred upon it. Antion. ap Schol ad Nicand. Theriac 471. Schol. ad Lycophr. 227.

MOSYNŒCI, a people of Pontus in Asia Minor, on the coast near Cerasus They were so called by the Greeks from their dwelling in small wooden turrets, termed μόσυνοι They are described as a savage race, subsisting chiefly on the flesh of wild animals and roots; and addicted to robbery, and other lawless habits They were said to keep their chief a close prisoner in one of their wooden huts, and if he ordered any thing contrary to law, they deprived him of food. The tract of country which they inhabited is now called Heldir. Strab. 12.—Xen Anab 5, 4.

MULCIBER, a surname of Vulcan (a mulcendo ferrum), from his occupation. Ovid. Met. 2, 5. Vid Vulcanus.

MULUCHA, a river of Africa, the same with the Molochath and Malua, and which separated Mauritania from Numidia in the time of Bocchus, king of the former country. It rises in mount Atlas, and flows with a northerly course into the Mediterranean Sea a little eastward of Rusadir It is now the Moulouia. Plin 5, 2.

MULVIUS PONS. Vid Milvius Pons

MUMMIUS, L a Roman consul sent against the Achæans, whom he conquered, B. C. 147. He destroyed Corinth, Thebes, and Chalcis, by order of the senate, and obtained the surname of Achaicus from his victories He did not enrich himself with the spoils of the enemy, but returned home without any increase of fortune. He was so unacquainted with the value of the paintings and works of the most celebrated artists of Greece, which were found in the plunder of Corinth, that he said to those who conveyed them to Rome, that if they lost them or injured them, they should make others in their stead His services were deservedly rewarded on his return, with a magnificent triumph He was afterwards censor with Africanus the younger, A U. C. 611. Cic. Br 22. Off. 2, 22. Verr. 1, 21.—Virg. Æn. 6, 836.—Paterc. 1, 13.—Plin 34, 7. 37. 1. —Paus. 5, 24.——Spurius, a brother of Achaicus before-mentioned, and his lieutenant in the Corinthian expedition, was distinguished as an orator, and for his fondness for the Stoic philosophy. Cic. ad Brut. 23, Ad Att. 13, 6.—Lucius Quadratus, a tribune of the people with Clodius. He was the friend of Cicero He is by some authors called Nonnius. Cic. Dom. 48. Sest 11.

MUNATIUS, Planeus, a Roman whose name frequently occurs in the history of the civil wars He was one of Cæsar's warmest partisans, and was sent by him into Gaul to found colonies there. He was also intended by him for the consulship. After the battle of Mutina, he joined his forces to those of Antony and Lepidus, and became consul with the former, A. U. C. 712. He afterwards accompanied Antony into Egypt, where he performed the part of a vile courtier, and even of a buffoon, around the person of Cleopatra. When fortune deserted his protector, he turned his back upon him and embraced the party of Octavianus. In 732 he was chosen censor. We have several letters of his among the correspondence of Cicero They betray the equivocal character of the man.

MUNDA, a strongly fortified, and large city of Hispania Bætica, on the coast, south-west of Malaca In its vicinity was fought the famous battle between Cæsar and the sons of Pompey, which put an end to the war It was a most desperate action, and even the veterans of Cæsar, who for upwards of fourteen years had signalized their valour, were compelled to give way. It was only by the most vigorous exertions that the son of Pompey were at last defeated. Cæsar is said to have given up all for lost at one period of the fight, and to have been on the point of destroying himself As he retired after the battle, he told his friends that he had often fought for victory, but that this was the first time he had fought for his life. Cæsar is said to have lost 1000 of his best soldiers: the enemy had 30,000 slain The battle was fought the 17th March, B. C. 45. After the battle, the siege of Munda ensued, and the assailants are said actually to have made use of the dead bodies of the enemy in elevating their mound to a sufficient height The little village of Monda in Grenada is supposed to lie near the ancient city Plin. 3, 3.—Liv 24, 42.—*Sil. MUNYCHIA. (and Æ.) one of the ports of Athens, so called from Munychus, an Orchomenian, who, having been expelled from Bœotia by the Thracians, settled at Athens. Strabo describes it as a peninsular hill, connected with the continent by a narrow neck of land, and abounding with hollows, partly natural, and partly the work of art. When it had been enclosed by fortified lines, connecting it with the other ports, Munychia became a most important position, from the security it afforded to these maritime dependencies of Athens, and accordingly we find it always mentioned as the point which was most particularly guarded when any attack was apprehended on the side of the sea. Dind. Sic. fragm. 7.—Thucyd. 8, 92.—Xen Hist. Gr. 2, 4.—Plut. Vit. Thoc.

MURÆNA, Licinius, a celebrated Roman, left at the head of the armies of the republic in Asia by Sylla. He invaded the dominions of Mithridates with success, but soon after met with a defeat, and was recalled by Sylla with marks of displeasure. He was, however, honoured with a triumph at his return to Rome. He commanded one of the wings of Sylla's army at the battle against Archelaus near Chæronea, but perished in the civil commotions which followed. Cic. Brut. 90.—The son of the preceding, a consul, and colleague of D. Silanus, was accused by Servius Sulpicius and Cato, of having been guilty of bribery in suing for the consulship, and was ably defended by Cicero. The oration delivered on this occasion is still extant.

After the death of Cassius he joined Pompey, by whom he was unjustly put to death. Patere. 2, 77.—Dio. 48, 19.—*Liv. MURGANTIA, a town [illegible] Liv. 25, 27.

MURRHENUS, a friend [illegible] killed by Æneas, &c. Virg. Æn. 12, 529.

MURSA, a city of Pannonia Inferior, on the Dravus, a short distance to the west of its junction with the Danube. It was founded by Hadrian, and in its vicinity Magnentius was conquered by Constantius. It corresponds to the modern Essegg, the capital of Sclavonia. Ptol.

MURTIA or MYRTIA. (a myrto,) a surname of Venus, because she presided over the myrtle. She was the patroness of the slothful and of all who spent their days in enervating pleasures. She had a temple at the foot of the Aventine hill, and hence this hill was anciently called Murtius. Lar 1, 33.—Varro de L. L. 4, 32.—Aug. de Civ. Dei. 4, 16.—Festus, de V. Sig.

MUS, a Roman consul. Vid. Decius.

MUSA ANTONIUS, a freedman and physician of Augustus. He cured his imperial master of a dangerous disease under which he laboured, by recommending to him the use of the cold bath. He was greatly rewarded for this celebrated cure. He was honoured with a brazen statue, by the Roman senate, which was placed near that of Æsculapius, and Augustus permitted him to wear a golden ring, and to be exempted from all taxes. He was not so successful in recommending the use of the cold bath to Marcellus, as he had been to Augustus, and his illustrious patient died under his care. The cold bath was for a long time discontinued, till Charmis of Marseilles introduced it again, and convinced the world of its great benefits. Musa was brother to Euphorbus the physician of King Juba. Two works are falsely ascribed to him, one entitled "Libellus de tuenda valetudine, ad Mæcenatem;" and the other "De Herba Betonica."—A daughter of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. She attempted to recover her father's kingdom from the Romans, but to no purpose, though Cæsar espoused her cause. Paterc. 2.—Suet. in Cæs

MUSÆ certain goddesses who presided over poetry, music, dancing, and all the liberal arts. They derived their name, according to some, from their being like each other (Μοῦσαι quasi ὁμοιοῦσαι, i. e. similes) because there is an affinity and relation between all the sciences. Others, however, derive it from a Greek word signifying to inquire, (ἀπὸ τοῦ μυεῖσθαι,) because men, by inquiring of them, learned the things of which they were before ignorant. They were daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, and were nine in number; Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polyhymnia, Calliope, and Urania.

Some suppose that there were in ancient times only three Muses, Melete, Mneme, and Aœde; others four, Telxiope, Aœde, Arche, Melete. They were, according to others, daughters of Pierus and Antiope, from which circumstance they are called Pierides. The name of Pierides might probably be derived from mount Pierus where they were born. They have been severally called Castalides, Aganippides, Lebethrides, Aonides, Heliconiades, &c. from the places where they were worshipped, or over which they presided. Apollo, who was the patron and the conductor of the Muses, has received the name of Musagetes, or leader of the Muses. The same surname was also given to Hercules. The palm tree, the laurel, and all the fountains of Pindus, Helicon, Parnassus, &c. were sacred to the Muses. They were generally represented as young, beautiful, and modest virgins. They were fond of solitude, and commonly appeared in different attire according to the arts and sciences over which they presided. [Vid Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, &c.] Sometimes they were represented as dancing in a chorus, to intimate the near and indissoluble connexion which exists between the liberal arts and sciences. The Muses sometimes appear with wings, because by the assistance of wings they freed themselves from the violence of Pyrenæus. Their contest with the daughters of Pierus is well known. [Vid. Pierides.] The worship of the Muses was universally established, particularly in the enlightened parts of Greece, Thessaly, and Italy. No sacrifices were ever offered to them, though no poet ever began a poem without a solemn invocation to the goddesses who presided over verse. There were festivals instituted in their honour in several parts of Greece, especially among the Thespians, every fifth year. The Macedonians observed also a festival in honour of Jupiter and the Muses. It had been instituted by king Archelaus, and was celebrated with stage plays, games, and different exhibitions, which continued nine days, according to the number of the Muses. Plut Erot.—Pollux.—Æschyn. in Tim.—Paus 9, 29.—Apollod. 1, 3. *Cic. de Nat. MUSÆUS, an early Greek bard, said by some to have been the son, by others, only the pupil of Orpheus. According to the Arundelian marbles, he flourished about 1428 years before the Christian era; but more probable accounts not earlier than from 1180 to 1200 years B. C. He seems to have been much less celebrated among the Greeks than his father or preceptor; but Virgil gives him a very high rank among the poets. He places him in a conspicuous situation in his Elysium, at the head of a sacred band, and in the character of the priest of Ceres. Very little is recorded respecting his personal adventures. He seems to have led a retired and religious life, officiating most probably as a priest of some of those mysteries which Orpheus had introduced before him. Plutarch does not mention him among the ancient musicians, and he does not seem to have been much celebrated for his performances on the lyre. As his hymns were set to music, it is probable, however, that he sung them himself at the ceremonies in which he presided. Pausanias asserts that the eminence in the neighbourhood of Athens, called the Museum, was so denominated from the circumstance of his having been accustomed to retire thither for contemplation and poetical musing. He is said to have composed his hymns there, and to have been interred beneath it. He wrote hymns and prophecies, and left precepts in verse addressed to his son. He is said also to have sung the wars of the Titans. But his principal work was a poetical account of the creation, in which he seems to have embodied some ideas of religion and philosophy more refined than were commonly entertained by the Grecian theologians of after days. Diogenes Laertius has preserved a principle of the philosophy of Musæus in the words, "Ἐξ ἑνὸς τὰ πάντα γεγονέναι, καὶ εἰς ἓν πάντα ἀναλυσθῆναι." It seems that he was also an astronomer, and composed or enlarged a sphere; though, as Chiron is generally supposed to have invented the sphere, it is probable that Musæus only improved it. The work itself is evidently subsequent to the voyage of Jason, as that expedition is described upon it, and as the Argo was the first vessel constructed on any other than the circular form. The life of Musæus seems to have been calm and tranquil, and was probably spent in philosophic ease. Of his works nothing remains. Even in the time of Pausanias, as we are informed by that writer, a hymn to Ceres was his only genuine composition then in existence. Athen. 13, 71.—Paus 1, 22 et 25, 10, 9.——A native of Ephesus, who resided at Pergamus. He was the author of an epic poem, in ten books, entitled Perseis, and also of other effusions in honour of Eumenes and Attalus. He does not appear to have been the writer of whom Martial speaks (14, 96).——A grammarian, the author of a poem founded on the story of Hero and Leander. He is supposed to have lived in the fourth century. Nothing is known of him personally, yet his work is in a pure and elegant style, with much delicacy of sentiment. It has been frequently reprinted, both in collections and separately. Some of the best editions are those of Schrader, Leovard. 8vo, 1742; of Heinrich, Hanov. 8vo, 1793, of Moblius, Hallæ, 8vo, 1814.

MUTA, a goddess who presided over silence among the Romans. Ovid. Fast 2, 580.

MUTIA, or Mucia, a daughter of Q. Mutius Scævola, and sister of Metellus Celer. She was Pompey's third wife. Her incontinent behaviour so disgusted her husband, that at his return from the Mithridatic war, he divorced her, though she had borne him three children. Cæsar was the seducer; and hence when Pompey married Cæsar's daughter, all blamed him for turning off a wife who had been the mother of three children, to espouse the daughter of a man whom he had often, with a sigh, called "his Ægisthus." Mutia's disloyalty must have been very public, since Cicero, in one of his letters to Atticus (1, 12.) says, "Divortium Mucia vehementer probatur."

MUTIA LEX, the same as that which was enacted by Licinius Crassus and Q. Mutius, A. U. C. 657. Vid Licinia Lex.

MUTICA, or Mutyce, a town Sicily west of the cape Pachynus. Cic. in Ver. 3, 43.

MUTINA, a city of Cisalpine Gaul, now Modena, situate on the Æmilian Way, in a south-east direction from Placentia and Parma. Livy asserts that it was colonized the same year with Parma, that is, 569 A. U. C.; but Polybius speaks of it as a Roman colony thirty-four years prior to that date. It sustained a severe siege against the troops of Antony, A. U. C. 709. D. Brutus, who defended the place, being apprised of the approach of the consuls Hirtius and Pansa by means of carrier-pigeons, made an obstinate defence. Antony being finally defeated, by those generals, and Octavianus, was forced to raise the siege. Mutina was also famous for its wool. Liv 30, 45.—Polyb. 3, 40.—Liv Epit. 118 et 119 —Cic Ep. ad Fam. 10, 14 —Vell. Paterc. 2, 61.—Flor 4, 4. - Suet. Aug 10 —Martial 3, 58.

MUTINES, one of Annibal's generals who was honoured with the freedom of Rome on delivering up Agrigentum. Liv. 25, 41. 27, 5.

MUTINUS Vid. Mutunus.

MUTIUS, the father-in-law of C. Marius.—— A Roman who saved the life of young Marius, by conveying him away from the pursuit of his enemies in a load of straw.——A friend of Tiberius Gracchus, by whose means he was raised to the office of a tribune.——C. Scævola, surnamed Cordus, became famous for his courage and intrepidity. When Porsenna king of Etruria, had besieged Rome, to reinstate Tarquin in all his rights and privileges, Mutius determined to deliver his country from so dangerous an enemy. He disguised himself in the habit of a Tuscan, and as he could fluently speak the language, he gained an easy introduction into the camp, and soon into the royal tent. Porsenna sat alone with his secretary, when Mutius entered. The Roman rushed upon the secretary, and stabbed him to the heart, mistaking him for his royal master. This occasioned a noise; and Mutius, unable to escape, was seized and brought before the king. He gave no answer to the inquiries of the courtiers, and only told them that he was a Roman, and to give them a proof of his fortitude, he laid his right hand on an altar of burning coals and sternly looking at the king, and without uttering a groan, he boldly told him that three hundred young Romans like himself had conspired against his life, and entered the camp in disguise, determined either to destroy him, or perish in the attempt. This extraordinary confession astonished Porsenna, he made peace with the Romans and retired from their city. Mutius obtained the surname of Scævola, because he had lost the use of his right hand by burning it in the presence of the Etrurian king. Plut in Par.—Flor. 1, 10.—Liv 2, 12 ——Q. Scævola, a Roman consul, son-in-law of Lælius. He obtained a victory over the Dalmatians, and signalized himself greatly in the Marsian war. He is highly commended by Cicero, whom he instructed in the study of civil law Cic Plut.——Another, appointed proconsul of Asia, which he governed with so much popularity that he was generally proposed to others as a pattern of equity and moderation. Cicero speaks of him as eloquent, learned, and ingenious, equally eminent as an orator and as a lawyer He was murdered in the temple of Vesta, by Damasippus, during the civil war of Marius and Sylla, eighty-two years before Christ. Plut.—Cic de Orat. 1, 48 —Paterc. 2, 22.

MUTUNUS, or MUTINUS, a deity among the Romans, much the same as the Priapus of the Greeks August. de Civ. D 4, 9 6, 9.—Lact 1, 20.

MUTUSCÆ, a town of Umbria Virg Æn. 7, 711.

MUZERIS, a harbour of India intra Gangem, on the western coast, below the Sinus Barygazenus. It was much frequented in the first century of our era, though somewhat dangerous to visit on account of the pirates in its vicinity. It appears to correspond to the modern Mirzno or Mirdchno Plin. 6, 23.

MYAGRUS, or MYODES, a divinity among the Egyptians, called also Achor. He was entreated by the inhabitants to protect them from flies and serpents. His worship passed into Greece and Italy. Plin. 10, 28.—Paus. 5, 26.

MYCALE, a celebrated magician, who boasted that she could draw down the moon from her orb. Ovid. Met. 12, 263.——A promontory of Ionia, in Asia Minor, opposite the island of Samos. It is a continuation of mount Messogis, which chain ran along the upper side of the Mæander for the greater part of its course. Mycale was already known to Homer; and became still more celebrated from the Panionium, or solemn assembly, of the Ionian states, held in a temple situated at its foot; and also from the great victory obtained by the Greek naval army, under the command of Leotychides, king of Sparta, against the Persian forces encamped near the shore; and which wrested the whole of Ionia for a time from the Persian dominion. Herodotus describes the action as taking place near the temples of the Eumenides and that of the Eleusinian Ceres, founded by Philistus, a follower of Neleus, son of Codrus. He also particularizes two spots, called Gæson and Scolopoeis The Persians had drawn up their ships on shore, and fortified themselves with entrenchments and palisades; but they were forced by the Greeks after an obstinate resistance, and defeated with great slaughter. Mount Mycale, according to Strabo, was well wooded, and abounded with game; a character which, as Chandler reports, it still retains. This traveller describes it as a high ridge, with a beautiful cultivated plain at its foot, and several villages on its side. Hom. Il 2, 869.—Herod. 1, 148. 9. 97.

MYCALESSUS, a city of Bœotia, north-east of Thebes, and a short distance to the west of Aulis. It was an ancient place, and known to Homer. We learn from Thucydides, that, in the Peloponnesian war, Mycalessus sustained a most afflicting disaster, owing to an attack made upon it by some Thracian troops in the pay of Athens. These barbarians, having surprised the town, put all the inhabitants to the sword, sparing neither women nor children, since they savagely butchered a number of boys who were assembled in the public school belonging to the place. The historian affirms, that this was one of the greatest calamities which ever befell a city. Hom. Il. 2, 495.—Hymn. in Apoll. 234.— Thucyd. 7, 30. —Paus. 1, 23 - Strab. 9.

MYCENÆ, an ancient city of Argolis, in a north-east direction from Argos. It was said to have been founded by Perseus, after the death of his grandfather Acrisius. The name was supposed by some to be derived from Mycene, daughter of Inachus; but others assigned a different origin to the word, as may be seen from Pausanias. Perseus was succeeded by Sthenelus, married to a daughter of Pelops named Astydameia; after whom followed Eurystheus, Atreus, and Agamemnon. Under the latter monarch, the empire of Mycenæ reached its highest degree of opulence and power, since his authority was acknowledged by the whole of Greece. Mycenæ, which had been superior even to Argos during the Trojan war, declined after the return of the Heraclidæ; and in the 75th

Olympiad, or 469 years B. C., the Argives having attacked and taken the city, razed it to the ground and reduced its inhabitants to slavery. Pausanias attributes the destruction of Mycenæ to the envy which the glory acquired by the troops of that city at Thermopylæ and Platæa had excited in the minds of the Argives. But Diodorus affirms that the war arose from a dispute relative to the temple of Juno on mount Euboia, which was common to the two republics. Strabo states that so complete was the destruction of this celebrated capital, that not a vestige remained of its existence. This assertion, however, is not correct, since Pausanias informs us that several parts of the walls were yet standing, as also one of the gates, surmounted by lions, when he visited the ruins. Modern travellers have given us a full and interesting account of these vestiges; among which the most remarkable is a subterraneous chamber, called by Pausanias the treasury of Atreus, and usually mentioned under that name by antiquaries of the present day. The modern village of Krabata stands near the ruins of Mycenæ. Paus. 2, 16.—Strab. 8.—Thucyd. 1, 9.—Diod. Sic. 11, 65

MYCENIS, (idis,) a name applied to Iphigenia as residing at Mycenæ. Ovid. Met. 12, 34.

MYCERINUS, a son of Cheops, king of Egypt. After the death of his father he reigned with great justice and moderation. He built one of the pyramids, which travellers usually call the third one. It is smaller in size than the others, but, according to Strabo, was equally an expensive as the rest, being cased, according to Diodorus Siculus, half way up with Ethiopian marble. Mycerinus is said by Herodotus to have died in the seventh year of his reign. He received the prediction of his short reign from the oracle of Latona at Butos, and, on complaining that he, a pious prince, was not allowed a long reign, while his father and grandfather, who had been injurious to mankind and impious to the gods, had enjoyed each a long life, he was told that his short life was the direct consequence of his piety, for the fates had decreed that for the space of 150 years Egypt should be oppressed; of which determination the two preceding monarchs had been aware. Herod. 2, 129.

MYCITHUS, a servant of Anaxilaus tyrant of Rhegium. He was entrusted with the care of the kingdom, and of the children of the deceased prince, and he exercised his power with such fidelity and moderation, that he acquired the esteem of all the citizens, and at last restored the kingdom to his master's children when come to years of maturity, and retired to peace and solitude with a small portion. He is called by some Micalus. Justin. 4, 2.

MYCON, a celebrated painter who with others assisted in making and perfecting the Pœcile of Athens. He was the rival of Polygnotus. Plin 33 et 35.——A youth of Athens changed into a poppy by Ceres.——A shepherd mentioned by Virgil. Ecl 3. 10. 7. 30.

MYCONOS, one of the Cyclades, lying a little to the east of Delos. It is described by Athenæus as a poor and barren island, the inhabitants of which were consequently rapacious and fond of money. Strabo reports, that they lost their hair at an early age, whence the name of Myconian was proverbially used to designate a bald person. It was also said, that the giants whom Hercules had conquered, lay in a heap under the island; a fable which gave rise to another saying, (ἀπὸ Μύκωνος) applied to those authors who confusedly mixed together things which ought to have been treated of separately. The modern name of this island is Myconi. Athen. 1, 14.—Strab. 10.—Thucyd 3, 29.—Herod. 6, 118.

MYDON, one of the Trojan chiefs who defended Troy against the Greeks. He was killed by Antilochus. Homer. Il 5, 580.

MYENUS, a mountain of Ætolia. Plut de Flum

MYGDONIA, a province of Macedonia, which appears to have extended from the river Axius to the lake Bolbe, and at one period even to the Strymon. It originally belonged to the Edones, a people of Thrace; but these were expelled by the Temenidæ. Under the division of Mygdonia we must include several minor districts, enumerated by different historians and geographers. These are, Amphaxitis and Paraxia, Anthemus and Crestonia or Crestonis. Herod. 7, 123.—Thucyd. 1, 58. 2, 99.——A district of Mesopotamia. It is thought to have been so called by the Macedonians after the Mygdonia of their own country. Strab. 16.

MYGDONIUS, a river of Mesopotamia, rising in the district of Mygdonia, and falling into the Chaboras. It is now the Hunb.—The epithet "Mygdonian," is applied by Horace to Phrygia, either from a branch of the Mygdones having settled there at a very early period, while they were still regarded as a Thracian tribe, or from one of the ancient monarchs of the land. Horat. Od. 2, 12, 22.—Strab. 12.—Paus. 10, 27.

MYGDONUS, or MYGDON, an ancient monarch of the Mygdones. Paus 10, 27.——A brother of Hecuba, Priam's wife, who reigned in part of Thrace. His son Corcobus was called Mygdonides from him Virg. Æn. 2 341.

MYLASSA, or MYLASA, (orum), a city of Caria, situate to the south-west of Stratonicea, and a short distance to the north of the harbour Physeus. It was of Grecian origin, and was founded at a very early period, but by whom is uncertain. Here at one time, resided Hecatomnus, the progenitor of Mausolus. This place was famous for a very ancient temple of the Carian Jove, and for another, of nearly equal antiquity, sacred to Jupiter Osogus. In after times a very beautiful temple was erected here, dedicated to Augustus and to Rome. Strab speaks highly of the magnificence of this city. It suffered severely in the inroad of Labienus, during the contest between Antony and Augustus, but was subsequently restored. Pococke saw the temple last mentioned entire, but it has since been destroyed, and the materials have been used for building a mosque. Mylassus is now Melasso, and is at the present day remarkable for producing the best tobacco in Turkey. Strab. 14.—Dio Cass. 48, 26

MYLE or MYLÆ, now Milazzo, was situate on a tongue of land south-west of Pelorum, on the northern coast of Sicily. Between this place and a station called Naulochus, the fleet of Sextus Pompeius was defeated by that of the triumvir Octavius, under the command of Agrippa. Thucyd. 3, 90.—Plin. 3, 8.—Vell. Paterc. 2, 79

MYLITTA, a surname of Venus among the Assyrians, in whose temples all the women were obliged to prostitute themselves to strangers. Herod 1, 131 et 199.

MYNDUS, a maritime town of Caria, north west of Halicarnassus, on the northern shore of the peninsula below the Sinus Iasius. It was founded by a colony from Troezene. It was at no great distance from Halicarnassus, since Alexander marched over the intervening space, in one night, with a part of his troops. The city was a strong one, and Alexander would not stop to besiege it. Hierocles gives it, probably by corruption, the name of Amyndus Col. Leake identifies Myndus with Gumushlu, a small port, where Captain Beaufort discovered some ruins. Peus. 2, 30.—Arrian. 1, 24.

MYONNESUS, a place between Teos and Lebedus, and to the north west of the latter. It was situated on a peninsular promontory. Liv. 37, 27.——A small island, off the coast of Phthiotis, in Thessaly, and between the Artemisian shore of Eubœa and the main land. It was near Aphetæ Strab 9.

MYOS HORMOS, or "mouse harbour," a seaport of Egypt, on the coast of the Red sea. Arrian says that it was one of the most celebrated ports on this sea. It was called also Aphrodites portus or the port of Venus It is full of little isles, and its modern name of Suffonge el Bahri, or "the sponge of the sea," has an evident analogy to the etymology of the second of the Greek names given above, from the vulgar error of sponge being the foam of the sea, and Venus, (Aphrodite) having been fabled to have sprung from the foam of the ocean.

MYRA, (orum or æ) a city of Lycia, near the southern coast, south-west of Limyra and west of the Sacrum Promontorium. It was seated on the brow of a lofty hill, at the distance of twenty stadia from the shore. It was one of the six chief towns of Lycia. At a late period of the empire it became the metropolis of that province. Myra still retains its ancient name. Strab 14.

MYRIANDROS, a town of Syria, on the bay of Issus, below Alexandria ad Issum. Xen Anab. 1, 4.

MYRINA, a city and harbour of Æolis, in Asia Minor, forty stadia to the north of Cyme. It is said to have been the oldest of the Æolian cities and to have received its name from Myrinus its founder. It subsequently assumed the name of Sebastopolis. Strab. 13.—Mela, 1, 18.—Plin. 5, 30.——A city on the north-western coast of Lemnos, and one of the principal places in the island. It was situate on the side looking towards mount Athos, since Pliny reports, that the shadow of the mountain was visible in the forum of this city at the time of the summer-solstice. Myrina alone offered resistance to Miltiades when that general was sent against Lemnos. It was taken, however, by his forces. Plin. 4, 12. Herod. 6, 140.——A town of Crete, north of Lyctus. Plin. 4, 12.

MYRINUS, a surname of Apollo, from Myrina in Æolis, where he was worshipped.

MYRMECIDES an artist of Miletus mentioned as making chariots so small that they were covered by the wing of a fly. He also inscribed an iambic distich on a grain of Indian sesamum. Acad. 4, 38.—Ælian. V. H. 1, 17.

MYRMIDONES a people on the southern borders of Thessaly, who accompanied Achilles to the Trojan war. They received their name from Myrmidon, a son of Jupiter and Eurymedusa. Also married one of the daughters of Æolus, son of Hellen Hir son Actor married Ægina, the daughter of the Asopus. He gave his name to his subjects, who dwelt near the river Peneus in Thessaly. According to some, the Myrmidons received their name from their having been originally ants, μύρμηκες. [Vid. Æacus.] According to Strabo, they received it from their industry, because they imitated the diligence of the ants, and like them were indefatigable and were continually employed in cultivating the earth. Ovid. Met. 7, 654.—Strab.—Hygin. fab. 52.

MYRON, a tyrant of Sicyon.——A celebrated statuary of Eleutheræ in Bœotia, peculiarly happy in imitating nature. He made a cow so much resembling life, that even bulls were deceived and approached her as if alive, as is frequently mentioned in many epigrams in the Anthologia. He flourished about 442 years before Christ. Ovid. Art. Am. 3, 319.—Propert. 2, 31.

MYRRHA, a daughter of Cinyras, king of Cyprus. She became enamoured of her father, and introduced herself into his bed unknown. She had a son by him, called Adonis. When Cinyras was apprized of the incest he had committed, he attempted to stab his daughter, and Myrrha fled into Arabia, where she was changed into a tree called myrrh Hygin. fab 58 et 275.—Ovid. Met 10, 298.—Plut. in Par.

MYRSILUS, a son of Myrsus, the last of the Heraclidæ, who reigned in Lydia. He is also called Candaules. Vid. Candaules.

MYRSUS, the father of Candaules. Herod. 1, 7.

MYRTEA, a surname of Venus. Vid Murtia.

MYRTILUS, son of Mercury and Phaetusa or Cleobule or Clymene, was armour-bearer to Œnomaus, king of Pisa. He was so experienced in riding and in the management of horses, that he rendered those of Œnomaus the swiftest in all Greece. His infidelity proved at last fatal to him. Œnomaus had been informed by an oracle, that his daughter Hippodamia's husband should cause his death, and on that account he resolved to marry her only to him who should overcome him in a chariot race. This seemed totally impossible, and to render it more terrible, Œnomaus declared that death would be the consequence of a defeat in the suitors. The charms of Hippodamia were so great, that many sacrificed their life in the fruitless endeavour to obtain her hand. Pelops at last presented himself, undaunted at the fate of those who had gone before him, but before he entered the course he bribed Myrtilus, and assured him that he should share Hippodamia's favours if he returned victorious from the race. Myrtilus, who was enamoured of Hippodamia, gave an old chariot to Œnomaus, which broke in the course and caused his death. Pelops gained the victory, and married Hippodamia; and when Myrtilus had the audacity to claim the reward promised to his perfidy, Pelops threw him headlong into the sea, where he perished. The body of Myrtilus, according to some, was carried by the waves to the sea shore, where he received an honourable burial, and as he was the son of Mercury, he was made a constellation. Hygin. fab 84 et 224.—Paus 8, 14.

MYRTIS, a Grecian female of distinguished poetical abilities, who flourished about 500 B. C. She was born at Anthedon, in Bœotia. Pindar is said to have received his first instructions in the poetic art from her, and it was during the period of his attendance upon her that he became acquainted with Corinna, who was also a pupil of Myrtis.

MYRTOUM MARE, that part of the Ægean which lay between the coast of Argolis and Attica. It was so called from a woman named Myrto. Strab. 7. — Paus. 8, 15.

MYRTUNTIUM, an inland lake of Acarnania, below Anactorium, the water of which, however, is salt, as it communicates with the sea. It is now called Murtari Strab. 10. —— A town of Elis, originally named Myrsinus, and classed by Homer, under this latter appellation, among the Epean towns It was about seventy stadia from the city of Elis, on the road from thence to Dyme and near the sea. Strab. 8.

MYS, (Myos,) a celebrated artist. He beautifully represented the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, on a shield in the hand of Minerva's statue made by Phidias. Paus 1, 28 —— A freedman of Epicurus, and one of his disciples MYSCELLUS, or MISCELLUS, a native of Rhypæ in Achaia, who founded Crotona in Italy, according to an oracle, which told him to build a city where he found rain with fine weather. The meaning of the oracle long perplexed him, till he found a beautiful woman all in tears in Italy, which circumstance he interpreted in his favour According to some, Myscellus, who was the son of Hercules, went out of Argos, without the permission of the magistrates, for which he was condemned to death. The judges had put each a black ball as a sign of condemnation, but Hercules changed them all and made them white, and had his son acquitted, upon which Myscellus left Greece and came to Italy, where he built Crotona. Ovid. Met 15, 19.

MYSIA, a country of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by the Propontis and Hellespont, on the east by Bithynia and Phrygia, on the south by Lydia, and on the west by the Ægæan Sea. The name of Mysia is supposed to have been derived from Madai, the son of Japhet, whose descendants crossed over to Europe and colonized parts of Mœsia and Macedonia: it was not at first applied in the extended sense afterwards assigned to it, its western parts being called Troas and Dardania. Its northern and eastern parts, from Abydos to the river Rhyndacus, were inhabited by a band of Phrygians, and hence obtained the appellation of Phrygia Minor: from this cause the Persians named Mysia the satrapy of Phrygia Minor. The Mysians, who are mentioned by Homer as auxiliaries of the Trojans, are said to have first settled at the foot of mount Olympus, between the river Rhyndacus and the town of Cius, and stretched to the south-west as far as Pergamus and the banks of the Caicus. Here they remained till the confusion which ensued after Alexander's death, when the Bithynians drove them beyond the Rhyndacus, and they again compelled the Phrygians to retreat inland The whole of the northern coast was now called Mysia Minor, whilst the southern and more important part received the name of Mysia Major. The Mysians were reckoned by some of the profane authors as descendants of the Lydians, but by others as a distinct tribe from them, who crossed over from Mœsia (or Mysia Europæa), and brought their name with them. They were once brave and warlike, but they degenerated so much that "Mysorum Virtutes" was a term proverbially used to denote a despicable person. They were frequently hired to attend funerals as mourners, owing to their melancholy and lachrymose habits In the time of Diocletian Mysia received the name of Provincia Hellespontica. Strab. 12. — Herod. 7, 74. — Hom. Il 2, 858. 24, 545. — Cic pro Flacc 27. —— A festival in honour of Ceres, surnamed Mysia from Mysius, an Argive, who raised her a temple near Pallene in Achaia. Some derive the word ἀπο τοῦ μυειν, to clay, or salsify because Ceres was the first who satisfied the wants of men by giving them corn. The festival continued during seven days, &c.

MYSIUS, a river of Mysia, which falls into the Caicus near the source of the latter river.

MYSON, a native of Sparta, one of the seven wise men of Greece. When Anacharsis consulted the oracle of Apollo, to know which was the wisest man in Greece, he received for answer, he who is now ploughing his fields. This was Myson. Diog. in Vit.

MYSTES a son of the poet Valgius, whose early death was so lamented by the father that Horace wrote an ode to allay the grief of his friend Horat Od. 2, 9.

MYTHECUS, a sophist of Syracuse. He studied cookery, and when he thought himself sufficiently skilled in dressing meat, he went to Sparta, where he gained much practice, especially among the younger citizens. He was soon after expelled the city by the magistrates, who observed that the aid of Mythecus was unnecessary, as hunger was the best seasoning.

MYTILENE. Vid. Mitylene.

MYUS, (Myuntis) a city of Ionia, situate apparently on the southern bank of the Mæander, about thirty stadia from its mouth. It was founded by Cydrelus, a natural son of Codrus; and became one of the twelve states which sent deputies to the Panionian assembly. Thucydides informs us, that this was one of the three towns granted to Themistocles by Artaxerxes, for his subsistence during his residence in Asia. The same historian mentions a check received by the Athenians near this place during the Peloponnesian war, from the Carians. Athenæus states, on the authority of Polybius that Philip, son of Demetrius, king of Macedon, having obtained possession of Myus, ceded it to the Magnesians. Strabo reports, that in his time Myus was so much reduced that it had been annexed to Miletus Pausanias accounts for this by the action of the Mæander, which had choked up the bay in which it stood, and brought such a host of gnats around the place that the inhabitants were forced to abandon it, and retire to Miletus. Strab. 14. — Herod 1, 142. — Thucyd. 1, 138. 3, 19. — Athen. 3. — Pous 7, 2.

NABATHÆA, a country of Arabia Petræa. It extended from the Euphrates to the Sinus Arabicus The Nabathæans are scarcely known in scripture until the time of the Maccabees. Their name is supposed to be derived from that of Nebaioth, son of Ishmael. In the time of Augustus they were a powerful people; but their kingdom, of which Petra was the capital, ended about the reign of Trajan. At a still later period their territory belonged to Palæstina Tertia. Genesis 25, 13. 28, 9 — Isaiah 60, 7. — Ovid Met. 1, 61 — Lucan. 4, 63. Jur. 11, 126.

NABAZANES, an officer of Darius 3d, at the battle of Issus. He conspired with Besaus to murder his royal master, either to obtain the favour of Alexander, or to seize the kingdom He was pardoned by Alexander. Curt 3, &c NABDALSA, a Numidian put to death by Jugurtha, against whose life he conspired, together with Bomilcar. Sallust. Jug. 70, &c.

NABIS, a celebrated tyrant of Lacedæmon, who in all acts of cruelty and oppression surpassed a Phalaris or a Dionysius. His house was filled with flatterers and with spies, who were continually employed in watching the words and the actions of his subjects When he had exercised every art in plundering the citizens of Sparta, he made a statue, which in resemblance was like his wife, and was clothed in the most magnificent apparel, and whenever any one refused to deliver up his riches, the tyrant led him to the statue, which immediately, by means of secret springs, seized him in its arms, and tormented him in the most excruciating manner with bearded points and prickles hid under the clothes To render his tyranny more popular, Nabis made an alliance with Flamininus, the Roman general, and pursued with the most inveterate enmity the war which he had undertaken against the Achæans. He besieged Gythium and defeated Philopœmen in a naval battle His triumph was short; the general of the Achæans soon repaired his losses, and Nabis was defeated in an engagement, and treacherously murdered by Alexander the Ætolian, as he attempted to save his life by flight, B C 192, after an usurpation of fourteen years. Justin 30 et 31. —Plut. in Phil.—Paus 7, 8.—Flor. 2, 7

—A priest of Jupiter Ammon, killed in the second Punic war, as he fought against the Romans. Sil. 15, 672

NABONASSAR, a king of Babylon, after the division of the Assyrian monarchy. From him the Nabonassarean epoch received its name This era began on Wednesday, the 26th of February, in the 3967th. year of the Julian period, i e B.C. 747 The years are vague, consisting of 365 days each, without intercalation. The Nabonassarean era included a period of 424 Egyptian years, from the commencement of Nabonassar's reign to the death of Alexander the Great, and was thence brought down to the reign of Antoninus Pius.

NABOPOLASSAR, a king of Babylon who united with Astyages against Assyria, which country they conquered, and having divided it between them, founded two kingdoms, that of the Medes under Astyages, and that of the Chaldeans under Nabopolassar, B. C. 626 Necho, king of Egypt, jealous of the power of the latter, declared war against and defeated him. Nabopolassar died after a reign of twenty-one years.

NÆNIA, the goddess of funerals at Rome, whose temple was without the gates of the city. The songs which were sung at funerals were also called nœnia They were generally filled with the praises of the deceased, but sometimes they were so unmeaning and improper, that the word became proverbial to signify nonsense. Varro, de vita P. R.—Plaut. Asin. 41, 1, 63

NÆVIUS, CNEIUS, an ancient Roman poet and historian, was a native of Campania, and served in the army in the first Punic war. Of this war he wrote a history in Saturnian verse, with all the rudeness of those illiterate times, but yet, according to Cicero, perspicuously; and he adds that Ennius, who alludes to the work contemptuously, borrowed much from it. Nævius was likewise the second Roman who brought dramatic compositions on the stage. His first comedy was acted B C 235, or, according to another authority, B C. 228. It appears to have given offence to some of the leading men at Rome; for Plautus, in his "Miles Gloriosus," hints at his being confined in prison. He was finally obliged to quit Rome through the enmity of the patrician family of Metelli, and died at Utica, B C. 203. A highly laudatory epitaph on him is extant, said to have been written by himself Of the works of this poet only some inconsiderable fragments, preserved by grammarians, have reached modern times. Cic. Tusc. 1, 1. Br. 15, &c. Leg 2, 15. De Senect.—Aul. Gell. 1, 24. 3, 3. 27, 21.—A tribune of the people at Rome, who accused Scipio Africanus of extortion.—An augur in the reign of Tarquin. To convince the king and the Romans of his power, as an augur, he cut a flint with a razor, and turned the ridicule of the populace into admiration. Tarquin rewarded his merit by erecting to him a statue in the comitium, which was still in being in the age of Augustus The razor and flint were buried near it under an altar, and it was usual among the Romans to make witnesses in civil causes swear near it. This miraculous event of cutting a flint with a razor, though believed by some writers, is treated as fabulous and improbable by Cicero, who himself had been an augur. Dionys. Hal. Liv. 1, 36.—Cic. de Divin. 1, 17. De N D 2, 3. 3, 6.

NAHARVALI, a people of Germany, ranked by Tacitus under the Lygi According to Kruse and Wersebe, they dwelt in what is now Upper Lusatia and Silesia Wilhelm, however, places them in Poland on the Vistula; and Reichard between the Wartha and Vistula. Tacit. Germ 43.

NAIADES, certain inferior deities who presided over rivers, springs, wells, and fountains, The Naiades generally inhabited the country, and resorted to the woods or meadows near the stream over which they presided, whence the name (ναω, "to flow.") They are represented as young and beautiful virgins, often leaning upon an urn, from which flows a stream of water. Ægle was the fairest of the Naiades, according to Virgil. They were held in great veneration among the ancients; and often sacrifices of goats and lambs were offered to them with libations of wine, honey, and oil. Sometimes they received only offerings of milk, fruit, and flowers. [Ved. Nymphæ.] Virg. Ecl. 6, 20.—Ovid. Met. 14, 328. —Homer. Od 14, 103.

NAIS, one of the Oceanides mother of Chiron or Glaucus, by Magnes. Apollod. 1, 9.— A nymph, mother by Bucolion of Ægesus and Idæsus. Homer. Il. 6, 22.— A nymph in an island of the Red Sea, who, by her incantations turned to fishes all those who approached her residence after she had admitted them to her embraces. She was herself changed into a fish by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 4, 49, &c.— The word is used for water by Tibullus, 3, 7.

NAISSUS, a city of Dacia Mediterranea, southwest of Ratiaria. It was the birth-place of Constantine the Great. It is supposed to correspond with the modern Nezza, or Nissa in the southern part of Servia Ante Marc 21, 10.

NAMNETES, a people of Gallia Lugdunensis, on the north bank of the Liger, or Loire, near its mouth. Their capital was Condivicum, afterwards Namnetes, now Nantes

NANTUATES, a people of Gallia Narbonensis, on the south of the Lacus Lemanus, or Lake of Geneva. Cæs. B. G. 4, 10.

NAPÆÆ, certain divinities among the ancients, who presided over the hills and woods of the country. Some suppose that they were tutelary deities of the fountains, and the Naiades of the sea. Their name is derived from νάπη, a grove. Fug. G. 4, 535.

NAR, a river of Italy, rising at the foot of Mount Fiscellus, in that part of the chain of the Apennines which separates the Sabines from Picenum, and after receiving the Velinus and several other smaller rivers, falls into the Tiber near Ocriculum. It was noted for its sulphureous stream and the whitish colour of its waters. It is now the Nera. Plin. 3, 12.—Virg. Æn. 7, 517.—Sil Ital. 8, 453.

NARBO, a city of Gaul, in the southern section of the country, and south-west of the mouths of the Rhone. It was situate on a canal leading from the river Atax, or Aude, into the lake Rubresus. When the Romans first entered Gaul, this was a flourishing city, and they made it a Roman colony, under the appellation of Narbo Martius. About 116 B. C., Julius Cæsar sent hither a colony of the veterans of the 10th legion; and under Augustus it was the capital of Gallia Narbonensis. It is now Narbonne. Vell Paterc. 1, 15.—Eutrop. 4, 3. Sueton Tib. 4.

NARBONENSIS GALLIA, one of the great divisions of Gaul under the Romans, deriving its name from the city of Narbo, its capital. It was situate in the southern and south eastern quarter of the country; and was bounded on the east by Gallia Cisalpina, being separated from it by the Varus, Var, on the north by the Lacus Lemanus, or L. de of Geneva, the Rhone, and Gallia Lugdunensis, on the west by Aquitania; and on the south by the Mediterranean and Pyrenees. It embraced what was afterwards the north-western part of Savoy, Dauphiny, Provence; the western part of Languedoc, together with the country along the Rhone, and the eastern part of Gascony.

NARCISSUS, a beautiful youth, son of Cephisus and the nymph Liriope, born at Thespis in Bœotia. He saw his image reflected in a fountain, and became enamoured of it, thinking it to be the nymph of the place. His fruitless attempts to approach this beautiful object so provoked him, that he grew desperate and killed himself. His blood was changed into a flower which still bears his name. The nymphs raised a funeral pile to burn his body, according to Ovid, but they found nothing but a beautiful flower. Pausanias says, that Narcissus had a sister as beautiful as himself, of whom he became deeply enamoured. He often hunted in the woods in her company, but his pleasure was soon interrupted by her death, and still to keep afresh her memory, he frequented the groves, where he had often attended her, or reposed himself on the brink of a fountain, where the sight of his own reflected image still awakened tender sentiments. Paus. 9, 21.—Hygin. fab. 271.—Ovid. Met. 3, 346, &c. — A freedman and secretary of Claudius, who abused his trust and the infirmities of his imperial master, and plundered the citizens of Rome to enrich himself. Messalina, the emperor's wife, endeavoured to remove him, but Narcissus sacrificed her to his avarice and resentment. Agrippina, who succeeded in the place of Messalina, was more successful. Narcissus was banished by her intrigues, and compelled to kill himself, A. D. 54. The emperor greatly regretted his loss, as he had found him subservient to his most criminal and extravagant pleasures. Tacit. Ann. 11, 33 et 38. 12, 53. 13, 1.—Sueton. Cl. 28. — A favourite of the emperor Nero, put to death by Galba. — A wretch who strangled the emperor Commodus.

NARISCI, a nation of Germany occupying what now corresponds to the northern part of Upper Pfalz in the Palatinate. Tacit. de Germ. 42.

NARNIA, now Narni, a town of Umbria, on the river Nar, a short distance above its junction with the Tiber. The more ancient name was Nequinum, which it exchanged for Narnia, when a Roman colony was sent hither, A. U. C. 453. This place was colonized with the view of serving as a point of defence against the Umbri. Many years after, we find it incurring the censure of the senate, for its want of zeal during the emergencies of the second Punic war. The situation of Narnia on a lofty hill, at the foot of which flows the Nar, has been described by several poets. Liv. 10, 9 et 10. 29, 15.—Claud. 6 Cons. Hon. 515.—Sil. Ital. 8, 458.—Martial. 7, 92.

NARO, now Narenta, a river of Dalmatia, rising in the mountains of Bosnia, and falling into the Adriatic opposite to the island of Lesina. On its banks lay the city of Narona, a Roman colony of some note. Its ruins should be sought for in the vicinity of Castel Novin. Plin. 3, 22.—Mela, 2, 3.

NARSES, a king of Persia, A. D. 294, defeated by Maximianus Galerius, after a reign of seven years. — An eunuch in the court of Justinian, who was deemed worthy to succeed Belisarius, &c.

NARYCIUM, or Naryx, a city of the Locri Opuntii, rendered celebrated by the birth of Ajax, son of Oileus. Virgil applies the epithet "Naryeian," to the Locri who settled in Italy as having been of the Opuntian stock. Strab. 9. Virg. Æn. 3, 399.

NASAMONES, a people of Africa, inhabiting the lower part of Cyrenaica and the shores of the Syrtis, and extending some distance into the province of Marmarica. They are represented to have been an infamous set of robbers, who attacked all the vessels which were cast upon their shores, and sold the cargoes as well as the crews. Their constant plunderings drew upon them the vengeance of the Romans under Augustus and Domitian who cut them to pieces, or drove them into the interior of the country. Herod. 4, 172.—Lucan. 9, 444.

NASCIO or NATIO, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the birth of children. She had a temple at Ardea. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 18.

NASICA, the surname of one of the Scipios. His integrity was considered to be so great, that the senate adjudged his house to be the holiest receptacle for the image of Cybele when brought to Rome. It was this same Nasica, who introduced the use of water-clocks at Rome, A. U. C. 544, about 157 B. C. They were invented by Ctesibius of Alexandria 245 B. C. [Vid Scipio.] Liv. 24, 14.—Val. Max. 3, 7.—Vitruv. 9, 9.— An avaricious fellow, who married his daughter to Coranus, a man as mean as himself, that he might not only not repay the money he had borrowed, but moreover become his creditor's heir. Coranus, understanding his meaning, purposely alienates his property from him and his daughter, and hands him his will to read. Horat. S. 1. 2, 5, 61, &c

NASIDIENUS, a Roman satirized by Horace. Under this feigned name, the poet describes an entertainer of bad taste and mean habits, affecting the manners of the higher classes. Sat. 2, 8.

NASO Vid. Ovidius.

NASOS, or NESOS, a town or fortress near Clonidæ in Acarnania. The name evidently implies an insular situation. Polyb. 9, 2.— Liv. 26, 24.

NATISO, a river of Venetia, in Cisalpine Gaul, rising in the Alps and falling into the Adriatic near Aquileia It is now the Natisone.

NATTA, a man whose manner of living was so mean, that his name became almost proverbial at Rome. Horat. Od. 1, 6, 124.

NAUCRATES, a Greek poet, who was employed by Artemisia to write a panegyric upon Mausolus.

NAUCRATIS, a city of Egypt, situate on the Canopic arm of the Nile, and to the south of Metelis and north-west of Sais. It was founded by the Milesians, with the permission of Amasis, king of Egypt, to whom and to his predecessor Psammetichus, they had rendered many services. It rose to great importance from its being the only place where the Greeks were allowed to carry on a regular trade with the Egyptians, and from the latter people being compelled by their priests to avoid all social intercourse with them, it remained for a very long period of time purely Greek, both in the manners and institutions of the people. It gave birth to the grammarian Athenæus. Strab. 17.— Herod. 2, 152 et 179.

NAULOCHUS, a naval station on the north-eastern coast of Sicily Between this place and Mylæ, which lay to the west of it, the fleet of Sextus Pompeius was defeated by that of Octavianus. (A.U.C. 718.— B. C. 36)——An island off the coast of Crete, near the promontory of Samonium. Plin. 4, 12.——The port of the town of Bulis in Phocis, near the confines of Bœotia. Plin. 4, 3.

NAUPACTUS, a city of Locris, at the western extremity of the territory of the Ozolæ, and close to Rhium of Ætolia. It is said to have derived its name from the words ναῦς navis, and πήγνυμι compingo, owing to the circumstance of the Heraclidæ having there constructed the fleet, in which they crossed over into the Peloponnesus. After the Persian war, this city was occupied by the Athenians, who there established the Messenian Helots, after they had evacuated Ithome. The acquisition of Naupactus was of great importance to the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war, as it was an excellent station for their fleet in the Corinthian gulf, and not only afforded them the means of keeping up a communication with Corcyra and Acarnania, but enabled them also to watch the motions of the enemy on the opposite coast, and to guard against any designs they might form against their allies. After the failure of the expedition undertaken by Demosthenes, the Athenian general, against the Ætolians, the latter, supported by a Peloponnesian force, endeavoured to seize Naupactus by a coup de main; but such were the able arrangements made by Demosthenes, who threw himself into the place with a reinforcement of Acarnanian auxiliaries, that the enemy did not think proper to prosecute the attempt. On the termination of the Peloponnesian war, however, Naupactus surrendered to the Spartans, who expelled the Messenians from the place. Demosthenes acquaints us, that it had afterwards been occupied by the Achæans, but was ceded by Philip of Macedon to the Ætolians, in whose possession it remained, till they were engaged in a war with the Romans. The latter, after having defeated Antiochus at Thermopylæ, suddenly crossed over from the Maliac gulf to that of Corinth, and invested Naupactus, which would probably have been taken, notwithstanding the obstinate defence made by the Ætolians, had they not obtained a truce by the intervention of T. Flaminius Naupactus was still a city of some importance in the time of Hierocles, but it was nearly destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Justinian. The modern town is called Enebachti by the Turks, Neparto by the Greeks, and Lepanto by the Franks. Strab 9.— Thucyd. 1, 103. 2, 90 3 102 Paus. 4, 24, &c.— Demosth. Phil 3. Liv 36, 30, &c NAUPLIA, a maritime town of Argolis, the port of Argos, situate on a point of land at the head of the Sinus Argolicus. It is said to have derived its name from Nauplius the son of Neptune. Its inhabitants were expelled by the Argives upon suspicion of their favouring the Spartans, and were consequently established by the latter people at Methone in Messenia It has been succeeded by the modern town of Napoli di Romania, as it is called by the Greeks, which possesses a fortress of some strength. Strab. 8 Herod. 6, 76.- Xen. Hell. 4, 7, 6.— Paus 4, 35.

NAUPLIADES, a patronymic of Palamedes, son of Nauplius. Ovid Met. 13, 39.

NAUPLIUS, a son of Neptune and Amymone, king of Eubœa. He was father to the celebrated Palamedes, who was so unjustly sacrificed to the artifice and resentment of Ulysses by the Greeks during the Trojan war. The death of Palamedes highly irritated Nauplius, and to avenge the injustice of the Grecian princes, he attempted to debauch their wives and ruin their character. When the Greeks returned from the Trojan war, Nauplius saw them with pleasure distressed in a storm on the coast of Eubœa, and to make their disaster still more universal, he lighted fires on such places as were surrounded with the most dangerous rocks, that the fleet might be shipwrecked upon the coast. This succeeded, but Nauplius was so disappointed when he saw Ulysses and Diomedes escape from the general calamity, that he threw himself into the sea. According to some mythologists, there were two persons of this name, a native of Argos, who went to Colchis with Jason. He was son of Neptune and Amymone. The other was king of Eubœa, and lived during the Trojan war. He was, according to some, son of Clytonæa, one of the descendants of Nauplius the Argonaut. The Argonaut was remarkable for his knowledge of sea affairs, and so well versed in astronomy that he discovered the constellation of the Ursa minor. He built the town of Nauplia, and sold Auge, daughter of Aleus, to king Teuthras, to withdraw her from her father's resentment. Orph. Argon. 200.— Apollod. 2, 7.— Placc. 1, 372. 5, 65 — Paus. 4. 35.— Hygin. ab. 116.

NAUPORTUS, a town of Pannonia, on a river of the same name, now Ober (Upper) Laybach. Vell. Pat. 2, 110. Plin. 3, 18.—Tacit. Ann. 1, 20

NAURA, a country of Scythia in Asia. Curt. 6.——Of India within the Ganges. Arrian.

NAUSICĂA, a daughter of Alcinous, king of the Phæacians. While she was washing the garments of her father, attended by a number of females, she met Ulysses shipwrecked on the coast, and it was to her humanity that he owed the kind reception which he experienced from the king. She married, according to Aristotle and Dictys, Telemachus the son of Ulysses, by whom she had a son called Perseptolis or Ptolporthus. Homer. Od. 6, 17, &c.—Hygin. fab. 126.

NAUSITHŌUS, a king of the Phæacians father to Alcinous. He was son of Neptune and Peribœa. Hesiod makes him son of Ulysses and Calypso. Hesiod. Th. 1, 1016——The pilot of the vessel which carried Theseus into Crete.

NAUSTATHMUS, a port and harbour in Sicily, at the mouth of the river Cacyparis, below Syracuse; now Asparanello.——A village and anchoring-place on Cyrenaica, between Krythron and Apollonia. Mela, 1, 8.——An anchoring-place on the coast of the Euxine, in Asia Minor, about 90 stadia from the mouth of the Halys

NAUTES, a Trojan soothsayer, who comforted Æneas when his fleet had been burnt in Sicily, and who received from the hands of Diomedes the Palladium which had been stolen from Troy. He was the progenitor of the Nautii at Rome, a family to whom the Palladium of Troy was, in consequence of the services of their ancestor, intrusted. Virg Æn 5, 704. Dionys. Hal. 1

NAVA, a river of Germany, falling into the Rhine at Bingium (Bingen), below Mayence. Tacit. Hist 4, 71.

NAXOS, now Naxia, the largest and most fertile of the Cyclades, lying to the south of Delos, in the Ægean sea. It anciently bore the names Dia, Dionysias, Strongyle, &c., and was first colonised by the Carians. It was conquered by the Persians, who destroyed its cities and temples. Its inhabitants, however, joined the Greek fleet at Salamis, and were the first of the confederates whom the Athenians deprived of their independence. Naxos was especially sacred to Bacchus, who was said to have been born there. It had a city of the same name. Plin 4, 12.—Herod. 5, 96. 8, 46.—Thucyd. 1, 98 et 137 - Virg. Æn. 3, 125.——A city on the eastern side of Sicily, situate on the southern side of mount Taurus, and looking towards Catana and Syracuse. It was founded by a colony from the island of Naxos, one year before the settlement of Syracuse (Ol 17. 3.), and at the same time consequently with Crotona in Italy. Upon the destruction of this city, its inhabitants settled in the immediate vicinity, and built Tauromenium (Vid. Tauromenium.) Thucyd. 6, 3.—Diod. 14, 15——A town of Crete, celebrated for producing excellent whetstones. Find. Isthm. 6, 107.

NAZIANZUS, a city of Cappadocia, in the south-western angle of the country, and to the south-east of Archelais. It was the birth place of Gregory, surnamed from it Nazianzenus.

NEA, or NOVA INSULA, a small island between Lemnos and the Hellespont, which rose out of the sea during an earthquake. Plin. 2, 87

NEÆRA, a nymph of Sicily, mother of Phaetusa and Lampetia by the Sun. Homer Od 12. 133.——A mistress of the poet Tibullus. —— A favourite of Horace.——A daughter of Pereus, who married Alcus, by whom she had Cepheus, Lycurgus, and Aëpe. Apollod. 3, 9.—Paus 8, 4. —— The wife of Autolycus.

NEÆTHUS, a river of Bruttium, rising to the north-east of Consentia, and falling into the Sinus Tarentinus above Crotona. It is now the Neto. Strab 6.

NEALCES, a friend of Turnus in his war against Æneas. Virg. Æn 10, 753.

NEAPOLIS, now Naples, a city of Campania, on the Sinus Crater. It was built by a colony from Cumæ, and formerly called Parthenope, from the Siren of that name, who was there cast on shore. It was remarkable for the indolence and effeminacy of manners prevalent among its inhabitants. Near it was the tomb of Virgil, who was conveyed there from Brundusium, where he had died. Strab. 5.—Liv 8, 22. Vell Paterc 1, 4.—Virg G 4, 563.- Hor. Epod 5, 43

NEARCHUS, one of the captains of Alexander the Great, who was employed by that conqueror in conducting his fleet from India by the ocean to the Persian gulf This expedition proved so tedious and fatiguing, that the leader, on his return, was not recognized by his friends, until he had made himself known. His service was so much esteemed, that he was crowned with a garland by Alexander at Susa; and wherever he went through the camp, flowers were thrown upon him. He is reckoned among the historians of Alexander, and is referred to as such by Strabo, Suidas, and Arrian, the latter of whom has copied much from him in his Indica. The relation of his voyage is extant, and is a curious and valuable record. It is published among Hudson's Geographi Minores.—— A beautiful youth, &c. Horat. Od. 3, 20.

NEBO, a mountain situate east of the river Jordan, and forming part of the chain of Abarim, north of the Dead Sea. The Israelites, in the fortieth year of their Exodus, encamped at the foot of this mountain; and Moses, having executed the commission with which he was intrusted, and having pronounced his blessing on the twelve tribes assembled to receive his last charge, ascended this mountain, from the summit of which, called Pisgah, he had a view of the promised land, into which he was not permitted to enter. On this mountain he soon afterwards died.

NEBRISSA, or COLONIA VENERIA NEBRISSA, a town of the Turdetani, in Hispania Bætica, north-east of Gades, and south-west of Hispalis. It is now Lebrija. Strab. 3.- Plin. 3, 3.

NEBRŌDES, a general name for the chain of mountains running through the northern part of Sicily. Strab 6.— Sil Ital. 14, 236.

NEBROPHŌNOS, a son of Jason and Hypsipyle. Apollod.——One of Actæon's dogs. Ovid. Met 3, 211

NECESSITAS, a divinity who presided over the destinies of mankind, and who was regarded as the mother of the Parcæ. Paus. 2, 4.

NECHO, a king of Egypt who endeavoured to open a communication, by means of a canal, between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. The attempt was abandoned, after the loss of 12,000 men, by order of an oracle, which warned the monarch, "that he was working for the barbarian." (τῷ βαρβάρῳ κόπον παρεχόμενος.) Necho is also famous in the annals of geographical discovery, for a voyage which, according to Herodotus, he caused to be performed around Africa, for the solution of the grand mystery which involved the form and termination of that continent. He was obliged to employ, not native, but Phœnician navigators, of whose proceedings Herodotus received an account from the Egyptian priests. They were ordered to sail down the Red Sea, pass through the Columns of Hercules, and so up the Mediterranean to Egypt; in other words, to circumnavigate Africa. The Phœnicians, passing down the Red Sea, entered the southern ocean: on the approach of autumn, they landed on the coast, and planted corn; when this was ripe they cut it down and again departed. Having thus consumed two years, they, in the third, doubled the Columns of Hercules, and returned to Egypt. They added, that in passing the most southern coast of Africa, they were surprised by observing the sun on their right hand, a statement which Herodotus himself rejects as impossible. We are not surprised that in an age when astronomical science was so imperfect, the historian should express his disbelief of the statement of these navigators respecting the different position of the sun; but this is, in fact, a most decisive evidence of the truth of their narrative, since this must have been their actual observation after having passed the equinoctial line.

NECROPOLIS, (from νεκρός, "dead," and πόλις, 'city,') the city of the dead; a name beautifully applied to the cemeteries in the neighbourhood of many of the ancient cities, such as Thebes in Egypt, Cyrene, Alexandria &c.

NECTANEBUS, and NECTANABIS, a king of Egypt, who defended his country against the Persians, and was succeeded by Tachos, B C. 363. His grandson, of the same name, made an alliance with Agesilaus king of Sparta, and with his assistance he quelled a rebellion of his subjects. Some time after he was joined by the Sidonians, Phœnicians, and inhabitants of Cyprus, who had revolted from the king of Persia. This powerful confederacy was soon attacked by Darius, the king of Persia, who marched at the head of his troops. Nectanebus, to defend his frontiers against so dangerous an enemy, levied 20,000 mercenary soldiers in Greece, the same number in Libya, and 60,000 were furnished in Egypt. This numerous body was not equal to the Persian forces; and Nectanebus, defeated in a battle, gave up all hopes of resistance, and fled into Æthiopia, B C. 350, where he found a safe asylum. His kingdom of Egypt became from that time tributary to the kings of Persia. Plut. Ages. — C. Nep. in Ages. — Diod 15, 42.

NECYSIA, a solemnity observed by the Greeks in memory of the dead.

NELEUS, a son of Neptune and Tyro. He was brother to Pelias, with whom he was exposed by his mother, who wished to conceal her infirmities from her father. They were preserved and brought to Tyro, who had then married Cretheus, king of Iolchos. After the death of Cretheus, Pelias and Neleus seized the kingdom of Iolchos, which belonged to Æson, the lawful son of Tyro by the deceased monarch. After they had reigned for some time conjointly, Pelias expelled Neleus from Iolchos. Neleus came to Aphareus, king of Messenia, who treated him with kindness, and permitted him to build a city, which he called Pylos. Neleus married Chloris the daughter of Amphion, by whom he had a daughter and twelve sons, who were all, except Nestor, killed by Hercules, together with their father. Neleus promised his daughter in marriage only to him who brought him the bulls of Iphiclus. Bias was the successful lover. [Id. Melampus.] Ovid. Met. 6, 418. — Apollod. 1, 9, 2, 6. — A scholar of Theophrastus, to whom that philosopher bequeathed, at his death, the writings of Aristotle. Id. Scepsis.

NEMAUSUS, an important city of Gallia Narbonensis, next in rank to Narbo. It was situate on the main route from Spain to Italy, and was the capital of the Arecomici. It is now Nismes, and is famed for its remains of antiquity. Mela, 2, 5. — Plin. 3, 4.

NEMEA, a city of Argolis, to the northwest of Mycenæ, celebrated as the haunt of the lion killed by Hercules, and the spot where triennial games were solemnized in honour of Archemorus, or Opheltes, son of Lycurgus, king of Nemea. The games were solemnized in the grove of Molorchus, who was said to have entertained Hercules, when he came to Nemea in pursuit of the lion. We know from Polybius and Livy, that the Nemean games continued to flourish in the reign of Philip, son of Demetrius; but we may infer, that in the time of Pausanias they had fallen into great neglect, from the slight mention he has made of their solemnization. The ruins of Nemea are to be seen near the modern village of Kutchumadi. It was the first labour of Hercules to destroy the Nemean lion; and the hero, when he found that his arrows and his club were useless against an animal whose skin was hard and impenetrable, seized him in his arms, and squeezed him to death. The conqueror clothed himself in the skin, and games were instituted to commemorate so great an event. The Nemean games were originally instituted by the Argives in honour of Archemorus, who died by the bite of a serpent, [Vid. Archemorus.] and Hercules some time after renewed them. They were one of the four great and solemn games, which were observed in Greece. The presidents were elected out of Corinth, Argos, and Cleonæ, and were dressed in black clothes, the habits of mourners, because these games were properly a funereal solemnity. At them were exhibited foot and horse-races, chariot races, boxing, wrestling, and contests of every kind, both gymnical and equestrian. The victors were crowned with parsley, which was an herb used at funerals, and fabled to have sprung from the blood of Archemorus; but, at first, they were rewarded with a crown of olive. These games were celebrated every third year, on the twelfth of the Corinthian month Πάνεμος, which coincided with the Athenian Boedromion. Apollod. 3, 6. — Hygin. fab. 74, et 273. — *Pind. NEMESIANUS, M. AURELIUS OLYMPIUS, a Latin poet, was a native of Carthage, and flourished under the emperors Carus, Carinus, and Numerianus. The last of these princes had a particular esteem for him. Under this prince he rose to high favour and fortune, and probably interested himself in behalf of his contemporary poet Calpburnius, who was reduced to indigence. Nemesianus wrote three poems, entitled Halieutica, Cynegetica, and Nautica. Of these the second only has come down to modern times, and that in an imperfect state. It cannot rank high as a poetical composition, but deserves praise for its polish and elegance. The best edition of the Cynegetica is that given by Wernsdorff in the first vol of his Poetæ Latini Minores

NEMESIS, one of the infernal deities, daughter of Nox. She was the goddess of vengeance, always prepared to punish impiety, and at the same time liberally to reward the good and virtuous. The original meaning of the term Νέμεσις in Greek is, the just indignation one feels at observing the prosperity of the undeserving. The goddess Nemesis was called Ἀδράστεια, i. e. she from whom no bad man can escape. She is made one of the Parcæ by some mythologists, and is represented with a helm and a wheel. The people of Smyrna were the first who made her statues with wings, to show with what celerity she is prepared to punish the crimes of the wicked, both by sea and land, as the helm and the wheel in her hands intimate. Her power did not only exist in this life, but she was also employed after death to find out the most effectual and rigorous means of correction. Nemesis was particularly worshipped at Rhamnus in Attica, where she had a celebrated statue ten cubits long, made of Parian marble by Phidias, or, according to others, by one of his pupils The Romans were also particularly attentive to the adoration of a deity whom they solemnly invoked, and to whom they offered sacrifices before they declared war against their enemies, to show the world that their wars were undertaken upon the most just grounds. Her statue at Rome was in the Capitol. Some suppose that Nemesis was the person whom Jupiter deceived in the form of a swan, and that Leda was intrusted with the care of the children which sprang from the two eggs. Others observe that Leda obtained the name of Nemesis after death. According to Pausanias, there were more than one Nemesis The goddess Nemesis was surnamed Rhamnusia, because worshipped at Rhamnus The Greeks celebrated a festival called Nemesea, in memory of deceased persons, as the goddess Nemesis was supposed to defend the relics and the memory of the dead from all insult. *Hygin. NEOPTOLEMUS, a king of Epirus, son of Achilles and Deidamia, called Pyrrhus, from the colour of his hair. (Πύρρος "flame coloured." "red.") He was carefully educated under the eye of his mother, and gave early proofs of his valour. After the death of Achilles, Calchas declared in the assembly of the Greeks, that Troy could not be taken without the assistance of the son of the deceased hero. Immediately upon this, Ulysses and Phœnix were commissioned to bring Pyrrhus to the war. He returned with them with pleasure, and received the name of Neoptolemus, because he had come late to the war, (νεος, νεόλαιος.) On his arrival before Troy, he paid a visit to the tomb of his father, and wept over his ashes He afterwards, according to some authors, accompanied Ulysses to Lemnos, to engage Philoctetes to come to the Trojan war. He greatly signalized himself during the remaining time of the siege, and he was the first who entered the wooden horse He was inferior to none of the Grecian warriors in valour, and Ulysses and Nestor alone could claim a superiority over him in eloquence, wisdom, and address. His cruelty, however, was as great as that of his father. Not satisfied with breaking down the gates of Priam's palace, he exercised the greatest barbarity upon the remains of his family, and without any regard to the sanctity of the place where Priam had taken refuge, he slaughtered him without mercy; or, according to others, dragged him by the hair to the tomb of his father, where he sacrificed him, and where he cut off his head, and carried it in exultation, through the streets of Troy, fixed on the point of a spear. He also sacrificed Astyanax to his fury, and immolated Polyxena on the tomb of Achilles, according to those who deny that that sacrifice was voluntary. When Troy was taken, the captives were divided among the conquerors, and Pyrrhus had for his share Andromache, the widow of Hector, and Helenus the son of Priam With these he departed for Greece, and he probably escaped from destruction by giving credit to the words of Helenus, who foretold him that, if he sailed with the rest of the Greeks, his voyage would be attended with fatal consequences, and perhaps with death. This obliged him to take a different course from the rest of the Greeks and he travelled over the greatest part of Thrace, where he had a severe encounter with queen Harpalyce. (Ibid. Harpalyce.) The place of his retirement after the Trojan war is not known. Some maintain that he went to Thessaly, where his grandfather still reigned; but this is confuted by others, who observe, perhaps with more reason, that he went to Epirus, where he laid the foundation of a new kingdom, because his grandfather Peleus had been deprived of his sceptre by Acastus the son of Pelias Neoptolemus lived with Andromache after his arrival in Greece, but it is unknown whether he treated her as a lawful wife or a concubine He had a son by this unfortunate princess called Molossus, and two others, if we may rely on the authority of Pausanias. Besides Andromache, he married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, as also Lanassa, the daughter of Cleodæus, one of the descendants of Hercules. The cause of his death is variously related. Menelaus, before the Trojan war, had promised his daughter Hermione to Orestes, but the services he experienced from the valour and the courage of Neoptolemus during the siege of Troy, induced him to reward his merit by making him his son-in-law. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but Hermione became jealous of Andromache, and because she had no children, she resolved to destroy her Trojan rival who seemed to steal away the affections of their common husband. In the absence of Neoptolemus at Delphi, Hermione attempted to murder Andromache, but she was prevented by the interference of Peleus, or according to others, of the populace. When she saw her schemes defeated, she determined to lay violent hands upon herself, to avoid the resentment of Neoptolemus. The sudden arrival of Orestes changed her resolution, and she consented to elope with her lover to Sparta. Orestes at the same time, in revenge and to punish his rival, caused him to be assassinated in the temple of Delphi, and he was murdered at the foot of the altar by Machareus, the priest, or by the hand of Orestes himself, according to Virgil, Paterculus, and Hyginus. Some say that he was murdered by the Delphians, who had been bribed by the presents of Orestes. It is unknown why Neoptolemus went to Delphi. Some suppose that he wished to consult the oracle to know how he might have children by the barren Hermione; others say, that he went thither to offer the spoils which he had obtained during the Trojan war, to appease the resentment of Apollo whom he had provoked by calling him the cause of the death of Achilles. The plunder of the rich temple of Delphi, if we believe others, was the object of the journey of Neoptolemus, and it cannot but be observed that he suffered the same death and the same barbarities which he had inflicted in the temple of Minerva upon the aged Priam and his wretched family. From this circumstance the ancients have made use of the proverb Neoptolemic revenge, when a person had suffered the same savage treatment which others had received from his hand. The Delphians celebrated a festival with great pomp and solemnity in memory of Neoptolemus, who had been slain in his attempt to plunder their temple, because, as they said, Apollo, the patron of the place, had been in some manner accessary to the death of Achilles. *Virg. NEPHELE, the first wife of Athamas king of Thebes and mother of Phryxus and Helle. She was repudiated on pretence of being subject to fits of insanity, and Athamas married Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had several children. Ino became jealous of Nephele, because her children would succeed to their father's throne before hers, by right of seniority, and she resolved to destroy them. Nephele was apprized of her wicked intentions, and she removed her children from the reach of Ino by giving them a celebrated ram, sprung from the union of Neptune and Theophane, on whose back they escaped to Colchis. (Id. Phryxus.) Nephele was afterwards changed into a cloud, whence her name is given by the Greeks to the clouds. Some call her Nebula, which word is the Latin translation of Nephele, "a cloud." The fleece of the ram, which saved the life of Nephele's children, is often called the Nephelean fleece. Apollod. 1, 9.—Hygin. 2, &c.—Ovid Met. 11, 195.—Plaut. 14, 56.—A mountain of Thessaly, once the residence of the Centaurs.

NEPIA, a daughter of Iasus, who married Olympus king of Mysia, whence the plains of Mysia are sometimes called Nepiæ Campi.

NEPOS, CORNELIUS, a Roman historian and biographer, flourished in the time of Julius Cæsar and Augustus, and was the friend of Cicero and Atticus. He was born on the banks of the Po, probably at Hostilia in the district of Verona. Nothing more is known of his life. This writer composed several works, one of which is commemorated in some verses addressed to him by Catullus, as comprising an universal history in three books or tables. The only performance of his which has reached modern times is a collection of biographical sketches, entitled Vitæ Excellentium Imperatorum, and consisting of twenty-two articles of Greek and other foreign generals, with a fragment of the life of Cato of Utica, and a more detailed life of Atticus. These pieces long passed under the name of Æmilius Probus, who presented them to the emperor Theodosius in the fourth century; but the purity of the style, which is that of the best age of the Latin language, assigns them to the real author. They are elegant compositions, but too concise for purposes of accuracy, and not marked by any depth of reflection or force of moral painting. The best editions of Cornelius Nepos are, that of Fischer, Lips. 1768, 8vo; that of Schmieder, Berol. 1801, 8vo; that of Tzschucke, Gotting. 1804; and that of Breme, Turiel, 1812, 8vo.

NEPOTIANUS, Flavius Popilius, a son of Eutropia, the sister of the emperor Constantine. He proclaimed himself emperor after the death of his cousin Constans, and rendered himself odious by his cruelty and oppression. He was murdered by Anicetus after one month's reign, and his family were involved in his ruin.

NEPTHYS, wife of Typhon, became enamoured of Osiris, her brother-in-law, and introduced herself to his bed. She had a son called Anubis by him. (Plut. de Isid.)

NEPTUNIUM, a promontory of Bithynia, on the Propontis, at the mouth of the Cianus Sinus. It is more usually known by its Greek name Posidium.

NEPTUNIUS (Dux), an expression applied by Horace to Sextus Pompeius, who boastingly styled himself the son of Neptune, because his father had once held the command of the sea. (Horat. Epod. 9, 7. Dio Cass. 48, 19.

NEPTUNUS, a god, son of Saturn and Ops, and brother to Jupiter, Pluto, and Juno. He was devoured by his father the day of his birth, and was again restored to life by means of Metis, who gave Saturn a certain potion. Pausanias says that his mother concealed him in a sheepfold in Arcadia, and that she imposed upon her husband, telling him that she had brought a colt into the world, which was instantly devoured by Saturn. Neptune shared with his brothers the empire of Saturn, and received as his portion the kingdom of the sea. This, however, did not seem equivalent to the empire of heaven and earth, which Jupiter had claimed, therefore he conspired to dethrone him, with the rest of the gods. The conspiracy was discovered, and Jupiter condemned Neptune to build the walls of Troy. (Vid. Laomedon.) A reconciliation was soon after made, and Neptune was re-instated in all his rights and privileges. Neptune disputed with Minerva the right of giving a name to the capital of Attica, but he was defeated, and the olive which the goddess suddenly raised from the earth was deemed more serviceable for the good of mankind than the horse which Neptune had produced by striking the ground with his trident, as that animal is the emblem of war and slaughter. This decision did not please Neptune, he renewed the combat by disputing for Troezene, but Jupiter settled their disputes by permitting them to be conjointly worshipped there, and by giving the name of Polias, or protectress of the city, to Minerva, and that of King of Troezene to the god of the sea. He also disputed his right for the isthmus of Corinth with Apollo; and Briareus the Cyclops, who was mutually chosen umpire, gave the isthmus to Neptune, and the promontory to Apollo. Neptune, as being the god of the sea, was entitled to more power than any of the other gods, except Jupiter. Not only the ocean, rivers, and fountains, were subjected to him, but he could also cause earthquakes at his pleasure, and raise islands from the bottom of the sea with a blow of his trident. The worship of Neptune was established in almost every part of the earth, and the Libyans in particular venerated him above all other nations, and looked upon him as the first and greatest of the gods. The Greeks and the Romans were also attached to his worship, and they celebrated their Isthmian games and Consualia with the greatest solemnity. He was generally represented sitting in a chariot made of a shell, and drawn by sea horses or dolphins. Sometimes he is drawn by winged horses, and holds his trident in his hand, and stands up as his chariot flies over the surface of the sea. Homer represents him as rising from the sea, and in three steps crossing the whole horizon. The mountains and the forests, says the poet, trembled as he walked, the whales, and all the fishes of the sea, appeared round him, and even the sea herself seemed to feel the presence of her god. The ancients generally sacrificed a bull and a horse on his altars, and the Roman soothsayers always offered to him the gall of the victims, which in taste resembles the bitterness of the sea water. The amours of Neptune are numerous. He obtained, by means of a dolphin, the favours of Amphitrite, who had made a vow of perpetual celibacy, and he placed among the constellations the fish which had persuaded the goddess to become his wife. He also married Venilia and Salacia, which are only the names of Amphitrite, according to some authors, who observed that the former word is derived from venire, alluding to the continual motion of the sea. Salacia is derived from salum, which signifies the sea, and is applicable to Amphitrite. Neptune became a horse to enjoy the company of Ceres. (Vid Arion.) To deceive Theophane, he changed himself into a ram. (Vid Theophane.) He assumed the form of the river Enipeus, to gain the confidence of Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus, by whom he had Pelias and Neleus. He was also father of Phorcus, and Polyphemus by Thoosa; of Lycus, Nycteus, and Euphemus, by Celeno; of Chryses by Chrysogenia; of Ancæus by Astypalea; of Bœotus and Helen by Antiope; of Leuconoe by Themisto; of Agenor and Bellerophon by Eurynome, the daughter of Nysus; of Antæus by Alcyone, the daughter of Atlas; of Abas by Arethusa, of Actor and Dictys by Asemede, the daughter of Augias; of Megareus by Œnope daughter of Epopeus, of Cycnus by Harpalyce; of Taras, Otus, Ephialtes, Dorus, Alesus, &c. The word Neptunus is often used metaphorically by the poets, to signify seawater. In the Consualia of the Romans, horses were led through the streets finely equipped and crowned with garlands, as the god in whose honour the festivals were instituted, had produced the horse, an animal so beneficial for the use of mankind. Paus. 1, 2, &c. — Homer Il. 7, &c. — *Varro de L. NEREIDES, nymphs of the sea, daughters of Nereus and Doris. They were fifty according to the greater number of the mythologists, whose names are as follows: Sao, Amphitrite, Proto, Galatea, Thoe, Eucrate, Eudora, Galena, Glauce, Thetis, Spio, Cymothoe, Melita, Thalia, Agave, Eulimene, Erato, Pasithea, Doto, Eunice, Ny-sea, Dynamene, Pherusa, Protomedia, Actea, Panope, Doris, Cymatolege, Hippothoe, Cymo, Ione, Hipponoe, Cymodoce. Nero, Eupompe, Pronoe, Themisto, Glauconome, Halimede, Pontoporia, Evagora, Liagora, Polynome, Laomedia, Lysianassa, Autonoe, Menippe, Evarne, Psamathe, Nemertes. In those which Homer mentions, to the number of thirty, we find the following names different from those spoken of by Hesiod; Halia, Lummoria, Iera, Amphitroe, Dexamene, Amphinome, Callianira, Apseudes, Callianassa, Clymene, Janira, Nassa, Mera, Orithya, Amathea. Apollodorus who mentions forty five, mentions the following names different from the others; Glauconthoe, Protomedusa, Pione, Plexaura, Calypso, Crante, Neomeris, Dejanira, Polynoe, Melia, Drone, Isea, Dero, Eumolpe, Ione, Ceto. Hyginus and others differ from the preceding authors in the following names: Drymo, Xantho, Ligea, Phyllodoce, Cydippe, Lycorias, Cleio, Beroe, Ephira, Opis, Asia, Deopea, Arethusa, Crenia, Eurydice, and Leucothoe The Nereides were implored as the rest of the deities, they had altars chiefly on the coasts of the sea, where the piety of mankind made offerings of milk, oil, and honey, and often of the flesh of goats. When they were on the sea-shore they generally resided in grottos and caves which were adorned with shells, and shaded by the branches of vines. Their duty was to attend upon the more powerful deities of the sea, and to be subservient to the will of Neptune. They were particularly fond of aloyons, and as they had the power of ruffling or calming the waters, they were always addressed by sailors, who implored their protection, that they might grant them a favourable voyage and a prosperous return. They are represented as young and handsome virgins, sitting on dolphins and holding Neptune's trident in their hands, or sometimes garlands of flowers Orpheus Hymn. 23.—Catul. de Rupt Pel.—*Ovid. NEREUS, a name given to Achilles as son of Thetis, who was one of the Nereides. Hor ep 17 8.

NEREUS, a deity of the sea, son of Oceanus and Terra. He married Doris, by whom he had fifty daughters, called the Nereides. (Vid Nereides.) Nereus was generally represented as an old man with a long flowing beard, and hair of an azure colour. The chief place of his residence was in the Ægean sea, where he was surrounded by his daughters, who often danced in choruses round him. He had the gift of prophecy, and informed those who consulted him with the different fates that attended them. He acquainted Paris with the consequences of his elopement with Helen; and it was by his directions that Hercules obtained the golden apples of the Hesperides, but the sea god often evaded the importunities of inquirers by assuming different shapes and totally escaping from their grasp. The word Nereus is often taken for the sea itself. Nereus is sometimes called the most ancient of all the gods. *Hesiod. NERIPHUS, a desert island near the Thracian Chersonesus. Plin. 4, 12.

NERITUM, a town of Calabria, about five miles to the north of Callipolis. It is now Nardo. Plin. 3, 11.

NERITUS, the highest and most remarkable mountain in the island of Ithaca. According to Dodwell, the modern name is Aroi, which means "lofty;" he observes also, that the forests spoken of by Homer have disappeared, it is at present bare and barren, producing nothing but stunted evergreens and aromatic plants. Homer. Od. 1, 22. Il. 2, 632.—Virg. Æn 3, 271.

NERIUM, a promontory of Spain, the same with Artabrum; now Cape Finisterre.

NERIUS, a banker, in the time of Horace, very skilful in tying down his debtors by written obligations for repayment. Sat. 2, 3, 69.—A usurer in Nero's age, who was so eager to get money, that he married as often as he could, and as soon destroyed his wives by poison, to possess himself of their estates Pers 2, 14.

NERO, Claudius Domitius Cæsar, a celebrated Roman emperor, son of Caius Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus. He was adopted by the emperor Claudius, A. D. 50, and four years after he succeeded to him on the throne. The beginning of his reign was marked by acts of the greatest kindness and condescension, by affability, complaisance, and popularity. The object of his administration seemed to be the good of his people; and when he was desired to sign his name to a list of malefactors that were to be executed, he exclaimed, I wish to heaven I could not write. He was an enemy to flattery, and when the senate had liberally commended the wisdom of his government, Nero desired them to withhold their praises till he deserved them. These promising virtues were soon discovered to be artificial, and Nero displayed the propensities of his nature. He delivered himself from the sway of his mother, and at last ordered her to be assassinated. This unnatural act of barbarity might astonish some of the Romans, but Nero had his devoted adherents; and when he declared that he had taken away his mother's life to save himself from ruin, the senate applauded his measures, and the people signified their approbation. Many of his courtiers shared the unhappy fate of Agrippina, and Nero sacrificed to his fury or caprice all such as obstructed his pleasure, or diverted his inclination. In the night he generally sallied out from his palace, to visit the meanest taverns and all the scenes of debauchery which Rome contained. In this nocturnal riot he was fond of insulting the people in the streets, and his attempts to offer violence to the wife of a Roman senator nearly cost him his life. He also turned actor, and publicly appeared on the Roman stage in the meanest characters. He also attempted to excel in music, and to conquer the disadvantages of a hoarse rough voice, he moderated his meals, and often passed the day without eating The celebrity of the Olympian games attracted his notice He passed into Greece, and presented himself as a candidate for the public honours. He was defeated in wrestling, but the flattery of the spectators adjudged him the victory, and Nero returned to Rome with all the pomp and splendour of an eastern conqueror, drawn in the chariot of Augustus, and attended by a band of musicians, actors, and stage dancers, from every part of the empire. These private and public amusements of the emperor were indeed innocent, his character was injured but personal liberty remained inviolate But his conduct soon became more abominable; he disguised himself in the habit of a woman, and was publicly married to one of his eunuchs. This violence to nature and decency was soon exchanged for another; Nero resumed his sex, and celebrated his nuptials with one of his meanest catamites, and it was on this occasion that one of the Romans observed that the world would have been happy if Nero's father had had such a wife. But now his cruelty was displayed in a more superlative degree, and he sacrificed to his wantonness his wife Octavia Poppæa, and the celebrated writers, Seneca, Lucan, Petronius, &c. The Christians also did not escape his barbarity. He had heard of the burning of Troy, and as he wished to renew that dismal scene, he caused Rome to be set on fire in different places The conflagration became soon universal, and during nine successive days the fire was unextinguished. All was desolation, nothing was heard but the lamentations of mothers whose children had perished in the flames, the groans of the dying, and the continual fall of palaces and buildings. Nero was the only one who enjoyed the general consternation He placed himself on the top of a high tower, and sang on his lyre the destruction of Troy, a dreadful scene which his barbarity had realised before his eyes. He attempted to avert the public odium from his head, by a feigned commiseration of the calamities of the citizens. He began to repair the streets and the public buildings at his own expense. He built himself a celebrated palace, which he called his golden house. It was profusely adorned with gold, with precious stones, and with whatever was rare and uncommon. It contained spacious fields, artificial lakes, woods gardens, orchards, and whatever could exhibit beauty and grandeur. The entrance of this edifice could admit a large colossus of the emperor 120 feet high, the galleries were each a mile long, and the whole was covered with gold. The roofs of the dining halls represented the firmament, in motion as well as in figure, and continually turned round night and day, showering down all sorts of perfumes and sweet waters. When this grand edifice, which, according to Pliny, extended all round the city was finished, Nero said, that now he could lodge like a man. His profusion was not less remarkable in all his other actions. When he went a fishing, his nets were made with gold and silk. He never appeared twice in the same garment, and when he undertook a voyage, there were thousands of servants to take care of his wardrobe. This continuation of debauchery and extravagance, at last roused the resentment of the people. Many conspiracies were formed against the emperor, but they were generally discovered, and such as were accessary suffered the greatest punishments. The most dangerous conspiracy against Nero's life, was that of Piso, from which he was delivered by the confession of a slave. The conspiracy of Galba proved more successful; and the conspirator when he was informed that his plot was known to Nero, declared himself emperor. The unpopularity of Nero favoured his cause, he was acknowledged by all the Roman empire, and the senate condemned the tyrant that sat on the throne to be dragged naked through the streets of Rome, and whipped to death, and afterwards to be thrown down from the Tarpeian rock like the meanest malefactor. This, however, was not done, and Nero, by a voluntary death, prevented the execution of the sentence. He killed himself, A. D 68, in the thirty-second year of his age, after a reign of thirteen years and eight months Rome was filled with acclamations at the intelligence, and the citizens, more strongly to indicate their joy, wore caps, such as were generally used by slaves who had received their freedom. Their vengeance was not only exercised against the statues of the deceased tyrant, but his friends were the objects of the public resentment, and many were crushed to pieces in such a violent manner, that one of the senators, amid the universal joy, said that he was afraid they should soon have cause to wish for Nero. The tyrant, as he expired, begged that his head might not be cut off from his body, and exposed to the insolence of an enraged populace, but that the whole might be burned on the funeral pile. His request was granted by one of Galba's freedmen, and his obsequies were performed with the usual ceremonies. Though his death seemed to be the source of universal gladness, yet many of his favourites lamented his fall, and were grieved to see that their pleasures and amusements were stopped by the death of the patron of debauchery and extravagance. Even the king of Parthia sent ambassadors to Rome to condole with the Romans, and to beg that they would honour and revere the memory of Nero. His statues were also crowned with garlands of flowers, and many believed that he was not dead, but that he would soon make his appearance, and take a due vengeance upon his enemies. It will be sufficient to observe, in finishing the character of this tyrannical emperor, that the name of Nero is even now used emphatically to express a barbarous and unfeeling oppressor. Pliny calls him the common enemy and the fury of mankind, and in the he has been followed by all writers who exhibit Nero as a pattern of the most execrable barbarity, and unpardonable wantonness Plut. in Galb. Suet in Vita · Plin 7, 8,.&c - Dio. 64 Aurel. Victor —Tacit Ann.——Claudius, a Roman general, who, after distinguishing himself in the taking of Capua, was sent into Spain to succeed the two Scipios He suffered himself to be imposed upon by Asdrubal, and was soon after succeeded by young Scipio He was afterwards made consul, and intercepted Asdrubal, who was passing from Spain into Italy with a large reinforcement for his brother Annibal. An engagement was fought near the river Metaurus, in Umbria, in which 56,000 of the Carthaginians were left on the field of battle, and great numbers taken prisoners, 207 B. C. Asdrubal, the Carthaginian general, was also killed, and his head cut off and thrown into his brother's camp by the conquerors. Liv. 27. &c.—Horat Od 4, 4 37.—Flor. 2, 6.—Val Max. 4, 1.——A son of Germanicus, who was ruined by Sejanus, and banished from Rome by Tiberius, to the island of Pontia, where he was starved to death.—— The Neros were of the Claudian family, which, during the republican times of Rome, was honoured with 28 consulships, 5 dictatorships, 6 triumphs, 7 censorships, and 2 ovations. They assumed the surname of Nero, which, in the language of the Sabines, signifies "warlike," "brave"

NERVA, Cocceius, a Roman emperor, descended from a Cretan family, that had become Roman in the time of Augustus, was born A. D 26, and being son, grandson, and great-grandson of consuls entered with great success the career of civil dignities. He was prætor when Nero conferred upon him triumphal honours. He was consul for the first time in the year 71 with Vespasian, and afterwards with Domitian, in the year 90. The conspirators, who had formed their plans for freeing the empire from the tyranny of Domitian, applied to Nerva, who was at that time at Rome, to undertake the duties and office of emperor: to this he consented, and was accordingly raised to the imperial purple in the year 96. The prætorian bands had been secured in his favour, and the senate was happy to confirm the elevation of one of their own body, whom they highly respected. He soon rendered himself extremely popular by the mildness of his manners, and by the activity which he exhibited in the management of public affairs. The first cares of his government were to repair the evils of the late tyranny; he abolished the odious law of treason, and recalled the exiles, among whom were some of the most virtuous persons of the age. He restored to the enjoyment of their property those who had been the objects of unjust confiscations, and punished with death the informers and slaves whose informations had caused the ruin of their masters. He suffered no statues to be raised to his own honour, and he applied to the use of the government all the gold and silver statues which had been erected to his predecessor. In himself he was the example as well as the patron of morals and strict virtue. He forbade the mutilation of male children. He made a solemn declaration that no senator should be put to death during his reign, which he observed with such sanctity, that, when two members of the senate had conspired against his own life, he was satisfied to tell them he was well acquainted with their evil intentions. He also conducted these very men to the public spectacles, and seated himself between them, and when a sword was offered to him according to the usual customs, he desired the conspirators to try it upon his body. Such confidence in the uprightness of his own intentions, and justice of his government, and such reliance upon the consequences of his lenity and indulgence, conciliated the affection of all his subjects. It was the spirit of his administration, so to govern that he might render a good account of his actions, and return without apprehension to a private station. In some instances it must be admitted that his lenity, or perhaps timidity, forced him into disgraceful compliances. One of these was the restoration of licentious pantomimes, which Domitian had abolished, but which the people demanded with tumultuous shouts: another was the giving up the authors of the death of Domitian, who were, in fact, the instruments of his own elevation. It was in vain that he presented his own bare neck to the enraged soldiers, and entreated them rather to satiate their vengeance on himself; he was obliged to consent to the sacrifices, and even to seem to approve it. The mortifying incident, however, was the cause of a great public benefit, for it produced the adoption of Trajan. Made sensible of the necessity of a firm support to the throne, he passed by his own kindred, and selected for his son, and successor, the man, in all the empire, best fitted for the high office. Had this choice been the only act of his reign, it would have entitled him to the remembrance of his subjects. He died in the year 98, after a reign of sixteen months, and at the age of 72. Nerva has been charged with an intemperate love and use of wine, and, perhaps, to have enjoyed the favour of Nero and Domitian may lead to a suspicion of the regularity of his morals, but his public virtues have deservedly placed him in the series of those good princes who have been respected and honoured by posterity. Tacitus speaks of Nerva as being the first person who allied two things before thought to be incompatible, viz monarchy and liberty.——A celebrated lawyer, consul with the emperor Vespasian. He was father to the emperor of that name.

NERVII, a warlike people of Belgic Gaul, whose country lay on both sides of the Scaldis, or Scheldt, near the sources of that river; afterwards Hainault, and Nord. Their original capital was Bagacum, now Bavay; but afterwards Camaracum or Cambray, and Turnacum, or Tournay, became its chief cities towards the end of the fourth century. Cæs B G 5, 39.—Plin 4, 17.

NESÆA, one of the Nereides. Virg. G. 4, 338.

NESSUS, a celebrated Centaur, son of Ixion and the Cloud. He offered violence to Dejanira, whom Hercules had intrusted to his care, with orders to carry her across the river Evenus. [Vid. Dejanira.] Hercules saw the distress of his wife from the opposite shore of the river, and immediately he let fly one of his poisoned arrows, which struck the Centaur to the heart. Nessus, as he expired, gave the tunic he then wore to Dejanira, assuring her that, from the poisoned blood which had flowed from his wounds, it had received the power of calling a husband away from unlawful loves. Dejanira received it with pleasure, and this mournful present caused the death of Hercules. [Vid Hercules.] Apollod. 2, 7.—Ovid Ep. 9.—*Senec, in Herc Fur. NESTOCLES, a famous statuary of Greece, rival to Phidias. Plin 34, 8.

NESTOR, a son of Neleus and Chloris, nephew to Pelias, and grandson to Neptune. He had eleven brothers, who were all killed, with his father, by Hercules. His tender age detained him at home, and was the cause of his preservation. The conqueror spared his life, and placed him on the throne of Pylos. He married Eurydice, the daughter of Clymenus, or, according to others, Anaxibia, the daughter of Atreus. He early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and was present at the nuptials of Pirithous, when a bloody battle was fought between the Lapithæ and Centaurs. As king of Pylos and Messenia he led his subjects to the Trojan war, where he distinguished himself among the rest of the Grecian chiefs by eloquence, address, wisdom, justice, and an uncommon prudence of mind. Homer displays his character as the most perfect of all his heroes; and Agamemnon exclaims, that, if he had ten generals like Nestor, he should soon see the walls of Troy reduced to ashes. After the Trojan war, Nestor retired to Greece, where he enjoyed, in the bosom of his family, the peace and tranquillity which were due to his wisdom and to his old age. The manner and the time of his death are unknown; the ancients are all agreed that he lived three generations of men, which length of time some suppose to be 300 years, though more probably only 90, allowing 30 years for each generation From that circumstance, therefore, it was usual among the Greeks and the Latins, when they wished a long and happy life to their friends, to wish them to see the years of Nestor. He had two daughters, Pisidice and Polycaste, and seven sons, Perseus, Strattcus, Aretus, Echephron, Pisistratus, Antilochus, and Trasimedes Nestor was one of the Argonauts, according to Valerius Flaccus, 1, 360, &c. — Dictys Cret. 1, 13, &c Homer Il 1 &c. Od. 3 et 11 — Hygin. fab 10 et 273 — Paus 2, 26, 4, 3 et 31.— Apollod 1. 9 2, 7.— *Ovid. NESTORIUS, the founder of a sect, was born in Syria in the fifth century. On entering into the priesthood he became so popular for his eloquence that Theodosius nominated him, in 429, to the archiepiscopric of Constantinople; in which station he displayed great zeal against the Arians and Novatians. He also opposed those Christians who differed from the catholic practice in the celebration of Easter At last he fell under censure himself for affirming that the Virgin Mary is not the mother of God. For this he was condemned in the council of Ephesus, deprived of his see, and banished. He died in 440, but his followers continue to be numerous in the east, and are organized under a patriarch.

NESTUS, a river of Thrace, rising in mount Scomius, and falling into the Ægean sea opposite the island of Thasos. It formed the boundary between Thrace and Macedonia, in the time of Philip and Alexander, and this arrangement subsequently remained unchanged by the Romans on the conquest of the latter empire. It is still called the Mesto. Strab. Epit. 7 Liv. 45, 29.— Thucyd. 2, 96 — Herod 7, 109 et 126.

NEURI, a Scythian race, who appear to have been originally established towards the head waters of the rivers Tyras and Hypanis (Dniester and Bong) They appear also to have touched on the Bastarnian Alps, which would separate them from the Agathyrsi. Herod, 4, 105.—Mela, 2, 1 —Plin. 4, 12.

NICÆA, a city of India, founded by Alexander in commemoration of his victory over Porus. It was situate on the left bank of the Hydaspes, on the road from the modern Attock to Lahore, and just below the southern point of the island of Jumad. Arrian 5.—Justin. 12, 8.—Curt. 9, 4.

——A town of Bithynia, situate on the eastern shore of the lake Ascanius, in a wide and fertile plain, though somewhat unhealthy in summer. Stephanus Byzantinus states that it was first colonized by the Bottiæi, and was called Anchore. Strabo mentions neither of these circumstances, but states that it was founded by Antigonus, son of Philip, who called it Antigonia; it subsequently received that of Nicæa from Lysimachus, in honour of his wife, daughter of Antipater. The circumference of the town, which was built in the form of a square, measured sixteen stadia, and the streets were drawn at right angles to each other, so that from a monument which stood near the gymnasium it was possible to see the four gates Pliny the Younger, in his Letters, makes frequent mention of Nicæa and its public buildings, which he had undertaken to restore, being at that time governor of Bithynia It was the birth place of Hipparchus the astronomer, and Dio Cassius Under the Byzantine emperors it was often taken and retaken during their wars with the Turks. The modern Isnik occupies the site of the ancient Nicæa. Nicæa is celebrated in ecclesiastical history for the council held there against the Arian heresy, A D. 325, whence the creed drawn up by the prelates assembled on that occasion is called Nicene. Strab. 12 — Plin. 10, 40, 48, &c —— A city of Liguria, on the coast, one geographical mile to the east of the mouth of the Varus. It was founded by the Massilienses, in memory of a victory which they obtained in its neighbourhood over the Ligurians. «Its modern name is Nizza (Nice.)

NICAGORAS, a sophist of Athens in the reign of the emperor Philip He wrote the lives of illustrious men, and was reckoned one of the greatest and most learned men of his age.

NICANDER, a king of Sparta, son of Charillus, of the family of the Proclidæ. He reigned thirty-nine years, and died B C 770. —— A Greek grammarian, poet, and physician, of Colophon, respecting whose birth-place and era considerable diversity of opinion has prevailed. Suidas informs us that he was a native of Colophon, although he admits that other writers considered him as a native of Ætolia, we have, however, the testimony of Nicander himself, that his birthplace was Claros, a town in Ionia, near Colophon. He is commonly supposed to have flourished about 140 B C, in the reign of Attalus king of Pergamus, whilst others are of opinion that he was in the zenith of his reputation in the reign of the last king of that name. He was the author of many works, but the two following alone remain, namely, the poems entitled Theriaca, and Alexipharmaca In the former he describes the effects of the bites of venomous animals, and in the latter, he treats of their antidotes. Among the works which are lost, were, a piece entitled Ophiaca, which related to serpents, and Hyacanthia, which was a collection of remedies. He is said also to have written five books of Metamorphoses which were the prototypes of those of Ovid, and were closely copied by Antoninus Liberalis. He wrote also several historical pieces A great number of editions of the Theriaca and Alexipharmaca have been published at different times and places The best is that of Schneider, 8vo, Halliæ, 1792.

NICATOR, (Νικάτωρ, i. e. "Conqueror,") a surname assumed by Seleucus I from his numerous successes.

NICEPHORIUM, a town of Mesopotamia, south of Charræ, and at the confluence of the Callicus and Euphrates. It was first colonized by Alexander, but being subsequently enlarged by one of the Syrian kings, it was called Callinicum. It was a wealthy and strong place, and commanded a flourishing trade. Its site is supposed to exist near the modern Racca. Plin. 6, 26.

NICEPHORIUS, a river of Armenia Major, the same with the Centritis. Vid. Centritis.

NICEPHORUS, Basilica, a teacher of rhetoric at Constantinople, during the latter half of the eleventh century. He has left some fables, tales, and ethopoeæ; for example, Joseph accused by Potiphar's wife; David in the cave with Saul; David pursued by Absalom, &c. These productions are contained in the collection of Leo Allatius.——Blemmida, a monk of the 13th century. He has left three works; a Geographical Abridgment, which is nothing but an analysis, in prose, of the Periegesis of Dionysius; a work entitled, "The second History of the Earth;" and a third, "On the heavens, earth, sun," &c The two first were published by Spohn, at Leipzig, 1818, in 8to; the third is unedited. It is mentioned by Bredow in his Epistolæ Parisienses. ——Xanthopulus, an ecclesiastical historian, was born at Constantinople in the 14th century. He wrote a "History of the Church," and an abridgment of the Bible in Iambic verse.——Chumnus, an officer at the court of Andronicus II. He composed a number of works, which still remain unedited ——Gregoras, a Greek historian of the fourteenth century. He was patronized by Andronicus II., whom he accompanied in his misfortunes; and attended at his death He compiled the Byzantine history from 1204 to 1341, which was printed at Basil in 1562, at Geneva in 1615, and at the Louvre in 1702 2 vols. fol ——A patriarch of Constantinople in the ninth century, who was a defender of image worship, and was deprived by Leo the Armenian in 815. He died in 828. He wrote "An Abridgment of History," and another of "Chronography."

NICER, or NICAR now the Neckar, a river of Germany falling into the Rhine at the modern town of Mannheim Amm. Marcell. 28, 2

NICETAS, Acominatus, a Greek historian, was born at Colosse, in Phrygia, in the twelfth century. He was much employed in the court of Constantinople; but on the taking of that city by the Franks, in 1204, he went to Nicæa in Bithynia, where he died in 1206.

NICETERIA, a festival at Athens, in memory of the victory which Minerva obtained over Neptune, in their dispute about giving a name to the capital of the country

NICIA, a small river of Cisalpine Gaul, rising in the territory of the Ligures Apuani, and falling into the Po at Brixellum. The Æmilian way crossed it a little before Tanetum. It is now the Lenza.

NICIAS, an Athenian general celebrated for his valour and for his misfortunes He early conciliated the good will of the people by his liberality, and he established his military character by taking the island of Cythera from the power of Lacedæmon When Athens determined to make war against Sicily Nicias was appointed, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to conduct the expedition, which he reprobated as impolitic and as the future cause of calamities to the Athenian power. In Sicily he behaved with great firmness, but he often blamed the quick and inconsiderate measures of his colleagues. The success of the Athenians remained long doubtful Alcibiades was recalled by his enemies to take his trial, and Nicias was left at the head of affairs. Syracuse was surrounded by a wall and, though the operations were carried on slowly, yet the city would have surrendered, had not the sudden appearance of Gylippus, the Corinthian ally of the Sicilians, cheered up the courage of the besieged at the most critical moment. Gylippus proposed terms of accommodation to the Athenians, which were refused. Some battles were fought in which the Sicilians obtained the advantage; and Nicias at last, tired of his ill success, and grown desponding, demanded of the Athenians a reinforcement or a successor. Demosthenes, upon this, was sent with a powerful fleet; but the advice of Nicias was despised, and the admiral, by his eagerness to come to a decisive engagement, ruined his fleet and the interest of Athens. The fear of his enemies at home prevented Nicias from leaving Sicily; and when, at last, a continued series of ill success obliged him to comply, he found himself surrounded on every side by the enemy, without hope of escaping. He gave himself up to the conquerors with all his army, but the assurances of safety which he had received soon proved vain and false, and he was no sooner in the hands of the enemy than he was shamefully put to death with Demosthenes. His troops were sent to quarries, where the plague and hard labour diminished their numbers and aggravated their misfortunes. Some suppose that the death of Nicias was not violent. He perished about 413 years before Christ, and the Athenians lamented in him a great and valiant but unfortunate general. Plut. in Vita.—C. Nep in Alcib. — Thucyd 4, &c.——A physician of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who made an offer to the Romans of poisoning his master for a sum of money. The Roman general disdained his offers, and acquainted Pyrrhus with his treachery. He is oftener called Cineas ——A painter of Athens, in the age of Alexander He was chiefly happy in his pictures of women Ælian. V. H. 2, 31.

NICO, a celebrated architect and geometrician. He was father to the celebrated Galen ——The name of an ass, which Augustus met before the battle of Actium, a circumstance which he considered as a favourable omen Suet Aug 96. ——The name of an elephant remarkable for his fidelity to king Pyrrhus NICOCLES, a familiar friend of Phocion, condemned to death. Plut ——A king of Paphos, who reigned under the protection of Ptolemy king of Egypt. He revolted from his friend to the king of Persia, upon which Ptolemy ordered one of his servants to put him to death, to strike terror into the other dependant princes. The servant, unwilling to murder the monarch, advised him to kill himself. Nicocles obeyed, and all his family followed his example, 310 years before the Christian era.——An ancient Greek poet, who called physicians a happy race of men, because light published their good deeds to the world, and the earth hid all their faults and imperfections.——A king of Cyprus, who succeeded his father Evagoras on the throne, 374 years before Christ. It was with him that the philosopher Isocrates corresponded ——A tyrant of Sicyon, deposed by means of Aratus, the Achæan. Plut in Arat.

NICOCRATES, a king of Salamis, in Cyprus, who made himself known by the valuable collection of books which he had. Athen. 1, 4.

NICOCREON, a tyrant of Salamis, in the age of Alexander the Great. He ordered the philosopher Anaxarchus to be pounded to pieces in a mortar.

NICODORUS, a wrestler of Mantinea, who studied philosophy in his old age. Ælian. V. H. 2, 22.

NICOLAUS, a comic poet whose era is unknown. He belonged to the New Comedy according to some. Stobæus has a fragment of his in 44 verses, which he ascribes, however, to Nicolaus Damascenus.——Damascenus, a philosopher and historian, was in great esteem in the age of Augustus, by whom, as well as by king Herod, he was admitted to intimate friendship He was a native of Damascus, of the peripatetic sect, and extensively learned. Many of his writings are mentioned by Suidas and others, of which only a few fragments are come down to our times. A history of Assyria, of his composition, is quoted, which appears to have been part of an universal history, in many books, referred to by Suidas, Josephus, and Athenæus Strabo quotes from him certain matters relating to India. Henry de Valois published at Paris, in 1634, in Greek and Latin, the collection from different works of this author made by Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and brought from Cyprus by Petresc

NICOMACHA, a daughter of Themistocles

NICOMACHUS, the father of the philosopher Aristotle

NICOMEDES 1st, a king of Bithynia, about 278 years before the Christian era. It was by his exertions that this part of Asia became a monarchy. He behaved with great cruelty to his brothers, and built a town which he called by his own name, Nicomedia Justin.——The 2d was ironically surnamed Philopater, because he drove his father Prusias from the kingdom of Bithynia, and caused him to be assassinated, B C. 149. He reigned fifty-nine years. Mithridates laid claim to his kingdom, but all their disputes were decided by the Romans, who deprived Nicomedes of the province of Paphlagonia, and his ambitious rival of Cappadocia. He gained the affections of his subjects by a courteous behaviour, and by a mild and peaceful government. Justin.——The 3d son and successor of the preceding, was dethroned by his brother Socrates, and afterwards by the ambitious Mithridates. The Romans reestablished him on his throne, and encouraged him to make reprisals upon the king of Pontus. He followed their advice, and he was, at last, expelled another time from his dominions, till Sylla came into Asia who restored him to his former power and affluence. Strab.—Appian.——The 4th of that name, was son and successor of Nicomedes 3d. He passed his life in an easy and tranquil manner, and enjoyed the peace which his alliance with the Romans had procured him. He died B. C. 75, without issue, and left his kingdom, with all his possessions to the Roman people. Appian. Mithrid. - Justin. 38, 2, &c.—Vor. 3, 5.——A celebrated geometrician. He is famous for being the inventor of the curve named the conchoid, which serves equally for the resolution of the two problems relating to the duplication of the cube, and the trisection of an angle. It was much used by the ancients in the construction of solid problems. It is not certain at what period Nicomedes flourished, but it was probably at no great distance from the time of Eratosthenes.

NICOMEDIA, a city of Bithynia, situate at the north eastern extremity of the Sinus Astacenus It was founded by Nicomedes 1st. who transferred to it the inhabitants of the neighbouring city of Astacus. Nicomedia being the chief residence of the Bithynian kings, soon became a large and flourishing city, and it continued to prosper under the Roman emperors, as may be collected from the letters of Pliny to Trajan, in which he speaks of several public buildings belonging to this city, such as a senate-house, an aqueduct, a forum, a temple of Cybele, &c. He mentions also its having suffered much from a great fire. In still later times, Nicomedia was often the residence of the Roman emperors, when engaged in carrying on war with the Parthians or Persians. It was, however, nearly destroyed by an invasion of the Scythians and an earthquake. The orator Libanius, in his lament over the fortunes of Nicomedia, πενθητικὸς ἐπὶ Νικομηδείᾳ, mourns the loss of its Thermæ, Basilicæ, temples, Gymnasia, schools, public gardens, &c Some of these were restored by Justinian. It was, however, finally conquered by the Turks, who call it Ismid Pim. Ep 10, 42 et 46—Niceph 7. ad fin. —Amm Marcell. 22, 9 et 12.- Philost. 4. Procop. Aed. 5 1.

NICOPOLIS, a city of Egypt, a little to the north of Alexandria. It was founded by Augustus in commemoration of a victory gained here over Antony, and is now Caer or Kussera. Strab. 17. —Dio. Cass 51. 18.——A city of Palestine, to the north-west of Jerusalem, the same with Emmaus It received the name of Nicopolis, in the third century from the emperor Heliogabalus, who restored and beautified the place. Chron Pasch Ann 223.——A city of Armenia Minor, on the river Lycus, near the borders of Pontus. It was built by Pompey in commemoration of a victory gained here over Mithridates. The site is probably occupied by the modern Decrik Appian. Bell Mithr 101 et 105.—Strab. 12.—Plin. 6, 9. ——A city of Epirus, on the upper coast of the Ambracian gulf and near its mouth It was built by Augustus to commemorate his victory at Actium, and peopled by him from the surrounding cities of Epirus, Acarnania, and Ætolia He obtained for it a vote in the Amphictyonic assembly, and established some splendid games, which were celebrated every five years The site of this city is now called Paleo Lechia. Strab. 7. Paus 5. 23. 7, 18. 10, 8.——A city of Thrace, on the river Nestus, not far from its mouth, founded by Trajan It is now Nikopoli Ptol.——A city in Mœsia Inferior, on the river Istrus, one of the tributaries of the Danube. It was built by Trajan, in memory of his defeating the Daci, and was generally called, for distinction's sake, Nicopolis ad Istrum Its modern name is Nikopol Amm. Marcell 24, 4 31, 5

NICOSTRATUS, one of the sons of Aristophanes, ranked among the poets of the Middle Comedy. The titles of some of his own and his brothers' comedies are preserved in Athenæus The names of his brothers were Araros and Philippus.

NIGER, C. Pescennius Justus, a celebrated governor in Syria, well known by his valour in the Roman armies, while yet a private man. At the death of Pertinax, he was declared emperor of Rome, and his claims to that elevated situation were supported by a sound understanding, prudence of mind, moderation, courage, and virtue He proposed to imitate the actions of the venerable Antoninus, of Trajan, of Titus, and M Aurelius. He was remarkable for his fondness for ancient discipline, and never suffered his soldiers to drink wine, but obliged them to quench their thirst with water and vinegar. He forbade the use of silver and gold utensils in his camp, all the bakers and cooks were driven away, and the soldiers ordered to live, during the expedition they undertook, merely upon biscuits. In his punishments Niger was inexorable: he even demned ten of his soldiers to be beheaded in the presence of the army, because they had stole and eaten a fowl. The sentence was heard with groans: the army interfered; and, when Niger consented to diminish the punishment for fear of kindling a rebellion he yet ordered the criminals to make each a restoration of ten fowls to the person whose property they had stolen; they were, besides, ordered not to light a fire the rest of the campaign, but to live upon cold aliments, and to drink nothing but water. Such great qualifications in a general seemed to promise the restoration of ancient discipline in the Roman armies, but the death of Niger frustrated every hope of reform. Severus, who had also been invested with the imperial purple, marched against him, and defeated him at Issus. Niger lost in this conflict twenty thousand men, and in endeavouring to reach the Euphrates from Antioch whither he had escaped with a small escort, was overtaken and slain.

NIGER or NIGRIS, a river of Africa, the course and termination of which have been always involved in obscurity. Many of the ancients fancied that it ran from east to west into the Atlantic Ocean, others of them, better instructed, describe it as flowing in the contrary direction, but they either leave its termination as a thing altogether unknown, or assert that it finally joins the Nile of Egypt. There is now no doubt but that it runs from west to east, and enters that part of the Atlantic which is called the Gulf of Guinea, but whether it also joins the great Egyptian river, remains for future discoveries to prove. It rises in the westernmost part of the continent, not 200 miles from the shores of the Atlantic Ocean, in a very lofty chain of mountains, which traverses the whole extent of Africa, to the borders of the Red Sea. This range was known to the ancients under several names, amongst which we may mention Ion Mons, towards the Atlantic, now called the mountains of Kong: its eastern part was named Lunæ Montes or the Moun. as of the Moon, an appellation still preserved in that of Gebel Komri, which has the same signification. The Niger runs from its source with a northeasterly course till it reaches Nigira Metropolis or Timbuctoo, when it turns suddenly to the southeast, and, after pursuing this direction past Thuppæ or Tappa, and the kingdom of Pundah, it enters the Gulf of Guinea. It is likewise presumed to communicate with the Libya Palus or Lake Tchad, and all the native accounts uniformly agree in its also joining the Nile of Egypt, whether by an actual junction of the rivers, or by an elevated lake, whence the waters of the two rivers flow in different directions, i. e. the Nile to the north-east, and the Niger to the west as far as the river Shary, remains yet to be demonstrated. The Niger was also called Nuchul and Dara both of which appellations may be traced in its modern names Quolla or Kulla and Quorra. The western part of the Niger is called Jolaba, and forms a large lake a little above Timbuctoo; this lake, now called Dibbie, is probably the Nigrites Palus of Ptolemy which that geographer places close upon the Atlantic, as the lake in which the Niger terminates. The Niger was considered by the ancients as one of the greatest rivers in the world, its banks were said to be exceedingly fertile, abounding with the same fruits and grain as those of the Nile, and producing likewise a quantity of papyrus. It was also reported to be subject to the same periodical and fertilizing inundations as the Nile, whence arose one of the reasons for considering the two rivers but as one. Plin. 5, 1 et 8.—Mela, 1, 4. 8, 10.—Ptol. 4, 6.

NIGIDIUS FIGULUS, P. a celebrated philosopher at Rome, one of the most learned men of his age after Varro. He foretold the future greatness of Augustus at his birth, and acquired so much celebrity by his knowledge of astrology and his calculation of the celestial phenomena, that the ignorance or superstition of his contemporaries gave him the degrading appellation of magician and necromancer. He was intimate with Cicero, and gave him his most unbiassed opinions concerning the conspirators who had leagued to destroy Rome with Catiline. He was made prætor, and honoured with a seat in the senate. In the civil wars he followed the interest of Pompey, for which he was banished by the conqueror. He died in the place of his banishment, forty-seven years before Christ. All his works on augury, grammar, animals, &c., have perished. Cic. ad Fam. 4, ep. 13.—Lucan. 1, 639.

NIGRITÆ, a people of Africa, who dwell on the banks of the Niger, in what is now Negroland. Mela, 1, 4 - Plin. 5, 1

NILEUS, a son of Codrus, who conducted a colony of Ionians to Asia, where he built Ephesus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedos, Claxomenæ, &c. Paus. 7, 2, &c

NILUS, a river of Egypt. The Nile was the longest river in the world with which the ancients were at all acquainted. It derived its name from the Hebrew word Nachal or Nahal, signifying merely the river, and hence, in the book of Exodus, it is mentioned only under this appellation: it was also called Siris by the Æthiopians, whence we find it mentioned by the prophet Jeremiah as the Sihor, and was surnamed Ægyptus, from its being the great fertilizer of this country. The Nile rises 23° to the south of the Mediterranean, from two sources. The more eastern of these, called Astapus by the ancients, and now Bahr el Azergue, or the Blue Nile, was the one visited by Mr Bruce, the British traveller; but the western branch, called the Bahr el Abiad or White Nile, is much more important, and from its being the true Nile, it preserved amongst the ancients the original name Nilus. The ancients, like the moderns, knew very little about the latter source, and hence they fashioned the proverb, "Nili caput quærere," to express an impossible or difficult undertaking. Many of them thought that the Nuchul or Niger in the interior of Africa, was the same river with the Nile, an opinion which is still maintained at the present day, but others have placed the source of the western arm in a lofty range of mountains, called Lunæ Montes, which the natives still distinguish as the Gebel Komri, or Mountains of the Moon. There are two well-known cataracts in the Nile, the upper one of which, called Catarractes Major, is at Wady Halfa, the lower one is near Syene, and is now known by the name of Es-Shellaale: the latter one formed the southern frontier of Egypt, and from it the river ran through the long valley of this country, till it entered the Mediterranean Sea by seven mouths. The ridge of mountains, which bounded this valley on the eastern side, was called Arabicus Mons or Gebel Mokattem, the western range was named Libycus Mons. A little above Memphis, these two ridges suddenly stop short, the eastern one striking off towards the head of the Red Sea, and the western one into the interior of Libya: from this point the river, dividing its waters into several arms, enters the sea by seven mouths. The names of these are Canopicum, Bolbitinum, Sebennyticum, Phatniticum or Bucolicum, Mendesium, Saiticum or Taniticum, and Pelusiacum; of which the first was nearest to Alexandria, and the last to Palestine. The two outer arms of the river form a triangle, the base of which is the Mediterranean sea; and hence, from its representing the letter Δ, the Greeks gave it the name of Delta, which it has preserved to our own times. But the most interesting phenomenon connected with the Nile, is its periodical inundation. About the time of the summer solstice the river begins to swell, and continues gradually rising for nearly one hundred days, till the autumnal equinox, when it overflows its banks and covers the whole valley; it remains stationary for some time, and then gradually decreases, till after the end of one hundred days, and towards the winter solstice, it has again reached its ordinary level, which it maintains till the summer of the succeeding year. The ancients, who witnessed this inundation, exhausted their imagination in conjectures as to its cause, and it is only of late years that it has been ascertained to arise from the periodical rains, which fall in the tropical regions from June to September, assisted by the Etesian winds which blow violently from the north-east, and thus hinder the waters from throwing themselves with their usual volume into the sea. This could hardly have been unknown to the priests of Egypt, as they asserted that the Nile came from heaven; and hence probably Homer, who is said to have studied amongst them, was led to call the Nile διϊπετης or falling from Jove or heaven. The average rise of the Nile has always been, as it still is, sixteen cubits, or twenty-four feet, above its ordinary level, one year varying much from another, when it rises to a greater height than this, the people suffer exceedingly from their habitations being destroyed by the overwhelming and irresistible body of water, and when it does not attain this height, all the upper grounds become as barren as the neighbouring desert. When the inundation has retired, the whole soil is found covered with a thick, black slime, in which the principles of vegetation are fully contained. Cic. Leg. 2. 1. *Ad Q. NINUS, a son of Belus, who built a city to which he gave his own name, and founded the Assyrian monarchy, of which he was the first sovereign, B C 2059. He was very warlike, and extended his conquests from Egypt to the extremities of India and Bactriana. He became enamoured of Semiramis the wife of one of his officers, and he married her after her husband had destroyed himself through fear of his powerful rival. Ninus reigned fifty-two years, and at his death he left his kingdom to the care of his wife Semiramis, by whom he had a son. The history of Ninus is very obscure, and even fabulous according to the opinion of some. Ctesias is the principal historian from whom it is derived, but little reliance is to be placed upon him, when Aristotle deems him unworthy to be believed. Ninus after death received divine honours, and became the Jupiter of the Assyrians, and the Hercules of the Chaldeans. Ctesias. Diod 2.—Justin 1, 1.——Or Nineveh, the capital of the Assyrian empire; founded, according to some by Ashur, and, according to others, by Nimrod. It stood on the eastern bank of the Tigris, and is stated in Holy Writ to have been an exceeding great city, of three days' journey (i. e. in circuit), and the profane authors estimated its circumference at 480 stadia, or sixty Roman miles. It escaped the destruction threatened it for the wickedness of its inhabitants, by repenting at the preaching of Jonah; but the people having afterwards returned to their former abominations, it was at last overthrown (as was foretold by the prophets Nahum and Zephaniah) by the united armies of the Medes and Babylonians brought about by the instrumentality of the river, and the drunkenness and carelessness of its inhabitants. There is still a village on its site called Nunia opposite to Mosul, which stands on the western side of the river. Nineveh was surrounded by walls 100 feet high, which were so broad that three chariots could run on the top of them abreast; along these walls there were 1,500 towers, each of which was 200 feet high. It was considered impregnable, a notion which was much strengthened by an old prediction that the city should never be taken until the river became its enemy; it was owing, as it is said to this prediction that Sardanapalus made it the seat of war against his enemies, Arbaces the Mede and Belesis the Babylonian, who having besieged him here for three years without success, at last gained possession of the city by the river's overflowing its banks and carrying away 20 stadia of the wall; upon this Sardanapalus burned himself in the midst of his treasures, and Nineveh was reduced, B. C 817. Upon its ruins another city appears to have risen of the same name, and at no great distance from the situation of the former. Nineveh gradually regained its ancient greatness, and in the reign of Esarhaddon, who took Babylon, again became the capital of the Assyrian and Babylonian empires; it maintained this dignity till Nabopolassar, a general in the Assyrian army, and father of the famous Nebuchadnezzar, took Babylon and proclaimed himself king, after which Nineveh ceased to be the metropolis of both kingdoms. It began now to decline rapidly, and was soon to yield to the rising power of its great rival. The Medes revolted once more, and their king Cyaxares having defeated the Assyrians in a great battle, about 633 years B. C laid siege to Nineveh; owing, however, to an invasion of Media by the Scythians, Cyaxares was obliged to withdraw his army to defend his own country. But he returned twenty-one years afterwards, having entered into an alliance with Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, when both of them laid siege to Nineveh, which they took and utterly destroyed in the same year. Jonah 3, 3.—10.—Nahum 1, 8 et 10. 2, 6.—13.—Zeph. 2, 13.—15.—*Diod. NINYAS a son of Ninus and Semiramis king of Assyria, who succeeded his mother, who had voluntarily abdicated the crown. Some suppose that Semiramis was put to death by her own son, because she had encouraged him to commit incest. The reign of Ninyas is remarkable for its luxury and extravagance. The prince left the care of the government to his favourites and ministers, and gave himself up to pleasure, riot, and debauchery, and never appeared in public. His successors imitated the example of his voluptuousness, and therefore their names or history are little known till the age of Sardanapalus. Justin. 1, 2. Diod. 1, &c.

NIOBE, a daughter of Tantalus king of Lydia, by Eurynassa or Dione. She married Amphion the son of Iasus, by whom she had ten sons and ten daughters, according to Hesiod, or two sons and three daughters, according to Herodotus. Homer and Propertius say, that she had six daughters and as many sons; and Ovid, Apollodorus, &c. according to the more received opinion, support that she had seven sons and seven daughters The names of the sons were Sipylus, Minytus, Tantalus, Agenor, Phædimus, Damasichthon, and Ismenus, and those of the daughters, Cleodoxa, Ethodœa or Thera, Astyoche, Phthia, Pelopia or Chloris, Asterarea, and Ogygia. The number of her children increased the pride of Niobe, and she not only had the imprudence to prefer herself to Latona who had only two children, but she even insulted her, and ridiculed the worship which was paid to her, observing, that she had a better claim to altars and sacrifices than the mother of Apollo and Diana This insolence provoked Latona, who entreated her children to punish the arrogant Niobe. Her prayers were heard, and immediately all the sons of Niobe expired by the darts of Apollo, and all the daughters except Chloris, who had married Neleus, king of Pylos, were equally destroyed by Diana, and Niobe, struck at the suddenness of her misfortunes, was changed into a stone. The carcasses of Niobe's children, according to Homer, were unburied in the plains for nine successive days, because Jupiter changed into stones all such as attempted to inter them On the tenth day they were honoured with a funeral by the gods. *Homer. NIPHATES, a range of mountains in Armenia, forming part of the great chain of Taurus, and lying to the south-east of the Arsissa Palus, or lake Van. Their summits were covered with snow during the whole year, and to this circumstance the name Niphates is supposed to allude. (Νιφάτης, quasi νιφετώδης, "snowy.") NISÆA, a city and district of Upper Asia, near the sources of the river Ochus, now the Tedjen. According to Strabo, it would appear to have been situate between Parthiene and Hyrcania Strab. 11.——The harbour of Megara, situate on the Saronic gulf, and connected with the main city by long walls The citadel was also called by the same name, and stood on the road between Megara and the port. It was a place of considerable strength, but might be cut off from the city by effecting a breach in the long walls. Thucyd. 4. 69

Nisibis, a large and populous city of Mesopotamia, about two days' journey from the Tigris, in the midst of a pleasant and fertile plain at the foot of Mons Masius, and on the river Mygdonius. In the year of Rome 684, it was subject to Tigranes, king of Armenia, from whom it was taken by Lucullus. It was afterwards taken by Trajan, and, after a revolt, retaken by his troops. Since the time of Lucullus, it had been deservedly esteemed the bulwark of the east. It sustained three memorable sieges against Sapor, king of Persia, and the disappointed monarch was thrice repulsed with loss and ignominy, but in the year 363 of the Christian era after the death of Julian, and under the irresolute Jovian, it was ceded to Sapor by treaty. It is still called Nisibin Plut. in Lucull.—Dio Cass. 30, 6 35, 7. 68, 23 75, 3

NISUS, a son of Hyrtæus, born on mount Ida near Troy. He came to Italy with Æneas, and signalized himself by his valour against the Rutulians. He was united in the closest friendship with Euryalus, a young Trojan, and with him he entered in the dead of night, the enemy's camp As they were returning victorious, after much bloodshed, they were perceived by the Rutulians, who attacked Euryalus. Nisus in endeavouring to rescue his friend from the enemy's darts, perished himself with him, and their heads were cut off and fixed on a spear, and carried in triumph to the camp. Their death was greatly lamented by all the Trojans, and their great friendship like that of a Pylades and an Orestes, or of a Theseus and Pirithous, is become proverbial. Virg. Æn. 9, 176, &c.— A king of Dulichium, remarkable for his probity and virtue Homer. Od 18, 126.——A king of Megara, son of Mars, or more probably of Pandion. He inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers, and received as his portion the country of Megaris. The peace of the brothers was interrupted by the hostilities of Minos, who wished to avenge the death of his son Androgeus, who had been murdered by the Athenians. Megara was besieged, and Attica laid waste. The fate of Nisus depended totally upon a yellow lock, which, as long as it continued upon his head, according to the words of an oracle, promised him life and success in his affairs. His daughter Scylla (often called Nisæa Virgo) saw from the walls of Megara the royal besieger, and she became desperately enamoured of him. To obtain a more immediate interview with this object of her passion, she stole away the fatal hair from her father's head as he was asleep; the town was immediately taken, but Minos disregarded the services of Scylla. And she threw herself into the sea. The gods changed her into a lark, and Nisus assumed the nature of the hawk, at the very moment that he gave himself death, not to fall into the enemy's hands. These two birds have continually been at variance with each other, and Scylla, by her apprehensions at the sight her father, seems to suffer the punishment which her perfidy deserved. Apollod 3 15.—Paus 1, 19 —*Ovid. NISYROS, an island in the Ægean, one of the Sporades, about sixty stadia north of Telos It was pretended that it had been torn from Cos by Neptune, that he might cast it against the giant Polybotes. We learn from Herodotus that Nisyros was under the dominion of Artemisia, queen of Caria. According to Strabo it was high and rocky, having a town of the same name, a port and temple of Neptune, and some warm baths. The modern name is Nisari. Strab. 10.—Apollod. 1, 6, 2.—Paus. 1, 2.—Herod 7, 99.——The chief town in the island Carpathus. Strab. 10.

NITOCRIS, a celebrated queen of Babylon, who, to defend that city the more, and render the approach to it by the Euphrates as difficult and tedious as possible, sunk a number of canals, which rendered the river so complicated by numerous windings, that, according to Herodotus, it arrived three times at Ardericca, an Assyrian village. She also raised to a very great height the banks of the river, to restrain its inundations, and dug an immense lake, some distance above Babylon, which might also serve as a defence She ordered herself to be buried over one of the gates of the city, and placed an inscription on her tomb, which signified that her successors would find great treasures within, if ever they were in need of money, but that their labours would be but ill repaid, if ever they ventured to open it without necessity. Cyrus opened it through curiosity, and was struck to find within these words: If thy avarice had not been insatiable, thou never wouldst have violated the monuments of the dead Herod. 1, 185.——A queen of Egypt who built a third pyramid.

NITRIA, a city of Egypt, to the west of the Canopic branch of the Nile, in the desert near the lakes which afforded nitre. It gave name to the Nitriotic nome, receiving its own from the adjacent natron lakes.

NIVARIA, one of the Fortunatæ Insulæ, off the western coast of Mauritania Tingitana, now the island of Teneriffe. The name Nivaria has reference to the snows which cover the summits of the island for a great part of the year. It was also called Convallis Plin. 4, 32.——A city of Hispania Terraconensis, in the territory of the Vaccæi, and to the north of Cauca.

NOCMON, a Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, 767

NOCTILUCA, a surname of Diana. She had a temple at Rome on mount Palatine, where torches were generally lighted in the night. Varro de L. L. 4.—Horat. Od 4, 6, 38.

NOLA, one of the most ancient and important cities of Campania, situate to the north east of Neapolis. The earliest record we have of it is from Hecataus, who is cited by Steph. Byz. That ancient historian, in one of his works, described it as a city of the Ausones. According to some accounts, Nola was said to have been founded by the Etrurians. Others again represented it as a colony of the Chalcidians. All which statements may be reconciled by admitting that it successively fell into the possession of these different people Nola afterwards appears to have been occupied by the Samnites, together with other Campanian towns, until they were expelled by the Romans. Though situated in an open plain, it was capable of being easily defended, from the strength of its walls and towers: and we know it resisted all the efforts of Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, under the able direction of Marcellus. In the Social war this city fell into the hands of the confederates, and remained in their possession nearly till the conclusion of the war. It was then retaken by Sylla, and having been set on fire by the Samnite garrison, was burned to the ground. It must have risen, however, from its ruins, since subsequent writers reckon it amongst the cities of Campania, and it continues reports that it was colonized by Vespasian. Here Augustus breathed his last, as Tacitus and Suetonius remark, in the same house and chamber in which his father Octavius ended his days. The modern name of the place is the same as the ancient, Nola. Vell. Paterc. 1, 6.—Justin. 20, 1, 13.—Strab 5.—Liv. 9, 28, 23, 14, &c.—Cic. Brut. 3.—*Appian. Bell. NOMADES, a name given by the Greeks to all those uncivilized people who had no fixed habitation, and who continually changed the place of their residence, to go in quest of fresh pasture, for the numerous cattle which they tended. The name is derived from νομὴ, pasture. There were Nomades in Scythia, India, Arabia, and Africa. NOMENTĀNUS, an epithet applied to L. Cassius as a native of Nomentum. He is mentioned by Horace as marked by luxury and dissipation. Horat Sat 1, 1, 102.

NOMENTUM, a city of Italy, in the territory of the Sabines, and to the north east of Rome. It was a colony of Alba, and therefore originally perhaps a Latin city, but from its position it is generally attributed to the Sabines. Nomentum was finally conquered, with several other towns, A. U. C. 417, and admitted to the participation of the privileges granted to Latin municipal cities. It was, however, but an insignificant place in the time of Propertius. Its territory was nevertheless long celebrated for the produce of its vineyards; and hence, in the time of Seneca and Pliny, we find that land in this district was sold for enormous sums. The former had an estate in the vicinity of this town, which was his favourite retreat. The wine of Nomentum is commended by Athenæus and Martial. The poet had a farm near this spot, to which he makes frequent allusions. Dion. Hal. 2, 53.—Liv. 1, 38 5, 14.—Propert 4, 10.—Senec. Ep. 104.—Plin. 14, 4.—Athen. 1, 48.—Martial 1, 55.

NOMIUS, a surname given to Apollo, because he fed (νέμω, pasco) the flocks of king Admetus in Thessaly. Cic in Nat D. 3, 23.

NONACRIS, a town of Arcadia, to the north-west of Phenæus, and on the confines of Achaia. It was surrounded by lofty mountains and perpendicular rocks, over which the celebrated torrent Styx precipitated itself to join the river Crathis: the waters were said to be poisonous, and to possess the property of dissolving metals and other hard substances exposed to their action. Herodotus describes the Nonacrian Styx as a scanty rill, distilling from the rock, and falling into a hollow basin surrounded by a wall. Pausanias only saw the ruins of Nonacris. Pouqueville informs us, that the fall of the Styx, which is now called Mauronero, or the Black water, is to be seen near the village of Fo and somewhat to the south-east of Calamyna. He describes it as streaming in a sheet of foam from one of the loftiest precipices of mount Chelmos, and afterwards uniting with the Crathis in the valley of Kloukinaus. The rocks above Nonacris are called Aroanii Montes by Pausanias The epithet Nonacrius is sometimes used by the poets in the sense of "Arcadian" Thus, Ovid employs it in speaking of Evander, as being an Arcadian by birth, and also of Atalanta. Fast. 8, 18.—Plin. 3, 104.—Herod. 6, 75.—*Ovid. NONIANUS, C. Consid a Roman to whom the province of Gaul was transferred from Cæsar. He was of the Nonian family, and adopted by the Considii. Cic Fam 16, 12.

NONIUS, a Roman soldier imprisoned for paying respect to Galba's statues, &c. Tacit Hist. 1, 56.——A Roman who exhorted his countrymen after the fatal battle of Pharsalia, and the flight of Pompey, by observing that eight standards (aquilæ) still remained in the camp, to which Cicero answered, recte, a nobis cum graculis bellum esset.

NONIUS MARCELLUS, a grammarian and peripatetic philosopher, was a native of Tibur, now Tivoli, and is supposed to have lived about the fourth century. He wrote a work entitled "De proprietate sermonum," now extant. Several editions of it have been published, of which the best is that by Mercier, Paris, 1614, 8vo. This author has little claim to the praise of accurate learning or judgment and is chiefly valuable for the passages which he cites from authors no where else to be met with.

NONNUS, a Greek poet, who flourished in the fifth century, was a native of Panopolis in Egypt, and was author of two works, on very different subjects, but generally admitted to be from the same pen. The first, entitled Dionysiaca, a poem of forty-eight books, contains a history of Bacchus, and comprehends a vast miscellany of heathen mythology and erudition. The second is a metrical paraphrase of the gospel of St John This is valuable as affording some important various readings, which have been collected by editors of the New Testament. The best edition of the Dionysiaca is that printed at Antwerp, 1569, in 4to His paraphrase was edited by Heinsius, L. Bat. 1627, in 8vo.

NORBA, a town of Latium, north-east of Antium, the position of which will nearly agree with the little place now called Norma. It was early colonised by the Romens as an advantageous station to check the inroads of the Volsci. The zeal which it displayed, at a later day, in the cause of Marius, drew upon it the vengeance of the adverse faction. Besieged by Lepidus, one of Sylla's generals, it was opened to him by treachery; but the undaunted inhabitants chose rather to perish by their own hands than become the victims of a bloody conqueror. Plin. 3, 5. — *Dion. It was also called Colonia Norbensis, or Cæsariana. The ruins of this place are in the vicinity of the modern Alcantara Plin. 4, 22. 35.

NORBANUS, C. A young and ambitious Roman who opposed Sylla, and joined his interest to that of young Marius. In his consulship he marched against Sylla, by whom he was defeated, &c. Plut.——A friend and general of Augustus employed in Macedonia against the republicans. He was defeated by Brutus, &c.

NORICUM, a Roman province, west of Pannonia. It was bounded on the south by the territory of the Carni and Illyricum, and on the west by Rhætia and Vindelicia, while on the north it extended along the lower bank of the Danube from the mouth of the Ænus, or Inn, as far as mount Cetius, near Vindobona, or Vienna. It comprehended parts of Upper and Lower Austria, nearly all Styria, Carinthia, and Salsburg, with portions of Tyrol and Bavaria. The Norici, who were governed by their own king, were subjected under Augustus as allies of the Pannonii; their country was famous for its iron and steel. In a subsequent age, Noricum was subdivided into Ripense and Mediterraneum; the former lying between the Danube and the Noric Alps, the latter between these hills and the Carnic Alps. *Dionys. NOVUM COMUM. Vid. Comum.

NOX, one of the most ancient deities among the heathens, daughter of Chaos. From her union with her brother Erebus, she gave birth to the Day and the Light. She was also the mother of the Parcæ, Hesperides, Dreams, of Discord, Death, Momus, Fraud, &c. She is called by some ... the poets the mother of all things, of gods as well as of men, and therefore she was worshipped with great solemnity by the ancients. She had a famous statue in Diana's temple at Ephesus It was usual to offer her a black sheep, as she was the mother of the Furies. The cock was also offered to her, as that bird proclaims the approach of day during the darkness of the night. She is represented as mounted on a chariot, and covered with a veil bespangled with stars. The constellations generally went before her as her constant messengers. Sometimes she is seen holding two children under her arms, one of which is black, representing death or rather night, and the other white, representing sleep, or day. Some of the moderns have described her as a woman veiled in mourning, and crowned with poppies, and carried on a chariot drawn by owls and bats. Virg. Æn. 6, 854.—*Ovid. It is now Nocera. Strab 5.——A town of Campania, about twelve miles south of Nola, now Nocera de Pagani. The appellation of Alfaterna was commonly attached to it, to distinguish it from the other places of the same name. It was said to have been founded by the Pelasgi Sarrastes Nuceria was besieged by Hannibal after his unsuccessful attack upon Nola; and on its being deserted by the inhabitants, he caused it to be sacked and burned We learn from Tacitus that, under the reign of Nero, Nuceria was restored and colonized. Plin. 3, 5. Liv. 10, 41. 23, 15 Lucan 2, 472. —Tacit Ann. 13, 31

NUITHONES, a people of Germany, possessing the country now called Mecklenburg and Pomerania. Tacit. G. 40.

NUMA MARTIUS, a man made governor of Rome by Tullus Hostilius. He was son-in-law of Numa Pompilius, and father to Ancus Martius. Tacit. Ann 6, 11 – Liv. 1, 20.

NUMA POMPILIUS, a celebrated philosopher, born at Cures, a village of the Sabines, on the day that Romulus laid the foundation of Rome. He married Tatia, the daughter of Tatius, the king of the Sabines, and at her death he retired into the country, to devote himself more freely to literary pursuits. At the death of Romulus, the Romans fixed upon him to be their new king, and two senators were sent to acquaint him with the decisions of the senate and of the people Numa refused their offers, and it was not but at the repeated solicitations and prayers of his friends, that he was prevailed upon to accept the royalty. The beginning of his reign was popular, and he dismissed the 300 body guards which his predecessor had kept around his person, observing that he did not distrust a people who had compelled him to reign over them. He was not like Romulus, fond of war and military expeditions, but he applied himself to tame the ferocity of his subjects, to inculcate in their minds a reverence for the deity, and to quell their dissensions by dividing all the citizens into different classes. He established different orders of priests, and taught the Romans not to worship the deity by images; and from his example no graven or painted statues appeared in the temples or sanctuaries of Rome for upwards of 160 years. He encouraged the report which was spread of his paying regular visits to the nymph Egeria, and made use of her name to give sanction to the laws and institutions which he had introduced. He established the college of the vestals, and told the Romans that the safety of the empire depended upon the preservation of the sacred ancile, or shield, which, as was generally believed, had dropped down from heaven. He dedicated a temple to Janus, which, during his whole reign, remained shut, as a mark of peace and tranquillity at Rome. Numa died after a reign of forty-three years, in which he had given every possible encouragement to the useful arts, and in which he had cultivated peace, B. C. 672. Not only the Romans, but also the neighbouring nations, were eager to pay their last offices to a monarch whom they revered for his abilities moderation, and humanity He forbade his body to be burned according to the custom of the Romans, but he ordered it to be buried near mount Janiculum, with many of the books which he had written These books were accidentally found by one of the Romans, about 400 years after his death, and as they contained nothing new or interesting, but merely the reasons why he had made innovations in the form of worship and in the religion of the Romans, they were burned by order of the senate. He left behind one daughter called Pompilia, who married Numa Martius, and became the mother of Ancus Martius, the fourth king of Rome. Some say that he had also four sons, but this opinion is ill-founded. Plut in Vita — Varro – Liv 1, 18. Plin. 13 et 14, &c. Flor 1, 2.—*Virg. NUMANTIA, a town of Spain near the sources of the river Durius, celebrated for the war of fourteen years, which, though unprotected by walls and towers it bravely maintained against the Romans. The inhabitants obtained some advantages over the Roman forces till Scipio Africanus was empowered to finish the war, and to see to the destruction of Numantia. He began the siege with an army of 60,000 men, and was bravely opposed by the besieged, who were no more than 4000 men able to bear arms Both armies behaved with uncommon valour, and the courage of the Numantines was soon changed into despair and fury. Their provisions began to fail, and they fed upon the flesh of their horses, and afterwards of that of their dead companions and at last were necessitated to draw lots to kill and devour one another. The melancholy situation of their affairs obliged some to surrender to the Roman general. Scipio demanded them to deliver themselves up on the morrow, they refused, and when a longer time had been granted to their petitions, they retired and set fire to their houses, and all destroyed themselves, B. C. 133, so that not even one remained to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. Some historians, however, deny that, and support that a number of Numantines delivered themselves into Scipio's hands, and that fifty of them were drawn in triumph to Rome, and the rest sold as slaves. The fall of Numantia was more glorious than that of Carthage or Corinth, though inferior to them. The conqueror obtained the surname of Numantinus. Flor. 2, 18. Mela, 2, 6.

NUMENIA, or NEOMENIA, a festival observed by the Greeks at the beginning of every lunar month, in honour of all the gods, but especially of Apollo, or the Sun, who is justly deemed the author of light, and of whatever distinction is made in the months, seasons, days, and nights. It was observed with games and public entertainments which were provided at the expense of rich citizens, and which were always frequented by the poor. Solemn prayers were offered at Athens during the solemnity, for the prosperity of the republic The demigods as well as the heroes of the ancients were honoured and invoked in the festival.

NUMENIUS, a Greek philosopher of the Platonic school, who is supposed to have flourished under the reign of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, was born at Apamea in Syria. He is said to have been eminent for wisdom, and is mentioned with respect both by Plotinus and Origen. Of the works which he wrote none are now extant, excepting some fragments preserved by Eusebius.

NUMERIANUS, M. Aurelius, an emperor of Rome, in conjunction with Carinus, was second son of the emperor Carus. On the death of his father in the year 283 A. C., Numerianus, with Carinus his elder brother, succeeded to the imperial dignity without opposition They had been nominated Augusti by their father, whom Numerianus had accompanied in his expedition into Persia. This young prince was distinguished by the promising qualities of his temper and understanding. He was mild and affable, and had from a very early age cultivated literature with success Being, in his youth, in a private station, he had exercised his talents for oratory in pleading causes, and several of his harangues had been given to the public, in which the declamatory eloquence of the age appeared with lustre Gibbon, in speaking of the brothers, says, "Carinus was unworthy to live: Numerian deserved to reign in a happier period. His affable manners and gentle virtues secured him, as soon as they became known, the regard and affection of the public. He possessed the elegant accomplishments of a poet and orator, which dignify, as well as adorn, the humblest and the most exalted stations. But the talents of Numerian were rather of the contemplative, than of the active kind" When his father's elevation reluctantly forced him from the shade of retirement, neither his temper nor his pursuits had qualified him for the command of armies. His constitution was destroyed by the hardships of the Persian war, and he had contracted, from the heat of the climate, such a weakness in his eyes, as obliged him in the course of a long retreat, to confine himself to the darkness of a tent or litter. The administration of all affairs, civil as well as military, devolved on Arrius Aper, the prætorian præfect, his father-in-law. The army was eight months on its march from the banks of the Tigris to the Thracian Bosporus, and during all that time the imperial authority was exercised in the name of the emperor, who never appeared to his soldiers. Suspicions at length spread among them that their emperor was no longer living, and they could not be prevented from breaking into the imperial tent, where they found his corpse How or at what time he died was never ascertained, but the general voice accused Aper of being his murderer, and he was accordingly stabbed, without trial, by the hand of Diocletian. —A friend of the emperor Severus.

NUMICIA VIA, a Roman road, traversing the northern part of Samnium. It communicated with the Valerian, Latin, and Appian ways, and, after crossing through part of Apulia, fell into the Via Aquilia in Lucania.

NUMICIUS, a small river of Latium near Lavinium, where the dead body of Æneas was found. It is now the Rio Torto. Virg. Æn. 7. 150, &c. —Sil. 1, 389. Ovid. Met. 14, 358, &c.— A friend of Horace, to whom he addressed 1 ep. 6.

NUMIDA, Plotius, a friend of Horace, who had returned after a long absence, from Spain, whence he had been serving under Augustus in the Cantabrian war. The poet addresses one of his odes to him, (1, 36) and bids his friends celebrate in due form, so joyous an event.

NUMIDIA, a country of Africa, bounded on the west by Mauritania, on the north by the Mediterranean, on the east by Africa Propria, and on the south by Gætulia. It corresponded in a great measure to the modern Algiers. Numidia was occupied by two principal nations, the Massyli, towards Africa Propria, in the eastern part, and the Massæsyli, towards Mauritania, in the western; they were separated by the promontory of Tretum, now Sebba Rous. The Massyli were the subjects of Masinissa, the Massæsyli of Syphax. This latter prince, having invaded the kingdom of Masinissa, the ally of the Romans, in the second Punic war, was overcome and taken prisoner by Masinissa and the Romans, and was carried to Rome by Scipio, to adorn his triumph, where he died in prison, B C. 201. The Romans confirmed Masinissa in the possession of the kingdom of Syphax, and the history of those transactions, together with an account of the heroic death of Sophonisba, is to be found in the 29th book of Livy. After the death of Masinissa and his son Micipsa, it was divided between his grandsons Hiempsal and Adherbal, who were successively murdered by Jugurtha, and thus Numidia became again united under one sovereign, and the Romans having resolved to punish the crimes of Jugurtha gave occasion to the Jugurthine war, the history of which is written by Sallust Jugurtha was taken, having been betrayed by Bocchus, to whom he had fled for refuge; and carried to Rome to adorn the triumph of Marius, B. C 106, after which he was starved to death in prison. Numidia was subsequently under the dominion of Juba, who took part with Pompey and his adherents against Cæsar, but was conquered in the battle of Thapsus, and Numidia was reduced to a Roman province; but a part of it was restored by Augustus to the son of Juba, who bore his father's name, and who also received in marriage from Augustus, Cleopatra, the daughter of Antony. The Numidians were a hardy and athletic race of warriors, and remarkable for their custom of attacking their enemies by night; they rode without either saddle or bridle, and are hence surnamed Infreni. They made admirable light troops, and during the second Punic war they annoyed the Romans dreadfully Sallust in Jug. —Flor. 2, 15.—Strab. 2 et 17.- Mela, 1, 4, &c. —*Ovid. NUMIDIUS, QUADRATUS, a governor of Syria under Claudius. Tacit. Ann. 12.

NUMISTRO, a town of the Brutii in Italy. Liv 45, 17.

NUMITOR, a son of Procas, king of Alba, who inherited his father's kingdom with his brother Amulius, and began to reign conjointly with him Amulius was too ambitious to bear a colleague on the throne, he expelled his brother, and that he might more safely secure himself, he put to death his son Lamus, and consecrated his daughter Ilia to the service of the goddess Vesta, which demanded perpetual celibacy. These great precautions were rendered abortive. Ilia became pregnant, and though the two children whom she brought forth were exposed in the river by order of the tyrant, their life was preserved, and Numitor was restored to his throne by his grandsons, and the tyrannical usurper was put to death *Dionys. NUNCUPERUS, a son of Sesostris, king of Egypt, who made an obelisk, some ages after brought to Rome, and placed in the Vatican. Plin. 36, 11. — He is called Pheron by Herodotus

NUNDINA, a goddess whom the Romans invoked when they named and purified their children. This happened the ninth day after their birth, whence the name of the goddess, Nona dies. Macrob Sat. 1, 16

NUNDINÆ Vid Ferie.

NURSÆ, a town of the Sabines, or more correctly perhaps in the territory of the Æqui, and near the banks of the Anio. Its particular site is unknown Virg. Æn. 7, 744.

NURSCIA, a goddess who patronized the Etrurians. Juv. 10, 74.

NURSIA, now Norcia, a city of the Sabines, at the foot of the central chain of the Apennines, and near the sources of the river Nar. It was noted for the coldness of its situation. Virg Æn. 7, 716. — Sil. Ital 8, 419

NYCTEIS, a daughter of Nycteus, who was mother of Labdacus. — A patronymic of Antiope, the daughter of Nycteus, mother of Amphion and Zethus by Jupiter, who had assumed the shape of a satyr to enjoy her company. Ovid. Met 6, 110

NYCTELIA, festivals in honour of Bacchus, (Vid. Nyctelius), observed on mount Citharon. Plut in Symp 4, 5.

NYCTELIUS, a surname of Bacchus, because his orgies were celebrated in the night (νὺξ. nox, noctis, perfero.) The words latex Nyctelius thence signify wine. Seneca in Œdip. — Paus. 1, 40. — Ovid Met 4, 15.

NYCTEUS, a son of Hyrieus and Clonia — A son of Neptune by Celene, daughter of Atlas, king of Lesbos, or of Thebes according to the more received opinion. He married a nymph of Crete, called Polyxo or Amalthea, by whom he had two daughters, Nyctimene and Antiope The first of these disgraced herself by her criminal amours with her father, into whose bed she introduced herself by means of her nurse. When the father knew the incest which he had committed, he attempted to stab his daughter, who was immediately changed by Minerva into an owl Nycteus made war against Epopeus, who had carried away Antiope, and died of a wound which he had received in an engagement, leaving his kingdom to his brother Lycus, whom he intreated to continue the war, and punish Antiope for her immodest conduct. (Vid. Antiope.) Paus 2, 6. — Hygin fab 157 et 204. — Ovid. Met 2, 590, &c. 6, 110, &c.

NYCTIMENE, a daughter of Nycteus. Vid. Nycteus

NYCTIMUS, a son of Lycaon, king of Arcadia. He died without issue, and left his kingdom to his nephew Arcas, the son of Callisto Pans. 8, 4.

NYMPHÆ, certain female deities among the ancients. They are said to have derived their name from the circumstance of their always having a youthful appearance, ἀπο τοῦ ἀει νέας φαίνεσθαι. They were generally divided into two classes, nymphs of the land, and nymphs of the sea. Of the nymphs of the earth, some presided over woods, and were called Dryades from δρὺς arbor, and Hamadryades, from ἅμα, simul, and δρὺς, arbor. These were supposed to come into existence when the tree was first planted, and when it perished, to die also; others presided over mountains, and were called Oreades, from ὄρος, mons, some presided over hills and dales, and were called Napææ, from νάπη, vallis &c. Of the sea nymphs, some were called Oceanides, Nereides, Naiades, Potamides, Limnades, &c. These presided not only over the sea, but also over rivers, fountains, streams, and lakes The nymphs fixed their residence not only in the sea, but also on mountains, rocks, in woods or caverns, and their grottos were beautified by evergreens, and delightful and romantic scenes. The nymphs were immortal, according to the opinion of some mythologists; others supposed that, like men, they were subject to mortality, though their lives were of long duration. They lived for several thousand years, according to Hesiod, or as Plutarch seems obscurely to intimate, they lived about 9720 years. The number of the nymphs is not precisely known They were according to Hesiod above 3000, whose power was extended over the different places of the earth, and the various functions and occupations of mankind They were worshipped by the ancients, though not with so much solemnity as the superior deities. They had no temples raised to their honour, and the only offerings they received were milk, honey, oil, and sometimes the sacrifice of a goat. They were generally represented as young and beautiful virgins, clothed up to the middle, and sometimes they held a vase, from which they seemed to pour water. Sometimes they had grass, leaves, and shells, instead of vases. It was deemed unfortunate to see them naked, and such sight was generally attended by a delirium, to which Propertius seems to allude in this verse, wherein he speaks of the innocence and simplicity of the primitive ages of the world, Nec fuerat nudas passa videre Deas.

The nymphs were generally distinguished by an epithet which denoted the place of their residence; thus the nymphs of Sicily were called Sicelides; those of Corycus, Coryciides, &c. Ovid Met. 1, 320 5, 412. 9, 651, &c. Fast 3, 769 — Paus 10, 3 — Plut de Orac. Def — Propert 3, 12

NYMPHÆUM, a place in the territory of Apollonia, in Illyricum, remarkable for a mine of asphaltus, of which several ancient writers have given a description. Near this spot was some rising ground whence fire was constantly seen to issue, without, however, injuring either the grass or the trees that grew there Strabo supposes it to have arisen from a mine of bitumen liquified, there being a hill in the vicinity whence this substance was dug out, the earth which was removed being in process of time converted into pitch, as it had been stated by Posidonius. Pliny says this spot was considered as oracular, which is confirmed by Dio Cassius, who describes at length the mode of consulting the oracle. The phenomenon noticed by the writers here mentioned, has been verified by modern travellers as existing near the village of Selenitsa, on the left bank of the Aous, and near the junction of that river with the Sulchitsa. From Livy it appears that there was a Roman encampment here for some time during the Macedonian war. Plutarch tells an amusing story of a satyr having been caught asleep in this vicinity and brought to Sylla the Roman commander who was then on the spot. Aristot Mirand. Auscult.—Ælian. Var. Hist. 13. 16.—Plin. 24, 7. Strab. 7.—Dio Cass. 41.—Liv. 42. 36 et 49.—Plut. in Syll.——A promontory of Athos, on the Singitic gulf, now Cape S. Georgio——A city in the Tauric Chersonese, on the route from Theodosia to Panticapæum, and having a good port on the Euxine.

NYMPHÆUS, a river of Armenia Major, which, according to Procopius formed a separation between the Roman and Persian empires. It ran from north to south, entered the town of Martyropolis, and discharged itself into the Tigris south-east of Amida. Amm Marcell. 18, 9.

NYMPHIDIUS, a favourite of Nero, who said that he was descended from Caligula. He was raised to the consular dignity, and soon after disputed the empire with Galba. He was slain by the soldiers, &c. Tacit Ann 15.

NYMPHODORUS, a native of Syracuse, whose era is uncertain. He wrote a work on the "Navigation along the coasts of Asia," and another on the "Wonders in Sicily and Sardinia."

NYMPHOLEPTES, or NYMPHOMANES, possessed by the nymphs. This name was given to the inhabitants of mount Cithæron, who believed that they were inspired by the nymphs. Plut. in Arist.

NYSA, a city of India, called also Dionysopolis, from its having been sacred to Bacchus, who made it the seat of his empire, and the capital of the eastern nations whom he had conquered. It was situated at the foot of a mountain named Meros, where Bacchus was educated by the nymphs of the place, and hence the fable of his having been confined in the thigh (μηρὸς) of his father, the mountain was also called Nysa, and it was from this name as well as from that of his father (Διὸς and Νυσα) that he is stated to have obtained the name of Dionysius. Mela, 3, 7. Ovid. Met. 4, 15, &c.—Ital. 7 198.—Curt 8, 10.—Virg. Æn 6, 805——A city of Arabia Felix, where Osiris was nurtured. Diod. Sic 1, 15.——A city of Cappadocia, on the Halys, between Parnassus and Ophlimus, now Nous Shehr.——A city of Caria, called also Pythopolis, on the slope of mount Messogis, in the valley of the Mæander. Strabo studied here under Aristodemus. It is now Nasli or Nosli. Strab. 14.—Plin. 5, 29.——A place in Eubœa, where the vine was said to put forth leaves, and to bear fruit the same day.——A small town of Bœotia, on mount Helicon——A town in the island of Naxos.

NYSÆUS, a surname of Bacchus, because he was worshipped at Nysa. Propert. 3, 17, 23.——A son of Dionysius of Syracuse. Cor. Nep. in Dion

NYSIADES, a name given to the nymphs of Nysa to whose care Jupiter intrusted the education of his son Bacchus. Ovid Met. 3 314, &c

O

OARSES, the original name of Artaxerxes Memnon.

OARUS, a river of Sarmatia, falling into the Palus Mæotis. Herod. 4, 123.

OASIS, a fertile spot in the midst of a desert. The word was formed by the Greeks from the Arabic Wah (Vah or Oash). It is specifically applied to the "green islands" which are found studding the Libyan desert, and which are four in number, the Oasis Magna, of which the principal town is El Karjeh the Oasis Parva, or that of El Kassar, the Northern or Ammonian Oasis, called also the Oasis of Siwah; and the Western Oasis, which, not being on any route, has been less frequented and was unknown to Europe till visited by Sir Archibald Edmonstone in 1818. Each Oasis consists of several villages, dependent upon springs, to the existence of which these spots owe their luxuriant fertility. Under the empire, the region of the Oases, called by the Arabian geographers, Al Wahat (or Alouhat) was attached to the Heptanomis; and after the establishment of Christianity, it was a district of some importance, including the seats of two Coptic bishops. They were used by the Roman emperors as places of exile; among those who were banished to them were the poet Juvenal and Nestorius. They all abound with interesting vestiges of antiquity. Seven days to the west of the Oasis of Siwah is another, called the Oasis of Augila, which is on the route to Fezzan. These spots are invaluable for the purposes of commercial intercourse, as facilitating the passage of the desert. Strab. 17.—Zoëga, 5, 97.—Herod. 3, 26.

OAXES, a river of Crete which received its name from Oaxus the son of Apollo. It is now the Mylopotamo, and is apparently one of the most considerable streams in the island. Virg. Ecl. 1, 66

OAXUS, a town of Crete, on the northern side of the island, at the mouth, probably, of the Oaxes. It was the capital of a kingdom which had its appropriate sovereign, and was said to have been founded by Oaxus, the son of Apollo. Herod 4, 154.

OBRINGA, a river of Germany, forming the line of separation between Germania Superior and Inferior. It is now the Ahr.

OBSEQUENS, Julius, a Latin writer who flourished A. D. 395. He wrote a treatise De Prodigiis, which is nothing more than a list of the wonders recorded by Livy. The best edition is that of Kapp, Cur. Regn. 1772, 8vo OCALEA, a town of Bœotia, where Rhadamanthus fled after his marriage with Alcmena. Apollod. 2.—Homer. Il 2, 501.

OCEANIDES and OCEANITIDES, sea nymphs, daughters of Oceanus, from whom they received their name, and of the goddess Tethys. They were 3000 according to Apollodorus, who mentions the names of seven of them; Asia, Styx, Electra, Doris, Eurynome, Amphitrite, and Metis. Hesiod speaks of the eldest of them, and reckons forty one, Pitho, Admete, Prymno, Ianthe, Rhodia, Hippo, Callirhoe, Urania Clymene, Idya, Pasithoe, Clythia, Zeuxo, Galaxaure, Plexaure, Perseis, Pluto, Thoe, Polydora Melobosis, Dione, Cerceis Xanthe, Acasta, Ianira, Telestho, Europa, Menestho, Petrea, Eudora, Calypso, Tyche, Ocyroe, Orisia, Amphiro, with those mentioned by Apollodorus, except Amphitrite. Hyginus mentions sixteen, whose names are almost all different from those of Apollodorus and Hesiod, which difference proceeds from the mutilation of the original text. The Oceanides, like the rest of the inferior deities, were honoured with libations and sacrifices. Prayers were offered to them, and they were intreated to protect sailors from storms and dangerous tempests. The Argonauts, before they proceeded on their expedition, made an offering of flour, honey, and oil, on the sea-shore, to all the deities of the sea, and sacrificed bulls to them, and intreated their protection. When the sacrifice was made on the sea-shore, the blood of the victim was received in a vessel, but when it was in the open sea, the blood was permitted to run down into the waters. When the sea was calm, the sailors generally offered a lamb or a young pig; but if it was agitated by the winds and rough, a black bull was deemed the most acceptable victim., Homer Od. 3 - Apollon Argo.—Virg. G. 4, 341. Hesiod. Theog. 349.

OCEANUS, a powerful deity of the sea, son of Cœlus and Terra. He married Tethys, by whom he had the principal rivers, such as the Alpheus, Peneus, Strymon, &c., with a number of daughters who are called from him Oceanides. [Vid. Oceanides.] According to Homer, Oceanus was the father of all the gods, and on that account he received frequent visits from the rest of the deities. He is generally represented as an old man with a long flowing beard, and sitting upon the waves of the sea. He often holds a pike in his hand while ships under sail appear at a distance, or a sea-monster stands near him. Oceanus presided over every part of the sea, and even the rivers were subjected to his power. The ancients were superstitious in their worship of Oceanus, and revered with great solemnity a deity to whose care they entrusted themselves when going on any voyage.——Besides being the name of a deity, the term Oceanus (Ὠκεανός) occurs in Homer in another sense also. It is made to signify an immense stream, which, according to the rude ideas of that early age, circulated around the terraqueous plain, and from which the different seas ran out in the manner of bays. This opinion, which is also that of Eratosthenes, was prevalent even in the time of Herodotus. Homer terms the ocean ἀψόῤῥοος, because it thus flowed back into itself. This same river Oceanus was supposed to ebb and flow thrice in the course of a single day, and the heavenly bodies were believed to descend into it at their setting, and emerge from it at their rising. Hence the term δυσώνυμος sometimes put for the immense sea. In Homer, therefore, δυσώνυμος and ἀθέσφατος always mean different things, the latter merely denoting the sea in the more modern acceptation of the term. On the shield of Achilles the poet represents the Oceanus as encircling the rim or extreme border of the shield, in full accordance with the popular belief of the day; whereas in Virgil's time, when this primitive meaning of the term was obsolete, and more correct geographical views had come in, we find the sea (the idea being borrowed probably from the position of the Mediterranean) occupying in the poet's description the centre of the shield of Æneas. If it be asked, whether any traces of this peculiar meaning of the term ὠκεανός occurs in other writers besides Homer, the following authorities, in favour of the affirmative, may be cited in reply. Hesiod Theog. 242. Herc. Clyp. 314.—Eurip. Oresl. 1371. Orph. Hymn. 10, 14.

OCNIA, a woman who presided over the sacred rites of Vesta for fifty-seven years with the greatest sanctity. She died in the reign of Tiberius. Tacit. Ann. 2, 86.

OCELLUS, surnamed Lucanus, from his having been a native of Lucania, a Pythagorean philosopher, who flourished about 450 B. C. He wrote a work "on the Universe," which has come down to us entire. In the form in which it now appears, indeed, it is not written in the Doric dialect, after the usual manner of the Pythagoreans, but that it was originally composed in that dialect, is evident from fragments of it in Stobæus. It is probable that it was converted from the Doric to the Attic by some learned grammarian, at a period when the writings of the Pythagoreans became obscure, on account of the dialect in which they were written. This remnant of philosophical antiquity is a specimen of the Pythagorean doctrine, intermixed with tenets peculiar to the author. He maintained that the universe never had a beginning, nor will have an end; that the world, in its present beautiful form, is to be distinguished from the universe of which it is formed; and that the collection of all beings which forms the world is itself perfect and entire, and has no connexion with any thing existinic. The immutable essences of Ocellus are the same with the intelligible natures of Pythagoras; and the doctrine of Ocellus concerning demons, that they inhabit the sublunar regions, is essentially different from that of Aristotle, who supposed no such intelligences, except in the celestial sphere. The best editions of Ocellus are, that of Batteux, Paris, 1768, 3 vols. 12mo, and that of Rudolph, Lips. 1801, 8vo.

OCELLUM, a city in Hispania Terraconensis, in the territory of the Vettones; now Fermoselle.——A city of Gallia Cisalpina, among the Cottian Alps, on the eastern borders of the kingdom of Cottius. According to Manners, it is now Avigliana, a small town with a castle, in Piedmont, not far from Turin. Cæs. B. G. 1, 10.

OCHUS, a title given to Artaxerxes 3d, and Darius 2d, kings of Persia. It is thought to have denoted in the Persian tongue, "excellence," "worth."——A river of Bactriana, rising in the mountains that lie northward of the source of the Arius, and falling into the Oxus. It is now the Dehasch. Plin. 6, 17.

OCNUS, a son of the Tiber and of Manto, who assisted Æneas against Turnus. He built a town which he called Mantua after his mother's name. Some suppose that he is the same as Bianor. Virg. Ecl. 9. Æn. 10, 198.——A man remarkable for his industry. He had a wife as remarkable for her profusion, who always consumed and lavished away whatever the labours of her husband had earned. He is represented as twisting a cord, which an ass standing by eats up as soon as he makes it, whence the proverb of Ocnus funem torquet, or contorquet piger funiculum, often applied to labour which meets no return, and which is totally lost. This fable was represented at Delphi by the pencil of Polygnotus, and it likewise engaged the labours of the painter Socrates, according to Pliny. Propert 4, 3, 21. - Plin 35, 11.- Pens. 10, 29.

OCRICULUM, a town of Umbria, below the junction of the Nar and Tiber, and a few miles from the bank of the latter river, now Otricoli. Here Fabius Maximus, when dictator, took the command of the army under Servilius, and ordered that consul to approach his presence without lictors. Liv. 9, 41. 22, 11. - Flor. 3, 18.—Strab. 5.—Cic. pro Mil.

OCRIDION, a king of Rhodes who was reckoned in the number of the gods after death. Plut. in Grec. quæst. 27.

OCTAVIA, a Roman lady, sister to the emperor Augustus, and celebrated for her beauty and virtues. She married Claudius Marcellus, and after his death, M. Antony. Her marriage with Antony was a political step to reconcile her brother and her husband. Antony proved for some time attentive to her, but he soon after despised her for Cleopatra, and when she attempted to withdraw him from this unlawful amour by going to meet him at Athens, she was secretly rebuked and totally banished from his presence. This affront was highly resented by Augustus, and though Octavia endeavoured to pacify him by palliating her husband's behaviour he resolved to revenge her cause by arms. After the battle of Actium and the death of Antony, Octavia, forgetful of the injuries she had received, took into her house all the children of her husband, and treated them with maternal tenderness. Marcellus, her son by her first husband, was married to a niece of Augustus, and publicly intended as a successor to his uncle. His sudden death plunged all his family into the greatest grief. Virgil, whom Augustus patronized, undertook upon himself to pay a melancholy tribute to the memory of a young man whom Rome regarded as her future father and patron. He was desired to repeat his composition in the presence of Augustus and of his sister. Octavia burst into tears as soon as the poet began; but when he mentioned Tu Marcellus eris, she swooned away. This tender and pathetic encomium upon the merit and the virtues of young Marcellus was liberally rewarded by Octavia, and Virgil received 10,000 sesterces for every one of the verses. Octavia had two daughters by Antony, Antonia Major and Antonia Minor. The elder married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom she had Cn. Domitius, the father of the emperor Nero by Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus. Antonia Minor, who was as virtuous and as beautiful as her mother, married Drusus, the son of Tiberius, by whom she had Germanicus, and Claudius who reigned before Nero. The death of Marcellus continually preyed upon the mind of Octavia, who died of melancholy, in her fifty fourth year, about ten years before the Christian era. Her brother paid great regard to her memory by pronouncing her funeral oration himself. The Roman people also showed their respect for her virtues by their wish to pay her divine honours. Suet. in Aug 61.—Plut in Anton. &c.——A daughter of the emperor Claudius by Messalina. She was betrothed to Silanus, but by the intrigues of Agrippina, she was married to the emperor Nero in the sixteenth year of her age. She was soon after divorced on pretence of barrenness, and the emperor married Poppæa, who expressed her enmity upon Octavia by causing her to be banished into Campania. She was afterwards recalled at the instance of the people, and Poppæa, who was resolved on her ruin, caused her again to be banished to an island, where she was ordered to kill herself by opening her veins. Her head was cut off and carried to Poppæa. Suet. in Claud. 27. In Ner. 7 et 35. Tacit. Ann. 14, 63.

OCTAVIANUS, or OCTAVIUS CÆSAR, the nephew of Cæsar the dictator. After the battle of Actium, and the final destruction of the Roman republic, the senate bestowed upon him the title and surname of Augustus, as expressive of his greatness and dignity. Vid. Augustus.

OCTAVIUS, Cn., a Roman, governor of Sardinia, successfully employed in the 1st Punic war, and afterwards engaged in honourable embassies. Liv. 26, &c.——Cneus, another, who commanded the Roman fleet against Perseus. The king surrendered to him in Samothrace, and Cneus, after conducting the royal captive and the Macedonian treasures to Rome, obtained a naval triumph. He was assassinated by Leptines, at Laodicea, when ambassador in Asia, and a statue was erected to his honour in the Roman forum. Cic. Phil. 9, 2. - Plin 34, 6. - Liv. 45, 5.——His son Cneus was also consul with T. Annius, A. U. C. 625, and his grandson Cneus was also consul A. U. C. 667, with Cinna, whom he expelled from the city. Cinna revenged the insult, and at the head of an army, and supported by the influence of Marius, he returned to Rome, and after putting his antagonist to death, he ignominously fixed his head on the rostra of the forum. Cneus was admired for his eloquence, as well as his integrity. Cic. Fr. 3. 3 Br. 47. Plane. 21 Har. 25 Cat. 3, 10 Flor. 3, 21.—Appian. B. Civ.——Cneus, the father of Augustus, was respected for his great virtues and superior abilities. As governor of Macedonia he conducted himself with spirit, bravery, and moderation, and after destroying the remains of Spartacus and Catiline's conspiracy at Thurii, and defeating the Thracians and Bessi, he received the honourable appellation of imperator, from the gratitude and affection of his troops. He died suddenly on his return from Macedonia to Rome, whilst he meditated to offer himself a candidate for the consulship. He left two daughters, besides Augustus, who was then only four years old. Suet. in Aug.—Patero 2, 59.—Cic. Q. Fr. 1, 1.——A lieutenant of Crassus in Parthia. He accompanied his general to the tent of the Parthian conqueror, and was killed by the enemy as he attempted to hinder them from carrying away Crassus.——A tribune of the people at Rome, whom Tib. Gracchus, his colleague, deposed.——A poet in the Augustan age, intimate with Horace. He also distinguished himself as a historian. Horat. Sat. 1, 10, 83.

OCTODŪRUS, a town of the Veragri, in Gallia Narbonensis. It was situate in the Vallis Penina, on the river Dranса or Drance, near its junction with the Rhone, at a considerable distance above the influx of the latter into the Lacus Lemanus, or Lake of Geneva. It is now Martigny. Cæs. B G. 3, 1.

OCTOGĒSA, a town of Spain, a little above the mouth of the Iberus, on the north bank of that river, where it is joined by the Sicoris. It is generally supposed to answer to the modern Mequinenza. Cæs B Civ. 1, 61.

OCYPĒTE, one of the Harpies who infected whatever she touched. The name signifies swiftflying (ὠκὺς and πέτομαι.)

OCYRŌE, a daughter of Chiron by Charicle, who had the gift of prophecy. She was changed into a mare. [Vid. Melanippe.] Ovid. Met. 2, 638, &c.

ODENATUS, king of Palmyra, was originally a native and a leading inhabitant of that city, though some make him a prince of a tribe of Saracens, who dwelt in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates. After Sapor, king of Persia, had rendered himself formidable throughout the east, by the defeat of the Roman emperor Valerian, A. D. 260, he received from Odenatus a present of several camels laden with rich merchandise, accompanied with a submissive letter, protesting that he had never borne arms against the Persians. Sapor was enraged that he should presume to write to him, and threatened to destroy him, and exterminate his whole family, unless he came, and, with his hands tied behind him, elicited forgiveness. Odenatus spurned the conditions, and levelled an army, declared for the Romans. To him is ascribed the success of an expedition in which Sapor's treasures, and several of his wives and children, were captured; and so closely did he press upon the Persian, that he forced him to retreat, and cut off his rear in passing the Euphrates. After these exploits, Odenatus assumed the title of king of Palmyra, and elevated his wife, the celebrated Zenobia, to the rank of queen. Gallienus, the son and colleague of Valerian, intrusted Odenatus with the chief command of the Roman army in the east. In this quality he entered Mesopotamia, defeated Sapor in his own country, and laid siege to Ctesiphon, during the distracted state of the empire under Gallienus, Odenatus remained faithful to him, and kept the eastern section in tranquillity. On this account he was treated Augustus and partner in the empire by Gallienus, in the year 264. Zenobia was dignified at the same time with the title of Augusta, and their children with that of Cæsar. In a second incursion into the territories of Sapor, he ravaged the country and took Ctesiphon. On his return from this expedition, he marched against the Goths or Scythians, who had invaded Asia, and compelled them to make a hasty retreat. Shortly after this he fell a victim to domestic treason, and his favourite amusement of hunting was the occasion of his death. His nephew, Mæonius, presumed to throw his javelin before that of his uncle; and, though admonished of his error, repeated the same. Odenatus was provoked at this show of insolence, took away his horse, a mark of infamy among the barbarians, and ordered the youth into confinement for a short time. The offence was soon forgotten, but the punishment was remembered, and Mæonius caused his uncle to be assassinated in the midst of a great entertainment. Herod, the son of Odenatus by a former wife, was killed with his father. This tragedy is said to have been acted at Emesa, in the year 267. Odenatus was a prince of great qualities, and one who well merited the high rank to which he had raised himself.

ODESSUS, a city on the coast of Mœsia Inferior, to the east of Marcianopolis. It was founded by a colony of Milesians, and is now Varna in Bulgaria. It was also called Odessopolis. Mela, 2, 2.—Plin. 11.—Ovid. Trist. 1, 9, 37.

ODEUM, a musical theatre at Athens. It was built by Pericles, and was so constructed as to imitate the form of Xerxes' tent. It was set on fire by Aristion, general of Mithridates, who defended Athens against Sylla. It was subsequently restored at the expense of Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia. Plut. Vit. Pericl.—Appian. in Mithr.—Vitruv. 5, 9.

ODITES, a son of Ixion, killed by Mopsus at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, 457.—A prince killed at the nuptials of Andromeda. Id. Ib. 5, 97.

ODOACER, a king of the Heruli, who destroyed the western empire of Rome, and called himself king of Italy, A. D. 476.

ODRYSÆ, one of the most powerful and warlike of the Thracian tribes. Their dominions extended at one time from Abdera and the Nestus, along the whole coast, as far as the mouths of the Ister, and reached as far inland as the source of the Strymon; but they were afterwards very much circumscribed, being confined within a small territory on the banks of the Hebrus, about Adrianople. Herod. 7, 137.—Thucyd. 2, 29.

ODYSSEA, one of Homer's epic poems in which he describes in twenty-four books the adventures of Ulysses on his return from the Trojan war, with other material circumstances. The whole of the action comprehends no more than fifty-five days. Though not so esteemed as the Iliad for boldness of genius and fire of description, yet the Odyssey claims an equal share of approbation for the dignity of its characters. Instead of carnage and blood, we here admire the social virtues, we accompany the hero into domestic scenes, share with him the sweets of private life, admire the steadiness of friendship tried by time and by calamity, and bless the hand of ancient hospitality which indiscriminately was open to those who laboured under distress or indigence. The Iliad possesses the powers of the meridian sun, according to the beautiful expression of Longinus, and the Odyssey still preserves the majesty and the serenity of the setting sun. (Id. Homerus.)—A city in Hispania Bætica, to the north of Abdera, founded, according to tradition, by Ulysses. Strab. 3.

ŒA, a town in the island of Ægina, about 20 stadia from the capital. Herod. 5, 83.—A city on the coast of Africa, between the two Syrtes, and forming together with Sabrata and Leptis Magna, the district called Tripolis. It derived all its importance from the Romans leading hither a colony of Sicilians, who were afterwards joined by the neighbouring Libyans. It is now replaced by Tripoli, the metropolis of the modern state of this name. Plin. 5, 4. Sil. Ital. 3, 257.

ŒAGRUS or ŒAGER, the father of Orpheus by Calliope. He was king of Thrace, and from him mount Hæmus, and also the Hebrus, one of the rivers of the country, have received the appellation of Œagrius. Ovid. in Ib. 454.—Virg. G. 4, 524.—Apollod. 1, 3.

ŒAX, a son of Nauplius and Clymene. He was brother to Palamedes, whom he accompanied to the Trojan war, and whose death he highly resented on his return to Greece, by raising disturbances in the family of some of the Grecian princes. Dictys Cret.—Apollod. 2.—Hygin. fab. 117.

ŒBALIA, the ancient name of Laconia, which it received from king Œbalus, and thence Œbalides puer is applied to Hyacinthus as a native of the country, and Œbalius sanguis is used to denominate his blood. Faus 3, 1.—Apollod. 3, 10.—The same name is given to Tarentum, because built by a Lacedæmonian colony, whose ancestors were governed by Œbalus. Virg. G. 4, 125.—Sil. 12, 451.

ŒBALIDES, a patronymic applied to Castor and Pollux, the grandsons of Œbalus, and also to Hyacinthus Ovid. Fast. 5, 705. Met 10, 196.

ŒBALUS, a son of Argalus or Cynortas, who was king of Laconia. He married Gorgophone, the daughter of Perseus, by whom he had Hippocoon, Tyndarus, &c Paus. 3, 1.—Apollod. 3, 10 ——A son of Telon and the nymph Sebethis who reigned at Capreæ in the neighbourhood of Neapolis in Italy Virg Æn. 7, 734.

OBARES, a groom of Darius, son of Hystaspes. He was the cause that his master obtained the kingdom of Persia, by his artifice in making his horse neigh first (Vid. Darius 1st) Herod. 3, 85.—Justin 1, 10

ŒCHALIA, a city of Thessaly, in the district of Estiæotis. Homer. Il. 2, 730.——A city of Etolia, belonging to the tribe of Eurytanes. Strab. 10 ——A city of Eubœa, where Eurytus reigned, and which was destroyed by Hercules. Soph. Trach. 74.——A city of Messenia, according to some the residence of Eurytus. Paus. 4, 33.—Homer. Il 2, 596.

ŒCUMENIUS, an ancient Greek commentator upon the Scriptures, who is supposed to have flourished in the tenth century, was bishop of Trieca in Thessaly. He was the author of Commentaries upon the Acts of the Apostles, the fourteen epistles of St Paul, and the seven Catholic epistles, which, besides his own remarks, contain those of many of the ancient fathers. He is thought to have written a commentary upon the four Gospels, but this is not extant. His works were published in Greek at Verona in 1532, and in Greek and Latin at Paris in 1631, in 2 vols fol.

ŒDIPUS, a son of Laius, king of Thebes, and Jocasta. As being descended from Venus by his father's side, Œdipus was born to be exposed to all the calamities and persecutions which Juno could inflict upon the posterity of the goddess of beauty. Laius, the father of Œdipus, was informed by the oracle, that as soon as he married Jocasta, he must perish by the hands of his son. Such dreadful intelligence awakened his fears, and to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle, he resolved never to approach Jocasta, but his solemn resolutions were violated in a fit of intoxication The queen became pregnant, and Laius, still intent to stop the evil, ordered his wife to destroy her child as soon as it came into the world. The mother had not the courage to obey, yet she gave the child as soon as born to one of her domestics, with orders to expose him on the mountains. The servant was moved with pity, but to obey the command of Jocasta, he bored the feet of the child, and suspended him with a twig by the heels to a tree on mount Cithæron, where he was soon found by one of the shepherds of Polybus, king of Corinth. The shepherd carried him home; and Periboea, the wife of Polybus, who had no children, educated him as her own child, with maternal tenderness. The accomplishments of the infant, who was named Œdipus on account of the swelling of his feet (οἰδέω, tumeo, swell, pes,) soon became the admiration of the age. His companions envied his strength and his address; and one of them, to mortify his rising ambition, told him he was an illegitimate child. This raised his doubts; he asked Periboea, who, out of tenderness, told him that his suspicions were ill founded. Not satisfied with this, he went to consult the oracle of Delphi, and was there told not to return home, for, if he did, he must necessarily be the murderer of his father, and the husband of his mother. This answer of the oracle terrified him; he knew no home but the house of Polybus, therefore he resolved not to return to Corinth, where such calamities apparently attended him. He travelled towards Phocis, and in his journey met in a narrow road Laius on a chariot with his armour-bearer. Laius haughtily ordered Œdipus to make way for him. Œdipus refused, and a conteft ensued, in which Laius and his armour-bearer were both killed. As Œdipus was ignorant of the quality and of the rank of the men whom he had just killed, he continued his journey, and was attracted to Thebes by the fame of the Sphynx. This terrible monster, which Juno had sent to lay waste the country, (Vid. Sphynx,) infested the neighbourhood of Thebes, and devoured all those who attempted to explain, without success, the enigmas which he proposed. The calamity was now become an object of public concern, and as the successful explanation of an enigma would end in the death of the Sphynx, Creon, who, at the death of Laius, had ascended the throne of Thebes, promised his crown and Jocasta to him who succeeded in the attempt. The enigma proposed was this: What animal in the morning walks upon four feet, at noon upon two, and in the evening upon three? This was left for Œdipus to explain; he came to the monster and said, that man in the morning of life walks upon his hands and his feet; when he has attained the years of manhood, he walks upon his two legs; and in the evening, he supports his old age with the assistance of a staff. The monster, mortified at the true explanation, dashed her head against a rock and perished. Œdipus ascended the throne of Thebes, and married Jocasta, by whom he had two sons, Polynices and Eteocles, and two daughters, Ismena and Antigone. Some years after, the Theban territories were visited with a plague; and the oracle declared that it should cease, only when the murderer of king Laius was banished from Bœotia. As the death of Laius had never been examined, and the circumstances that attended it never known, this answer of the oracle was of the greatest concern to the Thebans; but Œdipus, the friend of his people, resolved to overcome every difficulty by the most exact inquiries. His researches were successful, and he was soon proved to be the murderer of his father. The melancholy discovery was rendered the more alarming, when Œdipus considered that he had not only murdered his father, but that he had committed incest with his mother. In the excess of his grief he put out his eyes, as unworthy to see the light, and banished himself from Thebes, or, as some say, was banished by his own sons. He retired towards Attica, led by his daughter Antigone, and came near Colonus, where there was a grove sacred to the Furies. He remembered that he was doomed by the oracle to die in such a place, and to become the source of prosperity to the country in which his bones were buried. A messenger upon this was sent to Theseus, king of the country, to inform him of the resolution of Œdipus. When Theseus arrived, Œdipus acquainted him, with a prophetic voice, that the gods had called him to die in the place where he stood; and to show the truth of this, he walked, himself, without the assistance of a guide to the spot where he must expire. Immediately the earth opened, and Œdipus disappeared. Some suppose that Œdipus had not children by Jocasta, and that the mother murdered herself as soon as she knew the incest which had been committed. His tomb was near the Areopagus, in the age of Pausanias Some of the ancient poets represent him in hell, as suffering the punishment which crimes like his seemed to deserve. According to some, the four children which he had were by Eurigana, the daughter of Periphas, whom he married after the death of Jocasta. Apollod 3, 5 —Hygin fab. 66, &c.—*Sophocl. ŒNEUS, a king of Calydon in Ætolia, son of Parthaon or Portheus, and Euryte. He married Althæa, the daughter of Thestius, by whom he had Clymenus, Meleager, Gorge, and Dejanira After Althæa's death, he married Peribœa, the daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus In a general sacrifice, which Œneus made to all the gods upon reaping the rich produce of his fields, he forgot Diana, and the goddess, to revenge this unpardonable neglect, incited his neighbours to take up arms against him, and besides she sent a wild boar to lay waste the country of Calydon. The animal was at last killed by Meleager and the neighbouring princes of Greece, in a celebrated chace, known by the name of the chace of the Calydonian boar. Some time after Meleager died, and Œneus was driven from his kingdom by the sons of his brother Agrius. Diomedes, however, his grandson, soon restored him to his throne; but the continual misfortunes to which he was exposed, rendered him melancholy. He exiled himself from Calydon, and left his crown to his son-in-law Andræmon. He died as he was going to Argolis. His body was buried by the care of Diomedes in a town of Argolis, which from him received the name of Œnoe It is reported that Œneus received a visit from Bacchus, and that he suffered the god to enjoy the favours of Althæa, and to become the father of Dejanira, for which Bacchus permitted that the wine of which he was the patron should be called among the Greeks by the name of Œneus (οἶνος) Hygin. fab. 129.—Apollod. 1, 8. *Homer. ŒNOE, a demus or borough of Attica, belonging to the tribe Æantis. Strab 8 ——Another borough of Attica, on the confines of Bœotia near Eleutheræ. It belonged to the tribe of Hippothoon. Strab 8.——A small Corinthian fortress, near the promontory of Olmiæ. Strab 8.—Xen. Hist Gr. 4, 5, 3 ——A city of Elis, thought by some to be the same with Ephyre, seated near the sea on the road leading from Elis to the coast, and 120 stadia from that city. Strab. 8.——A town of Argolis, between Argos and Mantinea, and on the Arcadian frontier. It was said to have been founded by Diomed, and named after his grandfather Œneus The site of this place is still called Enoe Paus. 2, 25. Apollod 1, 8, 6.

ŒNOMAUS, a son of Mars by Sterope, the daughter of Atlas. He was king of Pisa in Elis, and father of Hippodamia by Euarete, daughter of Acrisius, or Eurythoa, the daughter of Danaus, He was informed by the oracle that he should perish by the hands of his son-in-law, therefore as he could skilfully drive a chariot, he determined to marry his daughter only to him who could outrun him; on condition that all who entered the list should agree to lay down their lives if conquered. Many had already perished, when Pelops, son of Tantalus, proposed himself He previously bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, by promising him the enjoyment of the favours of Hippodamia, if he proved victorious. Myrtilus gave his master an old chariot, whose axle-tree broke on the course, which was from Pisa to the Corinthian isthmus, and Œnomaus was killed. Pelops married Hippodamia, and became king of Pisa. As he expired, Œnomaus entreated Pelops to revenge the perfidy of Myrtilus, which was executed. Those that had been defeated when Pelops entered the lists, were Marmax, Alcathous, Eurydius, Eurymachus, Capetus, Lasius, Acrius, Chalcodon, Lycurgus, Tricolonus, Prias, Aristomachus, Acolius, Eurythrus, and Chronius. Apollod. 2 4.—Paus. 5. 17 6, 11, &c. Propert. 1, 2, 20. Ovid. in Ib. 367. Art Am. 2, 8 Heroid. 5, 70.

ŒNONE, a nymph of mount Ida, daughter of the river Cebrenus in Phrygia. As she had received the gift of prophecy, she foretold to Paris, whom she married before he was discovered to be the son of Priam, that his voyage into Greece would be attended with the most serious consequences, and the total ruin of his country, and that he should have recourse to her medicinal knowledge at the hour of death. All these predictions were fulfilled, and Paris, when he had received the fatal wound, ordered his body to be carried to Œnone, in hopes of being cured by her assistance. He expired as he came into her presence; and Œnone was so struck at the sight of his dead body, that after bathing it with her tears, she stabbed herself to the earth. She was mother of Corythus by Paris, and this son perished by the hand of his father, when he attempted, at the instigation of Œnone, to persuade him to withdraw his affection from Helen. Dictys. Cret. —Ovid. de Rem. Amor 157. Heroid 5

ŒNOPIA, one of the ancient names of the island Ægina. Ovid. Met. 7, 473.

ŒNOPION, a son of Ariadne by Theseus, or, according to others by Bacchus. He married Helice, by whom he had a daughter called Hero, or Merope, of whom the giant Orion became enamoured. The father, unwilling to give his daughter to such a lover, and afraid of provoking him by an open refusal, evaded his applications, and at last put out his eyes when he was intoxicated. Some suppose that this violence was offered to Orion after he had dishonoured Merope Œnopion received the island of Chios from Rhadamanthus, who had conquered most of the islands of the Ægean sea, and his tomb was still seen there in the age of Pausanias. Some suppose, and with more probability, that he reigned not at Chios, but at Ægina, which from him was called Œnopia. Plut. in Thes.—Apollod. 1, 4.—Paus 7, 4.

ŒNOTRI, the inhabitants of Œnotria.

ŒNOTRIA, a name derived from the ancient race of the Œnotri, and in early use among the Greeks to designate a portion of the south-eastern coast of Italy. The name is said by some to have been obtained from Œnotrus, a Sabine or Latin chief, or from Œnotrus, a son of Lycaon, who led a colony of Arcadians thither; but by others from ολος the Greek word for wine. With the poets of a later age it is a general appellation for all Italy. The Œnotri, as they were called appear to have been spread over a large portion of southern Italy, and may be regarded, not as a very early branch of the primitive Italian stock, but rather as the last scion propagated in a southerly direction.

ŒNOTRIDES small islands, two in number, off the coast of Lucania, and a little above the promontory of Palinurus. They lay in front of the city of Velia, where the river Heles empties itself into the sea. Plin. 7, 7.

ŒNŌTRUS, a son of Lycaon of Arcadia. He passed into Magna Græcia with a colony, and gave the name of Œnotria to that part of the country where he settled. Dionys Hal. 1, 11.—Paus 1, 3

ŒNUS, a town of Laconia, supposed to have been situated on the river of the same name, flowing near Sellasia. The modern name is Ichelenna. Polyb 2, 65 — Liv. 34, 28.

ŒNUSSÆ, small islands in the Ægean sea, between Chios and the mainland, now Spalmadores, or Agonisi. Herod 1, 165. Thucyd 8, 24.—Plin 5, 31 ——Small islands off the coast of Messenia, and nearly facing the city of Methone They are two in number, and are now called Sapienza and Cabrera. Paus 4, 31.—Plin. 4 11.

ŒONUS, a son of Lycymnius, killed at Sparta, where he accompanied Hercules, who burned the body, and conveyed the ashes to his father Eustathius assigns two reasons why the custom of burning corpses came to be of such general use in Greece, the first is because bodies were thought to be unclean after the soul's departure, and therefore were purified by fire; the second reason is, that the soul being separated from the gross and inactive matter, might be at liberty to take its flight to the heavenly mansions.

ŒTA, a celebrated chain of mountains in Thessaly, whose eastern extremity in conjunction with the sea forms the famous pass of Thermopylæ. It extended its ramifications westward into the country of the Dorians, and still farther into Ætolia, while to the south it was connected with the mountains of Locris and those of Bœotia. Its modern name is Katavothra. Sophocles represents Jove as thundering on the lofty crags of Œta. The highest summit, according to Livy, was named Callidromus: it was occupied by Cato with a body of troops in the battle fought at the pass of Thermopylæ, between the Romans under Acilius Glabrio, and the army of Antiochus, and, owing to this manœuvre, the latter was entirely routed. Herodotus describes the path by which the Persian army turned the position of the Greeks, as beginning at the Asopus. Its name, as well as that of the mountain is Anopæa. It leads along this ridge as far as Alponus, the first Locrian town. On the summit of mount Œta were two castles, named Tichius and Rhodunitia, which were successfully defended by the Ætolians against the Romans. Liv. 36, 15 et 19.—Strab. 9 et 10 Herod. 7, 216 et 217.—Soph. Trach 436.—Plin 4, 7

ŒTÆUS, a town of Laconia, so called from an Argive hero of that name, was situate eighty stadia from Thalamæ. Homer has noticed it among the towns subject to Menelaus. Strabo observes it was usually called Tylus. Ptolemy writes the name Bitylia, and it is still known by that of Vitulo. Pausanias noticed here a temple of Serapis, and a statue of Apollo Carneius in the forum. Paus. 3, 20.—Homer. Il. 2, 585.—Strab. 8.

OFELLIUS, a man whom, though unpolished, Horace represents as a character exemplary for wisdom, economy, and moderation. Horat. Sat. 2, 2, 2.

OGLASA, a small island off the coast of Etruria, some distance below Planasia, famed for its wine, now Monte Cristo. Plin 3, 7.

OGULNIA LEX, by Q. and Cn. Ogulnius, tribunes of the commons, A. U. C. 453, that the number of the pontifices should be increased to eight, and of the augurs to nine, and that four of the former and five of the latter should be chosen from among the plebeians.

OGYGES, a celebrated monarch, the most ancient of those that reigned in Greece. He was son of Terra or, as some suppose, of Neptune, and married Thebe, the daughter of Jupiter. He reigned in Bœotia, which, from him, is sometimes called Ogygia, and his power was also extended over Attica It is supposed that he was of Egyptian or Phœnician extraction; but his origin, as well as the age in which he lived, and the duration of his reign, are so obscure and unknown, that the epithet of Ogygian is often applied to every thing of dark antiquity In the reign of Ogyges there was a deluge, which so inundated the territories of Attica, that they remained waste for near 200 years. This, though it is very uncertain, is supposed to have happened about 1764 years before the Christian era, previous to the deluge of Deucalion. According to some writers, it was owing to the overflowing of one of the rivers of the country. The reign of Ogyges was also marked by an uncommon appearance in the heavens, and as it is reported, the planet Venus changed her colour, diameter, figure, and her course. *Varro de R. The situation, and even the existence of Calypso's island, is disputed by some writers. Plin. 3, 10.- Homer. Od. 1, 52 et 55. 5, 254.

OGYRIS, an island in the Indian ocean.

OICLEUS, a son of Antiphates and Zeuxippe, who married Hypermnestra, daughter of Thestius, by whom he had Iphianira, Polybœa, and Amphiaraus. He was killed by Laomedon when defending the ships which Hercules had brought to Asia, when he made war against Troy. Homer. Od. 15, 243.- Diod. 4.—Apollod. 1, 8. 3, 6. —Paus. 6, 17.

OILEUS, a king of the Locrians. His father's name was Odoedocus, and his mother's Agriaonome. He married Eriope by whom he had Ajax, called Oileus from his father, to discriminate him from Ajax the son of Telamon. He had also another son called Medon, by a courtezan called Rhene. Oileus was one of the Argonauts. Virg. Æn. 1, 45.—Apollon. 1.—Hygin. fab. 14 et 18.- Homer Il 13, 697. 15, 336.—Apollod. 3, 10.

OLEÁROS. Vid Antiparos.

OLEN, styled by Pausanias the Hyperborean, was the head of a sacerdotal colony which came from the north, and established itself at first in Lycia. Olen afterwards retired to Delos, whither he transplanted the worship of Apollo and Diana, and the birth of which deities in the country of the Hyperboreans, he celebrated in his hymns. He made the Greeks acquainted with Ilythia, a goddess of the north, who assisted Latona in her delivery. The recital of the odes of this ancient poet was accompanied with solemn shows and dances. He flourished long before the time of Orpheus

OLYMPIA, (orum,) celebrated games which received their name either from Olympia where they were observed, or from Jupiter Olympius, to whom they were dedicated They were, according to some, instituted by Jupiter after his victory over the Titans, and first observed by the Idæi Dactyli, B. C. 1453. Some attribute the institution to Pelops, after he had obtained a victory over Œnomaus and married Hippodamia; but the more probable, and indeed the more received opinion is, that they were first established by Hercules in honour of Jupiter Olympius, after a victory obtained over Augias, B. C 1222. Strabo objects to this opinion, by observing, that if they had been established in the age of Homer, the poet would have undoubtedly spoken of them, as he is in every particular careful in mentioning the amusements and diversions of the ancient Greeks. But they were neglected after their first institution by Hercules, and no notice was taken of them according to many writers, till Iphitus, in the age of the lawgiver of Sparta, renewed them, and instituted the celebration with greater solemnity This re institution, which happened B. C. 884, forms a celebrated epoch in Grecian history, and is the beginning of the Olympiads. (Ind. Olympias.) They, however, were neglected for some time after the age of Iphitus, till Corœbus, who obtained a victory B C. 776, re-instituted them to be regularly and constantly celebrated. The care and superintendence of the games were entrusted to the people of Elis, till they were excluded by the Pisæans, B. C. 364, after the destruction of Pisa. These obtained great privileges from this appointment, they were in danger neither of violence nor war, but they were permitted to enjoy their possessions without molestation, as the games were celebrated within their territories. Only one person superintended till the 50th olympiad, when two were appointed. In the 103d olympiad, the number was increased to twelve, according to the number of the tribes of Elis. But in the following olympiad, they were reduced to eight, and afterwards increased to ten, which number continued till the reign of Adrian. The presidents were obliged solemnly to swear that they would act impartially, and not take any bribes, or discover why they rejected some of the combatants. They generally sat naked and held before them the crown which was prepared for the conqueror. There were also certain officers to keep good order and regularity, called ἀλύται, much the same as the Roman lictors, of whom the chief was called ἀλυτάρχης. No women were permitted to appear at the celebration of the Olympian games, and whoever dared to violate this law was immediately thrown down from a rock. This however was sometimes neglected, for we find not only women present at the celebration, but also some among the combatants, and some rewarded with the crown. The preparations for these festivals were great. No person was permitted to enter the lists if he had not regularly exercised himself ten months before the celebration at the public gymnasium of Elis. No unfair dealings were allowed, and whoever attempted to bribe his adversary, was subjected to a severe fine No criminals, nor such as were connected with impious and guilty persons, were suffered to present themselves as combatants; and even the father and relations ere obliged to swear that they would have recourse to no artifice which might decide the victory in favour of their friends. The wrestlers ere appointed by lot. Some little balls, superscribed with a letter, were thrown into a silver rn, and such as drew the same letter were bliged to contend one with the other. He who ad an odd letter remained the last, and he often ad the advantage, as he was to encounter the st who had obtained the superiority over his dversary. He was called ἔφεδρος. In these ames were exhibited running, leaping, wrestng, boxing, and the throwing of the quoit, hich was called altogether πένταθλον, or quinertium. Besides these, there were horse and hariot races, and also contentions in poetry, loquence, and the fine arts. The only reward hat the conqueror obtained, was a crown of ive; which, as some suppose, was in memory f the labours of Hercules, which were accomlished for the universal good of mankind, and or which the hero claimed no other reward than he consciousness of having been the friend of humanity. So small and trifling a reward stimlated courage and virtue, and was more the ource of great honours than the most unbound-d treasures. The statues of the conquerors, alled Olympionicæ, were erected at Olympia, n the sacred wood of Jupiter. Their return ome was that of a warlike conqueror; they were rawn in a chariot by four horses, and every where received with the greatest acclamations. Their entrance into their native city was not brough the gates, but, to make it more grand and more solemn, a breach was made in the walls. Painters and poets were employed in elebrating their names, and indeed the victories enerally obtained at Olympia are the subjects of he most beautiful odes of Pindar. The combatants were naked; a scarf was originally tied round their waists, but when it had entangled one of the adversaries, and been the cause that he lost the victory, it was laid aside, and no regard was paid to decency. The Olympic games were observed every fifth year, or to speak with greater exactness, after a revolution of four years, and in the first month of the fifth year, and they continued for five successive days. As they were the most ancient and the most solemn of all the festivals of the Greeks, it will not appear wonderful that they drew so many people together, not only inhabitants of Greece, but of the neighbouring islands and countries. Pind. G. 3, 49.——A name given to the aggregate of temples, altars, and other structures on the banks of the Alpheus in Elis, in the immediate vicinity of the spot where the Olympic games were celebrated. It was not, as many have incorrectly supposed, a city, nor did it at all resemble a city. The main feature in the picture was the sacred grove Altis, planted, as legends told, by Hercules, and which he dedicated to Jupiter. Throughout this grove were scattered in rich profusion the most splendid monuments of architectural, sculptural, and pictorial skill. The site was already celebrated as the seat of an oracle; but it was not until the Eleans had conquered the Pisans, and destroyed their city, that a temple was erected to the god with the spoils of the vanquished. This temple of Jupiter was a Doric edifice, sixty-eight feet in height from the ground to the pediment, ninety-five feet wide, and two hundred and thirty long; its roof was covered with Pentelic marble, and at each of its extremities was placed a gilt urn. Within the temple was the statue of Jove, the chef d'œuvre of Phidias, portrayed in the sublime attitude and action conceived by Homer. The figure was of ivory and gold, and of such vast proportions, that though seated, it almost reached the ceiling; the head was crowned with olive; the right hand grasped an image of victory, the left a sceptre, curiously wrought of different metals, on which was perched an eagle; the sandals and vesture were of gold. The throne on which the god was represented as sitting, was composed of gold, ebony, and ivory, studded with precious stones, and embellished with paintings and the finest carved work. The altar of Jupiter was entirely composed of ashes collected from the burnt thighs of victims, which being softened and mixed with water from the Alpheus, formed a kind of cement; it was twenty-two feet high, and one hundred and twenty-five in circumference. Here daily sacrifices were offered by the Eleans, independent of those performed during the great solemnities. The stadium, so called from its length, was a mound of earth, where the foot-races were held; near it was the hippodrome, likewise surrounded by a mound of earth. Above these rose the Cronium, or hill of Saturn, on the summit of which, at the vernal equinox, the priests offered annual sacrifices to the god. Pind. Olymp. 10, 51.—Paus. 5, 11 et 12.—*Hom. OLYMPIAS, a certain space of time which elapsed between the celebration of the Olympic games. The Olympic games were celebrated after the expiration of four complete years, whence some have said that they were observed every fifth year. This period of time was called Olympiad, and became a celebrated era among the Greeks, who computed their time by it. The custom of reckoning time by the celebration of the Olympic games, was not introduced at the first institution of these festivals, but to speak accurately, only the year in which Chorœbus obtained the prize. This Olympiad, which has always been reckoned the first, fell, according to the accurate and learned computations of some of the moderns, exactly 776 years before the Christian era, in the year of the Julian period 3938, and 23 years before the building of Rome. The games were exhibited at the time of the full moon, next after the summer solstice, therefore the Olympiads were of unequal lengths, because the time of the full moon differs eleven days every year, and for that reason they sometimes began the next day after the solstice, and at other times four weeks after. The computations by Olympiads ceased, as some suppose, after the 364th, in the year 440 of the Christian era. It was universally adopted, not only by the Greeks, but by many of the neighbouring countries, though still the Pythian games served as an epoch to the people of Delphi and to the Bœotians, the Nemæan games to the Argives and Arcadians, and the Isthmian to the Corinthians, and the inhabitants of the Peloponnesian isthmus. To the Olympiads history is much indebted. They have served to fix the time of many momentous events, and indeed before this method of computing time was observed, every page of history is mostly fabulous, and filled with obscurity and contradiction, and no true chronological account can properly established and maintained with certainty. The mode of computation, which was used after the suppression of the Olympiads and of the consular fasti of Rome, was more useful as it was more universal; but while the era of the creation of the world prevailed in the east, the western nations in the sixth century began to adopt with more propriety the Christian epoch, which was propagated in the eighth century, and at last, in the tenth, became legal and popular. ——A celebrated woman, who was daughter of a king of Epirus, and who married Philip king of Macedonia, by whom she had Alexander the Great. Her haughtiness, and, more probably, her infidelity, obliged Philip to repudiate her, and to marry Cleopatra, the niece of king Attalus. Olympias was sensible of this injury, and Alexander showed his disapprobation of his father's measures by retiring from the court to his mother The murder of Philip, which soon followed this disgrace, and which some have attributed to the intrigues of Olympias, was productive of the greatest extravagances. The queen paid the highest honour to her husband's murderer. She gathered his mangled limbs, placed a crown of gold on his head, and laid his ashes near those of Philip The administration of Alexander, who had succeeded his father, was, in some instance, offensive to Olympias; but when the ambition of her son was concerned, she did not scruple to declare publicly, that Alexander was not the son of Philip, but that he was the offspring of an enormous serpent which had supernaturally introduced itself into her bed When Alexander was dead, Olympias seized the government of Macedonia, and, to establish her usurpation, she ordered to put to death Aridæus, with his wife Eurydice, as also Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, with 100 leading men of Macedon, who were inimical to her interest. Such barbarities did not long remain unpunished; Cassander besieged her in Pydna, where she had retired with the remains of her family, and she was obliged to surrender after an obstinate siege. The conqueror ordered her to be accused, and to be put to death. A body of 200 soldiers were directed to put the bloody commands into execution, but the splendour and majesty of the queen disarmed their courage, and she was at last massacred by those whom she had cruelly deprived of their children, about 316 years before the Christian era. Justin. 7, 6 9, 7. — Plut. in Alex.

OLYMPIODORUS, an Alexandrian philosopher who flourished about the year 430 B. C. He is celebrated for his knowledge of the Aristotelian doctrines, and was the master of Proclus, who attended upon his school before he was twenty years of age.——A Platonic philosopher, who flourished towards the close of the sixth century. He was the author of Commentaries on four of Plato's dialogues, the first Alcibiades, the Phædon, Gorgias, and Philebus. The first of these contains a life of Plato, in which we meet with certain particulars relative to the philosopher, not to be found elsewhere. This Olympiodorus was a native of Alexandria, and enjoyed great reputation in that capital, as will appear from a distich appended to his Commentary on the Gorgias.——A native of Alexandria, a peripatetic, who flourished during the latter half of the sixth century. He was the author of a Commentary on the Meteorology of Aristotle, which was edited by Aldus, Venet. 1551, fol.

OLYMPIUS, a surname of Jupiter at Olympia, where the god had a celebrated temple and statue, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world. It was the work of Phidias. Paus. 7, 2.——A native of Carthage, called also Nemesianus. (Vid. Nemesianus.)——A favourite at the court of Honorius, who was the cause of Stilicho's death.

OLYMPUS, a famous musician, a native of Mysia, who lived before the Trojan war. He was the disciple of Marsyas. Plato, Aristophanes, and Aristotle, cite his verses.——Another, a native of Phrygia, who lived in the time of Midas. Aristoxenus relates that he composed, in the Lydian mode, the air for the flute which expressed the funeral sorrows for the death of Python. To him likewise are ascribed the Cerulean, Minervan, Harmatian and Spondean modes. Plutarch says that he was the first who introduced among the Greeks the knowledge of stringed instruments; and that he instituted the custom of celebrating with the flute hymns to the polycephalic nome in honour of the gods. Plato says that his music influenced his auditors; Aristotle, that it exalted the soul, and Plutarch, that it surpassed in simplicity all other music ——A physician of Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, from whose writings Plutarch derived his account of the last hours of that princess.——A celebrated mountain, on the coast of Thessaly, forming the limit when regarded as an entire range, between the latter country and Macedonia. The highest summit in the chain, to which the name of Olympus was specially confined by the poets, was fabled to be the residence of the gods, and well deserved the honour. Travellers, who have visited these shores, dwell with admiration on the colossal magnificence of Olympus, which seems to rise at once from the sea to hide its snowy head among the clouds. Dr Holland, who beheld it from Litochori at its foot, observes "We had not before been aware of the extreme vicinity of the town to the base of Olympus, from the thick fogs which hung over us for three successive days, while traversing the country; but on leaving it, and accidentally looking back, we saw through an opening in the fog a faint outline of vast precipices, seeming almost to overhang the place, and so aerial in their aspect, that for a few minutes we doubted whether it might not be a delusion to the eye. The fog, however, dispersed yet more on this side, and partial openings were made, through which, as through arches, we saw the sunbeams resting on the snowy summits of Olympus, which rose into a dark blue sky far above the belt of clouds and mist that hung upon the sides of the mountain The transient view we had of the mountain from this point showed us a line of precipices of vast height, forming its eastern front toward the sea, and broken at intervals by deep hollows or ravines, which were richly clothed with forest trees. The oak, chestnut, beech, plane-tree, &c. are seen in great abundance along the base and skirts of the mountain, and towards the summit of the first ridge large forests of pine spread themselves along the acclivities, giving the character to the face of the mountain, which is so often alluded to by the ancient poets." The modern name of the mountain, with the Greeks, is Elimbo, and with the Turks Semavat Eri Kurp. Bacch 408 et 561. Troad. 215.— Hom. Od. 11, 314.— Virg. Georg. 1, 282. 3, 223.— Lucan. 6, 341.——A mountain in Mysia, on the confines of Bithynia, above the city of Prusa. It was one of the highest summits in Asia Minor, being covered with snow during great part of the year. The lower parts, and the plains at the foot, especially on the western side, had from the earliest period been occupied by the Mysians, whence it was generally denominated the Mysian Olympus. Its sides were covered with vast forests, which afforded shelter to wild beasts, and not unfrequently to robbers, who erected castles there, and other strongholds. Its modern name is Anadoli dagh. Plin. 5, 32.—Strab. 12.—Herod. 1, 36.——A mountain, to the north-west of Ancyra, in Galatia, and on the confines of Bithynia. Some suppose it to be the same with Didymus, or at least a part of this chain. Liv. 38, 18.—Polyb 12, 20.——A mountain on the borders of Arcadia and Laconia, in the vicinity of Sellasia. Polyb 2, 65.——A mountain chain on the eastern coast of Cyprus: the mountain in this range particularly called Olympus, was directly on the shore, and just below the promontory of Dinaretum. Strab. 14.——A mountain in Lycia, on the eastern coast, above the Sacrum Promontorium. A city of the same name stood on a part of it. Cic in Verr. 1, 23.—Eutrop. 6, 3.—Plin. 5, 27.—Flor 3, 6.

OLYNTHUS, a powerful city of Macedonia, in the district of Chalcidice, at the head of the Sinus Toronaicus. It was founded probably by the Chalcidians and Eretrians of Eubœa. It was celebrated for its many contests with Philip and the Athenians, and for the eloquence of Demosthenes in its behalf. It was at last taken and destroyed by Philip, and its inhabitants sold into slavery. Its ruins are now called Agios Mamas. Strab 10.—Diod. Sic. 16, 514 et 539.—Demosth. Olynth 2. Phil. 3.—Justin. 8, 4.

OMBOS or OMBI now Kom Ombo, a city of Egypt, a little north of Syene, on the eastern side of the Nile. It was famous for the worship of the crocodiles, in defence of which the Ombites fought battles with the people of Tentyra and Apollonopolis. The horrible effects of their religious zeal are ably satirized by Juvenal. Sat 15, 35.

OMOLE or HOMOLE, a mountain of Thessaly. Luc Ant 7 675.——There were some festivals called Homoleia, which were celebrated in Bœotia in honour of Jupiter, surnamed Homoleus.

OMOPHAGIA, a festival in honour of Bacchus The word signifies the eating of raw flesh. Vid. Dionysia

OMPHALE, a queen of Lydia, daughter of Jardanus. She married Tmolus, who, at his death, left her mistress of his kingdom. Omphale had been informed of the great exploits of Hercules, and wished to see so illustrious a hero. Her wish was soon gratified. After the murder of Eurytus, Hercules fell sick, and was ordered to be sold as a slave, that he might recover his health, and the right use of his senses. Mercury was commissioned to sell him, and Omphale bought him, and restored him to liberty. The hero became enamoured of his mistress, and the queen favoured his passion, and had a son by him, whom some call Agelaus, and others Lamon. From this son were descended Gyges and Croesus; but this opinion is different from the account which makes these Lydian monarchs spring from Alcæus, a son of Hercules by Malis, one of the female servants of Omphale. Hercules is represented by the poets as so desperately enamoured of the queen that, to conciliate her esteem, he sits by her side among her women, while she covers herself with the lion's skin, and arms herself with the club of the hero, and often strikes him with her sandals for the uncouth manner with which he holds the distaff, &c. Their fondness was mutual. As they once travelled together, they came to a grotto on mount Tmolus, where the queen dressed herself in the habit of her lover, and obliged him to appear in a female garment. After they had supped, they both retired to rest in different rooms, as a sacrifice on the morrow to Bacchus required. In the night, Faunus, or according to others, Pan, who was enamoured of Omphale, introduced himself into the cave. He went to the bed of the queen, but the lion's skin persuaded him that it was the dress of Hercules, and therefore he repaired to the bed of Hercules, in hopes to find there the object of his affection. The female dress of Hercules deceived him, and he laid himself down by his side. The hero was awaked, and kicked the intruder into the middle of the cave. The noise awoke Omphale, and Faunus was discovered lying on the ground, greatly disappointed and ashamed. Ovid Fast. 2, 305, &c —Apollod. 1, 9. 16, 7.—Diod. 4.—Propert 3, 11, 17.

OMPHALOS, a place of Crete, sacred to Jupiter.

ONARUS, a priest of Bacchus, who is supposed to have married Ariadne after she had been abandoned by Theseus. Plut. in Thes.

ONASIMUS, a sophist of Athens, who flourished in the reign of Constantine.

ONATAS, a famous statuary of Ægina, son of Micon. Paus 8, 42.

ONCHESMUS, a town of Epirus, on the coast, situate opposite the western extremity of Corcyra. Dionysius of Halicarnassus pretended that the real name of this place was Anchises Portus, derived from Anchises the father of Æneas. Cicero seems to refer to the port of Onchesmus, when he speaks of the wind Onchesmites as having favoured his navigation from Epirus to Brundusium. Strab. 7.—Dion. Hal. 1, 52.—Cic. Ep. ad Att. 7, 2.

ONCHESTUS, a river of Thessaly, rising near Cynoscephalæ and falling into the Sinus Pelasgicus. It is supposed to answer to the modern Patrasso. Liv. 33, 6 — Polyb. 18, 3.——A city of Bœotia, north-west of Thebes, and south of the lake Copais. It received its name from Onchestus, a son of Neptune, whose temple and grove are often celebrated by the poets of antiquity. Hom. Il 2, 506.—Pind. Isthm 4, 32.

ONESICRITUS, a Cynic philosopher, a native of Ægina and a disciple of Diogenes of Sinope. He was taken into the service of Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied in his expedition to India, and wrote an account of that undertaking on the plan of Xenophon's expedition of Cyrus. He is treated by Strabo, and others of the ancients, as a fabulous and romantic writer; but it is probable that the ignorance of the Greeks and Romans relative to India contributed not a little to render the narrative of Onesicritus incredible to his countrymen. He survived Alexander, but the exact time of his death is not known. His history is no longer extant, though some of his details relative to the geography and natural history of the regions he visited have been preserved by Strabo, Ælian, and Pliny.

ONESIMUS, the son of Python, a Macedonian nobleman, who, having in vain dissuaded Per-rents from undertaking war against the Romans, and on that account being suspected by the king, fled to the Romans, by whom he was kindly received, and liberally rewarded. Liv 44, 16

ONION a city of Egypt, south-west of Heropolis It was inhabited by Jews, who had a temple here, which continued from the time of Onias, who built it, to that of Vespasian. Onias was nephew to Menelaus, and the lawful successor to the priesthood of Jerusalem, but being deprived of his rights by Antiochus Eupator, king of Syria, who made Alcimus high priest in his stead, he fled to Egypt, and obtained permission from Ptolemy Philometor to build this temple there, about 173 B C This structure remained for the space of 243 years, when it was destroyed by order of Vespasian after the fall of Jerusalem Joseph Ant 14, 14 Bell Jud. 1, 7

ONOCHONUS a river of Thessaly, falling into the Peneus It was dried up by the army of Xerxes. Herod 7 196

ONOMACRITUS, a soothsayer of Athens It is generally believed, that the Greek poem on the Argonautic expedition, attributed to Orpheus, was written by Onomacritus The elegant poems of Musæus are also, by some, supposed to be the production of his pen. He flourished about 516 years before the Christian era, and was expelled from Athens by Hipparchus one of the sons of Pisistratus Herod 7, 6 ——A Persian, who wrote concerning laws, &c Aristot Polit 2

ONOMARCHUS a Phocian son of Euthycrates, and brother of Philomelus whom he succeeded, as general of his countrymen, in the sacred war. After exploits of valour and perseverance, he was defeated and slain in Thessaly by Philip of Macedon, who ordered his body to be ignominiously hung up for the sacrilege offered to the temple of Delphi He died 353 B C Aristot Pol 5, 4 —Diod. 16 ——A man to whose care Antigonus intrusted the keeping of Eumenes C Nep. in Eum

ONOPHAS one of the seven Persians who conspired against the usurper Smerdis Ctesias —— An officer in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece

ONOSANDER, a Greek author and Platonic philosopher, who flourished about the middle of the first century He was the author of a work of considerable celebrity, entitled στρατηγικὸς λόγος, being a treatise on the duties of a general The best editions are, that of Schwebel, Norimb. 1752, fol , and that of Coray, Paris, 1822, 8vo.

ONYTHES, a friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn 12, 514.

OPALIA, festivals celebrated by the Romans, in honour of Ops, on the 14th of the calends of January

OPHELTES a son of Lycurgus, king of Thrace He is the same as Archemorus. (Vid Archemorus) —The father of Euryalus, whose friendship with Nisus is proverbial Virg Æn 9 201 ——One of the companions of Acestes, changed into a dolphin by Bacchus Ovid. Met 3, fab 8.

OPHIAS a patronymic given to Combe, as daughter of Ophius, an unknown person Ovid. Met. 7, 382.

OPHIONEUS, was an ancient soothsayer in the age of Aristodemus He was born blind

OPHIR, a place or country remote from Judæa, to which the ships of Solomon traded There has been much discussion respecting the situation of this place; some supposing it to have been the island of Socotra; others, that anciently called Tabrobana, which is supposed by some to have been Ceylon, and by others Sumatra, whilst others fix its situation on the continent of India M Huet, and, after him, Bruce, place Ophir at Sofala, in South Africa, where mines of gold and silver have been found, which show marks of having been very anciently and extensively worked. The latter says, also, that the situation of this place explains the period of three years which the Ophir ships were absent, from the different courses of the monsoons and trade winds which they would have to encounter going and returning Ruins of ancient buildings have also been found in the neighbourhood of these mines Gen 10, 29.—1 Kings, 9, 28 10, 11.—2 Chron 8, 18.

OPHIS, a small river of Asia Minor, forming part of the eastern boundary of Pontus It rises in the mountains of the Tzani, and falls into the Euxine to the south west of Rhizæum It is now the Ouf —— A river in Arcadia running by Mantinea, and falling into the Alpheus. Paus 8, 8.

OPHIUSA an island in the Mediterranean off the coast of Spain and forming one of the Pityusæ, or Pine islands It obtained its name from the Greek word ὄφις coluber, owing to its having been infested with serpents. It is now called Columbretes, or Monte Colubre ——A city of Dacia, near the mouth of the river Tyras, which was also called Tyras It is supposed to correspond to the modern Palanka Plin 4, 12 —— The earlier name of the island of Tenos. Plin 4, 12.——One of the earlier names of the island of Rhodes Plin 5, 31

OPICI the same with the Osci (Vid Osci) that Opsus, Opscus and Oscus, are the same name is expressly remarked by Roman grammarians The Greek language adopted only the first form, and the last prevailed in the Latin. Festus de V. Sig

OPIMA SPOLIA, spoils taken by a Roman general from a general of the enemy whom he had slain They were dedicated and suspended in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius These spoils were obtained only thrice before the fall of the republic, the first by Romulus, who slew Acron, king of the Caninenses, the next by A Cornelius Cossus, who slew Lar Tolumnius, king of the Veientes, A U C 318, and the third by M Claudius Marcellus, who slew Viridomarus, king of the Gauls, A U C 530.

OPIMIUS, L a Roman who made himself consul in opposition to the interest and efforts of the Gracchi He showed himself a most inveterate enemy to C Gracchus and his adherents, and behaved, during his consulship, with the highest severity against the popular party. When sent to Africa at the head of an embassy to settle the disputes in the family of Masinissa, he suffered himself to be bribed by the gold of Jugurtha, and made an unfair division of the provinces referred to his arbitration He was accused and condemned for this criminal conduct, under the Mamilian law, and retired in disgrace and banishment to Dyrrachium, where he died in extreme poverty Cicero speaks with commendation of Opimius, but the orator's partiality might arise from the bias which he entertained for patrician greatness and unlimited power over the plebeians. The year in which Opimius was consul was remarkable for a superabundant vintage, hence Opimianum vinum was expressive of superior quality Some of this wine was still preserved in Pliny's age, two centuries after Opimius' death. Cic. pro Sext. et in Pis.—Plut.—Sal. Jug. 16.—Pun. 14, 4, &c.—Martial. 9, 69.—Paterc. 2, 7.——A Roman, who killed one of the Cimbri in single combat.——A rich usurer at Rome in the age of Horace, Sat. 2, 3, 142.

OPIS, a nymph who was among Diana's attendants, and who avenged the death of her favourite Camilla, by shooting Arans, by whose weapons the queen had fallen. The goddess herself is called Opis by the Greek poets, and that name is likewise applied to one of the three Hyperborean nymphs, who introduced the worship of the goddess in Delos. The other two were Loxo and Hecaerge. Virg. Æn. 11, 532 et 867.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 55.—Callim. in Dian. 204. In Del. 292.——A town on the river Tigris, in Assyria, west of Artemita. It was afterwards called Antiochia. Herod. 1, 189.—Xen. Anab. 2, 4.—Plin. 6, 27.

OPITERGIUM, a city of Venetia, in northern Italy, on the right bank of the river Plavis. It is now Oderzo. Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, 19.

OPITES, a native of Argos, killed by Hector in the Trojan war. Homer Il.

OPPIA LEX, by C. Oppius, the tribune, A. U. C. 540. It required that no woman should wear above half an ounce of gold for ornament, have party-coloured garments, or be carried in any city or town, or to any place within a mile's distance, unless it was to celebrate some sacred festivals or solemnities. This famous law, which was made while Annibal was in Italy, and while Rome was in distressed circumstances, created discontent, and, eighteen years after, the Roman ladies petitioned the assembly of the people that it might be repealed. Cato opposed it strongly, and made many satirical reflections upon the women for their appearing in public to solicit votes. The tribune Valerius, who had presented their petition to the assembly, answered the objections of Cato, and his eloquence had such an influence on the minds of the people, that the law was instantly abrogated with the unanimous consent of all the comitia, Cato alone excepted. Liv. 33 et 34.—Cic. de Orat 3.

OPPIANUS, a Greek poet and grammarian, was a native of Anazarbus in Cilicia, and flourished in the beginning of the third century. He dedicated two poems, entitled Halieutica, on fishing, and Cynegetica, on hunting, to the emperor Caracalla; with the latter that sovereign was so much pleased, that he gave the author a piece of gold for each line, hence they obtained the name of the golden verses. Both poems have been esteemed by various modern critics, as well for the force and elegance of the descriptions, as for the ingenuity of the thoughts and similes. Oppian likewise composed a work "On Fowling," with some other pieces which are lost. He died of the plague at the age of thirty, and was honoured by his townsmen with a statue and a highly encomiastic inscription. The best edition of Oppian is that of Schneider, Lips. 1813, 8vo.

OPPIDIUS, a rich old man introduced by Horace (Sat. 2, 3, 168,) as wisely dividing his possessions among his two sons, and warning them against those follies and that extravagance which he believed he saw raging in them.

OPPIUS, C. a friend of Julius Cæsar, celebrated for his life of Scipio Africanus and of Pompey the Great. In the latter, he paid not much regard to historical facts, and took every opportunity of defaming Pompey, to extol the character of his patron Cæsar. In the age of Suetonius, he was deemed the true author of the Alexandrian, African, and Spanish wars, which some attribute to Cæsar, and others to A Hirtius. Tacit. Ann. 14.—Suet. in Cæs. 53.——An officer sent by the Romans against Mithridates. He met with ill success, and was sent in chains to the king, &c.——Marcus, a leader of the plebeians at Rome, when they retired to mount Aventine from the Decemviri. Liv 3, 51.——Cornicen, one of the Decemviri, who shared the crimes of Appius, and on being put in prison, destroyed himself. Liv. 3, 58, &c.——Caius, the author of the Oppian law. Vid Oppia Lex.

OPS (Opis), a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, the same as the Rhea of the Greeks, who married Saturn, and became mother of Jupiter. She was known among the ancients by the different names of Cybele, Bona Dea, Magna Mater, Thea, Tellus, Proserpina, and even of Juno and Minerva; and the worship which was paid to these apparently several deities was offered merely to one and the same person, mother of the gods. The word Ops seems to be derived from Opus; because the goddess, who is the same as the earth, gives nothing without labour. Tatius built her a temple at Rome. She was generally represented as a matron, with her right hand opened, as if offering assistance to the helpless, and holding a loaf in her left hand. Her festivals were called Opalia, &c. Varro de L. L. 4.—Dionys. Hal. 2, &c.—Tibull. 4, 68.

OPTIMUS, MAXIMUS, epithets given to Jupiter to denote his greatness, omnipotence, and supreme goodness. They are usually expressed by the capitals O. M.

OPUS (Opuntia), one of the most ancient cities in Greece, the capital of the Locri Opuntii, whose territory lay to the north of Bœotia. According to Strabo, it was fifteen stadia from the sea and the distance between it and Cynus, its emporium, was sixty stadia. Livy places Opus, however, only one mile from the sea. This place was celebrated as having been the domain of Deucalion and Pyrrha, and as the birth-place of Patroclus. Strab. 9.—Liv. 28, 6.—Pind. Olymp. 9, 62.—Hom. Il. 18, 325.

ORACULUM, an answer of the gods to the questions of men, or the place where those answers were given. Nothing is more famous than the ancient oracles of Egypt, Greece, Rome, &c. They were supposed to be the will of the gods themselves, and they were consulted, not only upon every important matter, but even in the affairs of private life. To make peace or war, to introduce a change of government, to plant a colony, to enact laws, to raise an edifice, to marry, were sufficient reasons to consult the will of the gods. Mankind, in consulting them, showed that they wished to pay implicit obedience to the command of the divinity, and when they had been favoured with an answer, they acted with more spirit, and with more vigour, conscious that the undertaking had met with the sanction and approbation of heaven. In this, therefore, it will not appear wonderful that so many places were sacred to oracular purposes. The small province of Bœotia could once boast of her 25 oracles, and Peloponnesus of the same number. Not only the chief of the gods gave oracles, but, in process of time, heroes were admitted to enjoy the same privileges; and the oracles of a Trophonius and an Antinous, were soon able to rival the fame of Apollo and of Jupiter. The most celebrated oracles of antiquity were those of Dodona, Delphi, Jupiter Ammon &c. (Vid. Dodona, Delphi, Ammon.) The temple of Delphi seemed to claim a superiority over the other temples; its fame was once more extended, and its riches were so great, that not only private persons, but even kings and numerous armies, made it an object of plunder and of rapine. The manner of delivering oracles was different. A priestess at Delphi, (Vid. Pythia) was permitted to pronounce the oracles of the god, and her delivery of the answers was always attended with acts of apparent madness and desperate fury. Not only women, but even doves, were the ministers of the temple of Dodona, and the supplicant votary was often startled to hear his questions readily answered by the decayed trunk, or the spreading branches of a neighbouring oak. Ammon conveyed his answers in a plain and open manner; but Amphiaraus required many ablutions and preparatory ceremonies, and he generally communicated his oracles to his supplicants in dreams and visions. Sometimes the first words that were heard, after issuing from the temple, were deemed the answers of the oracles, and sometimes the nodding or shaking of the head of the statue, the motions of fishes in a neighbouring lake, or their reluctance in accepting the food which was offered to them, were as strong and valid as the most express and the minutest explanations. The answers were also sometimes given in verse, or written on tablets, but their meaning was always obscure, and often the cause of disaster to such as consulted them. Croesus, when he consulted the oracle of Delphi, was told that, if he crossed the Halys, he should destroy a great empire; he supposed that that empire was the empire of his enemy, but unfortunately it was his own. The words of Aeacida, Romanos vincere posse, which Pyrrhus received when he wished to assist the Tarentines against the Romans, by a favourable interpretation for himself, proved his ruin. Nero was ordered by the oracle of Delphi, to beware of 73 years; but the pleasing idea that he should live to that age, rendered him careless, and he was soon convinced of his mistake, when Galba, in his 73d year, had the presumption to dethrone him. It is a question among the learned, whether the oracles were given by the inspiration of evil spirits, or whether they proceeded from the imposture of the priests. Imposture, however, and forgery cannot flourish, and falsehood becomes its own destroyer; and on the contrary, it is well known how much confidence an enlightened age, therefore, much more the credulous and the superstitious, places upon dreams and romantic stories. Some have strongly believed that all the oracles of the earth ceased at the birth of Christ, but the supposition is false. It was, indeed, the beginning of their decline; but they remained in repute, and were consulted, though perhaps not so frequently, till the fourth century, when Christianity began to triumph over paganism. The oracles often suffered themselves to be bribed. Alexander did it, but it is well known that Lysander failed in the attempt. Herodotus, who first mentioned the corruption which often prevailed in the oracular temples of Greece and Egypt, has been severely treated for his remarks, by the historian Plutarch. Demosthenes is also a witness of the corruption, and he observed, that the oracles of Greece were servilely subservient to the will and pleasure of Philip king of Macedonia, as he beautifully expresses it by the word φιλιππίζειν. If some of the Greeks, and other European and Asiatic countries, paid so much attention to oracles, and were so fully persuaded of their veracity, and even divinity, many of their leading men and of their philosophers were apprized of their deceit, and paid no regard to the command of priests, whom money could corrupt, and interposition silence. The Egyptians showed themselves the most superstitious of mankind, by their blind acquiescence in the imposition of the priests, who persuaded them that the safety and happiness of their lives depended upon the mere motions of an ox, or the tameness of a crocodile. *Homer. ORMA, (Ὥραια) certain solemn sacrifices of fruits offered in the four seasons of the year, to obtain mild and temperate weathers. They were offered to the goddesses who presided over the seasons, who attended upon the sun, and who received divine worship at Athens.

ORBILIUS PUPILLUS a grammarian of Beneventum, who was the first instructor of the poet Horace. After serving for some time in the Roman armies he in his 50th year came to Rome in the consulship of Cicero, and there, as a public teacher, acquired more fame than money. He was naturally of a severe disposition, of which his pupils often felt the effects. He lived almost to his 100th year, and lost his memory some time before his death. His countrymen at Beneventum, raised a marble statue to his honour. Suet. de Illust. Gr. 9.—Horat. Ep. 2, 1, 71.

ORBONA, the tutelary goddess of orphans. Fest. 2, 7.—Arnob. 4.

ORCADES, islands to the north of Britain, answering to the modern Orkney isles. They were visited and subdued by Agricola, but soon threw off the yoke. Their number is variously given by the ancients, but the chief of them were Pomona, or the Mainland, Ocetis, or Hoy Wass and Dumna, or S Ronaldsay. Tacit. in Agric.—Juv. Sat. 2, 161.

ORCHAMUS, a king of Assyria, father of Leucothoe, by Eurynome. He buried his daughter alive for her amours with Apollo. Ovid. Met. 4, 212.

ORCHIA LEX, by Orchius the tribune, A.U.C. 566. It was enacted to limit the number of guests that were to be admitted at an entertainment; and it also enforced, that during supper, which was the chief meal among the Romans, the doors of every house should be left open.

ORCHOMENUS, a city of Boeotia, near the Cephissus, and to the north-west of the lake Copais. It was the second city of Boeotia, and at one time of such importance, as to vie with the most opulent cities in the world. Orchomenus is called by Pindar the city of the graces, from a temple consecrated to them there. Its first inhabitants were the Pelegyes, a lawless race, who were destroyed by the gods for their impiety, and were succeeded by the Minyæ, from whom the city is surnamed Minyeis. Here were the tombs of Minyas and Hesiod, the remains of the latter having been conveyed hither from Locris at the command of Apollo. The ruins of Orcho-menus are to be seen near the village of Scrypus. Paus. 9, 35 & 36.—Strab. 9.—Hom. Il. 2, 351. 11, 284.—Hymn. Apoll. 278.—Prud. Olymp. 14, 1. Tyrt. 12, 45.—Apollod. Rhod. 3, 1094.—A city of Arcadia, some distance to the north-west of Mantinea. It was first situated on the summit of a hill, but was afterwards removed to the plain below. Tradition assigned its foundation to Orchomenus, the son of Lycaon, and its antiquity is further evinced by Homer's mention of it in the catalogue of ships. The modern village of Kalpaki is built on the ruins of this town. Paus. 8, 3.—Hom. Il. 2, 605. Herod. 7, 102. 9, 25.—Thucyd. 5, 61.—A city of Thessaly, on the confines of Macedonia. Schol. in Apoll. Rhod. 2, 11-6

ORCUS, one of the names of the god of hell, the same as Pluto, though confounded by some with Charon. He had a temple at Rome under the name of Orcus Quietalis. Those slaves who were made free by the will of a master were called Orcini liberti, to be distinguished from those to whom a master in his lifetime had granted their liberty. The word Orcus, is generally used to signify the infernal regions. Horat. Od. 1, 28, &c.—Ing. Æn. 4, 502, &c.—Ovid. Met. 14, 116 &c.

ORDOVICES, a people of Britain, occupying what would correspond, at the present day, to the northern portion of Wales, together with the isle of Anglesey. Their capital was Mediolanum, or Megwood, in Montgomeryshire. Tacit Hist. 12, 33

OREADES, nymphs of the mountains, (ὄρος, mons,) daughters of Phoroneus and Hecate. Some call them Orestiades, and give them Jupiter for father. They generally attended upon Diana, and accompanied her in hunting. Virg. Æn. 1, 504.—Homer. Il. 6.—Strab. 10.—Ovid. Met. 8, 787.

ORESTÆ, a people of Epirus, situate apparently to the south-east of the Lyncestæ, and, like them, originally independent of the Macedonian kings, though afterwards annexed to their dominions. At a later period, having revolted under the protection of a Roman force, they were declared free on the conclusion of peace between Philip and the Romans. Their country was apparently of small extent, and contained but few towns. Liv 33, 34. 42, 38.

ORESTES, a son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When his father was cruelly murdered by Clytemnestra and Ægisthus, young Orestes was saved from his mother's dagger by means of his sister Electra, called Laodice by Homer, and he was privately conveyed to the house of Strophius, who was king of Phocis, and who had married a sister of Agamemnon. He was tenderly treated by Strophius, who educated him with his son Pylades. The two young princes soon became acquainted, and, from their familiarity, arose the most inviolable attachment and friendship. When Orestes was arrived to the years of manhood, he visited Mycenæ, and avenged his father's death by assassinating his mother Clytemnestra, and her adulterer Ægisthus. The manner in which he committed this murder is variously reported. According to Æschylus he was commissioned by Apollo to avenge his father, and therefore he introduced himself with his friend Pylades, at the court of Mycenæ, pretending to bring the news of the death of Orestes from king Strophius. He was at first received with coldness, and when he came into the presence of Ægisthus, who wished to inform himself of the particulars, he murdered him, and Clytemnestra soon shared the adulterer's fate. Euripides and Sophocles mention the same circumstances. Ægisthus was assassinated after Clytemnestra, according to Sophocles; and, in Euripides, Orestes is represented as murdering the adulterer, while he offers a sacrifice to the nymphs. This murder, as the poet mentions, irritates the guards, who were present, but Orestes appeases their fury by telling them who he is, and immediately he is acknowledged king of the country. Afterwards, he stabs his mother, at the instigation of his sister Electra, after he has upbraided her for her infidelity and cruelty to her husband. Such meditated murders, received the punishment, which, among the ancients, was always supposed to attend parricide. Orestes is tormented by the Furies, and exiles himself to Argos where he is still pursued by the avengeful goddesses. Apollo himself purifies him, and he is acquitted by the decision of the Areopagites, whom Minerva herself instituted on this occasion, according to the narration of the poet Æschylus, who flatters the Athenians in his tragical story, by representing them as passing judgment, even upon the gods themselves. According to Pausanias, Orestes was purified of the murder, not at Delphi, but at Troezene, where still was seen a large stone at the entrance of Diana's temple, upon which the ceremonies of purification had been performed by nine of the principal citizens of the place. There was also, at Megalopolis in Arcadia, a temple dedicated to the Furies, near which Orestes cut off one of his fingers with his teeth in a fit of insanity. These different traditions are confuted by Euripides, who says, that Orestes, after the murder of his mother, consulted the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, where he was informed that nothing could deliver him from the persecutions of the Furies, if he did not bring into Greece the Taurian statue, which was in the Taurica Chersonesus, and which, as it is reported by some, had fallen down from heaven. This was an arduous enterprise. The king of the Chersonesus always sacrificed on the altars of the goddess all such as entered the borders of his country. Orestes and his friend were both carried before Thoas, the king of the place, and they were doomed to be sacrificed. Iphigenia was then priestess of Diana's temple, and it was her office to immolate these strangers. The intelligence that they were Grecians delayed the preparations, and Iphigenia was anxious to learn something about a country which had given her birth. (Vid. Iphigenia.) She even interested herself in their misfortunes, and offered to spare the life of one of them provided he would convey letters to Greece from her hand. This was a difficult trial; never was friendship more truly displayed, according to the words of Ovid, ex Pont. 3, 2.

Ire jubet Pyladen earum moribus Orestem,
Hic negat; inque vicem pugnat utrinque mori.

At last Pylades gave way to the pressing intreaties of his friend, and consented to carry the letters of Iphigenia to Greece. These were addressed to Orestes himself, and, therefore, these circumstances soon led to a total discovery of the connexions of the priestess with the man whom she was going to immolate. Iphigenia was convinced that he was her brother Orestes, and, when the causes of their journey had been explained, she resolved, with the two friends, to fly from Chersonesus, and to carry away the statue of Diana. Their flight was discovered, and Thoas prepared to pursue them; but Minerva interfered, and told him, that all had been done by the will and approbation of the gods. Some suppose, that Orestes came to Cappadocia from Chersonesus, and that there he left the statue of Diana at Comana. Others contradict this tradition, and, according to Pausanias, the statue of Diana Orthia was the same as that which had been carried away from the Chersonesus. Some also suppose that Orestes brought it to Aricia, in Italy, where Diana's worship was established. After these celebrated adventures, Orestes ascended the throne of Argos, where he reigned in perfect security, and married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and gave his sister to his friend Pylades. The marriage of Orestes with Hermione is a matter of dispute among the ancients. All are agreed that she had been promised to the son of Agamemnon, but Menelaus had married her to Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, who had shown himself so truly interested in his cause during the Trojan war. The marriage of Hermione with Neoptolemus displeased Orestes; he remembered that she had been early promised to him, and therefore he resolved to recover her by force or artifice. This he effected by causing Neoptolemus to be assassinated, or assassinating him himself. According to Ovid's epistle of Hermione to Orestes, Hermione had always been faithful to her first lover, and it was even by her persuasion that Orestes removed her from the house of Neoptolemus. Hermione was dissatisfied with the partiality of Neoptolemus for Andromache, and her attachment for Orestes was increased. Euripides, however, and others, speak differently of Hermione's attachment to Neoptolemus, she loved him so tenderly, that she resolved to murder Andromache, who seemed to share, in a small degree, the affections of her husband. She was ready to perpetrate the horrid deed when Orestes came into Epirus, and she was easily persuaded by the foreign prince to withdraw herself, in her husband's absence, from a country which seemed to contribute so much to her sorrows. Orestes the better to secure the affections of Hermione, assassinated Neoptolemus, (Vid. Neoptolemus,) and retired to his kingdom of Argos. His old age was crowned with peace and security, and he died in the 90th year of his age, leaving his throne to his son Tisamenes, by Hermione. Three years after, the Heraclidæ recovered the Peloponnesus, and banished the descendants of Menelaus from the throne of Argos. Orestes died in Arcadia, as some suppose, by the bite of a serpent; and the Lacedæmonians, who had become his subjects at the death of Menelaus, were directed by an oracle to bring his bones to Sparta. They were some time after discovered at Tegea, and his stature appeared to be seven cubits, according to the traditions mentioned by Herodotus and others. The friendship of Orestes and Pylades became proverbial, and the two friends received divine honours among the Scythians and were worshipped to temples. Paus. 1, 2, 4, &c.—Paterc. 1, 1 et 3. - *Ovid. ORESTHEUM, or ORESTHEUM, called by Pausanias Oresthasium, a town of Arcadia, south-east of Megalopolis, in the district of Oresthis. Its ruins, according to Pausanias, were to be seen to the right of the road leading from Megalopolis to Tegea. Allusion is made to it by Euripides. It would seem from Thucydides and Herodotus to have been on the road from Sparta to Tegea. Paus. 8 et 54. — Thucyd. Orest 16, 17.—Thucyd. 5, 64 — Herod. 9, 11.

ORESTIAS, the primitive name of Adrianopolis, in Thrace, and which the Byzantine authors frequently employ in speaking of that city. The name is derived from the circumstance of Orestes having purified himself on this spot, after the murder of his mother. Three rivers had here their confluence, the Hebrus receiving the Arda, or Arda, on one side, and the Tonsus, or Tonza, on the other.

ORETANI, a people of Hispania Terraconensis, whose territory is supposed to have corresponded to the eastern part of Estremadura, the middle section of La Mancha, the eastern extremity of Jaen, and the northern extremity of Grenada. Liv 21, 11. 35, 7.—Plin. 3, 3.—Polyb. 10, 38. 11, 20.

ORPUS, an ancient city of Eubœa, in the north eastern part of the island, founded by an Athenian colony. It was situate in the district of Ellopia. Its primitive name was Histiæa, and it retained this appellation until, having endeavoured to shake off the galling yoke of Athens, after the close of the Persian war, it met with a cruel punishment at the hands of that power. The Histiæotæ were expelled, and Athenian colonists were sent to occupy the lands which they had evacuated. Strabo informs us, that the Histiæans withdrew on this occasion to Macedonia. From henceforth we find the name of their town changed to Oreus, which at first was that of a small place dependant on Histiæa, at the foot of mount Telethrius, and near the spot called Drymos, on the banks of the river Callas. The ruins of Oreus are still to be seen near the coast, opposite to Cape Volo of Thessaly. Strab. 10.—Thucyd. 1, 115. 8, 95.—Xen. Hist. Gr. 5, 4, 57 — Liv. 28, 6. 31, 46.

ORGIA, festivals in honour of Bacchus. They are the same as the Bacchanalia, Dionysia, &c., which were celebrated by the ancients to commemorate the triumph of Bacchus in India. Vid. Dionysia.

ORIBASIUS, an eminent physician of the fourth century, born at Pergamus. He was the pupil of Zeno of Cyprus, and became physician to the emperor Julian, whom he accompanied in his expedition to Persia, and witnessed his death. Under the succeeding emperors, Valens and Valentinian, he fell into disgrace, was deprived of his property, exiled, and obliged to take refuge among the barbarians. At length his merit was acknowledged, and he was recalled, and recompensed for his losses. He lived till towards the middle of the fifth century. Notwithstanding his misfortunes and his travels, he composed many professional works, some of which are still extant. The most important is his treatise on anatomy, published at Paris, 1556, 8vo; and at Leyden, 1735, 4to, enriched with notes, by Dr W. Dundas.

ORICUM, or ORICUS, a town of Epirus, on the Ionian sea, founded by a colony from Colchis, according to Pliny. It was called Dardania because Helenus and Andromache, natives of Troy or Dardania, reigned over the country after the Trojan war. It had a celebrated harbour, and was greatly esteemed by the Romans on account of its situation, but it was not well defended. The tree which produces the turpentine grew there in abundance. Virg. Æn. 10, 136. Lic. 24, 40. — Plin. 2, 89. — Cæs. Bell. Civ. 3, 1, &c. — Lucan. 3, 187.

ORIGENS, in ancient geography, is taken for all the most eastern parts of the world, such as Parthia, India, Assyria, &c.

ORIGENES a father of the church, was born at Alexandria, in Egypt, about A. D. 185. He received the elements of his education under his father, Leonides, after which he became a pupil of Ammonius the philosopher, while Clemens Alexandrinus was his preceptor in theology. At the age of seventeen he lost his father, who was beheaded for his profession of Christianity. Origen had now recourse to the teaching of grammar for the support of himself, his mother, and brethren; but this occupation he relinquished, on being appointed professor of sacred learning in the church of Alexandria. In this situation he distinguished himself by the austerity of his life, which he carried so far as to put in practice the passage of the gospel, "There be some who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven." About this time he began his great work, called "The Tetrapla;" or the Hebrew Bible, with four Greek versions; to which he afterwards added two more, and thus gave the name of "Hexapla" to the whole. Origen, by taking the order of priest, in Palestine, so offended his diocesan, Demetrius, that he interdicted him from teaching, and caused him to be banished the city. Upon this he went to Cæsarea, where he was protected by the bishops of Palestine. In the persecution raised against the church by Maximinus, Origen fled to Athens, where he wrote his Commentaries on the Scriptures. He afterwards convinced Beryllus, bishop of Bostra, of his error in regard to the pre-existence of Christ; and he next assisted at a council called against some Arabians, who maintained the death of the soul as well as of the body. In the persecution of Decius he was thrown into prison, and so cruelly tortured, that, though his life was spared, his health was destroyed by the sufferings which he underwent. He died at Tyre, aged sixty-nine. In his Commentaries he indulged too much the fancy for allegory; and in his other works he advanced notions more agreeable to the Platonic philosophy than the Scriptures. The most offensive of his doctrines related to the pre existence of souls, and the finite duration of future punishment. The best of his works is that which he wrote against Celsus. Huetius published an edition of Origen, in 2 vols folio; and another has been printed by De la Rue, in 4 vols. fol.

ORION, a celebrated giant sprung from the urine of Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury. These three gods, as they travelled over Bœotia, met with great hospitality from Hyrieus, a peasant of the country, who was ignorant of their dignity and character. They were entertained with whatever the cottage afforded, and, when Hyrieus had discovered that they were gods, because Neptune told him to fill up Jupiter's cup with wine, after he had served it before the rest, the old man welcomed them by the voluntary sacrifice of an ox. Pleased with his piety, the gods promised to grant him whatever he required, and the old man who had lately lost his wife, to whom he had promised never to marry again, desired them, that as he was childless, they would give him a son without another marriage. The gods consented, and they ordered him to bury in the ground the skin of the victim, into which they had all three made water. Hyrieus did as they commanded, and when, nine months after, he dug for the skin he found in it a beautiful child, whom he called Urion, ab urina. The name was changed into Orion, by the corruption of one letter, as Ovid says, perdidit antiquum littera prima sonum. Orion soon rendered himself celebrated, and Diana took him among her attendants, and even became deeply enamoured of him. His gigantic stature, however, displeased Œnopion, king of Chios, whose daughter Hero or Merope he demanded in marriage. The king, not to deny him openly, promised to make him his son-in-law as soon as he delivered his island from wild beasts. This task, which Œnopion deemed impracticable, was soon performed by Orion, who eagerly demanded his reward. Œnopion, on pretence of complying, intoxicated his illustrious guest, and put out his eyes on the sea shore, where he had laid himself down to sleep. Orion, finding himself blind when he awoke, was conducted by the sound to a neighbouring forge, where he placed one of the workmen on his back, and by his directions, went to a place where the rising sun was seen with the greatest advantage. Here he turned his face towards the luminary, and, as it is reported, he immediately recovered his eyesight, and hastened to punish the perfidious cruelty of Œnopion. It is said that Orion was an excellent workman in iron; and that he fabricated a subterraneous palace for Vulcan. Aurora, whom Venus had inspired with love, carried him away to the island of Delos, to enjoy his company with the greater security; but Diana, who was jealous of this, destroyed Orion with her arrows. Some say that Orion had provoked Diana's resentment, by offering violence to Opis one of her female attendants, or according to others, because he had attempted the virtue of the goddess herself. According to Ovid, Orion died of the bite of a scorpion, which the earth produced to punish his vanity in boasting that there was not on earth any animal which he could not conquer. Some say that Orion was the son of Neptune and Euryale, and that he had received from his father the privilege and power of walking over the sea without wetting his feet. Others make him son of Terra, like the rest of the giants. He had married a nymph called Side before his connexion with the family of Œnopion; but Side was the cause of her own death, by boasting herself fairer than Juno. According to Diodorus, Orion was a celebrated hunter, superior to the rest of mankind by his strength and uncommon stature. He built the port of Zancle, and fortified the coast of Sicily against the frequent inundations of the sea, by heaping a mound of earth, called Pelorum, on which he built a temple to the gods of the sea. After death, Orion was placed in heaven, where one of the constellations still bears his name. The constellation of Orion, placed near the feet of the bull, was composed of seventeen stars, in the form of a man holding a sword, which has given occasion to the poets often to speak of Orion's sword. As the constellation of Orion, which rises about the ninth day of March, and sets about the 21st of June, is generally supposed to be accompanied at its rising, with great rains and storms, it has acquired the epithet of aquosus, given it by Virgil. Orion was buried in the island of Delos, and the monument which the people of Tanagra in Boeotia showed, as containing the remains of this celebrated hero, was nothing but a cenotaph. The daughters of Orion distinguished themselves as much as their father, and when the oracle had declared that Boeotia should not be delivered from a dreadful pestilence before two of Jupiter's children were immolated on the altars, they joyfully accepted the offer, and voluntarily sacrificed themselves for the good of their country. Their names were Menippe and Metioche. They had been carefully educated by Diana, and Vesta and Minerva had made them very rich and valuable presents. The deities of hell were struck at the patriotism of the two females, and immediately two stars were seen to arise from the earth, which still smoked with the blood, and they were placed in the heavens in the form of a crown. According to Ovid, their bodies were burned by the Thebans, and from their ashes arose two persons, whom the gods soon after changed into constellations. Virg. Ain. 3, 517.—Apollod. 1, 4.—*Ovid. ORITHYIA, a daughter of Erectheus, king of Athens, by Praxithea. She was courted and carried away by Boreas, king of Thrace, as she crossed the Ilissus, and became mother of Cleopatra, Chione, Zetes, and Calais. Apollod. 3, 15.—Ovid Met. 6, 706. Fast 5, 203.—Paus 1 19 5, 19.——One of the Nereides.——A daughter of Cecrops, who bore Europus to Macedon.——One of the Amazons, famous for her warlike and intrepid spirit. Justin. 2, 4.

ORMENUS, a king of Thessaly, son of Cercaphus. He built a town, which was called Ormenium. He was father of Amyntor. Homer. Il. 9, 448.

ORNEÆ, a town of Argolis, north west of Nemea, and near the confines of the country. It was founded by Orneus, son of Erectheus. The Orneatæ were originally independent of Argos; but, in process of time, having been conquered by their more powerful neighbours, from Ionians they became Dorians, as Herodotus informs us. But we may observe that, according to Homer, this place was held in subjection by the sovereigns of Mycenæ as early as the time of the Trojan war. Thucydides writes that Ornea was destroyed in the sixteenth year of the Peloponnesian war, after it had been abandoned by the inhabitants. Paus 2, 25.—Herod. 8, 73.—*Hom. ORNYTUS, a friend of Æneas, killed by Camilla in the Rutulian wars. Virg. Æn. 11. 677.

ORNOSPADES, a Parthian, driven from his country by Artabanus. He assisted Tiberius, and was made governor of Macedonia, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6, 37.

ORODES, a prince of Parthia, who murdered his brother Mithridates, and ascended his throne. He either in person according to Paterculus, or by Surena his general, as several authors support, defeated Crassus, the Roman triumvir, and poured melted gold down the throat of his fallen enemy, to reproach him with his avarice and ambition. He followed the interest of Cassius and Brutus in Philippi. It is said, that, when Orodes became old and infirm, his thirty children applied to him, and disputed, in his presence, their right to the succession. Phraates, the eldest of them, obtained the crown from his father, and, to hasten him out of the world, he attempted to poison him. The poison had no effect; and Phraates, still determined on his father's death, strangled him with his own hands, about thirty-seven years before the Christian era. Orodes had then reigned about fifty years. Justin. 42. 4.—Patere. 2, 30. Another king of Parthia, murdered for his cruelty. *Joseph. ORŒTES, a Persian governor of Sardis, famous for his cruel murder of Polycrates. He died B. C. 521. He was put to death by order of Darius Hystaspes, on account of various offences committed by him, more particularly for having destroyed Mitrobates, governor of Daschylum, and his son Cranapes, and for having put to death a royal messenger. Historians are not quite agreed about the name of this man. He is called by some Orontes. Herod. 3, 120, &c.

OROMEDON, a lofty mountain in the island of Cos. Theocrit. 7.——A giant. Propert 3. 7, 48.

ORONTES, a river of Syria, rising on the eastern side of the range of Libanus, and after pursuing a northerly course, entering the Mediterranean opposite the island of Cyprus. It is a rapid and troubled river, and is said to have been formerly called Typhon, from the giant of that name, who being struck by the thunderbolts of Jupiter, sought refuge under the earth, and thereby caused the bursting forth of the river. It was also called Axius by the Macedonians, after the great river of their own country, a name which it still preserves in that of Asasy Dionys. Perieg. Ovid. Met. 2, 249.—Strab. 16.—Pous. 8, 20.

OROPUS, a city on the borders of Attica and Boeotia, on the lower bank of the Asopus, and not far from its mouth. The possession of this place was long the object of eager contest between the Athenians and the Boeotians. In the Peloponnesian war we find it occupied by the Athenians, but towards the close of that contest we hear of the city being surprised by the Boeotians, who retained possession of it for many years. In consequence of a sedition which occurred there, the Thebans changed the site of the place, and removed it about seven stadia from the sea. After the overthrow of Thebes, Oropus was ceded to the Athenians by Alexander. Hence Livy, Pausanias, and Pliny, place the town in Attica. Strabo, Dicæarchus, and Stephanus Byz., on the other hand, ascribe it to Boeotia. Oropus is now called Ropo, and contains only few and imperfect ruins. Paus. 1, 34.—Thucyd. 2, 23 8. 60.—Dod. Sic 13, 404.——A city in the island of Eubœa. Amm. Marcell. 30, 4.

OROSIUS, Paulus, a native of Hispania Terraconensis, who flourished about the beginning of the 5th century, under Arcadius and Honorius. He was in early life a disciple of St Augustine. The city of Rome having been taken by Alaric, king of the Goths, the pagans attributed that, and the other misfortunes which had befallen the empire, to the alteration of the national religion from heathenism to Christianity. It was to justify the Christians from this reproach that Orosius, at the request of St Augustine, undertook his principal work, entitled Historiæ, in which he exhibits a view of the most important events from the creation of the world to his own time, in order to show that great calamities had happened in every age, and that the Roman empire had not been more exempt from them at any other period than since the birth of Christ. This treatise forms a kind of general chronicle, or universal history, divided into seven books. The author has fallen into some important mistakes, especially in point of chronology, notwithstanding which, his work became exceedingly popular in the middle ages, and it was translated into Anglo Saxon, and commented on by king Alfred. Orosius wrote also against the heresy of Pelagius, and on other theological topics. The best edition of his history is that of Haverkamp, Lugd. B. 1738, 4to.

OROSPEDA MONS a chain of mountains in Spain, properly speaking, a continuation of the range of Idubeda. One part terminates, in the form of a segment of a circle, on the coast of Murcia and Grenada, while two arms are sent off in the direction of Ruteca, one of which pursues nearly a western direction and is called Mons Marianus now Sierra Morena; the other runs more to the south west, nearer the coast, and is called Mons Hipula, now Sierra Nevada, ending on the coast at Calpe, or Gibraltar. Strab. 3.

ORPHEUS, a son of Œager, by the muse Calliope. Some suppose him to be the son of Apollo, to render his birth more illustrious. He received a lyre from Apollo, or, according to some, from Mercury, upon which he played with such a masterly hand, that even the most rapid rivers ceased to flow, the savage beasts of the forest forgot their wildness, and the mountains moved to listen to his song. All nature seemed charmed and animated, and the nymphs were his constant companions. Eurydice was the only one who made a deep impression on the melodious musician, and their nuptials were celebrated. Their happiness, however, was short; Aristæus became enamoured of Eurydice, and, as she fled from her pursuer, a serpent that was lurking in the grass, bit her foot, and she died of the poisoned wound. Her loss was severely felt by Orpheus, and he resolved to recover her, or perish in the attempt. With his lyre in his hand, he entered the infernal regions, and gained an easy admission to the palace of Pluto. The king of hell was charmed with the melody of his strains; and, according to the beautiful expressions of the poets, the wheel of Ixion stopped, the stone of Sisyphus stood still, Tantalus forgot his perpetual thirst, and even the Furies relented. Pluto and Proserpine were moved with his sorrow, and consented to restore him Eurydice, provided he forbore looking behind till he had come to the extremest borders of hell. The conditions were gladly accepted, and Orpheus was already in sight of the upper regions of the air, when he forgot his promises and turned back to look at his long lost Eurydice. He saw her, but she instantly vanished from his eyes. He attempted to follow her, but he was refused admission; and the only comfort he could find, was to soothe his grief at the sound of his musical instrument, in grottoes, or on the mountains. He totally separated himself from the society of mankind, and the Thracian women, whom he had offended by his coldness to their amorous passion, or, according to others, by his unnatural gratifications, and impure indulgences, attacked him while they celebrated the orgies of Bacchus, and after they had torn his body to pieces, they threw into the Hebrus his head, which still articulated the words Eurydice! Eurydice! as it was carried down the stream into the Ægean sea. Orpheus was one of the Argonauts, of which celebrated expedition he wrote a poetical account still extant. This is doubted by Aristotle, who says, according to Cicero, that there never existed an Orpheus, but that the poems which pass under his name, are the compositions of a Pythagorean philosopher named Cercops. According to some of the moderns, the Argonautica, and the other poems attributed to Orpheus, are the productions of the pen of Onomacritus a poet who lived in the age of Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens. Pausanias, however, and Diodorus Siculus, speak of Orpheus as a great poet and musician, who rendered himself equally celebrated by his knowledge of the art of war, by the extent of his understanding, and by the laws which he enacted. Some maintain that he was killed by a thunderbolt. He was buried at Pieria in Macedonia, according to Apollodorus. The inhabitants of Dion boasted that his tomb was in their city, and the people of mount Libethrus, in Thrace, claimed the same honour, and farther observed, that the nightingales which built their nests near his tomb, sang with greater melody than all other birds. Orpheus, as some report, after death received divine honours, the Muses gave an honourable burial to his remains, and his lyre became one of the constellations in the heavens. ORTHIA, a surname of Diana at Sparta. In her sacrifices it was usual for boys to be whipped. (Vid Diamastigosis.) Plut in Thes. &c.

ORTHRUS, or ORTHUS, a dog which belonged to Geryon. He had two heads, and was sprung from the union of Echidna and Typhon. He was destroyed by Hercules. Hesod. Theog. 310. —Apollod. 2, 5.

ORTYGIA, a grove near Ephesus. Tacit. Ann. 3, 61.——A small island of Sicily, within the bay of Syracuse, which once formed one of the four quarters of that great city. It was in this island that the celebrated fountain Arethusa arose. (Vid. Syracusæ.) Virg. Æn. 3, 694.——An ancient name of the island of Delos. Some suppose that it received this name from Latona, who fled thither when changed into a quail (ὄρτυξ) by Jupiter, to avoid the pursuit of Juno. Diana was called Ortygia, as being born there; as also Apollo. Ovid. Met. 1, 691. Fast. 5, 692.—Virg. Æn. 3, 124.

ORTYGIUS, a Rutulian killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, 573.

ORUS, or HORUS, one of the gods of the Egyptians, son of Osiris and Isis. He assisted his mother in avenging his father, who had been murdered by Typhon. Orus was skilled in medicine, he was acquainted with futurity, and he made the good and the happiness of his subjects, the sole object of his government. He was the emblem of the sun among the Egyptians, and he was generally represented as an infant, swathed in variegated clothes. In one hand he held a staff, which terminated in the head of a hawk, in the other a whip with three thongs. Herod. 2. —Plut. de Isid. et Os.—Diod. 1.——The first king of Troezene. Paus 2, 30.

OSCA, a town of Hispania Bætica, in the territory of the Turdetani. It is supposed to correspond to the modern Huesca, in Arragon.

OSCHOPHORIA, a festival observed by the Athenians. It receives its name ἀπὸ τοῦ φέρειν τὰς ὄσχας, from carrying boughs hung up with grapes, called ὄσχαι. Its original institution is thus mentioned by Plutarch. (Vit. Thes.) Theseus, at his return from Crete, forgot to hang out the white sail, by which his father was to be apprised of his success. This neglect was fatal to Ægeus, who threw himself into the sea and perished. Theseus no sooner reached the land, than he sent a herald to inform his father of his safe return, and in the mean time he began to make the sacrifices which he vowed when he first set sail from Crete. The herald, on his entrance into the city, found the people in great agitation. Some lamented the king's death, while others, elated at the sudden news of the victory of Theseus, crowned the herald with garlands in demonstration of their joy. The herald carried back the garlands on his staff to the sea-shore, and after he had waited till Theseus had finished his sacrifice, he related the melancholy story of the king's death. Upon this, the people ran in crowds to the city, showing their grief by cries and lamentations. From that circumstance, therefore, at the feast of the Oschophoria, not the herald but his staff was crowned with garlands, and all the people that were present always exclaimed ἀλαλαί, ἰοῦ, ἰοῦ, the first of which expresses haste, and the others a consternation or depression of spirits. The historian further mentions that Theseus, when he went to Crete, did not take with him the usual number of virgins, but that instead of two of them, he filled up the number with two youths of his acquaintance, whom he made pass for women, by disguising their dress, and by using them to the ointments and perfumes of women, as well as by a long and successful imitation of their voice. The imposition succeeded; their sex was not discovered in Crete; and when Theseus had triumphed over the Minotaur, he, with these two youths, led a procession with branches in their hands, in the same habit which is still used at the celebration of the Oschophoria. The branches which were carried, were in honour of Bacchus or Ariadne, or because they returned in autumn, when the grapes were ripe. Besides this procession, there was a race also exhibited, in which only young men, whose parents were both alive, were permitted to engage. It was usual for them to run from the temple of Bacchus to that of Minerva, which was on the sea-shore. The place where they stopped was called ἀγαθόφορον, because the boughs which they carried in their hands were deposited there. The reward of the conqueror was a cup called σκυφὸς δικότυλος, because it contained a mixture of five different things, wine, honey, cheese, meal, and oil.

OSCI, one of the most ancient tribes of Italy, perhaps the primitive stock of the peninsula. They seem to have occupied at first the central regions of the country, and to have afterwards extended themselves widely both west and east. In the first direction they formed the several communities distinguished by the name of Latini, Rutuli, Volsci, Campani, and Sidicini. In the central districts they constituted the Sabine nation, from whom were descended the Picentes, as well as the Æqui, Marsi, Hernici, Peligni, Vestini, and Marrucini. From the Osci or Opici again, in conjunction with the Liburni, an Illyrian nation, who had very early formed settlements on the eastern coast of Italy, we must derive the Apuli and Daunii, Pedicetii, and Peucetii, Calabri, Iapyges, and Messapii. The Greeks, who formed numerous settlements in the south of Italy after the siege of Troy, found these several people and the Œnotri still farther south, in possession of the country. But the Œnotrian name disappeared, together with its subdivisions, into the Leutarnii, Chones, and Itali; when the Samnite nation, which derived its origin from the Sabines, had propagated the Ocan stock to the extremity of the peninsula, under the various denominations of Hirpini, Pentri, Caraceni, Frentani, and subsequently of the Lucani and Bruttii. The Opici were the same with the Osci. Vid. Opici.

OSINIUS, a king of Clusium, who assisted Æneas against Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, 655.

OSIRIS, a great deity of the Egyptians, son of Jupiter and Niobe. All the ancients greatly differ in their opinions concerning this celebrated god, but they all agree that, as king of Egypt, he took particular care to civilize his subjects, to polish their morals, to give them good and salutary laws, and to teach them agriculture. After he had accomplished a reform at home, Osiris resolved to go and spread civilization in the other parts of the earth. He left his kingdom to the care of his wife Isis, and of her faithful minister Hermes or Mercury. The command of his troops at home was left to the trust of Hercules, a warlike officer. In this expedition, Osiris was accompanied by his brother Apollo, and by Anubis. Macedo, and Pan. His march was through Æthiopia, where his army was increased by the addition of the Satyrs, a hairy race of monsters, who made dancing and playing on musical instruments their chief study. He afterwards passed through Arabia, and visited the greatest part of the kingdoms of Asia and Europe, where he enlightened the minds of men by introducing among them the worship of the gods, and a reverence for the wisdom of a supreme being. At his return home, Osiris found the minds of his subjects roused and agitated. His brother Typhon had raised seditions, and endeavoured to make himself popular. Osiris, whose sentiments were always of the most pacific nature, endeavoured to convince his brother of his ill conduct, but he fell a sacrifice to the attempt. Typhon murdered him in a secret apartment, and cut his body to pieces, which were divided among the associates of his guilt. Typhon, according to Plutarch, shut up his brother in a coffer, and threw them into the Nile. The inquiries of Isis discovered the body of her husband on the coasts of Phœnicia, where it had been conveyed by the waves, but Typhon stole it as it was carrying to Memphis, and he divided it among his companions, as was before observed. This cruelty incensed Isis; she revenged her husband's death, and with her son Orus, she defeated Typhon and the partisans of his conspiracy. She recovered the mangled pieces of her husband's body, the genitals excepted, which the murderer had thrown into the sea, and to render him all the honour which his humanity deserved, she made as many statues of wax as there were mangled pieces of his body. Each statue contained a piece of the flesh of the dead monarch, and Isis, after she had summoned in her presence one by one, the priests of all the different deities in her dominions, gave them each a statue, intimating, that, in doing that, she had preferred them to all the other communities of Egypt, and she bound them by a solemn oath that they would keep secret that mark of her favour and endeavour to show their sense of it by establishing a form of worship, and paying divine honours to their prince. They were further directed to choose whatever animals they pleased to represent the person and the divinity of Osiris, and they were enjoined to pay the greatest reverence to that representative of divinity, and to bury it when dead with the greatest solemnity. To render their establishment more popular, each sacerdotal body had a certain portion of land allotted to them to maintain them, and to defray the expenses which necessarily attended the sacrifices and ceremonial rites. That part of the body of Osiris which had not been recovered, was treated with more particular attention by Isis, and she ordered that it should receive honours more solemn, and at the same time more mysterious than the other members (Vid Phallica.) As Osiris had particularly instructed his subjects in cultivating the ground, the priests chose the ox to represent him, and paid the most superstitious veneration to that animal. (Vid. Apis.) Osiris, according to the opinion of some mythologists, is the same as the sun, and the adoration which is paid by different nations to an Anubis, a Bacchus, a Dionysius a Jupiter, a Pan, &c., is the same as that which Osiris received in the Egyptian temples. Isis also after death received divine honours as well as her husband, and as the ox was the symbol of the sun, or Osiris, so the cow was the emblem of the moon, or of Isis. Nothing can give a clearer idea of the power and greatness of Osiris than this inscription, which has been found on some ancient monuments:—Saturn, the youngest of all the gods, was my father: I am Osiris, who conducted a large and numerous army as far as the deserts of India, and travelled over the greatest part of the world, and unlocked the streams of the Ister, and the remote shores of the ocean, diffusing benevolence to all the inhabitants of the earth. Osiris was generally represented with a cap on his head like a mitre, with two horns; he held a stick in his left hand, and in his right a whip with three thongs. Sometimes he appears with the head of a hawk, as that bird, by its quick and piercing eyes, is a proper emblem of the sun. Plut. in Isid et Os.—Herod. 2. 144. – Diod. 1.—Homer Od 12, 328. Adam. de Anim 3 – *Lucan. de Dea Syr. OSISMII, a people of Gallia Lugdunensis Tertia, on the coast of the Mare Britannicum, and at the south-western extremity of the Tractus Armoricanus. Their country answers to the modern Leon and Quimpercorentin in Bretagne. Mela, 6, 25 – Plin 4, 18.

OSROENE, a district of Mesopotamia, in the north-western section of the country. It received its name from Osroes, an Arab sheik, who contrived to wrest it from the Seleucidæ about 120 B. C. Amm Marcell 14, 3.

OSSA, a celebrated mountain, or more correctly, mountain-range of Thessaly, extending from the right bank of the Peneus, along the Magnesian coast to the chain of Pelion. It was supposed that Ossa and Olympus were once united, but that an earthquake had rent them asunder, forming the vale of Tempe. (Vid. Tempe.) Ossa was one of the mountains which the giants, in their war with the gods, piled upon Olympus in order to ascend to the heavens. The modern name of Ossa is Kissovo, or, according to Dodwell, Kissabos. Herod 7, 129.—Eliam. V. H. 3, 1. – Homer Od 11, 314.—Virg. G. 1, 281.——A small town of Macedonia, in the territory of Bisaltia, and situate on a river (probably the Bisaltes,) falling into the Strymon.

OSTIA, a celebrated town and harbour, at the mouth of the river Tiber, in Italy. It was the port of Rome, and its name even now remains unchanged, though few vestiges are left of its ancient greatness. All historians agree in ascribing the foundation of Ostia to Ancus Martius. That it was a Roman colony we learn from Florus. When the Romans began to have shipping, Ostia became a place of greater importance, and a fleet was constantly stationed there to guard the mouth of the Tiber. It was here that the statue of Cybele was received with due solemnity by Scipio Nasica, when the public voice had selected him for that duty, as the best citizen of Rome. In the civil wars, Ostia fell into the hands of Marius, and was treated with savage cruelty. Cicero, in one of his orations, alludes with indignation, to the capture of the fleet stationed at Ostia, by some pirates. The town and colony of Ostia was distant only thirteen miles from Rome, but the port itself was at the mouth of the Tiber. There is some difficulty, however in ascertaining the exact situation of the harbour, from the change which appears to have taken place in the mouth of the river during the lapse of so many ages. Even the number of its channels is a disputed point. Ovid seems to point out two, but Dionysius Periegetes positively states that there was but one. This difference however, may be reconciled, by supposing that in the geographer's time the right branch of the river might alone be used for the purposes of navigation, and that the other stream was too insignificant and shallow for the reception of ships of any size. According to Plutarch, Julius Cæsar was the first who turned his attention to the construction of a port at Ostia, by raising there a mole and other works, but it was to the emperor Claudius that this harbour seems indebted for all the magnificence ascribed to it by antiquity. Suetonius, in his life of that prince, has given us a detailed account of the formation of this harbour with its pharos. *Dion. OTHO, M Salvius, a Roman, who, though the son of a freed woman by a Roman knight, was descended from the princes of Etruria He was one of Nero's favourites, and, as such, he was raised to the highest offices of the state, and made governor of Lusitania by the interest of Seneca, who wished to remove him from Rome, lest Nero's love for Poppæa should prove his ruin. After Nero's death, Otho conciliated the favour of Galba, the new emperor; but when he did not gain his point, and when Galba had refused to adopt him as his successor, he resolved to make himself absolute, without any regard to the age or dignity of his friend. The great debts which he had contracted encouraged his avarice, and he caused Galba to be assassinated, and he made himself emperor. He was acknowledged by the senate and the Roman people, but the sudden revolt of Vitellius in Germany rendered his situation precarious, and it was mutually resolved that their respective right to the empire should be decided by arms Otho obtained three victories over his enemies, but in a general engagement near Brixellum, his forces were defeated, and he stabbed himself when all hopes of success were vanished, after a reign of about three months, on the 20th of April, A. D. 69. It has been justly observed that the last moments of Otho's life were those of a philosopher. He comforted his soldiers who lamented his fortune, and he expressed his concern for their safety, when they earnestly solicited to pay him the last friendly offices before he stabbed himself, and he observed that it was better that one man should die, than that a whole empire should be involved in ruin for his obstinacy. His nephew was pale and distressed, fearing the anger and haughtiness of the conqueror; but Otho comforted him, and observed, that Vitellius would be kind and affectionate to the friends and relations of Otho, since Otho was not ashamed to say, that, in the time of their greatest enmity, the mother of Vitellius had received every friendly treatment from his hands. He also burned the letters which by falling into the hands of Vitellius, might provoke his resentment against those who had favoured the cause of an unfortunate general These noble and humane sentiments in a man who was the associate of Nero's shameful pleasures and who stained his hand in the blood of his master, have appeared to some wonderful and passed for the features of policy, and not of naturally virtuous and benevolent heart. *Plut in Vita.—Suet. in Oth.—Tacit. OTHRYS, a mountain range of Thessaly which, branching out of Thymphrestus, one of the highest points in the chain of Pindus, closes the great basin of Thessaly to the south, and served at the same time to divide the waters which flowed northwards into the Peneus from those received by the Sperchius. Though covered by almost perpetual snows, it abounds with forests of pine. At present it is known by the names of Hellovo and Gura. Europ. Alces 583.—*Theocr. OTUS and EPHIALTES, sons of Neptune and Iphimedia, called also Aloides.

OVIDIUS NASO, P., a celebrated Roman poet born at Sulmo, on the 20th of March, about 43 B C. As he was intended for the bar, his father sent him early to Rome, and removed him to Athens in the sixteenth year of his age. The progress of Ovid in the study of eloquence was great, but the father's expectations were frustrated; his son was born a poet, and neither could deter him from pursuing his natural inclination, though he was often reminded that Homer lived and died in the greatest poverty Every thing he wrote was expressed in poetical numbers, as he himself says, et quod tentabam scribere versus erat. A lively genius and a fertile imagination soon gained him admirers; the learned became his friends: Virgil, Propertius, Tibullus, and Horace, honoured him with their correspondence, and Augustus patronized his with the most unbounded liberality. These favours, however, were but of short duration, and the poet was soon after banished to Tomos on the Euxine sea, by the emperor. The true cause of this sudden exile is unknown. Some attribute it to a shameful amour with Livia the wife of Augustus, while others support that it arose from the knowledge which Ovid had of the unpardonable incest of the emperor with his daughter Julia. These reasons are indeed merely conjectural, the cause was of a very private and very secret nature, of which Ovid himself is nisi a to speak, as it arose from error and not from criminality. It was, however, something improper in the family or court of Augustus, as these lines seem to indicate

Cur aliquid vidi? Cur noxia lumina feci?
Cur imprudenti cognita culpa mihi est?
Inscius Actæon vidit sine veste Dianam:
Præda fuit canibus non minus ille suis

Again,

Inscia quod crimen viderunt lumina plector,
Peccatumque oculos est habuisse meum.

And in another place,

Perdiderunt cum me duo crimina carmen et error,
Alterius facti culpa silenda mihi est

In his banishment, Ovid betrayed his pusillanimity, and however afflicted and distressed his situation was yet the flattery and impatience which he showed in his writings are a disgrace to his pen and expose him more to ridicule than pity. Though he prostituted his pen and his time to adulation, yet the emperor proved deaf to all entreaties, and refused to listen to his most ardent friends at Rome, who wished for the return of the poet. Ovid, no undoubtedly wished for a Brutus to deliver Rome of her tyrannical Augustus, continued his flattery even to meanness; and when the emperor died, he was so mercenary as to consecrate a small temple to the departed tyrant, on the shore of the Euxine, where he regularly offered frankincense every morning. Tiberius proved as regardless as his predecessor, to the entreaties which were made for Ovid, and the poet died in the 7th or 8th year of his banishment, in the 59th year of his age, A. D. 17, and was buried at Tomos. In the year 1508 of the Christian era the following epitaph was found at Stain, in the modern kingdom of Austria

Hic situs est vates quem Dux Cæsarus ira
Augusto patria cedere jussit humo
Sæpe mihi voluit patrios occumbere terris,
Sed tu tutra! Hunc illi fata dedere locum

This however, is an imposition to render celebrated an obscure corner of the world, which never contained the bones of Ovid. The greatest part of Ovid's poems are remaining. His Metamorphoses in 15 books are extremely curious on account of the many different mythological facts and traditions which they relate but they can have no claim to an epic poem. In composing this, the poet was more indebted to the then existing traditions and to the theogony of the ancients, than to the powers of his own imagination. His Fasti were divided into 12 books, the same number as the constellations in the zodiac; but of these, six have perished, and the learned have reason to lament the loss of a poem, which must have thrown so much light upon the religious rites and ceremonies, festivals and sacrifices of the ancient Romans, as we may judge from the six that have survived the ravages of time and barbarity. His Tristia, which are divided into five books, contain much elegance and softness of expression, as also his Elegies on different subjects. The Heroides are nervous, spirited, and diffuse the poetry is excellent, the language varied but the expressions are often too wanton and indelicate a fault which is common in his compositions. His three books of Amorum, and the same number de Arte Amandi, with the other de Remedio Amoris, are written with great elegance, and contain many flowery descriptions, but the doctrine which they hold forth is dangerous, and as the composition of an experienced libertine and refined sensualist, they are to be read with caution, as they seem to be calculated to corrupt the heart, and sap the foundations of virtue and morality. His Ibis, which is written in imitation of a poem of Callimachus, of the same name, is a satirical performance. Besides these, there are extant some fragments of other poems and among these some of a tragedy called Medea. The talents of Ovid as a dramatic writer have been disputed, and some have observed that he who is so often void of sentiment was not born to shine as a tragedian. Ovid has attempted perhaps too many sorts of poetry at once. On whatever he has written, he has totally exhausted the subject and left nothing unsaid. He every where paints nature with a masterly hand, and gives strength to the most common expressions. It has been judiciously observed that his poetry, after his banishment from Rome, was destitute of that spirit and vivacity which we admire in his other compositions. His Fasti are perhaps the best written of all his poems, and after them we may fairly rank his love verses, his Heroides, and his Metamorphoses, which were not totally finished when Augustus sent him into banishment. His Epistles from Pontus are the language of an abject and pusillanimous flatterer. However critics may censure the indelicacy and the inaccuracies of Ovid, it is to be acknowledged that his poetry contains great sweetness and elegance, and like that of Tibullus, charms the ear and captivates the mind. Ovid married three wives, but of the last alone he speaks with fondness and affection. He had only one daughter, but by which of his wives is unknown; and she herself became mother of two children, by two husbands. The best edition of Ovid is that of Burmann Amst. 1727, 4to 4 vols. The edition of Nic. Heinsius, Amst 1661, 3 vols. 12mo, is also an excellent one. Ovid. Trist. 3 et 4, Eleg. 2. Pontic 2 — Martial. 3 et 8

OXEÆ, small pointed islands, near the Echinades off the coast of Acarnania. Their ancient name has reference to their form, (ὀξεῖαι.) Strabo reports that these are the same which Homer calls Thoas. This group is now commonly known by the name of Curzolari, but the most considerable amongst them retains the appellation of Oxia. Hom Od. 15, 298.—Strab. 10.

OXUS, a river of Bactriana rising in the north-eastern extremity of that country or rather in the south-eastern part of Great Bukaria, and running for the greater part of its course in a north-western direction. It receives numerous tributaries, and falls after a course of 1400 miles into the Arab Sea, whence, according to some, it flowed into the Caspian. It is an extremely broad and rapid river, carrying down much soil with it, and its waters were reckoned by the ancients very unwholesome to drink. It was as deep that it could be nowhere forded, but was very much used for the conveyance of Indian goods to the western parts of the country, whence they were despatched to Europe It is now known under the name of the Jihon. Mela, 3, 5. —Plin. 6 16.

OXYDRĀCÆ, a nation of India who are supposed to have inhabited the district now called Oulch, near the confluence of the Acesines and Indus Strab. 15.—Arrian 6, 13

OXYRYNCHUS, a city of Egypt, in the district of Heptanomis, and capital of the Oxyrynchite Nome. It was situate on the canal of Moeris, south of Heracleopolis Magna, and received its name (a translation very probably from the Egyptian), on account of a fish called Φάγρος in Greek, a species of pike, being worshipped and having a temple This place became a great resort of monks and hermits when Christianity was spread over Egypt. Nothing remains of this city, in the village called Behnese, built on its ruins, but some fragments of stone pillars, and a single column left standing, and which appears to have formed part of a portico of the composite order. Ædian. Hist. An 10, 46.

OZOLÆ, or OZOLI, a people of Greece, who occupied a narrow tract of country, on the northern shore of the Corinthian gulf, commencing at the Ætolian Rhium, and terminating near Crissa. (Vid Locri.) They received their name from the bad stench (ὄζος) of their bodies and of their clothing, which was the raw hides of wild beasts and which, it is said, they continued to wear the latest of the Greeks. Some, however, derive the appellation from the stench of the stagnated water in the neighbouring lakes and marshes, while a fabulous tradition gives the following explanation: during the reign of a son of Deucalion, a bitch brought into the world a stick instead of whelps. The stick was planted in the ground by the king, and it grew up to a large vine and produced grapes, from which the inhabitants of the country were called Ozolæ, not from ὄζειν, to smell bad, but from ὄζος, a branch or sprout. Paus. 10, 38.—Herod 8, 32.

PACATIANUS, Titus Julius, a general of the Roman armies, who proclaimed himself emperor in Gaul, about the latter part of Philip's reign He was soon after defeated, A. D. 249, and put to death.

PACCIUS, an insignificant poet in the age of Domitian. Juv. 7, 12.

PACHES, an Athenian, who took Mitylene, &c. Aristot. Pobt. 4.

PACHYNUS (Παχυνος Ακρα), a promontory of Sicily forming the south-eastern extremity of the island, and called also, by some of the Latin writers, Pachynum. It is one of the three promontories that gives to Sicily its triangular figure, the other two being Pelorus and Lilybæum. The modern name is Capo Passaro. Its southernmost point is called by Ptolemy Odysseæ Acra (Ὀδυσσεως Ακρα) and coincides with the projection of the coast before which the islands delle Correnti lie. Between Pachynus and this latter cape lies a small harbour called at the present day Porto di Pilo, and the same with what Cicero terms Portus Pachyni. It served merely as a temporary refuge for mariners in stress of weather. Mela, 2, 7.—Plin. 3, 8.—Cic. in Verr 5, 34

PACORUS, the eldest of the thirty sons of Orodes, king of Parthia, sent against Crassus, whose army he defeated, and whom he took prisoner. He took Syria from the Romans, and supported the republican party of Pompey, and of the murderers of Julius Cæsar. He was killed in a battle by Ventidius Bassus, B. C. 38, on the same day (9th of June) that Crassus had been defeated Flor. 4, 9 ——A king of Parthia, and ally of Decebalus king of the Dacians, in the war which he maintained against the Romans in the reign of Domitian.——A son of Vonones, king of Parthia, who obtained the country of Media for his share, on condition of his surrendering Parthia to his brother Vologeses

PACTOLUS, a river of Lydia, rising in the south-eastern part of mount Tmolus, and falling into the Hermus, after having passed by Sardes, the ancient capital of Crœsus. Pliny reports, that it was sometimes called Chrysorrhoas, and its source Tarne. A celebrated temple of Cybele rose on its banks, which is alluded to by Sophocles. This temple appears to have suffered in the burning of Sardes by the Ionians and Athenians. Callimachus and Dionysius Periegetes speak of the swans of Pactolus The Turkish name of this river is Bagoudy. Plin 5, 22.—Virg Æn. 10, 142 —Juv. Sat. 14, 298 *Soph. PACTYAS, a Lydian intrusted with the care of the treasures of Crœsus at Sardes. The immense riches which he could command corrupted him, and to make himself independent, he gathered a large army. He laid siege to the citadel of Sardes, but the arrival of one of the Persian generals soon put him to flight. He retired to Cumæ, and afterwards to Lesbos, where he was delivered into the hands of Cyrus. Herod. 1, 154, &c. —Plus 2 35

PACUVIUS, M., a Latin tragic poet, was a native of Brundusium, and is said to have been the sister's son of Ennius. He flourished about B. C. 154, and was the friend and guest of C. Lælius. In the rude state of the Roman theatre, he obtained great reputation; and his tragedy of Orestes is particularly mentioned by Cicero in his dialogue De Amicitia, as having been heard with loud applause. He also composed satires, and had a talent for painting. In advanced life he retired from Rome to Tarentum, where he died, having nearly reached his ninetieth year. A few fragments only of his works are left, which have been published in the Corpus Poetarum Latinorum.

PADUS, now the Po, the largest river of Italy, anciently called also Eridanus an appellation which is frequently used by the Roman poets, and almost always by Greek authors. This latter name, however, belongs properly to the Ostium Spuneticum of the Padus. The name Padus is said to have been derived from a word in the language of the Gauls, which denoted a pine-tree, in consequence of the great number of these trees growing near its source. Whatever be the derivation of the term, Padus, the more ancient name of the river, which was Bodincus, is certainly of Celtic origin, and is said to signify "bottomless." The Po rises in Mons Vesulus, now Monte Viso, near the sources of the Druentia, or Durance, runs in an easterly direction for more than 500 miles, and discharges its waters into the Adriatic, about 30 miles south of Portus Veneris, or Venice. It is sufficiently deep to bear boats and barges at all miles from its source but the navigation is at all times difficult, and not unfrequently hazardous, on account of the rapidity of the current. Its waters are liable to sudden increase from the melting of the snows and from heavy falls of rain, the rivers that flow into it being almost all mountain-streams, and in the flat country, in the lower part of its course, great dikes are erected on both sides of the river to protect the lands from inundation. During its long course it receives a great number of tributaries, its channel being the final receptacle of almost every stream which rises on the eastern and southern declivities of the Alps, and the northern declivity of the Apennines. The mouths of the Po were anciently reckoned seven in number, the principal one, which was the southernmost called Padusa, and now Po di Primaro. It was this mouth also to which the appellations Eridanus and Spineticum Ostium were applied. It sends off a branch from itself near Ferrara, the modern Volana Ostium, but is now denominated Po di Ferrara. The Padus is rendered famous in the legends of mythology by the fate of Phaeton, who fell into it when struck down from heaven by the thunderbolt of Jove. (Vid. Phaeton.) Plin. 3, 16 et 20. — Polyb. 2, 16.

PADUSA, the same with the Ostium Spineticum, or southernmost branch of the river Padus (Vid. Padus.) A canal was cut by Augustus from the Padusa to Ravenna. Virgil speaks of the swans along its banks. Virg. Æn. 11, 457.

PÆAN, a surname of Apollo, derived from the word paean, a hymn which was sung in his honour because he had killed the serpent Python, which had given cause to the people to exclaim Io Pæan! The exclamation of Io Pæan! was made use of in speaking to the other gods, as it often was a demonstration of joy. Juv. 6, 171. — *Ovid. PÆON, and Pæan, a deity, the god of medicine, mentioned in Homer as having healed the wounds of Mars and Pluto. Subsequently to the time of Homer, the name began to be applied to Apollo, and also to his son Æsculapius, as deities, who averted sickness and maladies from men; and hence the word is frequently employed in the simple sense of "a deliverer." Thus in Æschylus we have σωτὴρ γενοῦ τῶνδε μογήτορος. Hom. Il. 5, 401 et 899. — Æschyl. Agam. 90.

PÆONES, an ancient and powerful nation, who assisted Priam during the siege of Troy, and occupied at one time the whole northern part of Macedonia from the Etigon to the Strymon, including Emathia and other districts. *Homer. PÆSTANUS SINUS, a gulf on the lower coast of Italy, its upper shore belonging to Campania, and its lower to Lucania. According to Strabo, it extended from the Siren's cape to the promontory of Posidium. The modern name is the gulf of Salerno. Its ancient appellation was derived from the city of Paestum. Strab. 5.

PÆSTUM, a celebrated city of Lucania, in Lower Italy, below the river Silarus, and not far from the western coast. Its Greek appellation was Posidonia, the place being so called in honour of Neptune (Ποσειδών.) The name Paestum is used by the Latin writers more commonly. The origin of this once flourishing city has afforded matter of much discussion to antiquaries, but it seems now generally determined, that whether the Graeci or Tyrrheni were the original possessors of this coast, they can lay no claim to those majestic piles which, under the name of the ruins of Paestum, form at the present day the admiration and wonder of all who have visited them. The temples of Paestum too closely resemble in their plan and mode of structure the early edifices of Greece and Sicily, to be the work of any of the native tribes of Italy. The Tuscans, to whom alone they could be referred, have left us no example of a similar style in any of their architectural monuments. Strabo is the only ancient writer who has transmitted to us any positive account of the foundation of Posidonia. He states, that it was built by a colony of Sybarites, close to the shore in the first instance, but that it was afterwards removed more into the interior. This account is further confirmed by Scymnus of Chios, and agrees with what we know of the extent of dominion possessed by Sybaris at an early period on this sea, where she founded also the towns of Laus and Scidrus. We are left in uncertainty as to the exact date of this establishment of the Sybarites, but we have two fixed points which may assist us in forming a right conclusion on the subject. The first is the foundation of Sybaris itself, which took place about 720 B. C.; the other is that of Velia, a Phocæan colony, built, as we learn from Herodotus, in the reign of Cyrus, or nearly 540 B. C. It will be seen by that historian's account of the events which induced the Phocæans to settle on the shores of Lucania, that they were chiefly led to form this resolution by the advice of a citizen of Posidonia. It may thence reasonably be supposed, that the latter city had already existed for twenty or thirty years. There are but few other particulars on record relative to its history. That it must have attained a considerable degree of prosperity, is evident from the circumstance of its name having been attached to the present gulf of Salerno, (Vid. Paestanus Sinus;) and we possess yet farther confirmation of the fact, in the splendid monuments which age has not yet been able to deface or destroy. It appears from Strabo that the Posidoniates, jealous of the aggrandizement of Velia, endeavoured more than once to reduce that town to subjection; these attempts, however, proved fruitless, and not long after they were called upon to defend themselves against the aggressions of the Lucani, the most determined and dangerous of all the enemies with whom the Greeks had to contend. After an unsuccessful resistance, they were at

...th compelled to acknowledge the superiority of these barbarians, and so submit to their authority. It was probably to rescue Posidonia from their yoke that Alexander of Epirus landed here with a considerable army, and defeated the united forces of the Lucanians and Samnites in the vicinity of that place. The Romans having subsequently conquered the Lucani, became possessed of Posidonia, whither they sent a colony, A. U. C. 490. The loss of their liberty, even under these more distinguished conquerors, and still more the abolition of their usages and habits as Greeks, seem to have been particularly afflicting to the Posidoniatæ. Aristoxenus, a celebrated musician and philosopher of Tarentum, thus feelingly depicts the distress of this hapless people. "We follow the example," says this writer, "of the Posidoniatæ who, having been compelled to become Tuscans, or rather Romans, instead of Greeks, and to adopt the language and institutions of barbarians, still, however, annually commemorate one of the solemn festivals of Greece. On that day it is their custom to assemble together in order to revive the recollection of their ancient rites and language, and to lament and shed tears in common over their sad destiny; after which they retire in silence to their homes." The unhealthy situation of Pæstum, which has been remarked by Strabo, may probably have prevented that colony from attaining to any degree of importance; and as it was placed on an unfrequented coast, and had no trade of its own, it soon decayed, and we find it only noticed by subsequent writers for the celebrity of its roses, which were said to bloom twice in the year. Strab. 5. - Herod. 1, 167. 6, 21.—Liv. 8, 17. Epit. 14 et 27, 10.—Athen 10, 11. - Cic. ad Att. 11, 17 Virg G 4, 119.—Propert. 4, 5.- *Ovid. PAGASÆ, a maritime town of Thessaly, on the Sinus Pagasæus, and just below the mouth of the river Onchestus. It was the port of Iolcos, and afterwards of Pheræ, and was remarkable in Grecian story as the harbour whence the ship Argo set sail on her distant voyage. It was indeed asserted by some, that it derived its name from the construction of that famous vessel. (πήγνυμι, pango) But Strabo is of opinion that it rather owed its appellation to the numerous springs which were found in its vicinity, (πηγαί, fons,) and this indeed seems the preferable etymology. Apollo was the tutelary deity of the place. Hermippus, a comic poet, cited by Athenæus, says of this town, ἐν Παγασαῖς ἰσθμὸς καὶ στρατιαῖς παρέλαυνον. Its site is nearly occupied by the present castle of Volo. Pagasæ gave its name to the extensive gulf on whose shores it was situated; and which we find variously designated, as Pagasæticus Sinus, or Pagasitæ, Pagasæus, and Pagasicus. In modern geography it is called the gulf of Volo. Strab. 9.—Apoll. Rhod. 1, 413.—Athen. 1, 49.—Scyl. p. 28.—Demosth. Phil. Epist. 159.—Mela, 2, 3.—Plin. 4, 9.

——An early Athenian epic poet, mentioned by Suidas. The lexicographer states, that, according to some, he lived before the time of Phemonoe the first priestess of Delphi, while others placed him after her. Suidas cites the following productions of his. 1. A Cosmogonia, in five books 2 The nativity of Apollo and Diana, in three books. 3 Discourses of Venus and Love. (Λόγοι περὶ τοῦ Ἔρωτος φασὶ καὶ Ἀφρο.) in five books 4. The dispute between Minerva and Neptune 5 Latona's trees (Λητοῦς πλάσματα.)——A native either of Paros or Priene, who lived in the time of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and to whom, according to Suidas, the work, entitled Ἀπίστα was ascribed by some.——A native of Abydos, the favourite of Aristotle. He wrote historical and other works.——An Egyptian or Athenian, a grammarian, who wrote a work on the Egyptian Theology (Αἰγυπτία Θεολογία), an account of Trojan affairs, a book of fables, &c.——A grammarian of Alexandrea, perhaps the same with the preceding. A work entitled Ἀπίστα (" Incredible things,") in a single book, has come down to us, which is generally ascribed to an Alexandrean grammarian, and very probably was written by the individual of whom we are now speaking. The author endeavours to explain the origin of many of the Greek fables, such as those of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, Pasiphaë, Actæon, &c. All these legends have, according to him, an historical basis, and more or less truth connected with them, but which has been strangely distorted by the ignorance and credulity of men. The work is written in a very simple style, and, notwithstanding the forced nature of many of the explanations, may be regarded as, in some respects, an instructive book. Simson places Palæphatus in 409 B. C. while Saxius assigns him to 322 B. C. The best edition of the Ἀπίστα is that of J. Frid. Fischer, in 8vo. Lips. 1789.

PALÆSTINA, a district of Asia, first called the Land of Canaan from Noah's grandson, by whom it was peopled; but since distinguished by other appellations, such as the Land of Promise, the Land of Israel, the Holy Land, and, by way of pre-eminence, the Land. It derived its name of Palæstina from the Philistei, or Philistines, who possessed great part of it; and that of Judea, from Judah, whose tribe was the most considerable of the twelve, and possessed the finest and most fertile part of the whole. Christians, as well as Jews, have dignified it with the title of Holy Land, partly on account of its metropolis, supposed to have been the centre of God's worship, and his peculiar habitation, but chiefly because it was the native country of Jesus Christ, and the scene on which he accomplished the great work of our redemption. Palestine was bounded on the north by Phœnicia and Cœlesyria, on the east by Arabia Deserta, on the south by Arabia Petræa, and on the west by the Mediterranean, called in the Bible the Great Sea. Moses has described its fertility and productiveness, (Deut viii. 7, &c.) and it is said to have exceeded even the celebrated land of Egypt in the number of cattle which it bred, and in the quantity and excellence of the oil, corn, wine, and various fruits which it yielded. To this wonderful fecundity several circumstances are supposed to have contributed, such as the temperature of its climate, the regularity of its seasons, and the richness of its soil. In order to justify the Scripture accounts of this country, it ought to be considered that, in the times to which they refer, it was inhabited by an industrious people, who spared no pains to improve its natural fertility, and to render even its rocks, naturally barren, productive. The fecundity of Palestine has been extolled even by Julian the Apostate, the avowed enemy both of Jews and Christians, who frequently mentions the perpetuity, as well as excellence, and great abundance, of its fruits and products. The visible effects of divine displeasure which this country has experienced, not only under Titus, but much more since that emperor's time, in the inundations of the northern barbarians, of the Saracens, of the Crusaders, and the oppression it now feels under the Turkish yoke, are causes more than sufficient to have reduced the greater part of it to its present state, a mere desert. Herod. 1, 105.—*Ovid. PALÆTYRUS the ancient town of Tyre on the continent. [Vid. Tyrus.]

PALAMEDES, a Grecian chief, son of Nauplius, king of Eubœa by Clymene. He was sent by the Greek princes who were going to the Trojan war, to bring Ulysses to the camp, who to withdraw himself from the expedition, pretended insanity; and the better to impose upon his friends, used to harness different animals to a plough, and to sow salt instead of barley into the furrows. The deceit was soon perceived by Palamedes, he knew that the regret to part from his wife Penelope, whom he had lately married, was the only reason of the pretended insanity of Ulysses; and to demonstrate this, Palamedes took Telemachus, whom Penelope had lately brought into the world, and put him before the plough of his father Ulysses showed that he was not insane, by turning the plough a different way not to hurt his child This having been discovered, Ulysses was obliged to attend the Greek princes to the war, but an immortal enmity arose between Ulysses and Palamedes. The king of Ithaca resolved to take every opportunity to distress him, and when all his expectations were frustrated, he had the meanness to bribe one of his servants, and to make him dig a hole in his master's tent, and there conceal a large sum of money. After this Ulysses forged a letter in Phrygian characters, which king Priam was supposed to have sent to Palamedes. In the letter the Trojan king seemed to entreat Palamedes to deliver into his hands the Grecian army, according to the conditions which had been previously agreed upon, when he received the money. This forged letter was carried by means of Ulysses before the princes of the Grecian army. Palamedes was summoned, and he made the most solemn protestations of innocence, but all was in vain, the money that was discovered in his tent served only to corroborate the accusation, and he was found guilty by all the army and stoned to death. Homer is silent about the miserable fate of Palamedes, and Pausanias mentions that it had been reported by some, that Ulysses and Diomedes had drowned him in the sea as he was fishing on the coast. Philostratus, who mentions the tragical story above related, adds that Achilles and Ajax buried his body with great pomp on the sea-shore, and that they raised upon it a small chapel, where sacrifices were regularly offered by the inhabitants of Troas. Palamedes was a learned man as well as a soldier, and according to some he completed the alphabet of Cadmus by the addition of the four letters θ, ξ, χ, φ, during the Trojan war. A fragment of Euripides, preserved by Stobæus, ascribes to Palamedes the honour of the invention of the vowels. The meaning of this evidently is, that he was the first who conceived the idea of employing the four signs of aspiration in the Phœnician alphabet to express the vowel sounds. Aristotle states that Epicharmus invented the φ and χ. To him also is attributed the invention of dice and backgammon; and it is said that he was the first who regularly ranged the army in a line of battle, and who placed sentinels round a camp, and excited their vigilance and attention by giving them a watch-word. Hygin fab. 95, 105, &c.—Dictys Cret. 2, 15.—*Ovid. PALATINUS MONS, a celebrated hill, the largest of the seven hills on which Rome was built. It was upon it that Romulus laid the first foundation of the capital of Italy, in a quadrangular form, and there also he kept his court, as well as Tullus Hostilius, and Augustus, and all the succeeding emperors, from which circumstance, the word palatium has ever since been applied to the residence of a monarch or prince. The Palatine hill received its name from the goddess Pales, or from the Palatini, who originally inhabited the place, or from balare or palare, the bleatings of sheep, which were frequent there, or perhaps from the word palantes, wandering, because Evander, when he came to settle in Italy, gathered all the inhabitants, and made them all one society. Dio Cass 53.—Ital. 12, 709.—Liv. 1, 7 et 33.—*Ovid. PALATIUM, an appellation sometimes given to the Palatine Hill The plural form (Palatia) is more frequently used, and contains a particular reference to the palace of the Cæsars —— The name of the tenth region of the city of Rome.——The residence of Augustus, on the Palatine hill, afterwards, when enlarged and beautified, the palace of the Cæsars. Augustus had two houses on the Palatine, one in which he was supposed by some to have been born, (convenient to Forum Boarium, near the spot where the church of St Anastasia stands at present,) and the other on the northern side, where he lodged forty years, in a simple, unostentatious manner, without changing from the same room either summer or winter. Tiberius extended the palace of Augustus, and rendered it still more commodious and magnificent. Caligula rendered it more so; and luxury and superfluity increasing, he extended the palace to the declivity of the Forum, with superb and magnificent porticoes ascending to it. He also caused a temple to be erected, which he dedicated to himself, and, at a vast expense, made a superb arch-way, which communicated between his palace and the Capitol, which temple and arched way were demolished by the emperor Claudius, and the Roman people after his death. Nero, who succeeded Claudius, extended the palace of the Cæsars as much to the south as Tiberius and Caligula did to the north, so that it occupied the mountain as far as the Circus Maximus, and the valleys which were between the Palatine, the Esquiline, and the Cœlian hills. This building being burnt in the year 64 it was rebuilt with greater splendour and magnificence, with the spoils of Italy and the Roman empire, and was called Domus Aurea, not only the richest marbles, but even gold and diamonds were profusely lavished in its decorations; the rooms were strewed and surrounded with flowers and the most costly perfumes, every kind of luxury, delicacy, and profusion, were lavished to please a tyrant, who, sated with these, could never enjoy them. After the death of Nero the palace of the Cæsars was confined to mount Palatine alone, and also highly embellished, according to Martial, by Domitian. In the time of the emperor Commodus this place was consumed by fire, but rebuilt in the time of Heliogabalus. After this it always contained the residence of the Roman emperors, until the time of Valentinian, when it was entirely demolished by the Vandals, or at least by Alaric (in 409), so much so, that nothing remains at this day but some ruins that are to be seen in the Farnese gardens. Contiguous to the house of Augustus was the famous temple of the Palatine Apollo, erected by the emperor in fulfilment of a vow made to that deity on the morning of the battle of Actium. Ovid and Propertius describe it as a splendid structure of white marble. The portico more especially was an object of admiration; it was adorned with columns of African marble, and statues of the Danaides. Connected with the temple was a magnificent library, filled with the works of the best Greek and Latin authors. It contained, according to Pliny, a colossal statue of Apollo, in bronze, of Tuscan workmanship, which was much esteemed. Suet. Aug 5, 29 et 72. Vitell 15. Calig. 22. Ner. 31.—*Tacit. PALIBOTHRA, or PALIMBOTHRA, now Patna, the capital of the Prasii, in India. It was situated at the confluence of the Erannoboas with the Ganges, and was fabled to have been built by Hercules. PALICI, or PALICI, two deities, sons of Jupiter by Thalia, whom Æschylus calls Ætna, in a tragedy which is now lost, according to the words of Macrobius. The nymph Ætna, when pregnant, entreated her lover to remove her from the pursuit of Juno. The god concealed her in the bowels of the earth, and when the time of her delivery was come, the earth opened and brought into the world two children, who received the name of Palici, ἀπὸ τοῦ πάλιν ἐλθεῖν, because they came again into the world from the bowels of the earth. These deities were worshipped with great ceremonies by the Sicilians, and near their temple were two small lakes of sulphureous water, which were supposed to have sprung out of the earth, at the same time that they were born. These pools were properly craters of volcanoes, and their depths were unknown. The water kept continually bubbling up from them, emitting at the same time a sulphureous stench. The neighbouring inhabitants called them Delli, and supposed them to be the brothers of the Palici. A curious custom, tending to show the power of the priesthood, was connected with these lakes. All controversies, of whatsoever kind, were here decided; and it was sufficient in order to substantiate a charge, or clear one's self from an accusation, to swear by these waters and depart unhurt, for, if the oath were a false one, the party who made it was either struck dead or deprived of sight, or punished in some other preternatural manner. The temple also was an inviolable asylum for slaves, especially those who had cruel masters; and the latter were compelled to promise a more gentle treatment, and to ratify their promise with an oath, before the fugitives returned. *Virg. PALILIA, a festival celebrated by the Romans, in honour of the goddess Pales. The ceremony consisted in burning heaps of straw, and in leaping over them. No sacrifices were offered, but the purifications were made with the smoke of horses blood, and with the ashes of a calf that had been taken from the belly of its mother, after it had been sacrificed, and with the ashes of beans. The purification of the flocks was also made with the smoke of sulphur, of the olive, the pine, the laurel, and the rosemary. Offerings of mild cheese, boiled wine, and cakes of millet, were afterwards made to the goddess. This festival was observed on the 21st of April, and it was during the celebration that Romulus first began to build his city. Some call this festival Parilia, quasi a pariendo, because the sacrifices were offered to the divinity for the fecundity of the flocks. Ovid. Met. 14, 774. Fast 4, 721, &c 6 257.

PALINURUS, son of Jasus, was the skilful pilot of the ship of Æneas. He fell into the sea in his sleep, and was three days exposed to the tempests and the waves of the sea, and at last came safe to the sea-shore near Velia, where the cruel inhabitants of the place murdered him to obtain his clothes. His body was left unburied on the sea shore, and as, according to the religion of the ancient Romans, no person was suffered to cross the Stygian lake before 100 years were elapsed, if the remains had not been decently buried, we find Æneas, when he visited the infernal regions, speaking to Palinurus and assuring him, that though his bones were deprived of a funeral, yet the place where his body was exposed should soon be adorned with a monument and bear his name, and accordingly a promontory was called Palinurus Virg Æn. 3, 513 5, 840, &c — Ovid de Rem 577 Mela 2, 4 — Strab — Horat od 3 4, 28 —— A promontory of Italy on the western coast of Lucania, just above the Laus Sinus. PALLADIUM a celebrated statue of Pallas It was about three cubits high, and represented the goddess as sitting and holding a pike in her right hand and an her left a distaff and a spindle It fell down from heaven near the tent of Ilus as that prince was building the citadel of Ilium Some, nevertheless, suppose that it fell at Lacinius in Phrygia or according to others, Dardanus received it as a present from his mother Electra There are some authors who maintain that the Palladium was made with the bones of Pelops by Abaris but Apollodorus seems to say that it was no more than a piece of clock work which moved of itself However discordant the opinions of ancient authors be about this famous statue it is universally agreed that on its preservation depended the safety of Troy This fatality was well known to the Greeks during the Trojan war, and therefore Ulysses and Diomedes were commissioned to steal it away They effected their purpose, and if we rely upon the authority of some authors, they were directed how to carry it away by Helenus, the son of Priam who proved, in this unfaithful to his country, because his brother Deiphobus at the death of Paris had married Helen, of whom he was enamoured. Minerva was displeased with the violence which was offered to her statue, and according to Virgil, the Palladium itself appeared to have received life and motion, and by the flashes which started from its eyes, and its sudden springs from the earth, it seemed to show the resentment of the goddess The true Palladium, as some authors observe, was not carried away from Troy by the Greeks, but only one of the statues of similar size and shape, which were placed near it, to deceive whatever sacrilegious persons attempted to steal it. The Palladium, therefore, as they say, was conveyed safe from Troy to Italy by Æneas, and it was afterwards preserved by the Romans with the greatest secrecy and veneration, in the temple of Vesta, a circumstance which none but the vestal virgins knew Herodian. 1, 14, &c *Ovid. PALLADIUS, bishop of Hellenopolis in Bithynia, and afterwards of Aspona, was born in Cappadocia, about A D 368 He was much attached to St John Chrysostom, on whose death he went to Rome where he wrote the history of the Hermits of the Desert, which was published, in Greek, by Meursius, at Amsterdam, in 1619, and in Latin in the Bibliotheca Patrum —A physician of Alexandrea, distinguished from other individuals of the same name by the appellation of Saccophorus He wrote a commentary on the work of Hippocrates respecting Fractures He has left also scholia on the sixth book of Epidemics; others, still unpublished, on the regimen to be observed in acute maladies, and a treatise on Fevers. The commentary is published with the works of Hippocrates The scholia on the Epidemics have only appeared in a Latin translation by Crassus, Basil 1551 4to The treatise on Fevers was edited with a Latin version by Chartier, Paris, 1646 4to, and by Bernard, Lug Bat 1748 8vo.—— Rutilius Taurus Æmilianus, the last of the Latin writers on agriculture His work is entitled " De re rustica, and is divided into fourteen books It contains materials selected from earlier authors on this subject, and especially from Columella, who is often literally copied Nevertheless, Palladius treats, in a much more exact manner than Columella, the respective heads of fruit trees and kitchen gardens, having followed in these the work of Gargilius Martialis What he states respecting the mode of preserving fruits &c. is taken from the Greek Geoponica of which he appears to have possessed a much more complete copy than the abridgment which has come down to us

PALLANTEUM an ancient town of Italy in the vicinity of Reate, in the territory of the Sabines It was said, in tradition, to have been founded by the Arcadian Pelasgi united with the Aborigines From it the Palatine mount at Rome is said to have derived its name Holstenius thinks it must have occupied the site of Pidazzo on the hill called Ponte di Ruchi Dion Hal 1 14 Varro L L, 4

PALLANTIAS a patronymic of Aurora, as being related to the giant Pallas She was the cousin of Pallas Pallas was son of Crius Aurora was daughter of Hyperion and Hyperion and Crius were brothers, offspring of Coelus and Terra. *Ovid. PALLANTIDES, the fifty sons of Pallas, the son of Pandion and the brother of Ægeus. They were all killed by Theseus the son of Ægeus, whom they opposed when he came to take possession of his father's kingdom This opposition they showed in hopes of succeeding to the throne, as Ægeus left no children, except Theseus, whose legitimacy was even disputed, as he was born at Trœzene. Plut in Thes

PALLANTIUM, a town of Arcadia, north west of Tegea The Romans affirmed, that from this place Evander led into Italy the colony which settled on the banks of the Tiber The vestiges of Pallantium are to be seen near the village of Thane, on the right of the road leading from Tripolitza to Leondari. Paus. 8, 43 — Virg Æn 8 54. Plin. 4, 6

PALLAS, (adis,) a daughter of Jupiter, the same as Minerva The goddess received this name either because she killed the giant Pallas, or perhaps from the spear which she seems to brandish in her hands (πάλλειν) For the functions, power, and character of the goddess, see Minerva.

PALLAS, (antis), a son of king Evander, sent with some troops to assist Æneas. He was killed by Turnus, the king of the Rutuli, after he had made a great slaughter of the enemy. Virg. Æn. 8, 104, &c. ——One of the giants, son of Uranus and Terra. He was killed by Minerva, who covered herself with his skin, whence, as some suppose, she is called Pallas. Apollod. 3, 12.——A son of Crius and Eurybia, who married the nymph Styx, by whom he had Victory, Valour, &c. *Hesiod. PALLENE, a peninsula of Macedonia, one of three belonging to the district of Chalcidice. It was situate between the Sinus Thermaicus, or Gulf of Salonika, and the Sinus Toronaicus, or Gulf of Cassandra. This peninsula was said to have borne the name of Phlegra, and to have witnessed the conflict between the gods and the earth-born Titans. It is connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus of little more than two miles in breadth, on which once stood the rich and flourishing city of Potidæa *Ptol. PALMARIA, a small island in the Tyrrhenian sea, off the coasts of Latium and Campania, and south of the promontory of Circeii. It is now Palmarola. Plin. 3, b.

PALMYRA, a city of Asia, the Tadmor of the Old Testament; situated in a wilderness of Syria, on the borders of Arabia Deserta, towards the Euphrates. Josephus places it two days' journey from the Upper Syria, one days' journey from the Euphrates, and six days' journey from Babylon. He says there is no water in the wilderness, but in this place. At the present day there are to be seen vast ruins of this city. There was nothing more magnificent in the whole east. There are a great number of inscriptions, most of which are Greek, the others in Palmyrenean characters. Nothing relating to the Jews is seen in the Greek inscriptions; and the Palmyrenean inscriptions are entirely unknown, as well as the language and the characters of that country. The city of Palmyra preserved the name of Tadmor to the time of Alexander. It then received the name of Palmyra, which it preserved for several ages. About the middle of the third century it became famous, because Odenatus and Zenobia his queen made it the seat of their empire. When the Saracens became masters of the east, they restored its ancient name of Tadmor, which it has always preserved since. It is surrounded by sandy deserts on all sides. It is not known when, nor by whom, it was reduced to the ruinous condition in which it is now found. It may be said to consist at present of a forest of Corinthian pillars, erect and fallen. So numerous are these, consisting of many thousands, that the spectator is at a loss to examine or arrange them in any order or symmetry, or to conceive what purpose or design they could have answered. Plin. 5, 26 et 30.

PAMISOS, a river of Thessaly, now the Panaro, falling into the Peneus to the east of Tricca. Herod 7, 132 ——Major, a river of Messenia, falling into the Sinus Messeniacus, at its head. It is now the Pernatza. Paus 4 34.——A torrent of Messenia, falling into the Sinus Messeniacus near Leuctrum, and forming part of the ancient boundary between Laconia and Messenia. Strab 8.

PAMPHILUS, an Alexandrean grammarian, and disciple of Aristarchus, the author of a vast lexicon, in 91 or 95 books often quoted by Athenæus.——Another grammarian of Alexandrea, author of a work on Cynegetics, and also a treatise on Agriculture. Of the latter production, some fragments remain in the Geoponics of Cassianus Bassus ——A father of the church, who, in conjunction with Eusebius, published separately the Septuagint column of Origen's Hexapla.——A celebrated painter of Macedonia, in the age of Philip, distinguished above his rivals by a superior knowledge of literature, and the cultivation of those studies which taught how to infuse more successfully grace and dignity into his pieces He was founder of the school for painting at Sicyon and he made a law which was observed not only in Sicyon, but all over Greece, that none but the children of noble and dignified persons should be permitted to learn painting Apelles was one of his pupils Dog PAMPHOS, a Greek poet, supposed to have lived before Hesiod's age. He was a native of Athens, and wrote hymns and a poem on the Graces. Some of his verses are quoted by ancient authors. Paus 1, 38.—Philostr. Her 2.

PAMPHYLA, a Grecian female, according to some a native of Egypt, but, according to others, born at Epidaurus, in Argolis. She was the daughter of a grammarian, and wrote several historical works One of these was entitled Ἱστορικαὶ ὑπομνήσεις (Historical Abridgment) Another work, which Photius has make known to us, bore the name of Συμμικτα ἢ ὁπερ ὑπομνήματα (Historical Miscellany). It was a species of note, or memorandum book, in which this female regularly inserted, every day, whatever she heard most deserving of being recorded in the conversations between her father and his friends It contained a number of literary anecdotes of the most celebrated writers of Greece. It is unfortunately lost Pamphyla lived, according to Photius, in the reign of Nero.

PAMPHYLIA a province of Asia Minor, occupying originally a small tract of coast between Cilicia and Lycia, from Olbia on the west to the Cilician town of Laertes on the east, and extending a few miles inland. The name Pamphylia is said to come from πᾶς, omnis, and φῦλον tribus, and to have been applied to this tract of country from the circumstance of many and various tribes of Greeks settling here under Amphilochus and Calchas, after the destruction of Troy. Herod 7, 91.

PAN, the god of shepherds, of huntsmen, and of all the inhabitants of the country. He was the son of Mercury, by Dryope, according to Homer. Some give him Jupiter and Callisto for parents, others Jupiter and Vbis or Ouris Lucian, Hyginus, &c. support that he was the son of Mercury and Penelope, the daughter of Icarius, and that the god gained the affections of the princess under the form of a goat, as she tended her father's flocks on mount Taygetus, before her marriage with the king of Ithaca. Pan was a monster in appearance, he had two small horns on his head, his complexion was ruddy, his nose flat, and his legs, thighs, tail, and feet, were those of a goat. The education of Pan was entrusted to a nymph of Arcadia, called Sinoe, but the nurse, according to Hower, terrified at the sight of such a monster, fled away and left him. He was wrapped up in the skins of beasts by his father, and carried to heaven, where Jupiter and the gods long entertained themselves with the oddity of his appearance. Bacchus was greatly pleased with him, and gave him the name of Pan. The god of shepherds chiefly resided in Arcadia, where the woods and the most rugged mountains were his habitation. He invented the flute with seven reeds, which he called Syrinx, in honour of a beautiful nymph of the same name, to whom he attempted to offer violence and who was changed into a reed. He was continually employed in deceiving the neighbouring nymphs, and often with success. Though deformed in his shape and features, yet he had the good fortune to captivate Diana, by transforming himself into a beautiful white goat. He was also enamoured of a nymph of the mountains called Echo, by whom he had a son called Lynx. He also paid his addresses to Omphale queen of Lydia. [Vid. Omphale.] The worship of Pan was well established particularly in Arcadia, where he gave oracles on mount Lycæus. His festivals called by the Greeks Lycæa, were brought to Italy by Evander, and they were well known at Rome by the name of the Lupercalia. [Vid. Lupercalia.] The worship, and the different functions of Pan, are derived from the mythology of the ancient Egyptians. This god was one of the eight great gods of the Egyptians, who ranked before the other twelve gods, whom the Romans called Consentes. He was worshipped with the greatest solemnity at Mendes, in Egypt. [Vid. Mendes.] He was the emblem of fecundity, and they looked upon him as the principle of all things. His horns, as some observe, represented the rays of the sun; and the brightness of the heavens was expressed by the vivacity and the ruddiness of his complexion. The star which he wore on his breast, was the symbol of the firmament, and his hairy legs and feet denoted the inferior parts of the earth, such as the woods and plants. Some suppose that he appeared as a goat because when the gods fled into Egypt, in their war against the giants, Pan transformed himself into a goat, an example which was immediately followed by all the deities. Pan, according to some, is the same as Faunus, and he is the chief of all the Satyrs. Plutarch mentions, that in the reign of Tiberius, an extraordinary voice was heard near the Echinades, in the Ionian sea, which exclaimed, that the great Pan was dead. This was readily believed by the emperor, and the astrologers were consulted, but they were unable to explain the meaning of so supernatural a voice, which probably proceeded from the imposition of one of the courtiers, who attempted to terrify Tiberius. As Pan usually terrified the inhabitants of the neighbouring country, that kind of fear which often seizes men, and which is only ideal and imaginary, has received from him the name of panic fear. This kind of terror has been exemplified not only in individuals, but in numerous armies, such as that of Brennus, which was thrown into the greatest consternation at Rome, without any cause or plausible reason. *Consul. PANACEA, a goddess, daughter of Æsculapius, who presided over health. The term is derived from πᾶν, every thing, and ἄκεσμαι, I cure. This word is applied among medical practitioners to a universal remedy, or one that is capable of curing all diseases. The idea, however, of a panacea is now justly exploded by enlightened physicians. There were three panaceas held in high value among the ancients, the Heracleian, the Asclepian, and the Chironian. The first is what is termed in English true all-heal of Hercules, from the root and stem of which is drawn by incision the gum opopanax; the second is a kind of ferula; the third Dorsa's wound wort.

PANÆTIUS a celebrated philosopher among the Stoics, who flourished in the second century before Christ, was a native of Rhodes, and descended from ancestors who had distinguished themselves in the military transactions of the republic. His inclination leading him to the study of philosophy, he became a disciple of Antipater of Tarsus, but did not at this time approve the doctrines of the Stoics. He was a great admirer of Plato, whom he called divine, most wise, and most holy, and he freely borrowed opinions and sentiments from philosophers of every sect. From Rhodes he went to Athens, where he maintained the reputation of the school of Zeno, and had many disciples. His fame having reached Rome, he went thither, his lectures were crowded by the young nobility, and he enjoyed an intimate acquaintance with several eminent Romans, particularly Scipio and Lælius. According to some writers he accompanied Scipio in some of his expeditions, and is said to have rendered him essential services; he at the same time employed his interest with this great man in conferring various benefits on his fellow-citizens at Rhodes. Panætius appears to have spent the latter part of his life partly at Athens, and he died at the last-named city, but it is not at all certain in what year. None of his works have come down to us, but his moral doctrines were, doubtless, very excellent, since they are greatly extolled by Cicero, in his treatise De Officiis. Cic. de Off. 2, 14. 4, 9. *Ac. PANATHENÆA, festivals in honour of Minerva, the patroness of Athens. They were first instituted by Erichtheus or Orpheus, and called Athenæa, but Theseus afterwards renewed them, and caused them to be celebrated and observed by all the tribes of Athens, which he had united into one, and from which reason the festivals received their name. Some suppose that they are the same as the Roman Quinquatria, as they are often called by that name among the Latins. In the first years of the institution, they were observed only during one day, but afterwards the time was prolonged, and the celebration was attended with greater pomp and solemnity. The festivals were two; the great Panathenæa (μεγάλα), which were observed every fifth year, beginning on the 22d of the month called Hecatombæon, or 7th of July, and the lesser Panathenæa (μικρά), which were kept every third year, or rather annually, beginning on the 21st or 28th of the month called Thargelion, corresponding to the 5th or 6th day of the month of May. In the lesser festivals there were three games conducted by ten presidents chosen from the ten tribes at Athens, who continued four years in office. On the evening of the first day there was a race with torches, in which men on foot, and afterwards on horseback, contended. The same was also exhibited in the great festivals. The second combat was gymnical, and exhibited a trial of strength and bodily dexterity. The last was a musical contention, first instituted by Pericles. In the songs they celebrated the generous undertaking of Harmodius and Aristogiton, who opposed the Pisistratidæ, and of Thrasybulus, who delivered Athens from its thirty tyrants. Phrynis of Mitylene was the first who obtained the victory by playing upon the harp. There were besides other musical instruments, on which they played in concert, such as flutes, &c. The poets contended in four plays, called from their number τετραλογια. The last of these was a satyric drama. There was also at Bunium an imitation of a naval fight. Whoever obtained the victory in any of these games was rewarded with a vessel of oil, which he was permitted to dispose of in whatever manner he pleased, and it was unlawful for any other person to transport that commodity. The conqueror also received a crown of the olives which grew in the groves of Academus, and were sacred to Minerva, and called μορίαι, from μόρος, death, in remembrance of the tragical end of Hallirhotius, the son of Neptune, who cut his own legs when he attempted to cut down the olive which had given the victory to Minerva in preference to his father, when these two deities contended about giving a name to Athens. Some suppose that the word is derived from μέρος, a part, because these olives were given by contribution by all such as attended at the festivals. There was also a dance called Pyrrhichia, performed by young boys in armour, in imitation of Minerva, who thus expressed her triumph over the vanquished Titans. Gladiators were also introduced when Athens became tributary to the Romans. During the celebration no person was permitted to appear in dyed garments, and if any one transgressed he was punished according to the discretion of the president of the games. After these things, a sumptuous sacrifice was offered, in which every one of the Athenian boroughs contributed an ox, and the whole was concluded by an entertainment for all the company with the flesh that remained from the sacrifice. In the greater festivals, the same rites and ceremonies were usually observed, but with more solemnity and magnificence. Others were also added, particularly the procession, in which Minerva's sacred πέπλος, or garment, was carried. This garment was woven by a select number of virgins, called ἐργάναι, from ἔργον, work. They were superintended by two of the ἀρρηφόροι, or young virgins, not above seventeen years of age nor under eleven, whose garments were white and set off with ornaments of gold. Minerva's peplus was of a white colour, without sleeves, and embroidered with gold. Upon it were described the achievements of the goddess, particularly her victories over the giants. The exploits of Jupiter and the other gods were also represented there, and from that circumstance men of courage and bravery are said to be ἄξιοι πέπλου, worthy to be pourtrayed on Minerva's sacred garment. In the procession of the peplus, the following ceremonies were observed. In the ceramicus, without the city, there was an engine built in the form of a ship, upon which Minerva's garment was hung as a sail, and the whole was conducted, not by beasts, as some have supposed, but by subterraneous machines, to the temple of Ceres Eleusinia, and from thence to the citadel, where the peplus was placed upon Minerva's statue, which was laid upon a bed woven or strewed with flowers, which was called πλακοῦς. Persons of all ages, of every sex and quality, attended the procession, which was led by old men and women carrying olive branches in their hands, from which reason they were called θαλλοφόροι, bearers of green boughs. Next followed men of full age with shields and spears. They were attended by the μέτοικοι, or foreigners, who carried small boats as a token of their foreign origin, and from that account they were called σκαφηφόροι, boat bearers. After them came the women attended by the wives of the foreigners, called ὑδριαφόροι, because they carried water-pots. Next to these came young men crowned with millet and singing hymns to the goddess, and after them followed select virgins of the noblest families, called κανηφόροι, basket-bearers, because they carried baskets, in which were certain things necessary for the celebration, with whatever utensils were also requisite. These several necessaries were generally in the possession of the chief manager of the festival, called ἀρχιθέωρος, who distributed them when occasion offered. The virgins were attended by the daughters of foreigners, who carried umbrellas and little seats, from which they were named διφροφόροι, seat-carriers. The boys, called παιδισκοι, as it may be supposed, led the rear, cloathed in coats generally worn at processions. The necessaries for this and every other festival were prepared in a public hall erected for that purpose, between the Piræan gate and the temple of Ceres. The management and the care of the whole was entrusted to the σκιροφοριακὸς, or persons employed in seeing the rites and ceremonies properly observed. It was also usual to set all prisoners at liberty, and to present golden crowns to such as had deserved well of their country. Some persons were also chosen to sing some of Homer's poems, a custom which was first introduced by Hipparchus, the son of Pisistratus. It was also customary in this festival and every other quinquennial festival, to pray for the prosperity of the Plateans, whose services had been so conspicuous at the battle of Marathon. Plut. in Ther.—Ælian V. H. 5, 2.—Apollod. 3, 14.

PANCHIÆA, or PANCHÆA, an island of the ocean, upon the coast of Arabia. According to Diodorus Siculus, it was inhabited by natives of the country, and also by Indians, Cretans, and Scythians. In this island was a town called Panara, whose inhabitants, according to Diodorus, were singularly happy. They had a temple of Jupiter Triphylius, of which this author details all sorts of marvellous circumstances. The other three towns were Hiræia, Dabi, and Oceanus. But the existence of such an island is doubtful. Virg. G 2, 139. 4, 379. —Ovid. Met. 1, 309, &c. —Dod. 5.—Lucret 2, 417.

PANDA, two deities at Rome, who presided one over the openings of roads, and the other over the openings of towns. The former of these was first worshipped by Tatius, who invoked her assistance to open to him and to his troops the way to the capitol, and she afterwards presided also over travellers. Some imagine that Panda was the same as Ceres, but they are distinguished as different deities by most ancient authors. Aul. Gellius, 13, 22.—Varro de R. R. 1.

PANDARUS, a son of Lycaon, who assisted the Trojans in their war against the Greeks. He went to the war without a chariot, and therefore he generally fought on foot. He broke the truce which had been agreed upon between the Greeks and Trojans, and wounded Menelaus and Diomedes, and showed himself brave and unusually courageous. He was at last killed by Diomedes; and Æneas, who then carried him in his chariot, by attempting to revenge his death, nearly perished by the hand of the outrageous and enraged enemy. Dictys Cret. 2, 35.—Homer Il. 2, 5.—Hygin. fab. 112.—Virg. Æn. 5, 495. et Servius loco.—Strab. 14.——A son of Alcanor killed with his brother Bitias by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, 735 ——A native of Crete punished with death for being accessary to the theft of Tantalus. What this theft was is unknown. Some, however, suppose that Tantalus stole the ambrosia and the nectar from the tables of the gods to which he had been admitted or that he carried away a dog which watched Jupiter's temple in Crete, in which crime Pandarus was concerned, and for which he suffered. Pandarus had two daughters, Camiro and Clytia, who were also deprived of their mother by a sudden death, and left without friends or protectors. Venus had compassion upon them, and she fed them with milk, honey, and wine. The goddesses were all equally interested in their welfare. Juno gave them wisdom and beauty, Diana a handsome figure and regular features, and Minerva instructed them in whatever domestic accomplishments can recommend a wife. Venus wished still to make their happiness more complete; and when they were come to nubile years, the goddess prayed Jupiter to grant them kind and tender husbands. But in her absence the Harpies carried away the virgins and delivered them to the Eumenides to share the punishment which their father suffered. Pans. 10 30 Pind.

PANDAREUS, or PANDAREUS, a man who had a daughter called Philomela. She was changed into a nightingale, after she had killed, by mistake, her son Itylus, whose death she mourned in the greatest melancholy. Some suppose him to be the same as Pandion, king of Athens.

PANDATARIA, an island in the Mare Tyrrhenum, in the Sinus Puteolanus, on the coast of Italy. It was the place of banishment for Julia, the daughter of Augustus, and many others. It is now Isola Vandotina. Liv. 53, 14. —Mela, 2, 7.—Plin. 3, 6

PANDEMUS, one of the surnames of the god of love, among the Egyptians and the Greeks, who distinguished two Cupids, one of whom was the vulgar, called Pandemus, and another of a purer, and more celestial origin. Phil. in Erot

PANDIA, a festival at Athens established by Pandion, from whom it received its name, or because it was observed in honour of Jupiter, who can πὰ πάντα διοκεῖν, move and turn all things as he pleaseth. Some suppose that it concerned the moon, because it does περιέρχεσθαι, move incessantly by showing itself day and night, rather than the sun which never appears but in the day time. It was celebrated after the Dionysia, because Bacchus is sometimes taken for the sun or Apollo, and therefore the brother, or, as some will have it, the son of the moon.

PANDION, a king of Athens, son of Erichthon and Pasithea, who succeeded his father, B. C. 1437. He became father of Procne and Philomela, Erechtheus and Butes. During his reign, there was such an abundance of corn, wine, and oil, that it was publicly reported that Bacchus and Minerva had personally visited Attica. He waged a successful war against Labdacus, king of Bœotia, and gave his daughter Procne in marriage to Tereus, king of Thrace, who had assisted him. The treatment which Philomela received from her brother-in-law Tereus [Vid. Philomela] was the source of infinite grief to Pandion, and he died through excess of sorrow, after a reign of forty years. There was also another Pandion, son of Cecrops II., by Metiadusa, who succeeded to his father, B. C. 1307. He was driven from his paternal dominions, and fled to Pylas, king of Megara, who gave him his daughter Pelia in marriage, and resigned his crown to him Pandion became father of four children, called from him Pandionidæ, Ægeus, Pallas, Nisus, and Lycus. The eldest of these children recovered his father's kingdom. Some authors have confounded the two Pandions together in such an indiscriminate manner, that they seem to have been only one and the same person. Many believe that Philomela and Procne were the daughters, not of Pandion the first, but of Pandion the second. Ovid. Met 6, 638.—Apollod. 3, 15.—Paus. 1, 5.—Hygin fab. 48.

PANDORA, a celebrated woman, the first mortal female that ever lived, according to the opinion of the poet Hesiod. She was made with clay by Vulcan, at the request of Jupiter, who wished to punish the impiety and artifice of Prometheus, by giving him a wife. When this woman of clay had been made by the artist, and received life, all the gods vied in making her presents. Venus gave her beauty and the art of pleasing; the Graces gave her the power of captivating; Apollo taught her how to sing; Mercury instructed her in eloquence; and Minerva gave her the most rich and splendid ornaments. From all these valuable presents, which she had received from the gods, the woman was called Pandora, which intimates that she had received every necessary gift, παν δῶρον. Jupiter after this gave her a beautiful box, which she was ordered to present to the man who married her; and by the commission of the god, Mercury conducted her to Prometheus. The artful mortal was sensible of the deceit, and as he had always distrusted Jupiter, as well as the rest of the gods, since he had stolen fire away from the sun to animate his man of clay, he sent away Pandora without suffering himself to be captivated by her charms. His brother Epimetheus was not possessed of the same prudence and sagacity. He married Pandora, and when he opened the box which she presented to him, there issued from it a multitude of evils and distempers, which dispersed themselves all over the world, and which, from that fatal moment, have never ceased to afflict the human race. Hope was the only one that remained at the bottom of the box, and it is she alone who has the wonderful power of easing the labours of man, and of rendering his troubles and his sorrows less painful in life. Hesiod. Theog. et Dies.—Apollod. 1, 7.—Paus. 1, 24.—Hygin 14.

PANDOSIA, a city of Lucania, in Lower Italy, on the banks of the Aciris, and not far from Heraclea. The modern Anglona is supposed to represent the ancient place.——A city in the territory of the Brutii, near the western coast, and often confounded with the preceding. It was anciently possessed by the Œnotri, as Strabo reports, but is better known in history as having witnessed the defeat and death of Alexander, king of Epirus. The position of the Brutian Pandosia has not been ascertained, but it should probably be sought for near the village of Mendicino. Strab. 6. – Liv. 39, 23.——A city of Epirus, not far removed from the Acheron and the Acherusian lake, as we may infer from the passage in which Livy speaks of this city with reference to the oracle delivered to Alexander king of Epirus. It is not impossible that the antiquities which have been discovered at Paramythia, on the borders of the Soulioi territory, may belong to this ancient place. Liv. 8, 24. – Strab 7. – Plin. 4, 1.

PANDROSUS, a daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, sister to Aglaurus and Herse. She was the only one of the sisters, who had not the fatal curiosity to open a basket which Minerva had entrusted to their care, [Vid Erechthonius,] for which sincerity a temple was raised to her, near that of Minerva, and a festival instituted in her honour, called Pandrosia. Ovid. Met. 2, 738.

PANENUS, or PANÆUS, a celebrated painter who was for some time engaged in painting the battle of Marathon, which was still seen and admired in the Pœcile in the age of Pausanias. His pieces were among those which adorned the temple of Jupiter Olympius. Paus. 5, 11. – Plin 35, 8 36, 23

PANGÆUM, a celebrated ridge of mountains in Thrace, apparently connected with the central chain of Rhodope and Hæmus, and which, branching off in a south-easterly direction, closed upon the coast at the defile of Acontisma. The name of this range often appears in the poets. It is now called Pundhar Dagh, or Castagnats, according to the editor of the French Strabo. Herodotus informs us, that mount Pangæum contained gold and silver mines, which were worked by the Pieres, Odomanti, and Satræ, clans of Thrace, but especially the latter Euripides confirms this account. These valuable mines naturally attracted the attention of the Thasians, who were the first settlers on this coast; and they accordingly formed an establishment in this vicinity at a place named Crenides. (Vid. Philippi.) Theophrastus speaks of the rose centifolia, which grew in great beauty and was indigenous on mount Pangæum. Nicander mentions another sort which grew in the gardens of Midas. Find Pyth. 4, 320 —Koch. Pers. 500. —Eurip. Rhes. 923 et 972. – Virg. G. 4, 462. – Herod. 7, 112.

PANIONIUM, a sacred spot with a grove and village, at the foot of mount Mycale, near the town of Ephesus in Asia Minor, sacred to Neptune of Helice. It was in this place that all the delegates from the states of Ionia assembled, either to consult for their own safety and prosperity, or to celebrate festivals, or to offer a sacrifice for the good of all the nation, whence the name was Πάνιον, all Ionia. The deputies of of the twelve Ionian cities which assembled there were those of Miletus, Myus, Priene, Ephesus, Lebedus, Colophon, Clazomenæ, Phocæa, Teos, Chios, Samos, and Erythræ. If the bull offered in sacrifice bellowed, it was accounted an omen of the highest favour, as the sound was particularly acceptable to the god of the sea, as in some manner it resembled the roaring of the waves of the ocean. Herod. 1, 148, &c. Strab. 14. – Mela, 1, 17

PANIUM, or Panium, a mountain of Syria, which formed part of mount Libanus, and at the foot of which was situated the town of Paneas, afterwards called Cæsarea Philippi. Josephus, Bell. Jud. 1, 21.

PANNONIA a large province of Europe, bounded on the north and east by the Danube; on the south by Illyricum, including in this direction the country lying along the lower bank of the Savus; and on the west by the range of mount Cetius, separating it from Noricum. It comprehended Hungary to the right of the Danube, parts of Lower Austria, Styria, and Croatia, the whole of Sclavonia, and such portions of Turkish Croatia, Bosnia, and Servia, as immediately touch on the Save. It was at one time divided into Pannonia Superior and Inferior, by a line drawn from the mouth of the Arrabo, or Raab, and continued southward between the towns Marinianæ and Serena, to the Save Pannonia Inferior being the eastern part. This division was afterwards altered. Pannonia Superior was confined on the south by the Drave, and called Pannonia Prima; Pannonia Inferior was also confined on the south by that river, and was called Valeria, in honour of Valeria the wife of the emperor Galerius, who constituted the province, whilst that part of Pannonia, which was south of the Drave, assumed the epithet Secunda or Savia. The Pannonii are said to have been of Celtic origin, they were attacked by the Romans under Augustus, but their submission was not effected till the time of Tiberius. Lucan. 3, 99, 6, 220 — Tibull. 4, 1, 100 – Plin. 3. Dio. Cass 49. – Strab. 4 et 7 — Jornand. Paterc. 2, 9. – Suet. Aug. 20.—Ovid. Trist. 2. 225.

PANOMPHÆUS, a surname of Jupiter, from his being the parent source of omen and augury, "omnium ominum omnisque vaticinii auctor." Orid. Met. 11, 198.—Homer. Il. 8, 251 et Heyn. loco.

PANOPE, or PANOPPA, one of the Nereides, whom sailors generally invoked in storms. Virg Æn. 5, 825.———One of the daughters of Thespius. Apollod 2, 7.

PANOPES, a famous huntsman among the attendants of Acestes, king of Sicily, who was one of those that engaged in the games exhibited by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, 300.

PANOPEUS, a son of Phocus and Asteropia, who accompanied Amphitryon when he made war against the Teleboans. He was father to Epeus, who made the celebrated wooden horse at the siege of Troy. Paus. 2, 29. – Apollod. 2, 4. ——A town of Phocis, between Orchomenos and the Cephisus. Paus. 10 4. Strab. 9.

PANOPOLIS a city of Egypt, in the Thebaid, on the eastern bank of the Nile, and south of Antæopolis. It was the capital of the Panopolite Nome, and, as its name implies, sacred to the god Pan. ("City of Pan.") According to the later traditions, however, it would seem to have been sacred to the Fauns, or wood-deities, collectively, and hence we find it in Strabo designated by the appellation of Πανὸς κώμη. In some of the subsequent writers we find the place called Panos, the term polis being omitted. The name Panopolis (Πανὸς πόλις) is supposed to be merely a translation of the Egyptian term Chemmis, by which this city was known to the natives of the land. This Chemmis, however, must not be confounded with the place of that name mentioned by Herodotus, and by which that historian intends evidently to designate Coptos. The modern Ekhmim is supposed to occupy part of the site of the ancient Panopolis Strab. 17.

PANORMUS, now called Palermo, a town of Sicily, built by the Phœnicians, on the north-west part of the island, with a good and capacious harbour The ancient name is derived from the excellence and capaciousness of the harbour, (πᾶν δρόμος,) and is equivalent to All-Port. It is uncertain, however, whether this name originated with the Greeks, or was merely a translation of the Phœnician one. From the Phœnicians Panormus passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, and was for a long period an important stronghold of the latter people, though little noticed by the Grecian writers. Here was the chief station of their fleet, and here also were the winter quarters of their army. It was taken by the Romans, with their fleet of 300 sail, (A. U. C. 500,) and carefully guarded by them to prevent its again falling into the hands of the foe. It was subsequently ranked among the free cities of Sicily. Diod 13. 54, 14. — Polyb. 1. 24 et 38. Cic. in Verr. 2, 5. — A harbour on the eastern coast of Attica, south of the promontory of Cynosema, and opposite to the southern extremity of Kubœa. It is now Porto Raphti — A harbour on the coast of Achaia, east of Rhium, and opposite Naupactus. It is now Tekei Thucyd. 2, 86. — Plin. 4, 5. — A name given to the harbour of Ephesus. Mela, 2, 7 — A harbour in Crete, between Rithymna and Crytæum. Plin. 4, 12. — A town in the Thracian Chersonese, between Cardia and Coelos. Plin. 4, 11.

PANSA, C. Vibius, a Roman consul, who, with A. Hirtius, pursued the murderers of J. Cæsar, and was killed in a battle near Mutina. On his death-bed he advised young Octavius to unite his interest with that of Antony, if he wished to revenge the death of Julius Cæsar, and from his friendly advice soon after rose the celebrated second triumvirate. Some suppose that Pansa was put to death by Octavius himself, or through him, by the physician Glycon, who poured poison into the wounds of his patient. Pansa and Hirtius were the two last consuls who enjoyed the dignity of chief magistrates of Rome, with full power. The authority of the consuls afterwards dwindled into a shadow Paterc. 2, 6. — Ovid. Trist. 3, 5.

PANTAGIAS, a small river on the eastern coast of Sicily, which falls into the sea between Megara and Syracuse, after running a short space in rough cascades over rugged stones and precipices. Ceres, whose most favoured residence was in Sicily, is said to have commanded the river, whose noisy current disturbed her repose, to flow more quietly, and the obedient stream from that time, as the mythologists relate, was scarce ever heard in its way to the sea. Plin. 3, 8. — Virg. Æn. 3, 689. — Ital. 14, 232. — Ovid. Fast 4.471.

PANTALEON, a king of Pisa, who presided at the Olympic games, B. C. 664, after excluding the Eleans, who on that account expunged the Olympiad from the Fasti, and called it the 2d Anoly mpiad. They had called for the same reason the 8th the 1st Anolympiad, because the Pisæans presided.

PANTANUS LACUS, the lake of Lesina, situated in Apulia, near Teanum. Plin. 3, 11.

PANTHEA, the wife of Abradates, celebrated for her beauty and conjugal affection. She was taken prisoner by Cyrus, who refused to visit her, not to be ensnared by the power of her personal charms. She killed herself on the body of her husband, who had been slain in a battle, &c. [Vid Abradates.] Xenoph Cyrop.

PANTHEON, or PANTHEON, one of the most beautiful and magnificent temples of ancient Rome, and the only one which has been preserved entire. On the architrave is the following inscription: M. Agrippa. L. F. Cos Tertium. Fecit Some think, from this inscription, that it was built by Agrippa, son-in-law to Augustus. Others, from the disparity between the work of the portico and the body of the temple, are of opinion, that he only made the portico but that the temple itself was anterior to his time. Be that as it may, the tout ensemble of this temple must strike even the most indifferent beholder, and force him to acknowledge that it is the most beautiful, the most solid, and the most majestic structure of the kind that ever existed. It was dedicated to all the gods and goddesses, whether on the height of Olympus, or in the depth of Tartarus; from this universality of its dedication it was called the "Pantheon;" hence its circular form; hence they made its height and breadth equal, hence they made its roof a perfect hemisphere, in order to resemble as much as possible the azure vault of heaven, the principal habitation, as they supposed, of those deities to whom it was dedicated. This edifice has no windows; a circular aperture at the top serves for the purpose of admitting light and air; and in case of rain a hollow perforated piece of marble, inserted in the pavement, carries off the water. The vestibule (about seventy feet long by forty broad) is ornamented with sixteen beautiful columns, each of one entire piece of red oriental granite. These columns, nearly four feet and a half in diameter, and forty-two feet high, together with the entablature which they support, form, in the opinion of the most skilful architects, the most superb portico of the kind in existence This surprising temple was repaired by Adrian, M. Aurelius, and Septimus Severus: the first of these emperors, not only embellished it internally with pilasters and fluted columns, of giallo-antico, and other precious marbles, of the most exquisite workmanship, which still remain, but also had it externally covered with gilded bronze. In the interior there are rows of niches one above the other, which once contained statues of the principal deities of paganism, either in bronze, precious marble, or silver. The celestial deities occupied the upper niches, the terrestrial ones the lower; and the infernal deities were left on the pavement. Among these statues, those of Minerva and Venus were the most admired, the first, because it was the work of Phidias, and the second, because it was enriched with ear-rings made of Cleopatra's celebrated pearl; which, according to Pliny, was valued at 125,000*l.* The Pantheon is now commonly called the Rotonda, from its circular form. It was given to Boniface 4th by the emperor Phocas in 609, and was dedicated as a Christian church to the Virgin and the Holy Martyrs, a quantity of whose relics were placed under the great altar. In 830 Gregory 4th dedicated it to all the saints. This consecration of the edifice, however, seems to have afforded it little protection against the subsequent spoliations both of emperors and popes. The plates of gilded bronze that covered the roof, the bronze relievos of the pediment, and the silver that adorned the interior of the dome, were carried off by Constans II. (A. D 655), who destined them for his palace at Constantinople; but, being assassinated at Syracuse on his way back, his booty was conveyed to Alexandria, and thus the spoils of the Pantheon, formed out of the plunder of Egypt after the battle of Actium, reverted to their original source. Urban the eighth carried off all that was left—the bronze beams of the portico—and melted it down into the frightful tabernacle of St Peters, and the useless cannon of the castle of St Angelo. It was under his auspices, too, that Bernini erected the two brick belfries that now deform the front of the building

PANTHEUS or PANTHUS, a son of Othryas of Phocis, who was carried away from his country by Antenor when king Priam had sent to enquire of the oracle of Delphi, whether he might be permitted to rebuild the walls of Troy which Hercules had destroyed This insult offered to his person was alleviated by the kindness of the monarch, who loaded him with presents and made him priest of Apollo. When Troy was laid in ruins Pantheus escaped through the flames, carrying the sacred utensils in one hand, and leading in the other his grandson, that he might follow the fortune of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 2. 429.

PANTHOIDES, a patronymic of Euphorbus, the son of Panthous. Pythagoras is sometimes called by that name, as he asserted that he was Euphorbus during the Trojan war. Horat. od 1, 28, 10.—Ovid. Met. 15, 161.

PANTICAPÆUM, now Kertch, a city in the Tauric Chersonese, on the shore of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, and opposite to Phanagoria on the Asiatic shore. It was founded by a Milesian colony, and lay on a hill, and was in circumference 20 stadia. It was the residence of the princes of the Bosphorus, whence it is not unfrequently called Bosphorus. Here Mithridates the Great ended his days. Ptol.—Strab

PANTICAPES, a river of European Scythia, which falls into the Borysthenes, supposed to be the Samara of the moderns. Herod. 4, 54.

PANTILIUS, a buffoon, ridiculed by Horace, Sat. 1, 10, 78.

PANYASIS, an ancient Greek, uncle to the historian Herodotus. He celebrated Hercules in one of his poems, and the Ionians in another. Some make him a native of Samos and not of Halicarnassus, whilst others assert that he rendered himself odious to Lygdamis by attempting to prophecy future events, and that he was put to death by him. He was restored to life by Æsculapius according to Apollodorus. Some of his verses to the number of twenty three, are preserved in the collections of the Greek poets, and they are in praise of wine, and of drinking. Athen 2. Apollod. 3. - Quintil. 10, 1.

PAPHIA, a surname of Venus, because the goddess was worshipped at Paphos.——An ancient name of the island of Cyprus.

PAPHLAGONIA, now Penderachia, a country of Asia Minor, on the coast of the Euxine, between Bithynia and Pontus. It was bounded on the east by the Halys, on the south by Galatia, on the west by the Parthenius, and on the north by the Euxine. These were the boundaries of the Paphlagonians, but under the Persian dominion, the satrapy of Paphlagonia was extended as far eastward as the promontory Jasonium. The rulers of Pontus, on the other hand, when pushing their conquests on all sides, took from the Paphlagonians the whole of their sea-coast, driving them up the country; and it was not till some centuries after the Roman power had been established in the peninsula, that the province was restored to its original limits It was here that the Heneti dwelled, who, having lost their leader in the Trojan war, crossed over into Italy under the command of Antenor, and expelling the original inhabitants, settled in Venice. The Paphlagonians are described by Homer as a brave people; but according to Lucian they were silly and superstitious Strab. 12.—Hom. Il. 2, 851. 5, 577.—Lucian. Alexand. 41.

PAPHOS, Palæpaphos, (Old Paphos,) a very ancient city of Cyprus, on the south-western side of the island, situate on a height near the little river Bucarus. It was said to have been founded by Cinyras, the reputed father of Adonis. It was celebrated for its beautiful temple of Venus, built on the spot where she landed when she rose from the sea. There were one hundred altars in her temple, which smoked daily with a profusion of frankincense, and though exposed to the open air, they were never wetted by the rain. Annual festivals were held here in honour of the goddess, and her oracle, which was connected with the temple, acquired for it considerable reputation. Apollod 3, 14.—Mela, 2, 7.—Tacit. Ann 3, 62. Hist 2, 2.—Homer. Odyss. 8, 364.—Virg. Æn. 1, 415.—Horat. Od. 1, 30, 1.——Neapaphos, (New Paphos,) a city of Cyprus, on the western coast of the island, and north of Palæpaphos. It was said to have been founded by the Arcadian Agapenor, shortly after the destruction of Troy, when his fleet was driven upon the island by a storm. It was formerly called Erythræ, and possessed many magnificent temples of Venus. It suffered much from earthquakes, and was nearly destroyed by one, during the reign of Augustus, who rebuilt the city and commanded it to be called Augusta. It retains some vestiges of its ancient name under that of Baffo. Str. b. 14.—Paus 8 5.—Senec. Ep. 91. Nat. Quæst. 6, 26.—Dio Cass 54.

PAPIUS, a son of Pygmalion, by a statue which had been changed into a woman by Venus. [Vid Pygmalion.] Ovid. Met. 10, 297.

PAPIA LEX, de peregrinis, by Papius, the tribune, A. U. C 638, which required that all foreigners should be expelled from Rome, and the allies of the Latin name forced to return to their cities. Cic. de Off. 3, 11 Pro Balb 23.—— Another, called Papia Poppæa, because it was proposed by the consuls Papius and Poppæus, A. U. C. 762. It was passed at the desire of Augustus, and enforced and enlarged the Julian law for promoting population, and repairing the desolation occasioned by the civil wars. Vid. Julia lex de maritandis ordinibus.

PAPIAS, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, was the disciple of St John the Evangelist, and the master of Polycarp. He wrote "Exposition of the Discourses of the Lord," which are lost. Papias was the author of the Millenarian opinion respecting the personal reign of Christ upon earth, in which he was followed by Irenæus.

PAPINIANUS, Æmilius, a Roman lawyer, was born A. D. 175. He became advocate of the treasury, and afterwards Prætorian præfect under the emperor Severus, who recommended his sons, Caracalla and Geta, to his care. When the former murdered his brother, he ordered Papinian to justify the deed, which he refused, and was beheaded, A. D. 212. He wrote several valuable works.

PAPIUS LEX, by Papirius Carbo, A. U. C. 621. It required that, in passing or rejecting laws in the comitia, the votes should be given on tablets.—Another, by the tribune Papirius, which enacted that no person should consecrate any edifice, place, or thing, without the consent and permission of the people. Cic. pro domo 50.—Another, A. U. C. 543, to diminish the weight of the as one half. Plin. 33. 3. — Another, A. U. C. 421, to give the freedom of the city to the citizens of Acerræ. Another, A. U. C. 623. It was proposed, but not passed. It recommended the right of choosing a man to tribune of the people as often as he wished.

PAPIRIUS, a patrician, chosen rex sacrorum, after the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome. — A Roman who inhumanly treated a young Roman who had delivered himself into his hands in order to satisfy a debt due by his father to Papirius. The affair excited a great tumult, and, in order to appease the populace, it was ordered that no one should be held in fetters or stocks, except convicted of a crime, and in order to punishment; but that, for money due, the goods of the debtor, not his person, should be answerable. Livy says, that by this enactment one of the strongest bonds of credit was broken. Liv. 8, 28. — Cursor, a man who first erected a sun-dial in the temple of Quirinus at Rome, B. C. 293, from which time the days began to be divided into hours. — A dictator who ordered his master of horse to be put to death, because he had fought and conquered the enemies of the republic, without his consent. The people interfered, and the dictator pardoned him. Cursor made war against the Sabines and conquered them, and also triumphed over the Samnites. His great severity displeased the people. He flourished about 320 years before the Christian era. Liv. 8, 14. — One of his family, surnamed Prætextatus, from an action of his whilst he wore the prætexta, a certain gown for young men. His father, of the same name, carried him to the senate house, where affairs of the greatest importance were then in debate before the senators. The mother of young Papirius wished to know what had passed in the senate; but Papirius, unwilling to betray the secrets of that august assembly, amused his mother by telling her, that it had been considered whether it would be more advantageous to the republic to give two wives to one husband, than two husbands to one wife. The mother of Papirius was alarmed, and she communicated the secret to the other Roman matrons, and, on the morrow, they assembled in the senate, petitioning that one woman might have two husbands, rather than one husband two wives. The senators were astonished at this petition, but young Papirius unravelled the whole mystery, and from that time it was made a law among the senators, that no young man should for the future be introduced into the senate-house, except Papirius. This law was carefully observed till the age of Augustus, who permitted children of all ages to hear the debates of the senators. Macrob. Sat. 1, 6. — A consul defeated by the Cimbri. — A son of Papirius Cursor, who defeated the Samnites, and dedicated a temple to Romulus Quirinus. — Maso, a consul who conquered Sardinia and Corsica, and reduced them into the form of a province. At his return to Rome, he was refused a triumph, upon which he celebrated his triumph on the Alban mount, and was afterwards invitated in this by several commanders. Val. Max. 3, 6, 5. — Liv. 26, 21. 39, 24, &c. — The family of the Papirii was patrician, and long distinguished for its services to the state. It bore the different surnames of Crassus, Cursor, Mugillanus, Maso, Prætextatus, and Pætus, of which the three first branches became the most illustrious.

PAPPUS, a celebrated mathematician of Alexandria, who flourished in the fourth century, under Theodosius the Great. He was the author of a commentary on the Almagest of Ptolemy; a mathematical treatise, translated by Commandin in 1565, a description of some of the principal rivers in Africa; a work on military engines, &c., together with several other tracts most of which have not reached posterity, though some of them have been abridged, and others enumerated by Marin Mersenne. C. Manolessius collected and published all that is now known of his writings, in one folio volume, Bologna, 1660.

PARABYSTON, a tribunal at Athens, where causes of inferior consequence were tried. There were two courts of this name, one of which was called παραβυστον μεγα, and the other παραβυστον μικρον. The persons who sat as judges in the latter of these were the eleven magistrates called οι ἑνδεκα.

PARÆTACÆ, or TACENI, a people of Persia, occupying the mountain range between that country and Media. Their territory was called by the Greek Paræatacene, and Steph. Byz. makes mention of a city in it by the name of Paræatacæ. Diod. Sic. 19, 34. — Arrian, 3, 19. Plin. 6, 26.

PARÆTONIUM, a strongly fortified place, the frontier-town of Egypt on the side of Libya, and situate on the coast of the Mediterranean. It had, including its harbour, a circuit of about 40 stadia. Justinian repaired and strengthened it. The modern name is El Baretun. Strab 17. — Lucan. 10, 9. — Ovid. Met. 9, 773.

PARCÆ, powerful goddesses, who presided over the birth and the life of mankind. They were three in number. Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, daughters of Nox and Erebus, according to Hesiod, or of Jupiter and Themis, according to the same poet in another poem. Some make them daughters of the sea. Clotho, the youngest of the sisters, presided over the moment in which we are born, and held a distaff in her hand, Lachesis spun out all the events and actions of our life; and Atropos, the eldest of the three, cut the thread of human life with a pair of scissors. Their different functions are well expressed in this ancient verse:

Clotho colum retinet, Lachesis net, et Atropos occat.

The name of the Parcæ, according to Varro, is derived a partu et pariendo, because they presided over the birth of men; and by corruption the word parca is formed from paria or pertus. The true etymology is parco, "to spare;" and the Fates were so called from their being invoked in prayer to spare the lives of suppliant mortals. The power of the Parcæ was great and extensive. Some suppose that they were subjected to none of the gods but Jupiter, while others support that even Jupiter himself was obedient to their commands, and indeed we see the father of the gods in Homer's Iliad unwilling to see Patroclus perish, yet obliged by the superior power of the Fates to abandon him to his destiny. According to the more received opinions, they were the arbiters of the life and death of mankind, and whatever good or evil befalls us in the world, immediately proceeds from the Fates or Parcæ. Some make them ministers of the king of hell, and represent them as sitting at the foot of his throne; others represent them as placed on radiant thrones, amidst the celestial spheres, clothed in robes spangled with stars, and wearing crowns on their heads. According to Pausanias, the names of the Parcæ were different from those already mentioned. The most ancient of all, as the geographer observes, was Venus Urania, who presided over the birth of men; the second was Fortune; Hythia was the third. To these some add a fourth, Proserpina, who often disputes with Atropos the right of cutting the thread of human life. The worship of the Parcæ was well established in some cities of Greece, and though mankind were well convinced that they were inexorable, and that it was impossible to mitigate them, yet they were eager to show a proper respect to their divinity, by raising them temples and statues. They received the same worship as the Furies, and their votaries yearly sacrificed to them black sheep, during which solemnity the priests were obliged to wear garlands of flowers. The Parcæ were generally represented as three old women with chaplets made with wool, and interwoven with the flowers of the Narcissus. They were covered with a white robe, and fillet of the same colour, bound with chaplets. One of them held a distaff, another the spindle, and the third was armed with scissors, with which she cut the thread which her sisters had spun. Their dress is differently represented by some authors. Clotho appears in a variegated robe, and on her head is a crown of seven stars. She holds a distaff in her hand, reaching from heaven to earth. The robe which Lachesis wore was variegated with a great number of stars, and near her were placed variety of spindles. Atropos was clothed in black; she held scissors in her hand, with clues of thread of different sizes, according to the length and shortness of the lives whose destinies they seemed to contain. Hyginus attributes to them the invention of these Greek letters α, β, η, τ, υ, and others call them the secretaries of heaven, and the keepers of the archives of eternity. The Greeks call the Parcæ by the different names of μοῖραι, αἶσα, κῆρ, αἰσυμνῆται which are expressive of their power and of their inexorable decrees. *Hesiod. Theog. et Scut. Her. PARIS, the son of Priam, king of Troy, by Hecuba, also called Alexander. He was destined, even before his birth, to become the ruin of his country; and when his mother, in the first month of her pregnancy, had dreamed that she should bring forth a torch which would set fire to her palace, the soothsayers foretold the calamities which might be expected from the imprudence of her future son, and which would end in the destruction of Troy. Priam, to prevent so great and so alarming an evil, ordered his slave Archelaus to destroy the child as soon as born. The slave, either touched with humanity, or influenced by Hecuba, did not destroy him, but was satisfied to expose him on mount Ida, where the shepherds of the place found him, and educated him as their own son. Some attribute the preservation of his life, before he was found by the shepherds, to the motherly tenderness of a she-bear which suckled him. Young Paris, though educated among shepherds and peasants, gave early proofs of courage and intrepidity, and from his care in protecting the flocks of mount Ida against the rapacity of the wild beasts, he obtained the name of Alexander (helper or defender). He gained the esteem of all the shepherds, and his graceful countenance and manly deportment recommended him to the favor of Œnone, a nymph of Ida, whom he married, and with whom he lived with the most perfect tenderness. Their conjugal love was soon disturbed. At the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, the goddess of discord, who had not been invited to partake of the entertainment, showed her displeasure by throwing into the assembly of the gods who were at the celebration of the nuptials, a golden apple on which were written the words Ἡ καλὴ λαβέτω, "Let the fair one (among you) take me." All the goddesses claimed it as their own: the contention at first became general, but at last only three, Juno, Venus, and Minerva wished to dispute their respective right to beauty. The gods, unwilling to become arbiters in an affair of so tender and so delicate a nature, appointed Paris to adjudge the prize of beauty to the fairest of the goddesses, and indeed the shepherd seemed properly qualified to decide so great a contest, as his wisdom was so well established, and his prudence and sagacity so well known. The goddesses appeared before their judge without any covering or ornament, and each tried by promises and entreaties to gain the attention of Paris, and to influence his judgment. Juno promised him a kingdom; Minerva, military glory; and Venus, the fairest woman in the world, for his wife, as Ovid expresses it, Heroid. 17, 118.

Unaque cum regnum; bella daret altera gladios; Tyndaridis conjux, tertia dixit, eris

After he had heard their several claims and promises, Paris adjudged the prize to Venus, and gave her the golden apple, to which, perhaps, she seemed entitled, as the goddess of beauty. This decision of Paris in favour of Venus, drew upon the judge and his family the resentment of the two other goddesses. Soon after Priam proposed a contest among his sons and other princes, and promised to reward the conqueror with one of the finest bulls of mount Ida. His emissaries were sent to procure the animal, and it was found in the possession of Paris, who reluctantly yielded it up. The shepherd was desirous of obtaining again this favorite animal, and he went to Troy, and entered the list of the combatants. He was received with the greatest applause, and obtained the victory over his rivals, Nestor, the son of Neleus; Cycnus, son of Neptune; Polites, Helenus, and Deiphobus, sons of Priam. He also obtained a superiority over Hector himself, and the prince, enraged to see himself conquered by an unknown stranger, pursued him closely, and Paris must have fallen a victim to his brother's resentment, had he not fled to the altar of Jupiter. This sacred retreat preserved his life, and Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, struck with the similarity of the features of Paris with those of her brothers, enquired his birth and his age. From these circumstances she soon discovered that he was her brother, and as such she introduced him to her father and to his children. Priam acknowledged Paris as his son, forgetful of the alarming dreams which had influenced him to meditate his death, and all jealousy ceased among the brothers. Paris did not long suffer himself to remain inactive; he equipped a fleet, as if willing to redeem Hesione, his father's sister, whom Hercules had carried away, and obliged to marry Telamon, the son of Æacus. This was the pretended motive of his voyage, but the causes were far different. Paris recollected that he was to be the husband of the fairest of women, and if he had been led to form those expectations while he was an obscure shepherd of Ida, he had now every plausible reason to see them realized, since he was acknowledged son of the king of Troy. Helen was the fairest woman of the age, and Venus had promised her to him. On these grounds, therefore, he visited Sparta, the residence of Helen, who had married Menelaus. He was received with every mark of respect, but he abused the hospitality of Menelaus, and while the husband was absent in Crete, Paris persuaded Helen to elope with him, and fly to Asia. Helen consented, and Priam received her into his palace without difficulty, as his sister was then detained in a foreign country, and as he wished to show himself as hostile as possible to the Greeks. This affair was soon productive of serious consequences. When Menelaus had married Helen, all her suitors had bound themselves by a solemn oath to protect her person, and to defend her from every violence. [Vid. Helena.] and therefore the injured husband reminded them of their engagements, and called upon them to recover Helen. Upon this all Greece took up arms in the cause of Menelaus, Agamemnon was chosen general of all the combined forces, and a regular war was begun. [Vid. Troja.] Paris, meanwhile who had refused Helen to the petitions and embassies of the Greeks, armed himself with his brothers and subjects to oppose the enemy; but the success of the war was neither hindered nor accelerated by his means. He fought with little courage, and as the very sight of Menelaus, whom he had so recently injured, all his resolution vanished, and he retired from the front of the army, where he walked before like a conqueror. In a combat with Menelaus which he undertook at the persuasion of his brother Hector, Paris must have perished, had not Venus interfered, and stolen him from the resentment of his adversary. He nevertheless wounded, in another battle, Machaon, Eurypylus, and Diomedes, and, according to some opinions, he killed with one of his arrows the great Achilles. [Vid. Achilles.] The death of Paris is differently related; some suppose that he was mortally wounded by one of the arrows of Philoctetes, which had been once in the possession of Hercules, and that when he found himself languid on account of his wounds, he ordered himself to be carried to the feet of Œnone, whom he had basely abandoned, and who, in the years of his obscurity, had foretold him that he would solicit her assistance in his dying moments. He expired before he came into the presence of Œnone, and the nymph, still mindful of their former loves, threw herself upon his body, and stabbed herself to the heart, after she had plentifully bathed it with her tears. According to some authors, Paris did not immediately go to Troy when he left the Peloponnesus, but he was driven on the coasts of Egypt, where Proteus, who was king of the country, detained him, and, when he heard of the violence which had been offered to the king of Sparta, he kept Helen at his court, and permitted Paris to retire. PARISI, inhabitants of Britain, seated to the north of the Coritani, and occupying the district which is called Holderness, or as Camden imagines, the whole East-Riding of Yorkshire. They are supposed to have derived their name from the two British words pawr isa, which signify low pasture, and which are descriptive of the situation and uses of their country. Their capital was Petuaria.

PARISUS, a river of Pannonia, falling into the Danube; according to Mannert, the Mur, in the Hungarian part of its course.

PARIUM, a town of Asia Minor, in Mysia Minor, on the Propontis, south west from Linaus, and north-east from Pæsus. It was founded by the Milesians the Erythræans, and the Parians. Under the kings of Pergamus it became a city of some extent and opulence, having been enlarged by those princes at the expense of the neighbouring towns of Adrastea and Priapus. Its harbour was secure and capacious, being able to contain a fleet of more than eighty ships. At a later period, it was dignified by Augustus with the title of a Roman colony. The ruins of this town are pointed out by travellers at Kemarre, Strab. 13.—Herod. 5, 117.—Xen. Hell. 1, 1, &c.—Plin. 5, 32.

PARMA, a city of Italy, south of the Po, on the small river Parma. Whether this city was founded by the Gauls, or more anciently by the Etrurians, is uncertain; we only know that it received a Roman colony, A. U. C. 560. From Cicero it may be inferred that Parma was attached to the party of Antony, and suffered from the adverse faction in the civil wars. It was probably re-colonized under Augustus, as some inscriptions give it the title of Colonia Julia Augusta Parma. Strabo speaks of it as a city of note. From Martial we learn that its wool was highly prized. The modern name of this city is Parma. Liv. 39, 55.—*Cic. PARMENIDES, a celebrated Greek philosopher of the Eleatic sect, who flourished about 500 years before Christ, was a native of Elea, possessed a large patrimony, and lived in much splendour in his earlier years. He was distinguished in civil affairs, and is said to have drawn up for his fellow-citizens some excellent laws, to which their magistrates annually compelled them to swear obedience. He at length withdrew from the concerns of public life to the silence and leisure of the schools. He became the disciple and successor of Xenophanes, and is said to have attended upon the instructions of Anaximander. According to Cebes he was distinguished as an eminent pattern of virtue. He wrote the doctrine of his school in verses, of which only a few fragments remain. Plato, in the dialogue which he denominated Parmenides, professed to represent his tenets, but confounded them with his own. Parmenides maintained that the universe is one, immoveable, eternal, and of a spherical form; that the earth is spherical, and in the centre, being exactly balanced by its distance from the heavens, so that there is no cause why it should move one way rather than another. There were, as he supposed, only two sorts of philosophy; one founded on reason, and the other on the evidence of the senses. Diog 9, 21, &c.—Plato in Parmen.—Athen. 11.

PARMENIO, a celebrated general in the armies of Alexander, who enjoyed the king's confidence, and was more attached to his person as a man than as a monarch. When Darius, king of Persia, offered Alexander all the country which lies at the west of the Euphrates, with his daughter Statira in marriage, and 10,000 talents of gold, Parmenio took occasion to observe, that he would without hesitation accept of these conditions if he were Alexander; so would I, were I Parmenio, replied the conqueror. This friendship, so true and inviolable, was meanly sacrificed to a moment of resentment and suspicion; and Alexander, who had too eagerly listened to a light and perhaps a false accusation, ordered Parmenio and his son to be put to death, as if guilty of treason against his person. Parmenio was in the seventieth year of his age, B. C. 330. He died in the greatest popularity, and it has been judiciously observed, that Parmenio obtained many victories without Alexander, but Alexander not one without Parmenio. Curt 3, 6, 7, 1.—Plut. in Alex.

PARNASSUS, the highest mountain in central Greece, which retains its snow during the greater part of the year. It extends from the country of Doris and the Locri Ozolæ, and passing through the centre of Phocis, joins the ridge of Helicon. Its summit was especially sacred to Bacchus. The two lofty rocks, which rise perpendicularly above Delphi, were called Phædriades, and obtained for the mountain the epithet of Δικόρυφος, or the two-headed: from these the Delphians hurled their criminals, and in this manner Æsop was barbarously murdered. From the chasm between these two summits, and fed by the almost perpetual snows of Parnassus, pours down the Castalian Spring, sacred to the Muses; its cool and excellent waters were said to have the power of inspiring those who drank of them with the true spirit of poetry. Higher up the mountain was the Corycium Antrum, sacred to the Corycian nymphs, and to the god Pan. Near the summit of Parnassus was Lycorea once the residence of Deucalion, it is said to have derived its name from the howling of the wolves, which the people of Delphi followed up the mountain, to escape the flood: the same tradition states that Parnassus was anciently called Larnassus from the Greek word λάρναξ, owing to the boat, of Deucalion having been there carried up the mountain. Strab. 9.—*Eurip. PARNES, (Ætæ.) the highest mountain of Attica, rising on the northern frontier of the country, being connected with Pentelicus to the south, and towards Bœotia with Cithæron. It was covered with vines and corn, and was noted for the hunting of boars and bears upon it. On its summit was a temple of Jupiter Parnethius. The modern name of this mountain is *Nasea. PAROPAMISUS, a province of India, the eastern limit of which, in Alexander's time, was the river Cophenes. According to the ideas of Ptolemy it lay between the countries which the moderns name Khorasan and Cabul, and it answers to the tract between Herat and Cabul. This province was separated from Bactria by the range of Paropamisus, now Hindoo Coosh. Mela, 1, 15.—Plin. 6, 17.

PAROS, now Paro one of the Cyclades, to the south of Delos, at the distance of about seven and a half miles. It was said to have been first peopled by the Cretans and Arcadians. Its early prosperity is evinced by the colonies it established at Thasus, and on the shores of the Hellespont. During the time of the Persian war, we are told that it was the most flourishing and important of the Cyclades. After the battle of Marathon it was besieged in vain by Miltiades for twenty-six days, and thus proved the cause of his disgrace. The Parians did not take part with the Persians in the battle of Salamis, but kept aloof near Cythnus, awaiting the issue of the action. Themistocles, however, subsequently imposed upon them a heavy fine. Paros was celebrated for its marble, which was dug from mount Marpessa; this marble was termed "lychnites" from the word λυχνὸς, on account of its large sparkling crystals, and not from being cut by the light of lamps, as some have pretended. Paros had a cognominal town, and was the birth-place of the poet Archilochus. It was in Paros that the famous marble was discovered, known by the name of the Parian Chronicle, from its having been kept in this island. It is a chronological account of the principal events in Grecian, and particularly in Athenian, history, during a period of 1318 years, from the reign of Cecrops, B. C. 1582, to the archonship of Diognetus, B. C. 264. But the chronicle of the last ninety years was lost, so that the part now remaining ends at the archonship of Diotimus, B. C. 354. The authenticity of this chronicle has been called in question by Mr Robertson, who, in 1788, published a "Dissertation on the Parian Chronicle." His objections, however, have been ably and fully discussed, and the authenticity of this ancient document has been fully vindicated by Porson, in his review of Robertson's essay. The Chronicle is given, with an English version, in Hale's Analysis of Chronology. Strab 10.—Thucyd 4, 104. Herod 5, 2, &c. 6, 134, c. 67 et 112.—Virg Georg. 3, 34. Æn 3, 126. 6, 471.

PARRHASIUS, a famous painter, son of Evenor of Ephesus, in the age of Zeuxis, about 415 years before Christ. He was a great master of his profession, and particularly excelled in strongly expressing the violent passions. He was blessed with a great genius, and much invention, and he was peculiarly happy in his designs. He acquired for himself great reputation by his pieces, but by none more than that in which he allegorically represented the people of Athens, with all the injustice, the clemency, the fickleness, timidity, the arrogance and inconsistency, which so eminently characterised that celebrated nation. He once entered the lists against Zeuxis, and when they had produced their respective pieces, the birds came to pick with the greatest avidity the grapes which Zeuxis had painted. Immediately Parrhasius exhibited his piece, and Zeuxis said, remove your curtain that we may see the painting. The curtain was the painting, and Zeuxis acknowledged himself conquered, by exclaiming, Zeuxis has deceived birds, but Parrhasius has deceived Zeuxis himself. Parrhasius grew so vain of his art, that he clothed himself in purple, and wore a crown of gold, calling himself the king of painters. He was lavish in his own praises, and by his vanity too often exposed himself to the ridicule of his enemies. Plut. in Thes. de Poet. Aud.—Paus. 1, 28.—Plin. 35, 10.

PARTHENIÆ and PARTHENII, a certain number of desperate citizens of Sparta. During the Messenian war the Spartans were absent from their city for the space of ten years, and it was unlawful for them to return, as they had bound themselves by a solemn oath not to revisit Sparta before they had totally subdued Messenia. This long absence alarmed the Lacedæmonian women, as well as the magistrates. The Spartans were reminded by their wives that if they continued in their resolution, the state must at last decay for want of citizens, and when they had duly considered this embassy, they empowered all the young men in the army who had come to the war while yet under age, and who therefore were not bound by the oath, to return to Sparta, and by a familiar and promiscuous intercourse with all the unmarried women of the state, of nubile years, to raise a future generation. It was carried into execution, and the children that sprang from this union were called Parthenii, or sons of virgins (παρθένοι). The war with Messenia was some time after ended, and the Spartans returned victorious; but the cold indifference with which they looked upon the Parthenii was attended with serious consequences. The Parthenii knew they had no legitimate fathers, and no inheritance, and that therefore their lives depended upon their own exertions. This drove them almost to despair They joined with the Helots, whose maintenance was as precarious as their own, and it was mutually agreed to murder all the citizens of Sparta, and to seize their possessions. This massacre was to be done at a general assembly, and the signal was the throwing of a cap in the air. The whole, however, was discovered through the diffidence and apprehensions of the Helots; and when the people had assembled, the Parthenii discovered that all was known, by the voice of a crier, who proclaimed that no man should throw up his cap. The Parthenii, though apprehensive of punishment, were not visibly treated with greater severity; their calamitous condition was attentively examined, and the Spartans, afraid of another conspiracy, and awed by their numbers, permitted them to sail for Italy, with Phalantus their ring-leader at their head. They settled in Magna Græcia, at Tarentum, about 707 years before Christ. Justin. 3, 5.—Plut. in Apoph.

PARTHENIAS, or PARTHENIUS, a river of Elis, to the east of the Hirpinates, and, like it, a tributary of the Alpheus. Paus. 5, 21.

PARTHENIUM, the south-western extremity of the Tauric Chersonese. It received its name from Iphigenia's having been fabled to have offered up her human sacrifices here to the Tauric Diana. (Παρθένιον ἄκρωτήριον, "Virgin's Promontory.") It is now called Felenk Bournon, and on it stands the monastery of St George. Plin. 4, 12.——A town of Mysia, in the territory of Troas. *Xen. PARTHENIUS, a river of Asia Minor, forming the boundary between Paphlagonia and Bithynia, and falling into the Euxine to the south-west of Amastris. Strictly speaking, it separates Bithynia from Paphlagonia only in the lower part of its course, being elsewhere considerably within the limits of the latter country. It was supposed to derive its name from the gentleness of its stream, or because Diana loved to bathe in its waters. It is mentioned for the first time by Homer, in his Catalogue of ships Herodotus also mentions the Parthenius, and Strabo affirms that it was so called from the beauty of the country which it traverses. Its modern name is the Bartan. Apoll Rhod. 2, 935. Xen. Anab. 5, 6.—*Hom. Suidas states that he lived till the reign of the emperor Tiberius. The same lexicographer informs us that he gained his freedom on account of his learning. Of the numerous works written by Parthenius, only one now remains. Its title is Περὶ ἐρωτικῶν παθημάτων ("Of amatory affections"), and it is addressed to Cornelius Gallus, the elegiac poet. It is a collection of thirty erotic tales, all of a melancholy cast. The best edition of Parthenius is that of Legrand and Heyne, Goetting 1798. 8vo.

PARTHENON, a celebrated temple at Athens, on the summit of the Acropolis, and sacred to Minerva, the virgin-goddess (παρθένος, Virgo) It was far elevated above the Propylæa and the surrounding edifices, its pavements being on a level with the capitals of the columns in the former. It occupied the site of an older temple, called Hecatompedon, dedicated also to Minerva, which had been destroyed in the Persian invasion. It surpassed all other buildings of the kind in beauty and grandeur, being constructed entirely of Pentelic marble. The architect was Ictinus. Those who have studied its dimensions inform us that it consisted of a cell, surrounded with a peristyle, having eight Doric columns in the two fronts, and seventeen in the sides. These were six feet two inches in diameter at the base, and thirty-four feet in height, standing upon a pavement, to which there was an ascent of three steps, the total elevation of the temple being 65 feet from the ground; the length was 228, and the breadth 102 feet. It was also enriched, both within and without, with matchless works of art, by the first sculptors of Greece. We learn from Pausanias that those which decorated the pediment in front related to the birth of Minerva, and those behind to the contest between the goddess and Neptune for Attica. The statue of Minerva was of ivory and gold. On the summit of the helmet was placed a sphynx, with griffins on each of the sides. The statue itself was erect, and clothed in a robe reaching to the feet. On the breast was a head of Medusa, wrought in ivory, and a figure of Victory about four cubits high. She held a spear in her hand, and a shield lay at her feet; near the spear was a serpent, which might be supposed to represent that of Erichthonius. According to Pliny, the figure was twenty-six cubits high. The whole was executed by Phidias, who had further contrived that the gold with which the statue was encrusted might be removed at pleasure. The sculpture on the pedestal represented the birth of Pandora. Pausanias also notices the statues of Iphicrates, Pericles, and his father Xantippus, Anacreon, and a brazen Apollo, by Phidias. On the southern wall were sculptured the war of the giants who inhabited Pallene, and the battle of the Athenians and Amazons; also that of Marathon, and the defeat of the Gauls in Mysia, presented by Attalus. Here was likewise the statue of Olympiodorus, who freed the Athenians from the Macedonian yoke in the time of Cassander. Strab. 9.—Plin. 36, 5.—Thucyd. 2, 13.—Paus. 1, 25.

PARTHENOPÆUS, a son of Meleager and Atalanta, or, according to some, of Milanion and another Atalanta, celebrated among the ancients for the beauty of his person and the elegance of his manners. He was one of the seven chiefs who accompanied Adrastus, the king of Argos, in his expedition against Thebes. He was killed by Amphidicus. Apollod. 3, 9.—Paus. 3, 18. 9, 19.

PARTHIA a country of Asia, bounded on the north by Hyrcania, on the east by Ariana, on the south by Carmania and Persis, and on the west by Media. It corresponded with the western half of the modern province of Khorassan. It was in general an exceedingly desert and arid country, being considered by far the most barren of all the Persian provinces. The Parthians were an athletic and a warlike people, and were reckoned the most expert horsemen and archers in the world; they derived great celebrity from their peculiar custom of discharging their arrows whilst retreating at full speed, which is said to have rendered their flight more formidable than their attack. They were much addicted to inebriation and other gross vices, some of which were even sanctioned by their laws. Their chief city was situated in the northern part of the country, and was called Hecatompylos from the number of gates opening to the roads, which led to it from all parts of Persia: it was the seat of their government, and the original residence of their kings, and is now called Damghan. Parthia, called Parthyæa and Parthyene by the Greeks, was at first so inconsiderable a country as to be reckoned a part of the little province Hyrcania; the inhabitants were Scythians, who are said to have derived their name from a word signifying in the language of the country an exile. They were successively tributary to the Assyrians, the Medes, and the Persians, and having submitted, like the other provinces of Persia, to Alexander the Great, were for some time under the power of his successors, till the tyranny of Antiochus roused them to rebellion. Arsaces, a man of obscure origin, seized the opportunity of redressing the wrongs of his countrymen, and having placed himself at their head, succeeded in establishing their independence about 250 years B. C. He soon increased his little territory by seizing on parts of all the surrounding provinces, and Parthia began now for the first time to be considered as a separate state. The Macedonians endeavoured to recover the possessions which they had lost, but they were constantly foiled by a race of brave and vigilant princes, who from the founder of their kingdom assumed the name of Arsacidæ; the power of these chiefs became at last so formidable that they conquered eighteen kingdoms, and their dominion extended from the Euphrates to the Ganges, and from the shores of the Caspian to the Arabian Sea. Their conquests at last roused the watchful jealousy of the Romans, who attacked them under Crassus, and thus gave rise to a furious war which raged for many years between the two countries, generally to the disadvantage of the Romans. Phraates the Fourth, king of Parthia, carried on a successful war against Mark Antony, and obliged him to retire after he had been severely defeated: but being dethroned some time afterwards by the Parthian nobility, and the usurper of his crown having claimed the protection of Augustus, Phraates was glad to send ambassadors to Rome to obtain the favour of so powerful a judge. His embassy being successful, he made a treaty of peace and alliance with the great emperor of the west, and gave up the captives, ensigns, and standards, which the Parthians had taken from Crassus and Antony: it is to this circumstance, which was conveniently magnified into a victory over the Parthians, that the greater part, if not all, of the flattering compliments of the poets have reference. It was in one of the contests between the Parthians and Romans, that Artabanus, the last king of Parthia, lost his life, A. D. 229, upon which their country became a province of the newly re-established kingdom of Persia under Artaxerxes. Plut. 3, 5.—Virg. G. 3, 31, &c. Æn. 7, 606.—Plin. 6, 25.—*Ovid. Art. PARYADRES, or PARYADRIS, a branch of Caucasus, running off to the south-west, and separating Cappadocia from Armenia. On the confines of Cappadocia the name is changed to Scordiscus: it here unites with the chain of Antitaurus, and both stretch onwards to the west and south west PARYSĀTIS, a Persian princess, wife of Darius Ochus, by whom she had Artaxerxes, Memnon, and Cyrus the younger. She was so extremely partial to her younger son, that she committed the greatest cruelties to encourage his ambition, and she supported him with all her interest in his rebellion against his brother Memnon. The death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa was revenged with the grossest barbarity, and Parysatis sacrificed to her resentment all such as she found concerned in his fall. She also poisoned Statira, the wife of her son Artaxerxes, and ordered one of the eunuchs of the court to be flayed alive, and his skin to be stretched on two poles before her eyes because he had, by order of the king, cut off the hand and the head of Cyrus. These cruelties offended Artaxerxes, and he ordered his mother to be confined in Babylon; but they were soon after reconciled, and Parysatis regained all her power and influence till the time of her death. Plut. in Art.—Cles.

PASARGĂDA a very ancient city of Persia, south-east of Persepolis, and near the confines of Carmania. It was situate in Cœle Persis, on the banks of the Cyrus or Cores. It was a favourite residence of Cyrus, because near it he conquered Astyages the Mede; and here he chose to be buried. The kings of Persia were afterwards crowned here in the temple of Minerva, and as part of the ceremony put on the regalia which had been worn by Cyrus The Pasargadæ were reckoned the most illustrious among the Persians, as the Achæmenidæ, from whom Cyrus was descended, were a branch of them. Strab. 15.—Plin. 5, 26.—Herod. 1, 125

PASIPHAE, a daughter of the Sun and of Perseis, who married Minos, king of Crete She disgraced herself by her unnatural passion for a bull, which, according to some authors, she was enabled to gratify by means of the artist Dædalus. This celebrated bull had been given to Minos by Neptune, to be offered on his altars, but as the monarch refused to sacrifice the animal on account of his beauty, the god revenged his disobedience by inspiring Pasiphae with an unnatural love for it. This fabulous tradition, which is universally believed by the poets, who observe that the Minotaur was the fruit of this infamous commerce, is refuted by some writers, who suppose that the infidelity of Pasiphae to her husband was betrayed in her affection for an officer called Taurus; and that Dædalus, by permitting his house to be the asylum of the two lovers, was looked upon as accessary to the gratification of Pasiphae's lust. From this amour with Taurus, as it is further remarked, the queen became mother of twins, and the name of Minotaurus arises from the resemblance of the children to the husband and the lover of Pasiphae. Minos had four sons by Pasiphae, Castreus, Deucalion, Glaucus, and Androgeus, and three daughters, Hecate, Ariadne, and Phædra. PASSARON, a town of Epirus, the capital of the Molossi. Here the kings of Epirus convened the solemn assembly of the whole nation, when, after having performed the customary sacrifices, they took an oath that they would govern according to the established laws, and the people in return swore to maintain the constitution and defend the kingdom After the termination of the war between the Romans and Perseus, king of Macedon, Passaron did not escape the sentence which doomed to destruction so many of the unfortunate cities of Epirus, that had shown an inclination to favour the cause of the enemy. It was given up to plunder, and its walls were levelled to the ground. With regard to the site of this ancient place, it seems highly probable that it is to be identified with some remarkable ruins, described by more than one traveller, near Jouannina, in a S. S. W. direction, and about four hours from that city. Plut. in Pyrr.—Liv. 45, 26 et 33.

PATĀRA, (orum.) a city and harbour of Lycia, on the left bank and near the mouth of the river Xanthus It was one of the most celebrated cities in the province, and was adorned with several temples. The most famous of these was that of the Lycian Apollo, surnamed also Patareus: it was very ancient, and second only to that of Delphi. Some derived the name from Patarus a son of Apollo Pliny affirms it was more anciently called Sataros. Herodotus says the oracle was delivered by a priestess, for a certain period; which, according to Servius, was during the six winter months. We learn from Strabo, that Ptolemy Philadelphus restored Patara, and attempted to change its name to Arsinoe in Lycia; but this alteration does not appear to have succeeded. Livy and other writers always use the former appellation The common ethnic name is Patarenses, in Latin Pataremis; but Cicero uses Pataranus. This town is recorded among the Lycian bishoprics in the Acts of Councils; and the name of Patera is still attached to its ruins. Mela, 1, 15.—Strab. 14.—Plin. 5, 28. Herod 1, 182.—*Virg. PATAVIUM, a city of Cisalpine Gaul, in the district of Venetia, and situate between the Meduacus Major and Minor, in the lower part of their course. The poetic legend which ascribed the foundation of Patavium to Antenor, a Trojan prince, must be admitted to vouch at least for its high antiquity. In the 450th year of Rome, the Patavinians are recorded to have repulsed from their shores a party of Spartan invaders, who, driven by contrary winds from Tarentum, had taken shelter at the mouth of the Meduacus Major, near Fusina, and thence made a descent upon the defenceless villages. The shields of the Greeks and the beaks of their galleys were suspended in the temple of Juno; and an annual mock fight on the Meduacus, perpetuated the memory of the triumph. Strabo speaks of Patavium as the greatest and most flourishing city in the north of Italy. In his time, it numbered 500 Roman knights among its citizens, and could at one period send 20,000 men into the field. Its manufactures of cloth and woollen stuffs were renowned throughout Italy, and its wealth, celebrity, and importance entitled it to be regarded as the capital of ancient Venetia. Vessels could come up to Patavium from the sea, a distance of 250 stadia, by the Meduacus, which had a capacious port at its mouth. About six miles to the south of the city were the celebrated Patavinæ Aquæ, the principal source was distinguished by the name of Aponus Fons, whence that of Abano, by which these waters are known at the present day. The modern Padua (in Italian Padova) occupies the site of the ancient Patavium. Virg. Æn. 1, 242.—Liv. 10, 2.—Strab. 5 et 6.—Plin. 2, 103. 31, 6.

PATMOS, a small rocky island in the Ægean sea, south of Icaria, and south-west of Samos. This island, so interesting to the Christian on account of the banishment of the apostle St John, is mentioned by Strabo among the Sporades, and by Pliny, who says it is thirty miles in circuit. It is the general opinion of commentators that St John was banished to Patmos towards the close of the reign of Domitian. He himself declares, "I John, who also am your brother, and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ." It is not known how long his captivity lasted, but it is thought that he was released on the death of Domitian, which happened A. D. 96, when he retired to Ephesus. The island, which is now called Patmo, contains several churches and convents; the principal one is dedicated to the apostle. There are also the ruins of an ancient fortress, and some other remains. Strab. 10.—Plin. 4, 12.—Rev. 1, 9.

PATRÆ, a city of Achaia, west of Rhium, and at the opening of the Corinthian gulf. It is said to have been built on the site of three towns, called Arne, Anthea, and Mesatis, which had been founded by the Ionians when they were in possession of the country. On their expulsion by the Achæans, the small towns above mentioned fell into the hands of Patreus, an illustrious chief of that people; who, uniting them into one city, called it by his name. Patræ is enumerated by Herodotus among the twelve cities of Achaia. We are informed by Thucydides, that, during the interval of peace which occurred in the Peloponnesian war, Alcibiades persuaded its inhabitants to build long walls down to the sea. This was one of the first towns which renewed the federal system, after the interval occasioned by the Macedonian domination throughout Greece. Its maritime situation, opposite to the coast of Ætolia and Acarnania, rendered it a very advantageous port for communicating with these countries, and in the Social war, Philip of Macedon frequently landed his troops there in his expeditions into Peloponnesus. The Patræans sustained such severe losses in the different engagements fought against the Romans during the Achæan war, that the few men who remained in the city determined to abandon it, and to reside in the surrounding villages and boroughs. Patræ was, however, raised to its former flourishing condition after the battle of Actium by Augustus, who, in addition to its dispersed inhabitants, sent thither a large body of colonists, chosen from his veteran soldiers, and granted to the city, thus restored under his auspices, all the privileges usually conceded by the Romans to their colonies. Strabo affirms, that in his day it was a large and populous town, with a good harbour. The modern Patras occupies the site of the ancient city. Paus. 7, 18.—Herod. 1, 146.—Thucyd. 2, 84. 5, 53. Polyb. 2, 41. 40, 3. &c.—Strab. 8.

PATROCLUS, one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war, son of Menœtius, by Sthenele, whom some call Philomela, or Polymela. The accidental murder of Clysonymus, the son of Amphidamus, in the time of his youth, obliged him to fly from Opus, where his father reigned. He retired to the court of Peleus, king of Phthia, where he was kindly received, and where he contracted the most intimate friendship with Achilles, the monarch's son. When the Greeks went to the Trojan war, Patroclus also accompanied them at the express command of his father, who had visited the court of Peleus, and he embarked with ten ships from Phthia. He was the constant companion of Achilles; he lodged in the same tent; and when his friend refused to appear in the field of battle because he had been offended by Agamemnon, Patroclus imitated his example, and by his absence was the cause of the overthrow of the Greeks. But at last Nestor prevailed upon him to return to the war, and Achilles permitted him to appear in his armour. The valour of Patroclus, together with the terror which the sight of the arms of Achilles inspired, soon routed the victorious armies of the Trojans, and obliged them to fly within their walls for safety. He would have broken down the walls of the city; but Apollo, who interested himself for the Trojans, placed himself to oppose him, and Hector, at the instigation of the god, dismounted from his chariot to attack him as he attempted to strip one of the Trojans whom he had slain. The engagement was obstinate, but at last Patroclus was overpowered by the valour of Hector and the interposition of Apollo. His arms became the property of the conqueror, and Hector would have severed his head from his body, had not Ajax and Menelaus intervened. His body was at last recovered and carried to the Grecian camp, where Achilles received it with the bitterest lamentations. His funeral was observed with the greatest solemnity. Achilles sacrificed near the burning pile twelve young Trojans, besides four of his horses and two of his dogs, and the whole was concluded by the exhibition of funeral games, in which the conquerors were liberally rewarded by Achilles. The death of Patroclus, as it is described by Homer, gave rise to new events; Achilles forgot his resentment against Agamemnon, and entered the field to avenge the fall of his friend, and his anger was gratified only by the slaughter of Hector, who had more powerfully kindled his wrath by appearing at the head of the Trojan armies in the armour which had been taken from the body of Patroclus. The patronymic of Actoride is often applied to Patroclus, because Actor was father to Menœtius. Dictys Cret. 1, &c.—*Homer. PAULUS, Æmilius, a Roman, son of the Æmilius who fell at Cannæ, was celebrated for his victories, and received the surname of Macedonicus from his conquest of Macedonia. In the early part of life he distinguished himself by his uncommon application, and by his fondness for military discipline His first appearance in the field was attended with great success, and the barbarians that had revolted in Spain were reduced with the greatest facility under the power of the Romans. In his first consulship his arms were directed against the Ligurians, whom he totally subjected His applications for a second consulship proved abortive; but when Perseus, the king of Macedonia, had declared war against Rome, the abilities of Paulus were remembered, and he was honoured with the consulship about the sixtieth year of his age. After this appointment he behaved with uncommon vigour, and soon a general engagement was fought near Pydna. The Romans obtained the victory, and Perseus saw himself deserted by all his subjects In two days the conqueror made himself master of all Macedonia, and soon after the fugitive monarch was brought into his presence. Paulus did not insult over his fallen enemy; but when he had gently rebuked him for his temerity in attacking the Romans, he addressed himself in a pathetic speech to the officers of his army who surrounded him, and feelingly enlarged on the instability of fortune, and the vicissitude of all human affairs. When he had finally settled the government of Macedonia with ten commissioners from Rome, and after he had sacked seventy cities of Epirus, and divided the booty amongst his soldiers, Paulus returned to Italy. He was received with the usual acclamations, and though some of the seditious soldiers attempted to prevent his triumphal entry into the Capitol, yet three days were appointed to exhibit the fruits of his victories. Perseus, with his wretched family, adorned the triumph of the conqueror, and as they were dragged through the streets before the chariot of Paulus, they drew tears of compassion from the people. The riches which the Romans derived from this conquest were immense, and the people were freed from all taxes till the consulship of Hirtius and Pansa; but while every one of the citizens received some benefit from the victories of Paulus, the conqueror himself was poor, and appropriated to his own use nothing of the Macedonian treasures except the library of Perseus. In his office of censor, to which he was afterwards elected, Paulus behaved with the greatest moderation, and at his death, which happened about 168 years before the Christian era, not only the Romans, but their very enemies confessed, by their lamentations, the loss which they had sustained. He had married Papiria, by whom he had two sons, one of whom was adopted by the family of Maximus, and the other by that of Scipio Africanus. He had also two daughters, one of whom married a son of Cato, and the other Ælius Tubero. He afterwards divorced Papiria; and when his friends wished to reprobate his conduct in doing so, by observing that she was young and handsome, and that she had made him father of a fine family, Paulus replied, that the shoe which he then wore was new and well made, but that he was obliged to leave it off, though no one but himself, as he said, knew where it pinched him. He married a second wife, by whom he had two sons, whose sudden death exhibited to the Romans, in the most engaging view, their father a philosophy and stoicism. The elder of these sons died five days before Paulus triumphed over Perseus, and the other three days after the public procession. This domestic calamity did not shake the firmness of the conqueror; yet before he retired to a private station, he harangued the people, and in mentioning the severity of fortune upon his family, he expressed his wish that every evil might be averted from the republic by the sacrifice of the domestic prosperity of an individual. Plut. in Vit.—Liv. 45, &c.—*Flor. PAUSANIAS, a Spartan general, who greatly signalized himself at the battle of Platæa against the Persians The Greeks were very sensible of his services, and they rewarded his merit with a tenth of the spoils taken from the Persians. He was afterwards set at the head of the Spartan armies, and extended his conquests in Asia; but the haughtiness of his behaviour created him many enemies, and the Athenians soon obtained a superiority in the affairs of Greece. Pausanias was dissatisfied with his countrymen, and he offered to betray Greece to the Persians, if he received in marriage, as the reward of his perfidy, the daughter of their monarch His intrigues were discovered by means of a youth, who was entrusted with his letters to Persia, and who refused to go, on the recollection that such as had been employed in that office before had never returned. The letters were given to the Ephori of Sparta, and the perfidy of Pausanias laid open. He fled for safety to a temple of Minerva, and as the sanctity of the place screened him from the violence of his pursuers, the sacred building was surrounded with heaps of stones, the first of which was carried there by the indignant mother of the unhappy man. He was starved to death in the temple, and died about 471 years B. C. C. Nep. in Vita.—Plut. in Arist. et Them.——A young man at the court of Philip the father of Alexander. He was shamefully abused by Attalus, one of the friends of Philip, and when he complained of the injuries he had received, the king in some measure disregarded his remonstrances, and wished them to be forgotten. This incensed Pausanias: he resolved to revenge himself, and when he had heard from his master Hermocrates the sophist, that the most effectual way to render himself illustrious, was to murder a person who had signalized himself by uncommon actions, he stabbed Philip as he entered a public theatre. After this bloody action he attempted to make his escape to his chariot, which waited for him at the gate of the city, but he was stopped accidentally by the twig of a vine, and fell down. Attalus, Perdiccas, and other friends of Philip, who pursued him, immediately fell upon him and dispatched him. Some support that Pausanias committed this murder at the instigation of Olympias, the wife of Philip, and of her son Alexander. Justin. 9, 6.——A traveller and geographical writer, whose native country has not been clearly ascertained. He is supposed by some to have been born in Lydia, from a passage in his own work, and to have flourished during the reigns of Adrian and the Antonines. He travelled in Greece, Macedonia, Asia, Egypt, and even in Africa as far as the temple of Jupiter Ammon. After this he appears to have taken up his residence at Rome, and to have there published his Travels through Greece (Ἑλλάδος περιήγησις), in ten books. It is an important work for antiquities and archæology, combining with a description of public edifices, and works of art, the historical records and the legends connected with them. Hence the researches into which this mode of handling the subject has led him, and the discussions on which he enters, serve not only to throw light upon the Grecian mythology, but also to clear up many obscure points of ancient history. Pausanias displays judgment and erudition: occasionally, however, he falls into errors. He describes, moreover, many things too much in the style of a traveller who has not had sufficient leisure to examine every object with attention; and he describes things too, on the supposition that Greece would always remain nearly in the same state in which he himself saw it. In consequence of this, he is satisfied, oftentimes, with merely indicating objects; and, even when he gives an account of them, does it in a manner that is very concise and sometimes actually obscure. In respect of style, Pausanias cannot be cited as a model His own, which is a bad imitation of that of Herodotus, offends frequently by an affectation of conciseness. In the first book of his work Pausanias describes Attica and Megaris; in the second, Corinth, Sicyonia, the territory of Phlius, and Argolis; in the third, Laconia; in the fourth, Messenia; in the fifth and sixth, Elis; in the seventh, Achaia; in the eighth, Arcadia; in the ninth, Bœotia; and in the tenth, Phocis. The best editions of Pausanias are, that of Kühnius, Lips. 1796, fol.; that of Facius, Lips. 1793-7, 4 vols. 8vo.; and that of Siebelis, Lips. 1822-28, 5 vols. 8vo There is an English translation by Taylor, 1793, 2 vols. 8vo.——A grammarian, a native of Cæsarea ad Argæum, in Cappadocia He is often confounded with the preceding.

PAUSIAS, a painter of Sicyon, son of Brietis, and pupil to Pamphilus and Erigmus. He distinguished himself by the delicate manner in which he adorned the palaces and public buildings of Greece by emblematical paintings on their ceilings, and he is mentioned as the first who understood how to apply colours to wood or ivory, by means of fire. He made a beautiful painting of his mistress Glycera, whom he represented as sitting on the ground, and making garlands with flowers, and from this circumstance the picture, which was bought afterwards by Lucullus for two talents, received the name of Stephanoplocen. Some time after the death of Pausias, the Sicyonians were obliged to part with the pictures which they possessed to deliver themselves from an enormous debt, and M. Scaurus, the Roman, bought them all, in which were three of Pausias, to adorn the theatre which had been built during his ædileship. Pausias lived about 350 years B C. Plin. 35, 11.—*Horat. PAUSILYPUS, a celebrated mountain and grotto, near the city of Naples. It took its name from a villa of Vedius Pollio, erected in the time of Augustus, and called Pausilypum, from the effect which its beauty was supposed to produce in suspending sorrow and anxiety (παύειν, λύπην, cessare facturum dolorem). This mountain is said to be beautiful in the extreme, and justly to merit the name bestowed upon it. The grotto is nearly a mile in length, and is made through the mountain, twenty feet in breadth, and thirty in height. On the mountain Vedius Pollio had not only a villa, but also a reservoir or pond, in which he kept a number of lampreys, to which he used to throw such slaves as had committed a fault. When he died, he bequeathed, among other parts of his possessions, his villa to Augustus; but this monarch, abhorring a house where so many ill-fated creatures had lost their lives for very slight faults, caused it to be demolished, and the finest materials in it to be brought to Rome, and with them raised Julia's portico. Virgil's tomb is said to be above the entrance of the grotto of Pausilypo. A vaulted cell and two modern windows above present themselves to view: the poet's name is the only ornament of the place. No sarcophagus, no urn, and even no inscription, serve to feed the devotion of the classical pilgrim. The epitaph, though not genuine, is yet ancient; it was inscribed by order of the Duke of Pescolanciano, the proprietor of the place, on a marble slab placed in the side of the rock opposite to the entrance of the tomb, where it still remains. It is as follows:—

Parthenope Cecini pascua, rura, duces.

An Italian author, supposed to be Pietro de S'effano, assures us that he himself had seen, about the year 1526, the urn supposed to contain the poet's ashes, standing in the middle of the sepulchre, supported by nine little marble pillars, with the inscription just quoted on the frize. He adds that Robert of Anjou, apprehensive lest such a precious relic should be carried off or destroyed during the civil wars, took the urn and pillars from the tomb, and deposited them in the Castel Nuovo. This extreme precaution eventually occasioned the loss which it was meant to prevent: for notwithstanding the most laborious search and frequent enquiries made by the orders of Alphonso of Arragon, they were never more discovered. Some, indeed, have asserted that the tomb just mentioned is not the sepulchre of Virgil. Among these we may reckon Cluverius and Addison. Pan. 8. 53. — *Dio. PAVOR, an emotion of the mind, which received divine honours among the Romans. Tullus Hostilius, the third king of Rome, was the first who built her temples, and raised altars to her honour as also to Pallor, the goddess of Paleness Cic de Nat. D. 3, 17.

PAX, an allegorical divinity among the ancients. The Athenians raised her a statue, which represented her as holding Plutus, the god of wealth, in her lap, to intimate that peace gives rise to prosperity and to opulence, and they were the first who erected an altar to her honour after the victories obtained by Timotheus over the Lacedæmonian power, though Plutarch asserts it had been done after the conquests of Cimon over the Persians. She was represented among the Romans with the horn of plenty, and also carrying an olive branch in her hand. The emperor Vespasian built her a celebrated temple at Rome, which was consumed by fire in the reign of Commodus. It was customary for men of learning to assemble in that temple, and even to deposit their writings there, as in a place of the greatest security. Therefore when it was burnt, not only books, but also many valuable things, jewels, and immense treasures were lost in the general conflagration. C. Nep. in Timoth. 2.— Plut. in Cas.

PEDUM, an ancient town of Latium, often named in the early wars of Rome, and which must be placed in the vicinity of Praneste. The modern site of Zagarolo seems best to answer to the data which are supplied by Livy respecting its position. For, according to this historian, Pedum was situated between Tibur, Praneste, Rola, and Labicum. It was taken by storm, and destroyed by Camillus. Horace mentions the Regio Pedana in one of his epistles. Lib. 8, 11 et 13.— Horat. Ep. 1, 4, 2.

PEGASUS, a winged horse sprung from the blood of Medusa, when Perseus had cut off her head. He received his name from being born, according to Hesiod, near the sources (πγαὶ) of the ocean. As soon as born he left the earth and flew up into heaven, or rather, according to Ovid, he fixed his residence on mount Helicon, where, by striking the ground with his foot, he instantly raised a fountain, which received the name of Hippocrene. He became the favourite of the Muses; and being afterwards tamed by Neptune or Minerva, he was given to Bellerophon to conquer the Chimæra. No sooner was this fiery monster destroyed, than Pegasus threw down his rider, because he was a mortal, or rather, according to the more received opinion, because he attempted to fly to heaven. This act of temerity in Bellerophon was punished by Jupiter, who sent an insect to torment Pegasus, which occasioned the melancholy fall of his rider. Pegasus continued his flight up to heaven, and was placed among the constellations by Jupiter. Perseus, according to Ovid, was mounted on the horse Pegasus, when he destroyed the sea-monster which was going to devour Andromeda. Hesiod Theog. 283.— Horat od. 4, 11, 26.— *Homer. PELASGI, a wandering and vagabond people, originally of the country since called Argolis. Pelasgus, youngest son of Niobe, grandson of Phoroneus, and great-grandson of Inachus, disliking to live a private life, took with him some followers, to whom he gave his own name; with their assistance he took possession of Arcadia: soon after he passed into Thessaly. The Pelasgi were driven from Thessaly about 156 years afterwards by another horde of adventurers, who issued from Argolis, and were headed by another Pelasgus, from whom these new adventurers took likewise the name of Pelasgi. The ancient Pelasgi withdrew into Thesprotia: the new Pelasgi, who had taken the place of the ancient in Thessaly, were driven from thence by Deucalion, about 1541 B. C. Some withdrew to Dodona in Thesprotia, and joined the ancient Pelasgi; from thence they passed into Umbria: others proceeded to Crete and Asia, where they formed some small states, which did not subsist any length of time. They who went to Umbria flourished there about three centuries, when they were driven away by the Tyrrhenians: the greatest part of these Pelasgi fled into Attica, but having been driven from thence in consequence of their overbearing conduct, they passed over to Lemnos and other countries. They remained in possession of that island 652 years, but at last Miltiades forced them to evacuate it, 510 years B. C. The Pelasgi then dispersed into various countries; some were incorporated with other nations, and became totally extinct; others founded in Asia the towns of Scylace and Placia, which were presently conquered by the neighbouring nations; others proceeded to Thrace, and were soon after subdued; in a word, they became extinct every where, and not the slightest trace of them remained. Paus. 8, 1.—Strab. 5.—*Dion. PELASGICUM a name given to the most ancient part of the fortifications of the Acropolis at Athens, from its having been constructed by the Pelasgi, who, in the course of their migrations, settled in Attica, and were employed by the Athenians in the erection of these walls. The rampart raised by this people is often mentioned in the history of Athens, and included also a portion of ground below the wall at the foot of the rock of the Acropolis. This had been allotted to the Pelasgi, whilst they resided at Athens, and on their departure it was forbidden to be inhabited or cultivated. Thucyd. 2, 17.—Herod 2. 51. 6, 137.

PELEUS, a king of Thessaly, son of Æacus and Endeis, the daughter of Chiron. He married Thetis, one of the Nereids, and was the only one among mortals who married an immortal. He was necessary to the death of his brother Phocus, and on that account he was obliged to leave his father's dominions. He retired to the court of Eurytus, the son of Actor, who reigned at Phthia, or according to the less received opinion of Ovid, he fled to Ceyx, king of Trachinia. He was purified of his murder by Eurytus, with the usual ceremonies, and the monarch gave him his daughter Antigone in marriage. Some time after this, Peleus and Eurytus went to the chase of the Calydonian boar, where the father-in-law was accidentally killed by an arrow which his son-in-law had aimed at the beast. This unfortunate event obliged him to banish himself from the court of Phthia, and he retired to Iolchos, where he was purified of the murder of Eurytus, by Acastus the king of the country. His residence at Iolchos was short: Astydamia, the wife of Acastus, became enamoured of him, and when she found him insensible to her passionate declaration, she accused him of attempts upon her virtue. The monarch partially believed the accusations of his wife, but not to violate the laws of hospitality, by putting him instantly to death, he ordered his officers to conduct him to mount Pelion, on pretence of hunting, and there to tie him to a tree, that he might become the prey of the wild beasts of the place. The orders of Acastus were faithfully obeyed, but Jupiter, who knew the innocence of his grandson Peleus, ordered Vulcan to set him at liberty. As soon as he had been delivered from danger, Peleus assembled his friends to punish the ill-treatment which he had received from Acastus. He forcibly took Iolchos, drove the king from his possessions, and put to death the wicked Astydamia. After the death of Antigone, Peleus courted Thetis, of whose superior charms Jupiter himself had been enamoured. His pretensions, however, were rejected, and as he was a mortal, the goddess fled from him with the greatest abhorrence; and the more effectually to evade his enquiries, she generally assumed the shape of a bird, or of a tree, or of a tigress. Peleus became more animated from her refusal; he offered a sacrifice to the gods, and Proteus informed him that, to obtain Thetis, he must surprize her while she was asleep in her grotto near the shores of Thessaly. This advice was immediately followed, and Thetis, unable to escape from the grasp of Peleus, at last consented to marry him. Their nuptials were celebrated with the greatest solemnity, and all the gods attended, and made them each the most valuable presents. The goddess of discord was the only one of the deities who was not present, and she punished this seeming neglect by throwing an apple into the midst of the assembly of the gods, with the inscription "Η καλλίστῃ δότω, "Let the beauty (among you) take (me)." From the marriage of Peleus and Thetis was born Achilles, whose education was early entrusted to the Centaur Chiron, and afterwards to Phœnix, the son of Amyntor. Achilles went to the Trojan war, at the head of his father's troops, and Peleus gloried in having a son who was superior to all the Greeks in valour and intrepidity. The death of Achilles was the source of grief to Peleus; and Thetis, to comfort her husband, promised him immortality, and ordered him to retire into the grottos of the island of Leuce, where he would see and converse with the manes of his son. Peleus had a daughter called Polydora, by Antigone. Hom. Il. 9, 482.—Eurip. in Androm. Catull. de Nupt. Pel et Thet.—*Ovid. PELIADES, daughters of Pelias. Vid. Pelias PELIAS, the twin brother of Neleus, was son of Neptune by Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus. His birth was concealed from the world by his mother, who wished her father to be ignorant of her incontinence. He was exposed in the woods, but his life was preserved by shepherds, and he received the name of Pelias, from a spot of the colour of lead in his face Some time after this adventure, Tyro married Cretheus, son of Æolus, king of Iolchos, and became mother of three children, of whom Æson was the eldest. Meantime Pelias visited his mother, and was received in her family; and after the death of Cretheus, he unjustly seized the kingdom, which belonged to the children of Tyro by the deceased monarch. To strengthen himself in his usurpation, Pelias consulted the oracle, and when he was told to beware of one of the descendants of Æolus, who should come to his court with one foot shod, and the other bare, he privately removed the son of Æson, after he had publicly declared that he was dead. These precautions proved abortive. Jason, the son of Æson, who had been educated by Chiron, returned to Iolchos, when arrived to years of maturity; and as he had lost one of his shoes in crossing the river Anaurus, or the Evenus, Pelias immediately perceived that this was the person whom he was advised so much to dread. His unpopularity prevented him from acting with violence against a stranger, whose uncommon dress, and commanding aspect, had raised admiration in his subjects. But his astonishment was excited when he saw Jason arrive at his palace, with his friends and his relations, and boldly demand the kingdom which he usurped. Pelias was conscious that his complaints were well founded, and therefore, to divert his attention he told him that he would voluntarily resign the crown to him if he went to Colchis to avenge the death of Phryxus, the son of Athamas, whom Æetes had cruelly murdered. He further observed, that the expedition would be attended with the greatest glory, and that nothing but the infirmities of old age had prevented him himself from vindicating the honour of his country, and the injuries of his family, by punishing the assassin This so warmly recommended, was as warmly accepted by the young hero, and his intended expedition was made known all over Greece. [Vid Jason] During the absence of Jason, in the Argonautic expedition, Pelias murdered Æson and all his family, but according to the more received opinion of Ovid, Æson was still living when the Argonauts returned, and he was restored to the vigour of youth by the magic of Medea This sudden change in the vigour and the constitution of Æson, astonished all the inhabitants of Iolchos, and the daughters of Pelias, who had received the patronymic of Peliades, expressed their desire to see their father's infirmities vanish, by the same powerful arts Medea, who wished to avenge the injuries which her husband Jason had received from Pelias, raised the desires of the Peliades, by cutting an old ram to pieces, and boiling the flesh in a cauldron, and afterwards turning it into a fine young lamb After they had seen this successful experiment, the Peliades cut their father's body to pieces, after they had drawn all the blood from his veins, on the assurance that Medea would replenish them by her incantations The limbs were immediately put into a cauldron of boiling water, but Medea suffered the flesh to be totally consumed, and refused to give the Peliades the promised assistance, and the bones of Peliasdid not even receive a burial. The Peliades were four in number, Alceste, Pisidice, Pelopea, and Hippothoe, to whom Hyginus adds Medusa. Their mother's name was Anaxibia, the daughter of Bias, or Philomache, the daughter of Amphion. After this parricide, the Peliades fled to the court of Admetus, where Acastus, the son-in-law of Pelias, pursued them, and took their protector prisoner. The Peliades died, and were buried in Arcadia. Hygin. fab 12, 13, et 14.—Ovid. Met. 7, 3, et 4.—Apollod. 1, 9.—Seneca in Med.—A Trojan chief wounded by Ulysses during the Trojan war. PELIGNI, a people of Italy, south of the Vestini, and east of the Marsi. They were immediately descended from the Samnites, but owed their first origin to the Sabines As they inhabited the high mountains which formed a part of the Apennines, it is probable that they derived their name from the primitive term pal, signifying elevated. They are said to have constructed a temple to Jupiter Pelenus. Their chief town was Corfinium; Sulmo also was within their dominion. Liv. 8, 6, et 29. 9. 41.—Ovid. ex Pont 1, 8, 42. Am. 2, 16, 5. Fast. 3, 93.—Strab. 5.—Horat. Od. 3, 19, 8.

PELION and PELIUS, a range of mountains in Thessaly, along a portion of the eastern coast. Its principal summit rises behind Iolcos and Ormenium. The chain extends from the south-eastern extremity of the lake Bœbeis, where it unites with one of the ramifications of Ossa, to the extreme promontory of Magnesia. Homer alludes to this mountain as the ancient abode of the Centaurs, who were expelled by the Lapithæ It was, however, more especially the haunt of Chiron, whose cave, as Dicæarchus relates, occupied the highest point of the mountain. In a fragment of Dicæarchus, which has been preserved to us, we have a detailed description of Pelion, and its botanical productions, which appear to have been very numerous, both as to forest-trees and plants of various kinds. On the most elevated part of the mountain was a temple dedicated to Jupiter Acteus; to which a troop of the noblest youths of the city of Demetrias ascended every year by appointment of the priest; and such was the cold experienced on the summit, that they wore the thickest woollen fleeces to protect themselves from the inclemency of the weather. It is with propriety therefore that Pindar applies to Pelion the epithet of stormy. Strab. 9.—Herod. 7, 129.—Homer. Il. 2, 744.—Pind Pyth. 2 84 9. 7. Virg G 3, 94.

PELLA, a city of Macedonia, near the top of the Sinus Thermaicus, on the confines of Pmathia It became the capital of the kingdom when Edessa was annihilated, according to Ptolemy, and owed its grandeur to Philip, and to his son Alexander, who was born there, and who was hence styled Pellæus Juvenis by the Roman poets. "It is placed," says Livy, "on a hill sloping to the south-west, and is surrounded by marshes, caused by the inundation of a lake, so deep as to be impassable either in summer or winter. In that part nearest the city a great work has been constructed, rising like an island, and sustaining a fortification, which thus remains uninjured by the water,

At a distance it appears to join the city wall, with which, however, it is only connected by a bridge thrown over the river, that separates the fortress from the town." This river was called Ludias, Ludias, and Lydias. The baths of Pella were said to be injurious to health, producing biliary complaints, as we are informed by the poet Macho. Pella, under the Romans, was made the chief town of the third region of Macedon. Its ruins are yet visible on the spot called Pelatsa, or Al Lila, by the Turks. — Strab 7.—Liv. 44, 46. 45, 29.—Athen. 8, 41.

PELLENE, a city of Achaia, south-west of Sicyon, situate on a lofty and precipitous hill about sixty stadia from the sea. Its name was derived either from the Titan Pallas, or Pellen an Argive, who was son of Phorbas. The Pellenians alone amongst the Achæans assisted the Lacedæmonians in the Peloponnesian war, though afterwards all the other states followed their example. Pellene was famous for its wool, cloaks made of which were given as prizes to the riders at the gymnastic games held there in honour of Mercury. The ruins of Pellene are to be seen not far from Tricala. Paus. 7, 26.—Strab. 8.—Apoll. Argon. 1, 177.—Hom. Il. 2, 574. —Thucyd. 2, 9.—Pind. Olymp. 9, 148.

PELOPEA, or PELOPIA, a daughter of Thyestes, the brother of Atreus. She had a son by her father, who had offered her violence in a wood, without knowing that she was his own daughter. Some suppose that Thyestes purposely committed this incest, as the oracle had informed him that his wrongs would be avenged, and his brother destroyed, by a son who should be born from him and his daughter. This proved too true. Pelopea afterwards married her uncle Atreus, who kindly received in his house his wife's illegitimate child, called Ægysthus, because preserved by goats (αἶγες) when exposed in the mountains. Ægysthus became his uncle's murderer. [Vid Ægysthus.] Hygin. fab 87, &c.—Elian V. H. 12. Ovid. in Ib. 389.—Serv. in Agam.

PELOPEIA, a festival observed by the people of Elis, in honour of Pelops. It was kept in imitation of Hercules, who sacrificed to Pelops in a trench, as it was usual, when the manes and the infernal gods were the objects of worship.

PELOPIDAS, a celebrated general of Thebes, son of Hippoclus. He was descended of an illustrious family, and was remarkable for his immense possessions, which he bestowed with great liberality on the poor and necessitous. Many were the objects of his generosity; but when Epaminondas had refused to accept his presents, Pelopidas disregarded all his wealth, and preferred before it the enjoyment of his friend's conversation and of his poverty. From the friendship and intercourse of these two illustrious citizens, the Thebans derived the most considerable advantages. No sooner had the interest of Sparta prevailed at Thebes, and the friends of liberty and national independence been banished from the city, than Pelopidas, who was in the number of the exiles, resolved to free his country from foreign slavery. His plan was bold and animated, and his deliberations were slow but maturely weighed. Meanwhile Epaminondas, who had been left by the tyrants at Thebes, as being in appearance a worthless and insignificant philosopher, animated the youths of the city, and at last Pelopidas, with eleven of his associates, entered Thebes, and easily massacred the supporters of the tyranny, and freed their country from foreign masters. After this successful enterprize, Pelopidas was unanimously placed at the head of the government; and so confident were the Thebans of his abilities as a general and a magistrate, that they successively re-elected him thirteen times to fill the honourable office of governor of Bœotia. Epaminondas shared with him the sovereign power, and it was to their valour and prudence that the Thebans were indebted for a celebrated victory at the battle of Leuctra. In a war which Thebes carried on against Alexander, tyrant of Pheræ, Pelopidas was appointed commander; but his imprudence, in trusting himself unarmed into the enemy's camp, nearly proved fatal to him. He was taken prisoner, but Epaminondas restored him to liberty. The perfidy of Alexander irritated him, and he was killed bravely fighting in a celebrated battle in which his troops obtained the victory, B. C. 364. He received an honourable burial, the Thebans showed their sense for his merit by their lamentations, they sent a powerful army to revenge his death, by the destruction of the tyrant Pheræ, and his relations, and his children were presented as a homage to the virtues of their father with immense donations by the cities of Thessaly. Pelopidas is admired for his valour, as he never engaged an enemy without obtaining the advantage. The impoverished state of Thebes before his birth, and after his fall, plainly demonstrates the superiority of his genius and of his abilities, and it has been justly observed, that with Pelopidas and Epaminondas the glory and the independence of the Thebans rose and set. *Plut. et C. PELOPONNESIACUM BELLUM, a celebrated war which continued for twenty-seven years between the Athenians and the inhabitants of Peloponnesus with their respective allies. It is the most famous and the most interesting of all the wars which have happened between the inhabitants of Greece; and for the minute and circumstantial description which we have of the events and revolutions which mutual animosity produced, we are indebted more particularly to the correct and authentic writings of Thucydides and of Xenophon. The circumstances which gave birth to this memorable war are these: the power of Athens, under the prudent and vigorous administration of Pericles, was already extended over Greece, and it had procured itself many admirers and more enemies, when the Corcyreans, who had been planted by a Corinthian colony, refused to pay to their founders those marks of respect and reverence which among the Greeks every colony was obliged to show to its mother country. The Corinthians wished to punish that infidelity, and when the people of Epidamnus, a considerable town on the Adriatic, had been invaded by some of the barbarians of Illyricum, the people of Corinth gladly granted to the Epidamnians that assistance which had in vain been solicited from the Corcyreans, their founders and their patrons. The Corcyreans were offended at the interference of Corinth in the affairs of their colony; they manned a fleet, and obtained a victory over the Corinthian vessels which had assisted the Epi-damnians. The subsequent conduct of the Corcyreans, and their insolence to some of the Eleans who had furnished a few ships to the Corinthians, provoked the Peloponnesians, and the discontent became general. Ambassadors were sent by both parties to Athens to claim its protectiom and alliance, and to justify these violent proceedings. The greatest part of the Athenians heard their various reasons with moderation and with compassion, but the enterprizing ambition of Pericles prevailed, and when the Corcyreans had reminded the people of Athens, that in all the states of Peloponnesus they had to dread the most malevolent enemies, and the most insidious of rivals, they were listened to with attention, and were promised support. This step was no sooner taken than the Corinthians appealed to the other Grecian states, and particularly to the Lacedæmonians. Their complaints were accompanied by those of the people of Megara and of Ægina, who bitterly inveighed against the cruelty, injustice, and insolence of the Athenians. This had due weight with the Lacedæmonians, who had long beheld with concern and with jealousy the ambitious power of the Athenians, and they determined to support the cause of the Corinthians. However, before they proceeded to hostilities, an embassy was sent to Athens, to represent the danger of entering into a war with the most powerful and flourishing of all the Grecian states. This alarmed the Athenians, but when Pericles had eloquently spoken of the resources and the actual strength of the republic, and of the weakness of the allies the clamours of his enemies were silenced, and the answer which was returned to the Spartans was conveyed as a declaration of war. The Spartans were supported by all the republics of the Peloponnesus except Argos and part of Achaia, besides the people of Megara, Bœotia, Phocis, Locris, Leucas, Ambracia, and Anactorium. The Plateans, the Lesbians, Carians, Chians, Messenians, Acarnanians, Zacynthians, Corcyreans, Dorians, and Thracians, were the friends of the Athenians, with all the Cyclades, except Rubœa, Samos, Melos, and Thera. The first blow had already been struck, May 7, B. C. 431, by an attempt of the Bœotians to surprise Platæa; and therefore Archidamus king of Sparta, who had in vain recommended moderation to the allies, entered Attica at the head of an army of 60,000 men, and laid waste the country by fire and sword. Pericles, who was at the head of the government, did not attempt to oppose them in the field; but a fleet of a hundred and fifty ships set sail without delay, to ravage the coasts of the Peloponnesus. Megara was also depopulated by an army of 20,000 men, and the campaign of the first year of the war was concluded in celebrating with the most solemn pomp the funerals of such as had nobly fallen in battle. The following year was remarkable for a pestilence which raged in Athens, and which destroyed the greatest part of the inhabitants. The public calamity was still heightened by the approach of the Peloponnesian army on the borders of Attica, and by the unsuccessful expedition of the Athenians against Epidaurus and in Thrace. The pestilence which had carried away so many of the Athenians proved also fatal to Pericles, and he died about two years and six months after the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. The following years did not give rise to decisive events, but the revolt of Lesbos from the alliance of the Athenians tended more powerfully to embitter the invetorate enmity of the rival states. Mitylene, the capital of the island, was recovered, and the inhabitants treated with the greatest cruelty. The island of Corcyra became also the seat of new seditions, and those citizens who had been carried away prisoners by the Corinthians, and for political reasons treated with lenity, and taught to despise the alliance of Athens, were no sooner returned home than they raised commotions, and endeavoured to persuade their countrymen to join the Peloponnesian confederates. This was strongly opposed; but both parties obtained by turns the superiority, and massacred, with the greatest barbarity, all those who obstructed their views. Some time after Demosthenes, the Athenian general, invaded Ætolia, where his arms were attended with the greatest success. He also fortified Pylos in the Peloponnesus, and gained so many advantages over the confederates, that they sued for peace, which the insolence of Athens refused. The fortune of the war soon after changed, and the Lacedæmonians, under the prudent conduct of Brasidas, made themselves masters of many valuable places in Thrace. But this victorious progress was soon stopped by the death of their general, and that of Cleon, the Athenian commander; and the pacific disposition of Nicias, who was now at the head of Athens, made overtures for peace and universal tranquillity. Plistoanax, the king of the Spartans, wished them to be accepted; but the intrigues of the Corinthians prevented the discontinuation of the war, and therefore hostilities began anew. But while war was carried on with various success in different parts of Greece, the Athenians engaged in a new expedition, they yielded to the persuasive eloquence of Gorgias of Leontium, and to the ambitious views of Alcibiades, and sent a fleet of twenty ships to assist the Sicilian states against the tyrannical power of Syracuse, B. C. 416. This was warmly opposed by Nicias; but the eloquence of Alcibiades prevailed, and a powerful fleet was sent against the capital of Sicily. These vigorous though impolitic measures of the Athenians, were not viewed with indifference by the confederates. Syracuse, in her distress, implored the assistance of Corinth, and Gylippus was sent to direct her operations, and to defend her against the power of her enemies. The events of battles were dubious, and though the Athenian army was animated by the cool prudence and intrepid valour of Nicias, and the more impetuous courage of Demosthenes, yet the good fortune of Syracuse prevailed; and after a campaign of two years of bloodshed, the fleets of Athens were totally ruined, and the few soldiers that survived the destructive siege, made prisoners of war. So fatal a blow threw the people of Attica into consternation and despair, and while they sought for resources at home, they severely felt themselves deprived of support abroad. Their allies were alienated by the intrigues of the enemy, and rebellion was fomented in their dependent states and colonies on the Asiatic coast. The threatened ruin, however, was timely averted, and Alcibiades, who had been treated with cruelty by his countrymen, and who had for some time resided in

Sparta, and directed her military operations, now exerted himself to defeat the designs of the confederates, by inducing the Persians to espouse the cause of his country. But, a short time after, the internal tranquillity of Athens was disturbed, and Alcibiades, by wishing to abolish the democracy, called away the attention of his fellow-citizens from the prosecution of a war which had already cost them so much blood. This, however, was but momentary; the Athenians soon after obtained a naval victory, and the Peloponnesian fleet was defeated by Alcibiades. The Athenians beheld with rapture the success of their arms; but when their fleet, in the absence of Alcibiades had been defeated and destroyed near Andros, by Lysander, the Lacedæmonian admiral, they showed their discontent and mortification by eagerly listening to the accusations which were brought against their naval leader, to whom they gratefully had acknowledged themselves indebted for their former victories. In the violence of popular frenzy Alcibiades was disgraced in the public assembly, and ten commanders were appointed to succeed him in the management of the republic. This change of admirals, and the appointment of Callicratidas, to succeed Lysander, whose office had expired with the revolving year, produced new operations. The Athenians fitted out a fleet, and the two nations decided their superiority near Arginusæ, in a naval battle. Callicratidas was killed and the Lacedæmonians conquered, but the rejoicings which the intelligence of this victory occasioned were soon stopped, when it was known that the wrecks of some of the disabled ships of the Athenians, and the bodies of the slain had not been saved from the sea. The admirals were accused in the tumultuous assembly, and immediately condemned. Their successors in office were not so prudent, but they were more unfortunate in their operations. Lysander was again placed at the head of the Peloponnesian forces, instead of Eteonicus, who had succeeded to the command on the death of Callicratidas. The age and the experience of this general seemed to promise something decisive, and indeed an opportunity was not long wanting for the display of his military character. The superiority of the Athenian fleet over the Peloponnesian, rendered the former insolent, proud, and negligent and when they had imprudently forsaken their ships to indulge their indolence, or pursue their amusements on the sea-shore at Ægospotamos, Lysander attacked their fleet, and his victory was complete. Of one hundred and eighty sail, only nine escaped, eight of which fled under the command of Conon, to the island of Cyprus, and the other carried to Athens the melancholy news of the defeat. The Athenian prisoners were all massacred; and when the Peloponnesian conquerors had extended their dominion over the states and communities of Europe and Asia, which formerly acknowledged the power of Athens, they returned home to finish the war by the reduction of the capital of Attica. The siege was carried on with vigour, and supported with firmness, and the first Athenian who mentioned capitulation to his countrymen, was instantly sacrificed to the fury and the indignation of the populace, and all the citizens unanimously declared, that the same moment would terminate their independence and their lives. This animated language, however, was not long continued, the spirit of faction was not yet extinguished at Athens; and it proved, perhaps, more destructive to the public liberty, than the operations and assaults of the Peloponnesian besiegers. During four months, negociations were carried on with the Spartans by the aristocratical part of the Athenians, and at last it was agreed that to establish the peace, the fortifications of the Athenian harbours must be demolished, together with the long walls which joined them to the city; all their ships except twelve were to be surrendered to the enemy; they were to resign every pretension to their ancient dominions abroad; to recall from banishment all the members of the late aristocracy; to follow the Spartans in war, and, in the time of peace, to frame their constitution according to the will and the directions of their Peloponnesian conquerors. The humiliating terms were accepted, and the enemy entered the harbour, and took possession of the city, that very day on which the Athenians had been accustomed to celebrate the anniversary of the immortal victory which their ancestors had obtained over the Persians about seventy six years before, near the island of Salamis. The walls and fortifications were instantly levelled with the ground, and the conquerors observed, that in the demolition of Athens succeed ng ages would fix the era of Grecian freedom. The day was concluded with a festival, and the recitation of one of the tragedies of Euripides, in which the misfortunes of the daughter of Agamemnon, who was reduced to misery, and banished from her father's kingdom, excited a kindred sympathy in the bosoms of the audience, who melted into tears at the recollection that one moment had likewise reduced to misery and servitude the capital of Attica, which in happier times was deservedly called the common patroness of Greece, and the scourge of Persia. This memorable event happened about 404 years before the Christian era, and thirty tyrants were appointed by Lysander over the government of the city. *Xen. Græc. Hist.—Plut. in Lys. Per. Alcib. PELOPONNESUS, a celebrated peninsula, which comprehends the most southern part of Greece. It was called Peloponnesus from πέλοψ νῆσος, the island of Pelops. It was most anciently called Ægialeus from Ægialeus, Apia from Apis, Pelasgia from the Pelasgi; but took the name of Peloponnesus from Pelops, the son of Tantalus, who reigned there. Its shape resembles the leaf of a plane tree, being indented by numerous bays on all sides; and it has probably derived its modern name Morea, from its resemblance also to the young mulberry leaf. It is bounded on the north by the Corinthian gulf, on the west by the Ionian sea on the south by the Cretan sea, and on the east by the Myrtoan sea. Its greatest breadth and length are the same, being about 120 miles, and it contains nearly 6480 square miles, or 1120 less than Sicily. The isthmus, now called the Isthmus of Corinth, which separates it from the main land, is only four geographical, or six modern Greek miles broad, owing to which last circumstance it has obtained its modern name of Bezambon, a navigable canal was attempted to be cut across it by king Demetrius, Julius Cæsar, Caligula, Nero, and others, but always without success.

The Peloponnesus, like the rest of Greece, was originally inhabited by the Leleges, Caucones, and Pelasgi, all of whom, with the exception of the Arcadians, became gradually intermixed with the colonies, which at various times invaded the peninsula. It was said to have been left by Hercules on his death to the Heraclidæ, who made several attempts to gain possession of it, during one of which Hyllus was killed by Echemus, king of Arcadia, they at length, with the assistance of some Dorians, succeeded, and shared the peninsula among them, about eighty years after the destruction of Troy. The Peloponnesus was divided into six provinces, viz., Achaia, Elis, Arcadia, Argolis, Laconia, and Messenia. Homer Il. 1, 270 3, 49 — *Æschyl. PELOPEA MŒNIA, is applied to the cities of Greece, but more particularly to Mycenæ and Argos, where the descendants of Pelops reigned. Ling Æn. 2, 193

PELOPS, a celebrated prince, son of Tantalus, king of Phrygia. His mother's name was Euryanassa, or, according to others, Eurystone, or Euryatemista, or Dione. He was murdered by his father, who wished to try the divinity of the gods who had visited Phrygia, by placing on their table the limbs of his son. The gods perceived his perfidious cruelty, and they refused to touch the meat, except Ceres, whom the recent loss of her daughter had rendered melancholy and inattentive. She ate one of the shoulders of Pelops, and therefore when Jupiter had had compassion on his fate, and restored him to life, he placed a shoulder of ivory instead of that which Ceres had devoured. This shoulder had an uncommon power, and it could heal by its very touch every complaint, and remove every disorder. Some time after, the kingdom of Tantalus was invaded by Tros, king of Troy, on pretence that he had carried away his son Ganymedes. This rape had been committed by Jupiter himself; the war, nevertheless, was carried on, and Tantalus, defeated and ruined, was obliged to fly with his son Pelops, and to seek a shelter in Greece. This tradition is confuted by some who support, that Tantalus did not fly into Greece, as he had been sometime before confined by Jupiter in the infernal regions for his impiety, and therefore Pelops was the only one whom the enmity of Tros persecuted. Pelops came to Pisa, where he became one of the suitors of Hippodamia, the daughter of king Œnomaus, and he entered the lists against the father, who promised his daughter only to him, who could outrun him in a chariot-race. Pelops was not terrified at the fate of the thirteen lovers, who before him had entered the course against Œnomaus, and had, according to the conditions proposed, been put to death when conquered. He previously bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus and therefore he easily obtained the victory. [Id. Œnomaus.] He married Hippodamia, and threw Myrtilus, headlong into the sea when he claimed the reward of his perfidy. According to some authors, Pelops had received some winged horses from Neptune, with which he was enabled to outrun Œnomaus. When he had established himself on the throne of Pisa, Hippodamia's possession, he extended his conquests over the neighbouring countries, and from him the peninsula, of which he was one of the monarchs, received the name of Peloponnesus. Pelops, after death, received divine honours, and he was as much revered above all the other heroes of Greece, as Jupiter was above the rest of the gods. He had a temple at Olympia, near that of Jupiter, where Hercules consecrated to him a small portion of land, and offered to him a sacrifice. The place where this sacrifice had been offered was religiously observed, and the magistrates of the country yearly, on coming upon office, made there an offering of a black ram. During the sacrifice, the soothsayer was not allowed, as at other times, to have a share of the victim; but he alone, who furnished the wood, was permitted to take the neck. The wood for sacrifices, as may be observed, was always furnished by some of the priests, to all such as offered victims, and they received a price, equivalent to what they gave. The white poplar was generally used in the sacrifices made to Jupiter and to Pelops. The children of Pelops by Hippodamia were Pitheus, Trœzen, Atreus, Thyestes, &c., besides some by concubines. The time of his death is unknown, though it is universally agreed, that he survived Hippodamia for some time. Some suppose that the Palladium of the Trojans was made with the bones of Pelops. His descendants were called Pelopidæ. Pindar, who, in his first Olympic, speaks of Pelops, confutes the traditions of his ivory shoulder, and says that Neptune took him up to heaven to become the cup-bearer to the gods, from which he was expelled, when the impiety of Tantalus wished to make mankind partake of the nectar and the entertainments of the gods. Some suppose that Pelops first instituted the Olympic games in honour of Jupiter, and to commemorate the victory which he had obtained over Œnomaus. Paus 5, 1, &c. Apollod 2, 5. — Eurip in Iphig. — Mela 1, 18. *Virg. PELORIA, a festival observed by the Thessalians, in commemoration of the news which they received by one Pelorus, that the mountains of Tempe had been separated by an earthquake, and that the waters of the lake which lay there stagnated, had found a passage into the Alpheus, and left behind a vast, pleasant, and most delightful plain, &c.

PELORIAS (promontorium), now Cape Faro, one of the three great promontories of Sicily. It lies near the coast of Italy, and received its name from Pelorus, the pilot of the ship which carried Annibal away from Italy, or, according to another account, from Carthage to Syria. This celebrated general, as it is reported, was carried by the tides into the straits of Charybdis, and as he was ignorant of the coast, and perceived no passage through, for, in consequence of the route which the vessel was pursuing, the promontories on either side seemed to join, he suspected the pilot of an intention to deliver him into the hands of the Romans, and killed him on the spot. He was soon, however, convinced of his error, and to atone for his rashness, and pay honour to his pilot's memory, he gave him a magnificent funeral, and called the promontory on the Sicilian shore after his name, having erected on it a tomb with a statue of Pelorus. Val Max. 9, 8. — Mela, 2, 7.— Strab. 6 — Virg Æn. 3, 411, et 687. — Ovid Met 5, 350 13, 727. 15, 706.

PELTÆ, a town of Phrygia, south-west of Ipsus, and not far from the river Obrimas, which is a tributary of the Mæander. Xenophon describes it as a well inhabited town, and states that the army of Cyrus remained there three days, during which games and sacrifices were performed. Pliny says, that in his time Pelta was under the jurisdiction of Apamea. Xen. Anab. 1, 2.—Plin. 5, 29.

PELUSIUM, a city of Egypt, at the entrance of the Pelusiac mouth of the Nile, and about twenty stadia from the sea. It derived its name from the Greek word πηλὸς lutum, inasmuch as it lay in the midst of lakes and marshes, and hence in the Bible it is called Sin, a word denoting its miry situation; but the Greeks asserted that it was so called after Peleus, the father of Achilles, who fled hither and purified himself of his transgressions in the neighbouring pools. It was an exceedingly strong, and a well garrisoned city, being reckoned the key of Egypt on this side; but owing to the waters of that arm of the Nile on which it stood, finding their way into the Damiatta branch of the river, Pelusium lost all its importance, and is now merely a heap of rubbish near Tineh. Mela 2, 9.—Colum. 5, 10. *Nat. PENATES, certain inferior deities among the Romans, who presided over houses and the domestic affairs of families. They were called Penates, because they were generally placed in the innermost and most secret parts of the house, in penitissima ædium parte, quod as Cicero says, penitus tendent. The place where they stood was afterwards called penetrale, and they themselves received the name of Penetrales. It was in the option of every master of a family to choose his Penates, and therefore Jupiter, and some of the superior gods, are often invoked as patrons of domestic affairs. According to some, the gods Penates were divided into four classes; the first comprehended all the celestial, the second the sea gods, the third the gods of hell, and the last all such heroes as had received divine honours after death. The Penates were originally the manes of the dead, but when superstition had taught mankind to pay more than common reverence to the statues and images of their deceased friends, their attention was soon exchanged for regular worship, and they were admitted by their votaries to share immortality and power over the world, with a Jupiter or a Minerva. The statues of the Penates were generally made with wax ivory, silver, or earth, according to the taste or affluence of the worshipper, and the only offerings they received were wine, incense, fruits, and sometimes the sacrifice of lambs, sheep goats &c. In the early ages of Rome, human sacrifices were offered to them; but Brutus, who expelled the Tarquins abolished this unnatural custom. When offerings were made to them, their statues were crowned with garlands poppies, or garlic, and besides the monthly day that was set apart for their worship their festivals were celebrated during the Saturnalia. Some have confounded the Lares and the Penates, but they were different. The Penates were of divine origin, the Lares of human. Certain persons were admitted to the worship of the Lares, who were not to that of the Penates. The Penates were worshipped only in the innermost parts of the house, the Lares also in the public roads, in the camp and on sea. Dic. de Nat D. 2, 27. Varr. 2. Dionys. 1.

PENELUS, one of the Greeks killed in the Trojan war. Homer. Il 2, 494.

PENELOPE, a celebrated princess of Greece, daughter of Icarius, and wife of Ulysses, king of Ithaca. Her marriage with Ulysses was celebrated about the same time that Menelaus married Helen, and she retired with her husband to Ithaca, against the inclination of her father, who wished to detain her at Sparta, her native country. She soon after became mother of Telemachus, and was obliged to part with great reluctance from her husband, whom the Greeks obliged to go to the Trojan war. [Vid Palamedes.] The continuation of hostilities for ten years rendered her sad and melancholy; but when Ulysses did not return like the other princes of Greece at the conclusion of the war, her fears and her anxieties were increased. As she received no intelligence of his situation, she was soon beset by a number of importuning suitors, who wished her to believe that her husband was shipwrecked, and that therefore she ought not longer to expect his return, but forget his loss and fix her choice and affections on one of her numerous admirers. She received their addresses with coldness and disdain, but as she was destitute of power, and a prisoner as it were in their hands, she yet flattered them with hopes and promises and declared that she would make choice of one of them, as soon as she had finished a piece of tapestry, on which she was employed. The work was done in a dilatory manner, and she baffled their eager expectations, by undoing in the night what she had done in the day time. This artifice of Penelope has given rise to the proverb of Penelope's web, which is applied to whatever labour can never be ended. The return of Ulysses, after an absence of twenty years, however, delivered her from her fears and from her importunate suitors. Penelope is described by Homer as a model of female virtue and chastity, but some more modern writers dispute her claims to modesty and continence. After the return of Ulysses Penelope had a daughter, who was called Ptolliporthe; but if we believe the traditions that were long preserved at Mantinea, Ulysses repudiated his wife for her incontinence during his absence, and Penelope fled to Sparta, and afterwards to Mantinea, where she died and was buried. After the death of Ulysses, according to Hyginus, she married Telegonus her husband's son by Circe, by order of the goddess Minerva. Some say that her original name was Arnea or Amirace, and that she was called Penelope, when some river-birds called Penelopes had saved her from the waves of the sea, when her father had exposed her. Icarius had attempted to destroy her, because the oracles had told him that his daughter by Peribœa would be the most dissolute of her sex, and a disgrace to his family. Apollod. 3, 10.—Paus. 3, 12.—Homer Il et Od.—Ovid Heroid. 1.—Met.—*Aristot. PENEUS a river of Thessaly, rising on mount Pindus, and falling into the Thermæan gulf, after a wandering course between mount Ossa and Olympus, through the vale of Tempe. It received its name from Peneus, a son of Oceanus and Tethys. The Peneus anciently inundated the plains of Thessaly, till an earthquake separated the mountains Ossa and Olympus, and formed the beautiful vale of Tempe. From this circumstance, therefore, it obtained the name of ARAXES, ab ἀράσσω, scindo. Daphne, the daughter of the Peneus, according to the fables of the mythologists, was changed into a laurel on the banks of this river. This tradition arises from the quantity of laurels which grow near the Peneus. The Peneus is called Salambria by Tzetzes, and Salabria and Salampria by some of the Byzantine historians; which name appears to be derived from σαλάσσω, "an outlet," and was applicable to it more particularly at the vale of Tempe where it has forced a passage through the rocks of Ossa and Olympus. *Ovid. PENNINÆ ALPES, a part of the chain of the Alps, extending from the Great St Bernard to the source of the Rhone and Rhine. The name is derived from the Celtic Penn, a summit. Vid Alpes.

PENTAPOLIS, a town of India, placed by Mannert in the north-eastern angle of the Sinus Gangeticus, or Bay of Bengal. — A name given to Cyrenaica in Africa, from its five cities, Cyrene, Arsinoe, Berenice, Ptolemais or Barce, and Apollonia. — A part of Palestine, containing the five cities of Gaza, Gath, Ascalon, Azotus, and Ekron. — Also a name applied to Doris in Asia Minor, after Halicarnassus had been excluded from the Doric confederacy. Vid Doris.

PENTELICUS, a mountain of Attica, where were found quarries of beautiful marble. "Pentelicus," says Dodwell, "is separated from the northern foot of Hymettus, which in the narrowest part is about three miles broad. It shoots up into a pointed summit, but the outline is beautifully varied, and the greater part is either mantled with woods, or variegated with shrubs. Several villages and some monasteries and churches are seen near its base." The same traveller gives a very interesting account of the quarries of Pentelicus, which he visited, and examined with attention. Strab. 9. — Paus. 1, 32.

PENTHESILEA, a queen of the Amazons, daughter of Mars, by Otrera, or Orithya. She came to assist Priam in the last years of the Trojan war, and fought against Achilles, by whom she was slain. The hero was so struck with the beauty of Penthesilea, when he stripped her of her arms, that he even shed tears for having too violently sacrificed her to his fury. Thersites laughed at the partiality of the hero, for which ridicule he was instantly killed. Lycophron says, that Achilles slew Thersites because he had put out the eyes of Penthesilea when she was yet alive. The scholiast of Lycophron differs from that opinion, and declares that it was commonly believed, that Achilles offered violence to the body of Penthesilea when she was dead, and that Thersites was killed because he had reproached the hero for this infamous action, in the presence of all the Greeks. The death of Thersites so offended Diomedes that he dragged the body of Penthesilea out of the camp, and threw it into the Scamander. It is generally supposed, that Achilles was enamoured of the Amazon before he fought with her, and that she had by him a son called Cayster. According to Hellen and Ptolemæus, Penthesilea conquered and killed Achilles, whom Thetis restored to life for a few moments that he might revenge his fall by the death of the victorious Amazon. Dictys Cret 3 et 4. — Paus. 10, 31. — *Q. PENTHEUS, son of Echion and Agave, was king of Thebes in Bœotia. His refusal to acknowledge the divinity of Bacchus was attended with the most fatal consequences. He forbade his subjects to pay adoration to this new god; and when the Theban women had gone out of the city to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus, Pentheus, apprized of the debauchery which attended the solemnity, ordered the god himself, who conducted the religious multitude, to be seized. His orders were obeyed with reluctance, but when the doors of the prison in which Bacchus had been confined, opened of their own accord, Pentheus became more irritated, and commanded his soldiers to destroy the whole band of the bacchanals. This, however, was not executed, for Bacchus inspired the monarch with the ardent desire of seeing the celebration of the orgies. Accordingly, he hid himself in a wood on mount Cithæron, from whence he could see all the ceremonies unperceived. But here his curiosity soon proved fatal, he was deserted by the bacchanals, and they all rushed upon him. His mother was the first who attacked him, and her example was instantly followed by her two sisters, Ino and Autonoe, and his body was torn to pieces. Euripides introduces Bacchus among his priestesses, when Pentheus was put to death, but Ovid, who relates the whole in the same manner, differs from the Greek poet only in saying, that not Bacchus himself, but one of his priests, was present. The tree on which the bacchanals found Pentheus, was cut down by the Corinthians, by order of the oracle, and with it two statues of the god of wine were made and placed in the forum. Hygin fab 184. — Theocrit 26. — Ovid, Met. 3, fab 7, 8, et 9. — *Virg. PENTHILUS, a prince of Paphos, who assisted Xerxes with twelve ships. He was seized by the Greeks, to whom he communicated many important things concerning the situation of the Persians, &c. Herod. 7, 195.

PEPARETHOS, now Piperi, a small island in the Ægean sea, off the coast of Thessaly, and in a north-eastern direction from Eubœa. It is nine miles in circuit. It anciently bore the name Evanus, and was first colonized by the Cretans. It produced good wine and oil. Plin. 4, 12. — Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 32. — Ovid. Met. 7, 470. — Liv. 28, 5.

PEPHNOS, a town of Laconia near a small island of the same name, where Castor and Pollux were born, and where they had two small statues which are stated to have remained immoveable though continually beaten by the waves. The town and islet are now called Pelano. Paus 3, 26.

PERÆA, a name given by the Greeks to that part of Judæa which lay east of Jordan from its egress out of the lake of Gennesareth to its entrance into the Dead Sea, and still lower down as far as the river Arnon. The term is derived from ὑπερ, beyond. Plin 5, 14. — A part of Caria, opposite to Rhodes. Liv. 32, 33. — A colony of the Mityleneans in Æolia. Liv. 37, 21.

PERCŌTE, a town on the Hellespont, between Abydos and Lampsacus, near the seashore. Artaxerxes gave it to Themistocles, to maintain his wardrobe. Herod. 1, 117.—Apoll Rhod. 1, 932.

PERDICCAS, the fourth king of Macedonia, B C 729, was descended from Temenus. He increased his dominions by conquest, and in the latter part of his life, he showed his son Argeus where he wished to be buried, and told him that as long as the bones of his descendants and successors on the throne of Macedonia were laid in the same grave, so long would the crown remain in their family. These injunctions were observed till the time of Alexander, who was buried out of Macedonia. Herod 7 et 8.—Justin 7, 2.——Another, king of Macedonia, son of Alexander. He reigned during the Peloponnesian war, and assisted the Lacedæmonians against Athens. He behaved with great courage on the throne, and died B C 413, after a long reign of glory and independence, during which he had subdued some of his barbarian neighbours.——Another, king of Macedonia, who was supported on his throne by Iphicrates the Athenian, against the intrusions of Pausanias. He was killed in a war against the Illyrians, B C 369. Justin 7, &c.——One of the friends and favourites of Alexander the Great. At the king's death he wished to make himself absolute; and the ring which he had received from the hand of the dying Alexander, seemed in some measure to favour his pretensions. The better to support his claims to the throne, he married Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander, and strengthened himself by making a league with Eumenes. His ambitious views were easily discovered by Antigonus, and the rest of the generals of Alexander, who all wished, like Perdiccas, to succeed to the kingdom and honours of the deceased monarch. Antipater, Craterus, and Ptolemy, leagued with Antigonus against him, and after much bloodshed on both sides, Perdiccas was totally ruined, and at last assassinated in his tent in Egypt, by his own officers, about 321 years before the Christian era. Perdiccas had not the prudence and the address which were necessary to conciliate the esteem, and gain the attachment of his fellow-soldiers, and this impropriety of his conduct alienated the heart of his friends, and at last proved his destruction. Plut. in Alex.—C. Nep. Eum.—Ælian. V. H. 12.

PERDIX, a young Athenian, son of the sister of Dædalus. He invented the saw, and seemed to promise to become a greater artist than had ever been known. His uncle was jealous of his rising fame, and he threw him down from the top of a tower and put him to death. Perdix was changed into a bird which bears his name. Hygin. fab. 39 et 274.—Apollod. 3, 15.—Ovid. Met 8, 236, &c.

PERENNA. Vid. Anna.

PERENNIS, a favourite of the emperor Commodus. He is described by some as a virtuous and impartial magistrate, while others paint him as a cruel, violent, and oppressive tyrant, who committed the greatest barbarities to enrich himself. He was put to death for aspiring to the empire. Herodian.

PERGA, a city of Pamphylia, on the river Cestrus, at a distance of sixty stadia from its mouth. Here St Paul landed on his voyage from Paphos. At a later period it appears as the metropolis of the second Pamphylia. Upon a neighbouring mountain was a very famous temple of Diana, surnamed Pergæa, from the name of the city, and it appears that Bacchus was also worshipped at Perga. Strab. 14.—Callim Hymn. in Dian. 187.—Acts 13, 13.

PERGAMUS, (Pergama, plur.) the citadel of the city of Troy. The word is often used for Troy by the poets. [Vid. Troja.] The root of this word appears to be analogous to the Teutonic burg, "a fortified place." Compare the French bourg, the English burgh, the Danish and Swedish borg, and the Italian borgo.

PERGAMUS, now Bergamo, a town of Mysia on the banks of the Caicus. It was the capital of a celebrated empire called the kingdom of Pergamus, which was founded by Philetærus, a eunuch, whom Lysimachus, after the battle of Ipsus, had entrusted with the treasures which he had obtained in the war. Philetærus made himself master of the treasures and of Pergamus in which they were deposited, B. C. 283, and laid the foundation of an empire, over which he himself presided for twenty years. His successors began to reign in the following order: his nephew Eumenes ascended the throne 263 B C.; Attalus, 241; Eumenes the second, 197; Attalus Philadelphus 159; Attalus Philometor, 138, who B. C 133, left the Roman people heirs to his kingdom, as he had no children. The right of the Romans, however, was disputed by an usurper, who claimed the empire as his own, and Aquilius, the Roman general, was obliged to conquer the different cities one by one, and to gain their submission by poisoning the waters which were conveyed to their houses, till the whole was reduced into the form of a dependent province. The capital of the kingdom of Pergamus was famous for a library of 200 000 volumes, which had been collected by the different monarchs who had reigned there. This noble collection was afterwards transported to Egypt by Cleopatra, with the permission of Antony, and it adorned and enriched the Alexandrian library, till it was most fatally destroyed by the Saracens, A D 642. Parchment was first invented and made use of at Pergamus to transcribe books, as Ptolemy, king of Egypt, had forbidden the exportation of papyrus from his kingdom, in order to prevent Eumenes from making a library as valuable and as choice as that of Alexandria. From this circumstance parchment has been called charta pergamena. Galenus the physician, and Apollodorus the mythologist, were born there. Æsculapius was the chief deity of the country. Pius. 5 et 13.—Ital. 6, 11.—Strab 13.—Liv 29, 11, 21, 46.—Plin. 10, 21. 13, 11.——A son of Neoptolemus and Andromache, who, as some suppose, retired from Epirus when his brother Molossus ascended the throne, and went into Asia, where he founded Pergamus. Paus. 1, 11.

PERGE. Vid Perga.

PERGUS, a lake of Sicily, near Enna, where Proserpine was carried away by Pluto. Ovid. Met 5, 386.

PERIANDER, a tyrant of Corinth, son of Cypselus. The first years of his government were mild and popular, but he soon learned to become oppressive, when he had consulted the tyrant of Sicily, about the surest way of reigning. He received no other answer but whatever explanation he wished to place on the Sicilian tyrant's having, in the presence of his messenger, plucked in a field all the ears of corn which seemed to tower above the rest. Periander understood the meaning of this answer. He immediately surrounded himself with a numerous guard, and put to death the richest and most powerful citizens of Corinth. He was not only cruel to his subjects, but his family also were objects of his vengeance. He committed incest with his mother, and put to death his wife Melissa, upon false accusation. He also banished his son Lycophron to the island of Corcyra, because the youth pitied the miserable end of his mother, and detested the barbarities of his father. Periander died about 585 years before the Christian era, and by the meanness of his flatterers, he was reckoned one of the seven wise men of Greece. Though he was tyrannical, yet he patronized the fine arts; he was fond of peace, and he showed himself the friend and the protector of genius and of learning. He used to say, that a man ought solemnly to keep his word, but not to hesitate to break it if ever it clashed with his interest. He said also, that not only crimes ought to be punished, but also every wicked and corrupted thought. Diog. in Vita.—Arist. Polit. 5.——A tyrant of Ambracia, whom some rank with the seven wise men of Greece, and not the tyrant of Corinth.

PERIBŒA, the second wife of Œneus, king of Calydon was daughter of Hipponous. She became mother of Tydeus. Some suppose that Œneus debauched her, and afterwards married her. Hygin fab 69.——A daughter of Alcathus, sold by her father upon suspicion that she courted by Telamon son of Æacus, king of Ægina. She was carried to Cyprus, where Telamon the founder of Salamis married her, and she became mother of Ajax. She also married Theseus, according to some. She is also called Eribœa. Paus 1, 17 et 42.—Hygin. 97.——The wife of Polybus, king of Corinth, who educated Œdipus as her own child.——A daughter of Eurymedon, who became mother of Nausithous by Neptune.——The mother of Penelope, according to some authors.

PERICLES, an Athenian of a noble family, son of Xanthippus and Agariste. He was naturally endowed with great powers, which he improved by attending the lectures of Damon, Zeno, and of Anaxagoras. Under these celebrated masters he became a commander, a statesman, and an orator, and gained the affections of the people by his uncommon address and well-directed liberality. When he took a share in the administration of public affairs, he rendered himself popular by opposing Cimon, who was the favourite of the nobility, and to remove every obstacle which stood in the way of his ambition, he lessened the dignity and the power of the court of Areopagus, whom the people had been taught for ages to respect and to venerate. He also attacked Cimon, and caused him to be banished by the ostracism. Thucydides also, who had succeeded Cimon on his banishment, shared the same fate, and Pericles remained for fifteen years the sole minister, and, as it may be said, the absolute sovereign of a republic which always showed itself so jealous of its liberties, and which distrusted so much the honesty of her magistrates. In his ministerial capacity, Pericles did not enrich himself, but the prosperity of Athens was the object of his administration. He made war against the Lacedæmonians, and restored the temple of Delphi to the care of the Phocians, who had been illegally deprived of that honourable trust. He obtained a victory over the Sicyonians near Nemæa, and waged a successful war against the inhabitants of Samos at the request of his favourite mistress Aspasia. The Peloponnesian war was fomented by his ambitious views, [Vid. Peloponnesiacum bellum,] and when he had warmly represented the flourishing state, the opulence, and actual power of his country, the Athenians did not hesitate a moment to undertake a war against the most powerful republics of Greece a war which continued for twenty seven years, and which was concluded by the destruction of their empire, and the demolition of their walls. The arms of the Athenians were for some time crowned with success; but an unfortunate expedition raised clamours against Pericles, and the enraged populace attributed all their losses to him, and to make atonement for their ill success, they condemned him to pay fifty talents. This loss of popular favour by republican caprice, did not so much affect Pericles as the recent death of all his children; and when the tide of unpopularity was passed by, he condescended to come into the public assembly, and to view with secret pride the contrition of his fellow-citizens, who universally begged his forgiveness for the violence which they had offered to his ministerial character. He was again restored to all his honours, and, if possible, invested with more power and more authority than before; but the dreadful pestilence which had diminished the number of his family, proved fatal to him, and about 429 years before Christ, in his seventieth year, he fell a sacrifice to that terrible malady, which robbed Athens of so many of her citizens. Pericles was for forty years at the head of the administration, twenty five years with others, and fifteen alone; and the flourishing state of the empire during his government gave occasion to the Athenians publicly to lament his loss, and venerate his memory. As he was expiring, and seemingly senseless, his friends that stood around his bed expatiated with warmth on the most glorious actions of his life, and the victories which he had won, when he suddenly interrupted their tears and conversation by saying that in mentioning the exploits that he had achieved, and which were common to him with all generals, they had forgot to mention a circumstance which reflected far greater glory upon him as a minister, a general, and above all, as a man. It is, says he, that not a citizen in Athens has been obliged to put on mourning on my account. The Athenians were so pleased with his eloquence that they compared it to thunder and lightning, and, as to another father of the gods, they gave him the surname of Olympian. The poets, his flatterers, said that the goddess of persuasion, with all her charms, and her attraction, dwelt upon his tongue. When he marched at the head of the Athenian armies, Pericles observed that he had the command of a free nation that were Greeks and citizens of Athens. He also declared, that not only the hand of a magistrate, but also his eyes and his tongue should be pure and undefiled. Yet great and venerable as his character may appear, we must not forget the follies of Pericles. His vicious partiality for the celebrated courtezan Aspasia, subjected him to the ridicule and censure of his fellow-citizens, but if he triumphed over satire and malevolent remarks, the Athenians had occasion to execrate the memory of a man who by his example corrupted the purity and innocence of their morals, and who made licentiousness respectable, and the indulgence of every impure desire the qualification of the soldier as well as of the senator. Pericles lost all his legitimate children by the pestilence, and to call a natural son by his own name he was obliged to repeal a law which he had made against spurious children, and which he had enforced with great severity. This son, called Pericles, became one of the ten generals who succeeded Alcibiades in the administration of affairs, and like his colleagues he was condemned to death by the Athenians, after the unfortunate battle of Arginusæ. Paus. 1 29. — *Plut. in Vit. PERILLUS an ingenious artist at Athens, who made a brazen bull for Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum. This machine was fabricated to put prisoners to death by burning them alive and it was such that their cries were like the roaring of a bull. When Perillus gave it to Phalaris, the tyrant made the first experiment upon the donor, and cruelly put him to death by lighting a slow fire under the belly of the bull. Plin. 34, 8. — Ovid. in Art Am. 1, 653. *Im. PERIMEDES, one of the companions of Ulysses, who prepared the victims, which by advice of Circe, the hero offered to the manes before his descent to the infernal regions. Those victims, though not mentioned by Homer, were supposed to be black rams, according to a picture of Polygnotus Homer Odyss. 11, 23.

PERIMELA a daughter of Hippodamas, thrown into the sea for receiving the addresses of the Achelous. She was changed into an island in the Ionian sea, and became one of the Echinades. Ovid. Met. 8 890.

PERINTHUS, a city of Thrace, on the coast of the Propontis, west of Byzantium. It was originally colonized by the Samians, and was said to have received its name from the Epidaurian Perinthus, one of the followers of Orestes. Another account, however, assigned its foundation to Hercules, and the inhabitants themselves would seem to have believed this from their having a figure of Hercules on the reverse of their coins. Perinthus soon became a place of great trade, and, surpassing in this the neighbouring Selymbria, eventually rivalled Byzantium. When this last mentioned city, however, fell under the Spartan power, Perinthus was compelled to follow its example It subsequently suffered from the attacks of the Thracians, but principally from those of Philip of Macedon, who besieged and vigorously pressed the city, but was unable to take it. The city was situate on a small peninsula, and the isthmus connecting it with the main land was only a stadium broad, according to Ephorus, but Pliny makes it somewhat more. The place was built along the slope of a hill, and afforded to one approaching it the appearance of a theatre, the inner rows of dwellings being overtopped by those behind. PERIPATETICI, a sect of philosophers at Athens, disciples to Aristotle They derived this name from the place where they were taught, called Peripatos, in the Lyceum, or because they received the philosopher's lectures as they walked (περιπατοῦντες). The Peripatetics acknowledged the dignity of human nature, and placed their summum bonum not in the pleasures of passive sensation, but in the due exercise of the moral and intellectual faculties. The habit of this exercise, when guided by reason, constituted the highest excellence of man The philosopher contended that our own happiness chiefly depends upon ourselves, and though he did not require in his followers that self-command to which others pretended, yet he allowed a moderate degree of perturbation, as becoming human nature, and he considered a certain sensibility of passion totally necessary, as by resentment we are enabled to repel injuries, and the smart which past calamities have inflicted renders us careful to avoid the repetition. Cic. Acad 2, &c.

PERMESSUS, a river of Bœotia, rising in mount Helicon, and which, after uniting its waters with those of the Olmius, flowed along with that stream into the Copaic lake near Haliartus It received its name from Permessus, the father of a nymph called Aganippe, who also gave her name to one of the fountains of Helicon. The river Permessus as well as the fountain Aganippe, were sacred to the Muses. Strab. 8. —Propert 2, 8.

PERSEPOLIS a celebrated city the metropolis of the whole Persian empire situate in the centre of the province of Persis and said to have been built a first out of the spoils of the Egyptian Thebes It contained a splendid palace surrounded by a triple wall with gates of brass, which was burnt to the ground by Alexander, after his conquest of Darius when he allowed the whole city to be pillaged by his soldiers He is said to have been provoked to do this by the sight of about eight hundred Greeks whom the Persians had shamefully mutilated, but others say that he set the palace on fire at the instigation of Thais one of his courtezans after he had passed the day in riotous revelry Its ruins are now called Istakhar and Amara, and are situate near the junction of the two little rivers Araxes or Bend Amir, and Medus or Abkuen which after they have united flow into the Lake of Bakhtegan Quint Curt. 5 — Arrian 3 66 Plutarch in Alexand Diodor lib 17 Strab 15

PERSEUS a son of Jupiter and Danae the daughter of Acrisius As Acrisius had confined his daughter in a brazen tower to prevent her becoming a mother by a person whom he dreaded according to the words of an oracle, by the hands of his daughter's son Perseus was no sooner born than he was thrown into the sea with his mother Danae. The hopes of Acrisius were frustrated, the slender boat which carried Danae and her son was driven by the winds on the coasts of the island of Seriphus, one of the Cyclades, where they were found by a fisherman called Dictys, and carried to Polydectes, the king of the place They were treated with great humanity, and Perseus was entrusted to the care of the priests of Minerva's temple. His rising genius and manly courage, however, soon displeased Polydectes and the monarch, who wished to offer violence to Danae, feared the resentment of her son Yet Polydectes resolved to remove every obstacle He invited all his friends to a sumptuous entertainment, and it was requisite that all such as came should present the monarch with a beautiful horse. Perseus was in the number of the invited and the more particularly so, as Polydectes knew that he could not receive from him the present which he expected from all the rest Nevertheless Perseus, who wished not to appear inferior to the others in magnificence, told the king that as he could not give him a horse, he would bring him the head of Medusa the only one of the Gorgons who was subject to mortality. The offer was doubly agreeable to Polydectes, as it would remove Perseus from Seriphus and on account of its seeming impossibility the attempt might perhaps end in his ruin But the innocence of Perseus was patronized by the gods Pluto lent him his helmet which had the wonderful power of making its bearer invisible, Minerva gave him her buckler, which was as resplendent as glass and he received from Mercury wings and the talaria, with a short dagger, made of diamonds and called Harpe According to some it was from Vulcan and not from Mercury that he received the harpe, which was in form like a scythe With these arms Perseus began his expedition, and traversed the air, conducted by the goddess Minerva He went to the Graiæ the sisters of the Gorgons who according to the poets, had wings like the Gorgons but only one eye and one tooth between them all of which they made use, each in her turn They were three in number, according to Æschylus and Apollodorus, or only two according to Ovid and Hesiod. With Pluto's helmet which rendered him invisible, Perseus was enabled to steal their eye and their tooth while they were asleep, and he returned them only when they had informed him where their sisters the Gorgons resided When he had received every necessary information, Perseus flew to the habitation of the Gorgons which was situate beyond the western ocean according to Hesiod and Apollodorus; or in Libya, according to Ovid and Lucan; or in the deserts of Asiatic Scythia, according to Æschylus, He found these monsters asleep; and as he knew that if he fixed his eyes upon them, he should be instantly changed into a stone he continually looked on his shield, which reflected all the objects as clearly as the best of glasses He approached them, and with a courage which the goddess Minerva supported he cut off Medusa's head with one blow The noise awoke the two immortal sisters, but Pluto's helmet rendered Perseus invisible, and the attempts of the Gorgons to revenge Medusa's death proved fruitless the conqueror made his way through the air, and from the blood which dropped from Medusa's head sprang all those innumerable serpents which have ever since infested the sandy deserts of Libya. Chrysaor also with his golden sword, sprang from these drops of blood, as well as the horse Pegasus, which immediately flew through the air, and stopped on mount Helicon, where he became the favourite of the Muses. Meantime Perseus had continued his journey across the deserts of Libya; but the approach of night obliged him to alight in the territories of Atlas king of Mauritania. He went to the monarch's palace, where he hoped to find a kind reception by announcing himself as the son of Jupiter, but in this he was disappointed. Atlas recollected that, according to an ancient oracle, his gardens were to be robbed of their fruit by one of the sons of Jupiter, and therefore he not only refused Perseus the hospitality which he demanded, but he even offered violence to his person. Perseus finding himself inferior to his powerful enemy, showed him Medusa's head, and instantly Atlas was changed into a large mountain which bore the same name in the deserts of Africa. On the morrow Perseus continued his flight, and as he passed across the territories of Libya, he discovered, on the coasts of Æthiopia, the naked Andromeda, exposed as a sea monster. He was struck at the sight, and offered her father Cepheus to deliver her from instant death, if he obtained her in marriage as a reward of his labours. Cepheus consented, and immediately Perseus raising himself in the air, flew towards the monster, which was advancing to devour Andromeda, and he plunged his dagger in his right shoulder, and destroyed it. This happy event was attended with the greatest rejoicings. Perseus raised three altars to Mercury, Jupiter and Pallas, and after he had offered the sacrifice of a calf, a bullock, and a heifer, the nuptials were celebrated with the greatest festivity. The universal joy, however, was soon disturbed. Phineus, Andromeda's uncle, entered the palace with a number of armed men, and attempted to carry away the bride, whom he had courted and admired long before the arrival of Perseus. The father and mother of Andromeda interfered but in vain; a bloody battle ensued, and Perseus must have fallen a victim to the rage of Phineus, had not he defended himself at last with the same arms which proved fatal to Atlas. He showed the Gorgon's head to his adversaries, and they were instantly turned to stone, each in the posture and attitude in which he then stood. The friends of Cepheus, and such as supported Perseus, shared not the fate of Phineus, as the hero had previously warned them of the power of Medusa's head, and of the services which he received from it. Soon after this memorable adventure Perseus retired to Seriphos, at the very moment that his mother Danae fled to the altar of Minerva, to avoid the pursuit of Polydectes, who attempted to offer her violence. Dictys, who had saved her from the sea, and who, as some say, was the brother of Polydectes, defended her against the attempts of her enemies, and therefore Perseus, sensible of his merit, and of his humanity, placed him on the throne of Seriphos, after he had with Medusa's head turned into stones the wicked Polydectes, and the officers who were the associates of his guilt. He afterwards restored to Mercury his talaria and his wings, to Pluto his helmet, to Vulcan his sword, and to Minerva her shield; but as he was more particularly indebted to the goddess of wisdom for her assistance and protection, he placed the Gorgon's head on her shield, or rather, according to the more received opinion, on her ægis. After he had finished these celebrated exploits, Perseus expressed a wish to return to his native country; and accordingly he embarked for the Peloponnesus, with his mother and Andromeda. When he reached the Peloponnesian coasts he was informed that Teutamias, king of Larissa, was then celebrating funeral games in honour of his father. This intelligence drew him to Larissa to signalize himself in throwing the quoit, of which, according to some, he was the inventor. But here he was attended by an evil fate, and had the misfortune to kill a man with a quoit which he had thrown in the air. This was no other than his grandfather Acrisius, who, on the first intelligence that his grandson had reached the Peloponnesus, fled from his kingdom of Argos to the court of his friend and ally Teutamias, to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle which had obliged him to treat his daughter with so much barbarity. Some suppose, with Pausanias, that Acrisius had gone to Larissa to be reconciled to his grandson, whose fame had been spread in every city of Greece; and Ovid maintains that the grandfather was under the strongest obligations to his son-in-law, as through him he had received his kingdom, from which he had been forcibly driven by the sons of his brother Proetus. This unfortunate murder greatly depressed the spirits of Perseus: by the death of Acrisius he was entitled to the throne of Argos, but he refused to reign there; and to remove himself from a place which reminded him of the parricide he had unfortunately committed, he exchanged his kingdom for that of Tiryntha, and the maritime coast of Argolis, where Megapenthes the son of Proetus then reigned. When he had finally settled in this part of the Peloponnesus, he determined to lay the foundations of a new city, which he made the capital of his dominions, and which he called Mycenæ, because the pommel of his sword, called by the Greeks myces, had fallen there. The time of his death is unknown; yet it is universally agreed that he received divine honours like the rest of the ancient heroes. He had statues at Mycenæ, and in the island of Seriphos, and the Athenians raised him a temple, in which they consecrated an altar in honour of Dictys, who had treated Danae and her infant son with so much paternal tenderness. The Egyptians also paid particular honour to his memory, and asserted that he often appeared among them wearing shoes two cubits long, which was always interpreted as a sign of fertility. Perseus had by Andromeda, Alceus, Sthenelus, Nestor, Electryon, and Gorgophone, and after death, according to some mythologists, he became a constellation in the heavens. Herod. 2, 91. – Apollod. 2, 4, &c. – Paus. 2, 16 et 18, 3, 17, &c. – *Apollon. PERSEUS, or PERSES a son of Philip king of Macedonia. He distinguished himself like his father, by his enmity to the Romans and when he had made sufficient preparations, he declared war against them. His operations, however, were slow and injudicious; he wanted courage and resolution, and though he at first obtained some advantages over the Roman armies, yet his avarice and his timidity proved destructive to his cause. When Paulus was appointed to the command of the Roman armies in Macedonia, Perseus showed his inferiority by his imprudent encampments, and when he had at last yielded to the advice of his officers, who recommended a general engagement, and had drawn up his forces near the walls of Pydna, B. C. 168, he was the first who ruined his own cause, and by flying as soon as the battle was begun, he left the enemy masters of the field. From Pydna, Perseus fled to Samothrace, but he was soon discovered in his obscure retreat, and brought into the presence of the Roman conqueror, where the meanness of his behaviour exposed him to ridicule, and not to mercy. He was carried to Rome, and dragged along the streets of the city to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. His family were also exposed to the sight of the Roman populace, who shed tears on viewing in their streets, dragged like a slave a monarch who had once defeated their armies, and spread alarm all over Italy, by the greatness of his military preparations, and by his bold undertakings. Perseus died in prison, or, according to some, he was put to a shameful death the first year of his captivity. He had two sons Philip and Alexander, and one daughter, whose name is not known. Alexander, the younger of these, was bred to a Roman carpenter, and led the greatest part of his life in obscurity, till his ingenuity raised him to notice. He was afterwards made secretary to the senate Liv 40, &c. Justin. 33 1, &c Plut. in Paulo — Flor 2, 12.– Propert 4, 12 39.

PERSIA, or PERSIS, a country of Asia, bounded on the east by Carmania, on the north by Parthia and Media, on the west by Susiana, and on the south by the Persian Gulf, it corresponded generally with the modern province of Fars. It is called Elam in the Bible, prior to the time of Cyrus, after Elam the son of Shem, who settled hereabouts, under this name also parts of Susiana and Media appear to have been originally included, as the profane authors mention these the district Elymais and the tribe Elymæi subsequent to the reign of Cyrus, the term of Persia, or Parse, may also be found in Holy Writ This was Persia in its confined sense, or properly so called, and must not be confounded with the mighty empire of Persia founded by Cyrus, which extended from the Indus to the Mediterranean, and from the Caspian and Euxine Seas to the Persian Gulf and the Ocean hence the pompous title, which its sovereigns adopted, of King of Kings The first king of Elam that is mentioned was Chedorlaomer, who extended his conquest over many parts of Asia, and after whose days nothing occurs of any consequence in the history of Persia, till the reign of Cyrus. Three centuries before the time of Cyrus the Elamites had been conquered and kept in subjection by the Medes, but this extraordinary man, whose real name was Agradates, determined upon liberating his countrymen from the yoke of their oppressors; he succeeded in defeating them in a great battle near the Persian metropolis, on the banks of the little river Cores, or Cyrus, after which he first assumed the name of Cyrus He soon reduced Media, and by degrees gained possession of the territories it had conquered from other nations; but from the acknowledged superiority in arts and civilization which this rival country had over its victors, as well as from the military importance it contrived to maintain even in its subjection, the two names were united together, and the dominions of Cyrus described as the kingdom of the Medes and Persians. He is said to have published an edict, importing that it should be esteemed mean and scandalous for any man in his dominions to go on foot, whether the journey were long or short, thus compelling, as it were, the inhabitants to become horsemen, and hence it is, from the word Paras, which, in the Oriental tongues, denotes a horseman, that the name of Persia, or Paras, has been thought to be derived. In the mythology of the Greeks, however, the Persians are said to have obtained their name from Perses, a son of Perseus and Andromeda, and to have been previously called Cephenes. Cyrus was succeeded on his throne by his son Cambyses, who reduced Egypt to subjection Darius Hystaspis divided the whole empire into twenty Satrapies, and appointed a governor over each, who was bound to render him an annual tribute: he marched against the Scythians, and having reduced the provinces of Thrace and Macedonia, conquered a great part of India The Ionians at last revolted from him and being assisted by the Athenians took Sardes, and burnt it to the ground Darius was provoked by this to send an enormous army to Greece, it was defeated at Marathon, shortly after which he died Xerxes, his son and successor made an unfortunate attempt to revenge his father's cause, and invaded Greece with an immense body of men, amounting, as it has been estimated, to five millions of persons. He was gallantly, though unsuccessfully, opposed at Thermopylæ, but was subsequently gloriously beaten at the battle of Salamis, which obliged him to leave Europe with precipitation and disgrace After this, his army, under the command of his general Mardonius, was routed at Platæa, and another body of his forces was defeated on the same day by the Greeks, at Mycale in Asia Minor After his death, Artaxerxes Longimanus ascended the throne, 464 years B. C; this prince is supposed to be the same with the Ahasuerus of the Scriptures, who raised Esther to the throne and so highly favoured the Jews. After some intermediate reigns, Artaxerxes Mnemon, or the beautiful, succeeded to the empire; but his brother Cyrus the younger disputed the crown with him at Cunaxa, and lost his life in the battle: it was in this expedition that those 10,000 Greeks were engaged, whose retreat has been so beautifully described by Xenophon Darius Codomanus or the Third, was the last prince of this dynasty, and was defeated in a series of brilliant victories by Alexander the Great, who put an end at last to the Persian monarchy. Upon the death of Alexander, this country fell under the dominion of the Seleucidæ, but it was taken from them B. C 141 by Mithridates, king of Parthia who annexed it to his own empire It remained subject to the Parthian princes till the reign of Artabanus when Artaxerxes a Persian of obscure origin, roused his countrymen to recover their independence, having defeated the Parthians in a pitched battle, he was raised to the throne, A. D 229, and thus founded the second Persian monarchy, after the people had been tributary to the Parthians for nearly 500 years The name of this prince's father was Sassan, and hence his descendants are called Sassanides. Artaxerxes became involved in hostilities with the Romans, in consequence of his having laid claim to all the provinces which had once belonged to the Persian empire, and a sanguinary warfare was kept up between the two empires for many years The government of Persia was an absolute monarchy, throughout the whole period of its history; but succession to the throne was not defined, and the disputes that ensued constantly weakened and distracted the kingdom, and enabled the Satraps, or nobles and provincial governors, to exercise comparative independence. The early Persians were remarkable for simplicity of manners; and it was said of their youth, that they were educated to ride, to shoot with the bow, and speak the truth. The manners of the nobles and kings were, in general, luxurious and dissolute. The religion of the first Persians appears to have been the worship of the planets, but in the reign of Darius Hystaspes, the adoration of fire and the elements was introduced by Zoroaster, and continued to be the religion of the state until its conquest by the Mahometans. The fugitives from Mahometan oppression, known as Ghebers and Parsees, still follow this faith. The doctrines and practice of this system are collected in a work called Avesta, or Zend-Avesta, being written in the Zend language This is the sacred dialect of the Parsees, as Sanscrit is of the Hindus, and bears very great affinity to Sanscrit. The Zend-Avesta has been translated into French by Mons. Anquetil Du Perron. Besides the information derived from classical writers, the history of Persia, since the Mahometan conquest, has been written by many Arabic and Persian authors, the substance of whose works is given in the History of Persia by Sir J. PERSICUM MARE, or PERSICUS SINUS, a part of the Indian ocean on the coast of Persia and Arabia, now called the Persian Gulf.

PERSIS a province of Persia, bounded by Media, Carmania, Susiana, and the Persian gulf. It is often taken for Persia itself.

PERSIUS FLACCUS, AULUS, a Latin poet, born at Volaterræ, A D 34, and in the twentieth year of the reign of Tiberius. He was of an equestrian family, and he made himself known by his intimacy with the most illustrious Romans of the age. The early part of his life was spent in his native town, and at the age of twelve he was removed to Rome, where he studied philosophy under Cornutus the celebrated stoic He also received the instructions of Palemon the grammarian, and Virginius the rhetorician. Naturally of a mild disposition, his character was unimpeached, his modesty remarkable, and his benevolence universally admired. He distinguished himself by his satirical humour, and made the faults of the orators and poets of his age the subject of his poems. He did not even spare Nero; and the more effectually to expose the emperor to ridicule, he introduced into his satires some of his verses. The Torva mimalloneis implerunt cornua bombis, with the three following verses, are Nero's, according to some. But though he was so severe upon the vicious and ignorant, he did not forget his friendship for Cornutus, and he showed his regard for his character and abilities by making mention of him name with great propriety in his satires. It was by the advice of his learned preceptor that he corrected one of his poems in which he had compared Nero to Midas, and at his representation he altered the words Auriculas asini Midæ rex habet into Auriculas asinæ quas non habet? Persius died in the 30th year of his age, A. D. 62, and left all his books, which consisted of seven hundred volumes, and a large sum of money, to his preceptor, but Cornutus only accepted the books, and returned the money to the sisters and friends of the deceased The satires of Persius are six in number, blamed by some for obscurity of style and of language. But though they may appear almost unintelligible to some, it ought to be remembered that they were read with pleasure and with avidity by his contemporaries, and that the only difficulties which now appear to the moderns, arise from their not knowing the various characters which they described, the vices which they lashed, and the errors which they remarked. The satires of Persius are generally printed with those of Juvenal, the best editions of which will be found to be that of Henninius, 4to, Ultraj. 1685, and that of Ruperti, 2 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1819 The best edition of Persius, separate, is that of Koenig, Gotting. 1803, 8vo. Among the principal English translations of Persius may be specified those of Dryden, Brewster, Drummond, Howes, and Gifford. Martial. - Quintil 10, 1.— August de Magist. 9 —Lactant.

PERTINAX, PUBLIUS HELVIUS a Roman emperor after the death of Commodus He was descended from an obscure family, and, like his father, who was either a slave or the son of a manumitted slave, he for some time followed the mean employment of drying wood and making charcoal. His indigence, however, did not prevent him from receiving a liberal education, and indeed he was for some time employed in teaching a number of pupils the Greek and the Roman languages in Etruria. He left this laborious profession for a military life, and by his valour and intrepidity, he gradually rose to offices of the highest trust in the army, and was made consul by M Aurelius for his eminent services. He was afterwards entrusted with the government of Mœsia, and at last he presided over the city of Rome as governor. When Commodus was murdered, Pertinax was universally selected to succeed to the imperial throne, and his great reputation, and the plea of old age and increasing infirmities, did not prevent his being saluted emperor and Augustus He acquiesced with reluctance, but his mildness, his economy and the popularity of his administration, convinced the senate and the people, of the prudence and the justice of their choice. He forbade his name to be inscribed on such places or estates as were part of the imperial domain, and exclaimed that they belonged not to him but to the public. He melted all the silver statues which had been raised to his vicious predecessor, and he exposed to public sale all his concubines, his horses, his arms, and all the instruments of his pleasure and extravagance. With the money raised from these he enriched the empire, and was enabled to abolish all the taxes which Commodus had laid on the rivers, ports, and highways through the empire. This patriotic administration gained him the affection of the worthiest and most dis cerning of his subjects, but the extravagant and luxurious raised their clamour against him; and when Pertinax attempted to introduce among the prætorian guards that discipline which was so necessary to preserve the peace and tranquillity of Rome, the flames of rebellion were kindled, and the minds of the soldiers totally alienated. Pertinax was apprized of this mutiny, but he refused to fly at the hour of danger. He scorned the advice of his friends who wished him to withdraw from the impending storm, and he unexpectedly appeared before the seditious prætorians, and without fear or concern, boldly asked them whether they who were bound to defend the person of their prince and emperor, were come to betray him and to shed his blood. His undaunted assurance and his intrepidity would have had the desired effect, and the soldiers had already begun to retire, when one of the most seditious advanced and darted his javelin at the emperor's breast, exclaiming, the soldiers send you this. The rest immediately followed the example, and Pertinax muffling up his head, and calling upon Jupiter to avenge his death, remained unmoved, and was instantly dispatched. His head was cut off, and carried upon the point of a spear as in triumph to the camp. This happened on the 28th of March, A. D. 193. Pertinax reigned only 87 days, and his death was the more universally lamented as it proceeded from a seditious tumult, and robbed the Roman empire of a wise, virtuous, and benevolent emperor. Dio. Herodian. - Capitol.

PERUSIA, now Perugia, one of the most ancient and distinguished cities of Etruria, situated at the south-eastern extremity of the Lacus Thrasymenus, or Lago di Perugia. The era of its foundation long preceded that of Rome, though the precise period cannot be ascertained with certainty. In conjunction with the other Etruscan states it long resisted the Romans, and when subjected, or rather reconciled to them, it became a faithful and courageous ally. It defied the power of Annibal, and flourished in peace and opulence till the reign of Augustus, when unfortunately it engaged in the rebellion of L. Antonius, uncle of the triumvir, and under his command, shut its gates against Augustus, who took it, and, as it is asserted, wished to spare it, but one of its principal citizens setting fire to his own house, which he intended as a funeral pile for himself and his family, the flames communicated to the neighbouring buildings, and spreading rapidly, reduced the city to ashes. Perusia, however, rose immediately from its ruins, and, on its restoration, by a strange inconsistence chose for its patron Vulcan, a divinity to whom it seems to have had very few obligations, as the god had spared his own temple only in the general conflagration. In the Gothic war it displayed much spirit, and stood a siege of seven years against the barbarians. Liv. 9, 36. - Appian. Bell. Civ. 5, 49 - Dio Cass. 48, 13. - Lucan 1, 41.

PESCENNIUS Vid. Niger.

PESSINUS, (untis,) a city of Galatia, on the river Sangarius, and near the western confines. It was of early origin, and chiefly famous for the worship of Cybele. Strabo says, that mount Dindymus, whence Cybele was surnamed Dindymene, rose above the town. So great was the fame of the shrine and statue of the goddess, that the Romans, enjoined, as it is said, by the Sybilline oracles, had caused the latter to be conveyed to Rome, since the safety of the state was declared to depend on its removal to Italy. A special embassy was sent to king Attalus to request his assistance on this occasion: this sovereign received the Roman deputies with great kindness and hospitality, and having conveyed them to Pessinus, obtained for them permission to remove the statue of the mother of the gods, which was nothing else but a great stone. On its arrival at Rome, it was received with great pomp and ceremony by the Roman senate and people, headed by Scipio Nasica, selected for this office by the national voice as the best citizen, according to the injunction of the Pythian oracle. This took place in the year 547, U. C. near the close of the second Punic war. It appears from Livy that the worship of Cybele was still observed in Pessinus after its occupation by the Gauls, since the priests of the goddess are said to have sent a deputation to the army of Manlius, when on the banks of the Sangarius. Polybius mentions the names of the individuals who then presided over the worship and temple of Cybele. Strabo says Pessinus was the most commercial and flourishing city in this part of Asia, in his time, though the worship of Cybele had fallen into decay. The temple and its porticoes were of white marble, and surrounded by a beautiful grove: the city was indebted to the kings of Pergamus for these decorations. Formerly the priests of Cybele were high in rank and dignity, and possessed of great privileges and emoluments. Pausanias states that Pessinus was at the foot of mount Agdistis, where Atys was said to have been buried; this is probably the same mountain which Strabo calls Dindymus. At a later period we find Pessinus the metropolis of Western Galatia. The ruins of this city should be sought for near the left bank of the Sangarius, somewhere in the great angle it makes between its junction with the Tembris and the Purseh. Strab. 12. Liv. 29, 10. - 12, 3; 15. - *Polyb. PETILIA, a town of Italy, in the territory of the Bruttii, on the coast of the Tarentine gulf, and to the north of Crotona. It was fabled to have been built by Philoctetes after the Trojan war. In the opinion of the most judicious and best informed topographers, it occupied the situation of the modern Strongoli. This small town gave a striking proof of its fidelity to the Romans in the second Punic war, when it refused to follow the example of the other Bruttian cities in joining the Carthaginians. In consequence of this resolution, it was besieged by Annibal, and, though unassisted by the Romans, it held out until reduced to the last extremity by famine; nor was it till all the leather in the town, as well as the bark and young shoots of trees, and the grass in the streets, had been consumed for subsistence, that they at length surrendered. Virg. Æn. 3, 402 - Val. Max. 6. 6. - Liv. 23, 30. — A town of Lucania, confounded by Strabo with the Bruttian Petilia. It is supposed to have have been situated on what is now the Monte della Stella, not far from Pæstum.

Numa's tomb, about 400 years after his death His advice was followed Plin in Num – Liv 40, 29 —— An individual at Rome, surnamed Capitolinus. According to the scholiasts on Horace, he had been governor of the Capitol, They add, that he was accused of having stolen, during his office, a gold crown consecrated to Jupiter, and that, having pled his cause in person, he was acquitted by the judges in order to gratify Augustus, with whom he was on friendly terms. Hence, they say, arose his surname of Capitolinus. One part at least of this story is incorrect, since the Capitolini were a branch of the Petilian family long before this. *Horat. PETRA, a city of Arabia, the metropolis of the Nabathæi, and giving name to the division of the country called Arabia Petræa. It was situate about midway between Palestine and the Ælanitic gulf. It obtained its name from its situation on a rock, for which reason it appears to be called Selah in the Scriptures, and sometimes merely the Rock It was also known by the names of Recem and Arce, and was taken by Amaziah, son of Joash It was attacked by the troops of Antigonus, Alexander's successor, but they were obliged to retreat from it. It is now, however, nothing but a heap of ruins, tenanted only by wild beasts, by birds of prey, and poisonous reptiles, and as bad been merely prophesied concerning it in Holy Writ, Edom is cut off for ever, it is made a desolate wilderness, and none shall pass through it without being cut off. The ruins of Petra are scattered about a spot called Wady Mousa, or The Valley of Moses, above which rises mount Hor or Haroun, where Aaron was buried, and where the Arabs still show his sepulchre. 2 Kings. 14, 7.—2 Chron 25, 12. - Jud. 1, 36. - Isaiah, 16, 1. 34, 5 ?? 42, 11 Jerem 49, 7—18.— Ezek 35 —Amos 1, 11 et 12 — Diod, Sic. 19 55 et 100.— Dio Cass. 68, 14 — Strab 16.——A fortress of Macedonia among the mountains beyond Libethra, the possession of which was disputed by the Perrhæbi of Thessaly, and the kings of Macedonia. It commanded a pass which led to Pythium in Thessaly by the back of Olympus. Liv 39, 26 41, 32 —— A fortress on mount Hæmus Liv 40, 22.——A Corinthian borough or village, of which Bœton the father of Cypselus was a native. Herod 5, 91 —— A rock fortress in Sogdiana, taken by Alexander. It was also called Oxi Petra, probably from its being near the river Oxus. Quint Curt 7, 11.

PETRÆA, the smallest of the three divisions of Arabia. It was bounded on the east by Arabia Deserta, on the west by Egypt and the Mediterranean, on the south by the Red Sea, which here divides and runs north in two branches, and on the north by Palestine. It derived its name from its metropolis Petra. Its principal tribe were the Nabathæi, so called from Nebaioth the son of Ishmael. They are said, as were all the Nomadic tribes, to have lived by robbing their neighbours, who again plundered them in their turn; a character still maintained by all the descendants of Ishmael, concerning whom it was prophecied that he should be a wild man, that his hand should be against every man, and every man's hand against him. Gen. 16, 12.

PETREIUS, a Roman soldier who killed his tribune during the Cimbrian wars, because he hesitated to attack the enemy. He was rewarded for his valour with a crown of grass. Plin. 22, 6 ——A lieutenant of C. Antonius, who defeated the troops of Catiline. He took the part of Pompey against Julius Cæsar, by whom he was defeated in Spain When Cæsar had been victorious in every part of the world, Petreius, who had retired into Africa, attempted to destroy himself by fighting with his friend, king Juba, in single combat Juba was killed first, and Petreius obliged one of his slaves to run him through. *Sallust. PETRONIUS, Titus, surnamed Arbiter, because Nero had named him Arbiter elegantiæ He was born, according to some modern scholars, at Massilia (Marseilles), or somewhere in its vicinity, of a good family; but received his education at Rome. No one knew better how to unite the love of letters with the most unrestrained desire for pleasure. His portrait has been drawn by Tacitus, with the hand of a master. It must be confessed, however, that the Petronius of Tacitus has the prænomen of Titus, and the Petronius of whom we are now treating that of Titus. There prevails, indeed, much uncertainty respecting the prænomen of Petronius. Pliny calls the Petronius of Tacitus, Titus, while the scholiast on Juvenal gives him the name of Publius. We will here insert the passage of the historian above mentioned, which gives so graphic a description of the character of the man. "He passed his days in sleep, and his nights in business or pleasure. Indolence was at once his passion and his road to fame What others did by vigour and industry, he accomplished by his love of pleasure and luxurious ease Unlike the men who profess to understand social enjoyment, and ruin their fortunes, he led a life of expense, without profusion; an epicure, yet not a prodigal; addicted to his appetites, but with taste and judgment, a refined and elegant voluptuary Gay and airy in his conversation, he charmed by a certain graceful negligence, the more engaging as it flowed from the natural frankness of his disposition. With all his delicacy and carelessness he showed, when he was governor of Bithynia, and afterwards in the year of his consulship, that vigour of mind and softness of manners may well unite in the same person From his public station, he returned to his usual gratifications, fond of vice, or of pleasures that bordered upon it His gaiety recommended him to the notice of the prince. Being in favour at court, and cherished as the companion of Nero in all his select parties, he was allowed to be the arbiter of taste and elegance. Without the sanction of Petronius nothing was exquisite nothing rare or delicious. Hence the jealousy of Tigellinus, who dreaded a rival in the good graces of the emperor almost his equal; in the science of luxury his superior. Tigellinus determined to work his downfall, and accordingly addressed himself to the cruelty of the prince; that master passion to which all other affections and every motive were sure to give way. He charged Petronius with having lived in close intimacy with Sevinus the conspirator; and, to give colour to that assertion, he bribed a slave to turn informer against his master. The rest of the domestics were loaded with irons. Nor was Petronius suffered to make his defence. Nero at that time happened to be on one of his excursions into Campania. Petronius had followed him as far as Cumæ, but was not allowed to proceed farther than that place. He seemed, to linger in doubt and fear, and yet he was not in a hurry to leave a world which he loved. He opened his veins and closed them again, at intervals losing a small quantity of blood, then binding up the orifice, as his own inclinations prompted. He conversed during the whole time with his usual gaiety, never changing his habitual manner, nor talking sentences to show his contempt of death. He listened to his friends, who endeavoured to entertain him, not with grave discourses on the immortality of the soul, or the moral wisdom of philosophers, but with strains of poetry, and verses of a gay and natural turn. He distributed presents to some of his servants, and ordered others to be chastised. He walked out for his amusement, and even lay down to sleep. In his last scene of life he acted with such calm tranquillity, that his death, though an act of necessity, seemed no more than the decline of nature. In his will, he scorned to follow the example of others, who, like himself, died under the tyrant's stroke: he neither flattered the emperor, nor Tigellinus, nor any of the creatures of the court; but having written, under the fictitious names of profligate men and women, a narrative of Nero's debauchery, and his new modes of vice, he had the spirit to send it to the emperor the tablets, sealed with his own seal, which he took care to break, that, after his death, it might not be used for the destruction of any person whatever. It is a matter of considerable doubt, whether it was this Petronius who was the author of the work that has come down to us, entitled Satyricon, for while its contents are not at all unsuitable to a man of such a character, the style and other circumstances have been thought more appropriate to a later period of Roman literature. The Satyricon is a farrago of verse and prose, of topics and stories, serious and ludicrous, intermixed with the most detestable obscenity, and so mutilated that no connection can be made out. It has been thought that some of the scenes in it were intended as a satire against Nero, written by Petronius in his last moments. A new fragment was discovered at Trau, in Dalmatia, and published in 1664; its genuineness was warmly discussed among critics, but it has generally obtained an admission among the rest. On the other hand, some additional fragments produced by Nodot, in 1694, have been rejected. The difficulties of this author, and, it is probable, the nature of his subjects, have caused him to be much studied by the curious; his text and have produced numerous editions and commentators, chiefly French, German and Dutch. It is to the credit of England that none of her scholars have contaminated themselves with the attempt to elucidate him. The best edition is that of Burman, 4to Ultraj. 1709; to which may be added that of Reinesius, 1731, 8vo., and that of Antonius, Lips. 1781, 8vo.

PEUCE, a name applied to the land inundated by the two principal arms of the Danube at its mouth. The ancient appellation still partly remains in that of Picenna. It was called Peuce from πεύκη, a pine-tree, with which species of tree it abounded. From this island the Peucini, who dwelt in and adjacent to it, derived their name. We find them as appearing in the Lower Empire, under the names of Pecenages, and Patzinacites. Lucan. 3, 202. – Plin. 4, 12.

PEUCESTES, a Macedonian set over Egypt by Alexander. He received Persia at the general division of the Macedonian empire at the king's death. He behaved with great cowardice after he had joined himself to Eumenes. C. Nep. in Eum. Plut. Cart 4, 8.

PEUCETIA, a region of Apulia, on the coast, below Daunia. It is fabled to have received its name from Peucetius, son of Lycaon, king of Arcadia, who migrated to Italy with his brother Œnotrus. Dion. Hal. 1, 13.

PHÆA, a celebrated sow which infested the neighbourhood of Cromyon. It was destroyed by Theseus as he was travelling from Troezene to Athens to make himself known to his father. Some supposed that the boar of Calydon sprang from this sow. Phæa, according to some authors, was no other than a woman who prostituted herself to strangers, whom she murdered, and afterwards plundered. Plut. in Thes.— Strab 8.

PHÆACIA, an island of the Ionian sea, near the coast of Epirus, anciently called Scheria, and afterwards Corcyra [Vid. Corcyra.] The inhabitants, called Phæaces, were a luxurious and dissolute people, from which reason a glutton was generally stigmatized by the epithet of Phæax. When Ulysses was shipwrecked on the coast of Phæacia, Alcinous was then king of the island, whose gardens have been greatly celebrated. Horat ep. 1, 15, 21.— *Ovid. PHÆDON, an Athenian put to death by the thirty tyrants. His daughters, to escape the oppressors and preserve their chastity, threw themselves together into a well.—A disciple of Socrates. He had been seized by pirates in his younger days, and the philosopher, who seemed to discover something uncommon and promising in his countenance, bought his liberty for a sum of money, and ever after esteemed him. Phædon, after the death of Socrates, returned to Elis, his native country, where he founded a sect of philosophers called Eleans. The name of Phædon is given to one of the dialogues of Plato. Macrob. Sat 1, 11 – Dogs.—An archon at Athens, when the Athenians were directed by the oracle to remove the bones of Theseus to Attica. Plut. in Thes.

PHÆDRA, a daughter of Minos and Pasiphae, who married Theseus, by whom she became mother of Acamas and Demophoon. They had already lived for some time in conjugal felicity, when Venus, who hated all the descendants of amours with Mars, inspired Phædra with an unconquerable passion for Hippolytus, the son of Theseus, by the Amazon Hippolyte. This shameful passion Phædra long attempted to still-, but in vain; and therefore, in the absence of Theseus, she addressed Hippolytus with all the impatience of a desponding lover. Hippolytus rejected her with horror and disdain; but Phædra, incensed on account of the reception she had met, resolved to punish his coldness and refusal. At the return of Theseus, she accused Hippolytus of attempts upon her virtue. The credulous father listened to the accusation, and without hearing the defence of Hippolytus, he banished him from his kingdom and implored Neptune, who had promised to grant three of his requests, to punish him in some exemplary manner. As Hippolytus fled from Athens, his horses were suddenly terrified by a huge sea-monster, which Neptune had sent on the shore. He was dragged through precipices and over rocks, and he was trampled under the feet of his horses, and crushed under the wheels of his chariot. When the tragical end of Hippolytus was known at Athens, Phædra confessed her crime, and hung herself in despair, unable to survive one whose death her wickedness and guilt had occasioned. The death of Hippolytus, and the infamous passion of Phædra, are the subject of one of the tragedies of Euripides, and of Seneca. Phædra was buried at Trœzene, where her tomb was still seen in the age of the geographer Pausanias, near the temple of Venus, which she had built to render the goddess favourable to her incestuous passion. There was near her tomb a myrtle, whose leaves were all full of small holes and it was reported that Phædra had done this with a hair pin, when the vehemence of her passion had rendered her melancholy and almost desperate. She was represented in a painting in Apollo's temple at Delphi as suspended in the air, while her sister Ariadne stood near to her, and fixed her eyes upon her. *Plut. in Thes. PHÆDRUS, one of the disciples of Socrates. Cic. de Nat. D. 1.——An Epicurean philosopher.——A Latin fabulist was a native of Thrace, and probably brought to Rome at an early age in the condition of a slave. He came into the service of the emperor Augustus, by whom he was enfranchised, as appears from the title prefixed to his work of "Augusti Libertus." Of his life nothing more is known, except that in the reign of Tiberius he was a sufferer under the injustice and tyranny of Sejanus, whom he survived. It is probable he lived to an advanced age. He was author of five books of fables, composed in iambic verse. They are valuable for their precision, purity, elegance, and simplicity. The matter of these fables is generally borrowed from Æsop but Phædrus intermixes stories or historical pieces of his own. This work appears to have been little known in his own time, for no extant writer of antiquity alludes to it. This circumstance, together with the assertion of Seneca, "that the Romans had not attempted fables or Æsopean compositions," might throw suspicion on the genuineness of the work, did not its style and manner refer it to the best age of Roman literature. It remained unknown to the moderns till 1595 or 1596 when Francis Pithou discovered a copy in the library of St Remi at Rheims, and sent it to his brother Peter, who published it. Two manuscripts of Phædrus are said to exist, both of which are not only imperfect but, being transcribed from the same copy very carelessly, are full of errors; hence few ancient works have given more trouble and room for conjecture to critics. The best edition of Phædrus is that of Burmann, Lug. Bat. 1727, 4to. The editions of Hoogstraten, Amst. 1701, 8vo., of Brotier, Paris, 1783, 12mo., of Schwabe, Brunsvig. 1806 8vo., and of Eichstædt, Jenæ, 1812 fol. are also deserving of commendation.

PHÆDYMA, a daughter of Otanes, who first discovered that Smerdis who had ascended the throne of Persia at the death of Cambyses, was an impostor. Herod 3, 69

PHAETON, a son of the Sun, or Phœbus, and Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was son of Cephalus and Aurora, according to Hesiod and Pausanias, or of Tithonus and Aurora, according to Apollodorus. He is, however, more generally acknowledged to be the son of Phœbus and Clymene. Phaeton was naturally of a lively disposition, and a handsome figure. Venus became enamoured of him, and entrusted him with the care of one of her temples. This distinguishing favour of the goddess rendered him vain and aspiring; and when Epaphus, the son of Io, had told him, to check his pride, that he was not the son of Phœbus, Phaeton resolved to know his true origin, and at the instigation of his mother, he visited the palace of the Sun. He begged Phœbus, that if he really were his father, he would give him incontestible proofs of his paternal tenderness, and convince the world of his legitimacy. Phœbus swore by the Styx that he would grant him whatever he required, and no sooner was the oath uttered, than Phaeton demanded of him to drive his chariot for one day. Phœbus represented the impropriety of such a request and the dangers to which it would expose him; but in vain; and, as the oath was inviolable, and Phaeton unmoved, the father instructed his son how he was to proceed in his way through the regions of the air. His explicit directions were forgotten, or little attended to, and no sooner had Phaeton received the reins from his father, than he betrayed his ignorance and incapacity to guide the chariot. The flying horses became sensible of the confusion of their driver, and immediately departed from the usual track. Phaeton repented too late of his rashness, and already heaven and earth were threatened with an universal conflagration, when Jupiter who had perceived the disorder of the horses of the sun, struck the rider with one of his thunderbolts, and buried him headlong from heaven into the river Po. His body, consumed with fire, was found by the nymphs of the place, and honoured with a decent burial. His sisters mourned his unhappy end, and were changed into poplars by

Jupiter. [Id Phaetontiades.] According to the poets, while Phaeton was unskilfully driving the chariot of his father, the blood of the Æthiopians was dried up, and their skin became black, a colour which is still preserved among the greatest part of the inhabitants of the torrid zone. The territories of Libya were also parched up, according to the same tradition, on account of their too great vicinity to the sun; and ever since, Africa, unable to recover her original verdure and fruitfulness, has exhibited a sandy country, and uncultivated waste. According to those who explain this poetical fable, Phaeton was a Ligurian prince, who studied astronomy and in whose age the neighbourhood of the Po was visited with uncommon heats. The horses of the Sun are called Phaetontis equa either because they were guided by Phaeton, or from the Greek word (φαίνω), which expresses the splendour and lustre of that luminary. Virg Æn 5, 105. *Hesiod. PHALÆ, or FALÆ, wooden towers at Rome, erected in the circus They were seven in number, and placed near the spot whence the chariots started. They were either of an oval form, or had oval spheres on their tops called Ova, which were raised or rather taken down to denote how many rounds the charioteers had completed, one for each round; for they usually ran seven times round the course. Juv. 6, 589

PHALANTHUS, a Lacedæmonian, who founded Tarentum in Italy, at the head of the Parthenie His father's name was Aracus. As he went to Italy he was shipwrecked on the coast, and carried to shore by a dolphin, and for that reason there was a dolphin placed near his statue in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. [Id Parthenie.] He received divine honours after death Justin 3. - Paus. 10, 10. - Horat. od 2. 6 11. Sil Ital 11. 16.

PHALARIS, a tyrant of Agrigentum, who made use of the most excruciating torments to punish his subjects on the smallest suspicion. Perillus made him a brazen bull, and when he had presented it to Phalaris, the tyrant ordered the inventor to be seized and the first experiment to be made on his body. These cruelties did not long remain unrevenged, the people of Agrigentum revolted in the tenth year of his reign, and put him to death in the same manner as he had tortured Perillus, and many of his subjects after him. B. C. 552. The brazen bull of Phalaris was carried by Amilcar to Carthage; when that city was taken by Scipio, it was delivered again to the inhabitants of Agrigentum by the Romans. There is extant a series of letters under the names of Phalaris and Abaris, the genuineness of which has been the subject of much controversy, especially between the honourable Charles Boyle and the celebrated Dr Bentley. Boyle, who gave an edition of those epistles with a new Latin version, in 1695, made a reflection upon the conduct of Bentley in his preface, which induced the critic to undertake to prove that the letters were spurious, and consequently the labour bestowed upon them useless. He carried his point, and the spuriousness of the epistles of Phalaris is now generally admitted: hence the circumstances of his life deduced from them lose their authority. Cic in Verr. 4. ad Attic 7, 12. de Offic 2. *Ovid. de Art. PHALARIUM, a citadel of Syracuse, where Phalaris's bull was placed.

PHALARUS, a river of Bœotia, falling into the Cephisus Paus 9, 34

PHALERUM, the most ancient of the Athenian ports, but which, after the erection of the docks in the Piræus ceased to be of any importance in a maritime point of view. It was, however, enclosed within the fortifications of Themistocles, and gave its name to the southernmost of the long walls, by means of which it was connected with Athens. Phalerum supplied the Athenian market with abundance of the little fish named Aphyæ, so often mentioned by the comic writers. The lands around it were marshy, and produced very fine cabbages. The modern name of Phalerum is Porto Fanari. Aristoph. Acharn. 101 Ar. 76. —Aristot. Hist. Anim. 6, 15. - Xen. Œcon. 19.

PHALLICA, festivals observed by the Egyptians in honour of Osiris. They receive their name from φαλλὸς membrum igneum mentri virile. The institution originated in this: after the murder of Osiris, Isis was unable to recover among the other limbs the privities of her husband, and therefore, as she paid particular honour to every part of his body, she distinguished that which was lost with more honour, and paid it more attention. Its representation, called phallus, was made with wood, and carried during the sacred festivals which were instituted in honour of Osiris. The people held it in the greatest veneration, it was looked upon as an emblem of fecundity, and the mention of it among the ancients never conveyed any impure thought or lascivious reflection. The festivals of the phallus were imitated by the Greeks, and introduced into Europe by the Athenians, who made the procession of the phallus part of the celebration of the Dionysia of the god of wine. Those that carried the phallus at the end of a long pole were called phallophori. They generally appeared among the Greeks, besmeared with the dregs of wine, covered with skins of lambs, and wearing on their heads a crown of ivy. Lucian. de Dea Syr Plut. de Isid et Osir.

PHANÆ, a harbour of the island of Chios, with a temple of Apollo and a palm grove in its vicinity. Near it also was a promontory of the same name. Phanæ was in the southern part of the island, and the neighbourhood was remarkable for its excellent wine The promontory is now called Cape Mastico. Strab 14. - Virg. Georg. 2, 98.

PHANOTE, a town of Chaonia in Epirus, corresponding to the modern Gardiki a fortress once belonging to the Suliots

PHANTASIA, a daughter of Nicharchus of Memphis in Egypt. Some have supposed that she wrote a poem on the Trojan war, and another on the return of Ulysses to Ithaca, from which compositions Homer copied the greatest part of his Iliad and Odyssey, when he visited Memphis, where they were deposited PHAON, a boatman of Mitylene in Lesbos. He received a small box of ointment from Venus, who had presented herself to him in the form of an old woman, to be carried over into Asia, and as soon as he had rubbed himself with what the box contained, he became one of the most beautiful men of his age. Many were captivated with the charms of Phaon, and among others, Sappho, the celebrated poetess. Phaon gave himself up to the pleasures of Sappho's company; but, however, he soon conceived a disdain for her, and Sappho, mortified at his coldness, threw herself into the sea. Some say that Phaon was beloved by the goddess of beauty, who concealed him for some time among lettuces. [Vid. Leucadia.] Ælian says, that Phaon was killed by a man whose bed he was defiling. Ovid. Heroid. 21, 44.—Palæphat. de Iner. 49.

PHARÆ, a borough of Tanagra in Bœotia. Strab. 9.——One of the twelve cities of Achaia, situate on the river Pirus, about 70 stadia from the sea, and 120 from Patræ. It was annexed by Augustus to the colony of Patræ. It possessed an extensive forum, with an image of Mercury, and near it an oracle of the god. Its ruins are to be seen on the left bank of the Camenitza. Paus. 7, 22. Strab. 8.——A town of Crete.

PHARIS, a town of Laconia, whose inhabitants are called Pharitæ. Paus. 3, 20.

PHARMACOSA, or Pharmacusæ, two islets a short distance from the Attic shore, in the Sinus Saronicus, east of Salamis. In the larger of these Circe was said to have been buried. They are now called Kyra. Strab. 9.——An island of the Ægean sea, south-west from Miletus, and about 120 stadia distant from that place. It is known as the place where Julius Cæsar was taken by pirates. Plut. Vit. Cæs.—Sueton. Cæs. 4.

PHARNABAZUS, a satrap of Persia, son of a person of the same name, B. C 491. He assisted the Lacedæmonians against the Athenians, and gained their esteem by his friendly behaviour and support. His conduct, however, towards Alcibiades, was of the most perfidious nature, and he did not scruple to betray to his mortal enemies the man whom he had long honoured with his friendship. C. Nep. in Alc. Plut.

PHARNACES, a son of Mithridates, king of Pontus, who favoured the Romans against his father. He revolted against Mithridates, and even caused him to be put to death, according to some accounts. In the civil wars of Julius Cæsar and Pompey, he interested himself for neither of the contending parties, but hoped from their dissensions to raise the fallen power of Pontus, and regain the extensive dominions lost by his father. Cæsar was aware of his ambitious views, and therefore, after the conquest of Egypt he marched against the unsuspecting monarch and easily defeated him. It was to express the celerity of his operations in conquering Pharnaces, that the victorious Roman made use of these words, Veni, vidi, vici. Flor. 3.—Suet in Cæs. 37.—Paterc 2, 55.——A king of Pontus, who made war with Rumenes, B. C 181.

PHARNACIA, a town of Pontus, in Asia Minor Vid. Cerasus.

PHAROS, a small island in the bay of Alexandria, about seven furlongs distant from the continent. It was joined to the Egyptian shore with a causeway by Dexiphanes, B. C. 281, and upon it was built a celebrated tower, in the reign of Ptolemy Soter, and Philadelphus, by Sostratus, the son of Dexiphanes This tower which was called the tower of Pharos, and which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world, was built with white marble, and could be seen at the distance of 100 miles It had several stories raised one above another, adorned with columns, balustrades, and galleries, of the finest marble and workmanship. On the top fires were constantly kept to direct sailors in the bay, which was dangerous and difficult of access. The building of this tower cost the Egyptian monarch 800 talents, which are equivalent to above 165 000l. English, if Attic, or if Alexandrian double that sum There was this inscription upon it, King Ptolemy to the gods the saviours for the benefit of sailors; but Sostratus, the architect, wishing to claim all the glory, engraved his own name upon the stones, and afterwards filled the hollow with mortar, and wrote the above-mentioned inscription. When the mortar had decayed by time, Ptolemy's name disappeared, and the following inscription then became visible: Sostratus, the Cnidian, son of Dexiphanes, to the gods the saviours, for the benefit of sailors. The word Pharus is often used as Egyptian. Lucin 2, 63b. 3, 260. 6, 308. 9, 1004, &c.—*Ovid A. It was formerly called Paros from a colony of Parians who settled there Scymn. Ch 425.——The emperor Claudius ordered a tower to be built at the entrance of the port of Ostia, for the benefit of sailors and it likewise bore the name of Pharos, an appellation afterwards given to every other edifice which was raised to direct the course of sailors, either with lights or by signals Juv. 11, 76.

PHARSALUS, now Pharsala, a city of Thessaly, south west of Larissa, on the river Enipeus, which falls into the Apidanus, one of the tributaries of the Peneus. Although a city of considerable size and importance, we find no mention of it prior to the Persian invasion. Thucydides reports that it was besieged by the Athenian general Myronides after his success in Bœotia, but without avail. The same historian speaks of the services rendered to the Athenian people by Thucydides the Pharsalian, who performed the duties of proxenos to his countrymen at Athens; and he also states that the Pharsalians generally favoured that republic during the Peloponnesian war. Livy seems to make a distinction between the old and new town, as he speaks of Palæ-Pharsalus. In the neighbourhood of Pharsalus was a large plain called Pharsalia, famous for a battle which was fought there between Julius Cæsar and Pompey, in which the former obtained the victory. In that battle, which was fought on the 12th of May, B. C. 48, Cæsar lost about 200 men, or according to others, 1200. Pompey's loss was 15000, or 25000, according to others, and 24000 of his army were made prisoners of war by the conqueror. Thucyd. 1, 111. 8, 92. Liv. 44, 1.—Cæs. Bell. Civ. 3, 88. &c.—Appian. Bell. Civ. 2. Eutrop. 6, 16.—Plut. Vit. Cæs.—The poem of Lucan, in which he gives an account of the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey, bears the name of Pharsalia. Vid. Lucanus.

PHARUS, a Rutulian killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, 322.

PHARUSII, or PHAURUSII, a people of Africa, beyond Mauritania, situate perhaps to the east of the Autolotes, which latter people occupied the Atlantic coast of Africa, opposite to the Insulæ Fortunatæ. Mela, 1, 4.

PHASELIS, a town of Lycia, on the eastern coast, near the confines of Pamphylia, and a short distance south of mount Climax. Livy remarks that it was a conspicuous point for those sailing from Cilicia to Rhodes, since it advanced out towards the sea, and, on the other hand, a fleet could easily be descried from thence. Hence the epithet of σκοπιόεσσα applied to it by Dionysius Periegetes, who, it may be observed, ascribes it to Pamphylia. We are informed by Herodotus, that this town was colonized by some Dorians. Stephanus asserts that it was once name Pityussa. Though united to Lycia, it did not form part of the Lycian confederacy, but was governed by its own laws. It is mentioned by Thucydides as a place of some importance to the Athenian commerce, with Phœnicia and Cilicia. Phaselis, at a later period, having become the haunt of pirates, was attacked and taken by Servilius Isauricus. Cicero, in his orations against Verres, explains how, from the opportunity of its situation, it had fallen into the hands of the Cilician pirates. Lucan speaks of it as nearly deserted when visited by Pompey in his flight after the defeat of Pharsalus. Nevertheless, Strabo states that it was a considerable town, and possessed three ports: he observes also, that it was taken by Alexander, as an advantageous post for the prosecution of his conquests into the interior. Phaselis, according to Athenæus, was celebrated for the manufacture of rose-perfume. Nicander certainly recommends its roses. Pausanias reports that the spear of Achilles was pretended to be shown in the temple of Minerva in that town. The modern name of Phaselis is Tekrova. Liv. 37, 23.—*Dion. PHASIANA, a district of Armenia Major, through which the river Phasis or Araxes flows, hence the name of the region. The beautiful birds, which we call pheasants, still preserve in their name the traces of this their native country.

PHASIAS, a patronymic given to Medea, as being born near the Phasis. Ovid. Met 7.

PHASIS, now the Phas, a river of Asia, rising in the Moschian mountains, and flowing westward into the Euxine sea. It is a calm and gentle river and was considered by some as the boundary between Europe and Asia. From it the ancients often denoted Colchis by the epithet Phasiacus. The Phasis was remarkable for the beautiful birds which frequented its banks, some of which are said to have been brought by the Argonauts to Greece, and called φασιανοι φασιανικαι αves, Anglice pheasants, after the river. Strab 11.—Plin 6, 4.—Apoll Argon. 2, 401.—Properl. 1, 20, 15.——A city at the mouth of the Colchian Phasis, said to have been founded by a Milesian colony. Mela, 1, 85.——A river of Armenia Major, the same with the Araxes. Vid. Araxes PHAVORINUS, a native of Italy, born near Camerino. His true name was Guarino de Favera, which he changed for Varinus Phavorinus. He was the disciple of Politian and Lascaris; after which he became preceptor to John de Medici, who, when he ascended the papal throne, by the name of Leo 10th, made him bishop of Nocera. He died in 1537. He published a Greek Lexicon in 1523, but the best edition is that of Bortoli, Venet. 1712, fol.

PHAZANIA, a region of Africa, lying to the south of Tripolis. It is now Fezzan.

PHEGEUS, or PHLEGEUS, a companion of Æneas, killed by Turnus Virg Æn. 9, 765.——Another, likewise killed by Turnus Id. 12, 371, &c.——A son of Alphæus, king of a small town in Arcadia, which afterwards bore his name. He had two sons Temenus and Axion, and a daughter called Arsinoe, by Apollodorus, and Alphesiboea, by Pausanias. When Alcmæon, after the murder of his mother, fled to him, he hospitably received him, and when he had purified him of the foul crime, he gave him his daughter in marriage. He was afterwards put to death by the children of Alcmæon by Callirhoe, because he had ordered Alcmæon to be killed when he had attempted to recover a collar which he had given to his daughter. [Vid. Alcmæon.] Ovid. Met. 9, 412.——A Trojan prince, son of Dares, killed by Diomedes after many acts of valour in defence of his country. Homer Il. 5, 11.——A priest of Bacchus, who accompanied the god in his Indian expedition. Stat. Theb. 2, 609. 7, 803.

PHEMIUS, a man introduced by Homer as a musician among Penelope's suitors. Some say that he taught Homer, for which the grateful poet immortalized his name. Homer Od. 1 et 22.——A man, who, according to some, wrote an account of the return of the Greeks from the Trojan war. The word is applied by Ovid, Am. 3, 7, indiscriminately to any person who excels in music.

PHENEUS, a city in the northern part of Arcadia, at the foot of mount Cyllene. It was a town of great antiquity, since Hercules is said to have resided there after his departure from Tiryns, and Homer has mentioned it among the principal Arcadian cities. The place was surrounded by some extensive marshes, which are said to have once inundated the whole country, and to have destroyed the ancient town. They are more commonly called the lake of Pheneus, and were principally formed by the river Aroanius, or Olonus, which descends from the mountains to the north of Pheneus, and usually finds a vent in some natural caverns or katabathra at the extremity of the plain; but when, by accident, these happened to be blocked up, the waters filled the whole valley, and, communicating with the Ladon and Alphæus, overflowed the beds of those rivers as far as Olympia. Pausanias reports that vestiges of some great works undertaken to drain the Pheneus marshes, and ascribed by the natives to Hercules, were to be seen near the city The vestiges of the town itself are to be seen near the village of Phonia, upon an insulated rock. The lake is very small, and varies according to the season of the year. Homer. Il. 2, 605.—Eratosth. ap.

PHERÆ, a city of Pelasgiotis, in Thessaly, one of the most ancient and important places in the country. It was the capital of Admetus and Eumetus, as we learn from Homer and Apollonius Pherræ was formed at a later period as the native city of Jason, who, having raised himself to the head of affairs by his talents and ability, became master not only of his own city, but of nearly the whole of Thessaly. [Vid. Jason.] After the death of Jason, Pherræ was ruled over by Polydorus and Polyphron, his two brothers. The latter of these was succeeded by Alexander, who continued for eleven years the scourge of his native city and of the whole of Thessaly. His evil designs were for a time checked by the brave Pelopidas, who entered that province at the head of a Bœotian force, and occupied the citadel of Larissa; but on his falling into the hands of the tyrant, the Bœotian army was placed in a most perilous situation, and was only saved by the presence of mind and ability of Epaminondas, then serving as a volunteer. The Thebans subsequently rescued Pelopidas, and under his command made war upon Alexander of Pherræ whom they defeated, but at the expense of the life of their gallant leader, who fell in the action Alexander was not long after assassinated by his wife and her brothers, who continued to tyrannize over this country until it was liberated by Philip of Macedon. Many years after, Alexander fortified Pherræ, but Demetrius Poliorcetes contrived, by secret negotiations, to obtain possession both of the town and citadel. In the invasion of Thessaly by Antiochus, Pherræ was forced to surrender to the troops of that monarch after some resistance. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Roman consul Acilius Strabo observes that the constant tyranny under which this city laboured had hastened its decay Its territory was most fertile, and the suburbs were surrounded by gardens and walled enclosures *Hom. It was annexed by Augustus to Laconia, after the battle of Actium. Hom. Il. 9, 151 Paus. 4, 30

PHERÆUS, a surname of Jason, as being a native of Pherræ.

PHERECRATES a comic poet of Athens, in the age of Plato and Aristophanes. He is supposed to have written twenty one comedies, of which only a few verses remain. He introduced living characters on the stage, but never abused the liberty which he had taken, either by satire or defamation. He invented a sort of verse which from him has been called Pherecratean. It is composed of a spondee, a choriambus, and a catalectic syllable. The first foot is sometimes a trochee or an anapæst, rarely an iambus. When this species of verse has a spondee in the first station, it may then be scanned as a dactylic trimeter.

PHERECYDES a Grecian philosopher, contemporary with Thespander and Thales, who flourished about 660 B C., and was a native of the Island of Scyros. Some writers suppose that he derived his principles of philosophy from the sacred books of the Phœnicians; but others, who have carefully examined into the matter think that he had them from the Grecian philosophers. Josephus advances the opinion that he studied in Egypt, which is not improbable, since that country, in his time, was universally resorted to as the seat of learning. It was pretended that he had the power of predicting future events, that he foretold the destruction of a vessel at sea, and the approach of an earthquake, and that the event in both cases justified the prophecy. Admitting, however, the truth of these stories, it is easy to imagine that his knowledge was the result of a careful observation of those phenomena which commonly precede storms and earthquakes, in a country where they frequently happen; and it is not improbable that Pherecydes, like many other ancient philosophers, availed himself of his superior knowledge of nature to impose upon the ignorant multitude, by pretending to powers that he did not possess He is said to have been the first among the Greeians who wrote concerning the nature of the gods, that is, who wrote upon that subject in prose, since, before his time, Orpheus, Museus, and others, had written theogonies in verse Pherecydes died at the age of eighty five. It is not easy to ascertain the nature of the doctrines which he taught: he probably believed in an eternal first cause of all things; and in the immortality of the soul According to Cicero, he was the first philosopher whose writings this doctrine appeared. He is said to have taught the belief of the transmigration of the soul, this is probably true, it being a tenet commonly received among the Egyptians, and afterwards taught by Pythagoras, who was a pupil of Pherecydes Diog. Luc. Tusc. 1, 16. Dio. 1, 50.

PHERELEATTE a name of Proserpine

PHILERS, a son of Cretheus and Tyro, who built Pherræ in Thessaly, where he reigned He married Clymene by whom he had Admetus and Lycurgus Apollod 1, 9 —A son of Medea, stoned to death by the Corinthians, on account of the poisonous clothes which he had given to Glauce, Creon's daughter [Vid. Medea.] Paus 2, 3. —A friend of Æneas, killed by Halesus, Virg. Æn 10 413.

PHERETIMA the wife of Battus, king of Cyrene, and mother of Arcesilaus After her son's death, she recovered the kingdom by means of Amasis, king of Egypt, and to avenge the murder of Arcesilaus, she caused all his assassins to be crucified around the walls of Cyrene, and she cut off the breasts of their wives, and hung them up near the bodies of their husbands. It is said that she was devoured alive by worms, a punishment, which, according to some of the ancients, was inflicted by Providence for her unparalleled cruelties. Polyæn. 8 —Herod. 4, 201, &c.

PHERON, a king of Egypt, who succeeded Sesostris. He was blind, and he recovered his sight by washing his eyes, according to the directions of the oracle, in the urine of a woman who had never had any unlawful connexions He tried his wife first, but she appeared to have been faithless to his bed, and she was buried with all those whose urine could not restore sight to the king. He married the woman whose urine proved beneficial Herod 2, 111.

PHIDIAS, a celebrated statuary of Athens, son of Charmidas, and pupil to Eladas of Argos, who died P. C. 432. He made a statue of Minerva, at the request of Pericles, which was placed in the Parthenon. It was made with ivory and gold, and measured thirty-nine feet in height. It was universally admired, not only for its majestic appearance, but for the mythological representations with which it was judiciously adorned, for the battles of the Centaurs, the Amazons, the birth of Pandora, and of twenty of the gods, in which the workman had shown, not only his taste, but his learning and superior judgment. The serpent and the sphynx on which the lance in the hand of the goddess was supported were particularly entitled to approbation, as Pliny mentions in his circumstantial description of it, but as most of these historical events were represented on the shield of the statue, which was ten feet in diameter, their effect was in a great degree lost, as the image placed on a pedestal rendered a distant examination very difficult and indistinct. So celebrated a statue, while it displayed the merit of the artist, did not however diminish satirical reflections and malevolent insinuations, and Phidias, charged with arrogance and presumption, was no sooner accused of having carved his own image and that of Pericles on the shield of the goddess, than he was banished from Athens by the clamorous populace. He retired to Elis, where he determined to revenge the ill treatment he had received from his countrymen, by making a statue which should eclipse the fame of that of Minerva. He was successful in the attempt, and the statue which he made of Jupiter Olympius, likewise in gold and ivory, sixty feet high, was always reckoned the best of all his pieces, and has passed for one of the wonders of the world. The people of Elis were so sensible of his merit, and of the honour he had done to their city, that they appointed his descendants to the honourable office of keeping clean that magnificent statue, and of preserving it from injury. Pous. 9, 4. - Cic. de Orat. Plin. 36, 5 et 8. - Strab. 8. - Quintil. 12, 10. - Flut. in Per.

PHIDIPPIDES, a celebrated courier, who ran from Athens to Lacedæmon, about 152 English miles, in two days, to ask of the Lacedæmonians assistance against the Persians. The Athenians raised a temple to his memory. Herod. 6, 105.— C. Nep. in Mill.

PHIDITIA, a public entertainment at Sparta, where much frugality was observed, as the word (φείδεσθαι from φείδομαι, parco,) denotes. Persons of all ages were admitted, the younger frequented it as a school of temperance and sobriety, where they were trained to good manners and useful knowledge, by the example and the discourse of their elders. Cic. Tusc. 5, 34. - Pous. 3, 10.

PHIDON, a man who enjoyed the sovereign power at Argos, and is supposed to have invented scales and measures, and coined silver at Ægina. He died B. C. 854. Arist. - Herod. 6, 127. —An ancient legislator at Corinth.

PHILA, the eldest daughter of Antipater, who married Craterus. She afterwards married Demetrius, and when her husband had lost the kingdom of Macedonia, she poisoned herself. Plut.

PHILADELPHIA, a city of Lydia, south east of Sardes. It owed its foundation to Attalus Philadelphus, brother of Eumenes, king of Pergamus. Pliny reports, that it was seated on the river Cogamus, at the foot of mount Tmolus. Strabo places it on the border of Catacecaumene, and observes, that it suffered repeatedly from violent shocks of earthquakes. The walls and houses were constantly liable to be demolished, and as the inhabitants were continually apprehensive of some disaster to themselves and their property, it had nearly become deserted. Tacitus mentions it among the towns restored by Tiberius, after a more than ordinary calamity of this kind. In the midst of these alarms Christianity however flourished in Philadelphia, a fact which is well attested by the Book of Revelations, where it is mentioned as one of the seven churches. It is now called Allah sher, and preserves some remains of Christianity, and also a few monuments of heathen antiquity. Plin. 5, 29. Strab. 12 et 13. Tacit. Ann. 2, 47. Rev. 3, 7. —A city of Cilicia Trachea, on the river Calycadnus, to the north of Seleucia Trachea. It is supposed to be represented by the modern Moul, or Mood.— A city of the Ammonites, and their capital, situate among the mountains of Gilead, near the sources of the Jabok, or Jebacus. It received its name from Ptolemy Philadelphus. Its oriental appellation was Rabbath Ammon. Steph. Byz.

PHILADELPHUS, a king of Paphlagonia, who followed the interests of M. Antony. —The surname of one of the Ptolemies, king of Egypt, by antiphrasis, because he destroyed all his brothers. Vid. Ptolemæus second.

PHILÆ, an island and town of Egypt, south of Syene. The town appears to have owed its existence to the Ptolemies, who intended it as a friendly meeting place, and a common emporium, for the Egyptians and the Æthiopians from Meroe. The island contains at present many splendid remains of antiquity. The modern name is Gezeret ellharbe ("Temple-Island"), in allusion to the remains of antiquity upon it.

PHILÆNI, two brothers of Carthage. When a contest arose between the Cyreneans and Carthaginians, about the extent of their territories, it was mutually agreed, that, at a stated hour, two men should depart from each city, and that wherever they met, there they should fix the boundaries of their country. The Philæni accordingly departed from Carthage, and met the Cyreneans, when they had advanced far into their territories. This produced a quarrel, and the Cyreneans supported, that the Philæni had left Carthage before the appointment and that therefore they must return, or be buried in the sand. The Philæni agreed to the latter of these conditions, and they were accordingly buried in the sand. The Carthaginians to commemorate the patriotic deed of the Philæni, who had sacrificed their lives that the extent of their country might not be diminished, raised two altars on the place where their bodies had been buried, which they called Philænorum aræ. These altars were the boundaries of the Carthaginian dominions, which on the other side extended as far as the columns of Hercules, which is about 2000 miles, or according to the accurate observations of the moderns, only 14.0 geographical miles. *Sall. de Bell. PHILAMMON, the son of Chrysothemis of Crete. He was distinguished for his musical powers, and was the second person who obtained a prize at the Pythian games. His father was the first who carried off the prize at them, and his son Thamyris the third.

PHILEMON, a comic poet, the rival of Menander. According to some authorities, he was a native of Syracuse, while others make him to have been born at Soloe in Cilicia. He seems to have been a writer of considerable powers. His wit, ingenuity, skill in depiction of character, and expression of sentiment, are praised by Apuleius, while he pronounces him inferior to his more celebrated antagonist. Temperance of body, with cheerfulness of mind, prolonged his life to the great age of 101 years, during which period he composed ninety-seven comedies. The manner of his death is variously related. The account of Apuleius is the most probable, which makes him to have expired without pain or disease, from the mere exhaustion of nature. The fragments of Philemon are usually printed along with those of Menander. The best edition of these conjointly is that of Meineke, Berol 1823, 8vo. *Suidas. PHILETÆRUS, an eunuch, made governor of Pergamus by Lysimachus. He quarrelled with Lysimachus, and made himself master of Pergamus, where he laid the foundations of a kingdom called the kingdom of Pergamus, B.C 283. He reigned there for twenty years, and at his death he appointed his nephew Eumenes as his successor. Paus 1, 8.

PHILETAS, a grammarian and poet of Cos, in the reign of king Philip, and of his son Alexander the Great. He was made preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus. The elegies and epigrams which he wrote have been greatly commended by the ancients, and some fragments of them are still preserved in Athenæus. He was so small and slender, according to the improbable accounts of Ælian, that he always carried pieces of lead in his pockets, to prevent being blown away by the wind. Ælian. V. H. 9, 14 — Ovid. Fast. 1, 5. &c PHILINUS, a native of Agrigentum, who fought with Annibal against the Romans. He wrote a partial history of the Punic wars. C. Nep. in Annib. —Polyb.

PHILIPPEI, or PHILIPPI, certain pieces of money coined in the reign of Philip of Macedonia, and with his image. Horat ep. 2, 1. 234 Liv 31, 52. 37, 59. 39, 5 et 7.

PHILIPPI, a city of Thrace, to the north-east of Amphipolis, and in the immediate vicinity of mount Pangæus It was founded by the Thasians, and by them called Crenides from its many springs, (κρῆναι, fontes.) Philip of Macedon subsequently increased it, naming it Philippi after himself. It is celebrated in history from the great victory gained there by Antony and Augustus over the forces of Brutus and Cassius, by which the republican party was completely subdued. It is likewise rendered very interesting from the circumstance of its being the first place in Europe where the Gospel was preached by St Paul, (A D 51) as we know from the 16th of the Acts of the Apostles, and also from the Epistle he has addressed to his Philippian converts, where the zeal and charity of the Philippians towards their apostle received a just commendation. Its ruins still retain the name of Filibah. Dicd Sic, 16.— Appian. Bel Civ. 4, 107 &c. —Dio. Cass. 47, 41 Fig. G. 1, 490. —Lucan. 1, 680.

PHILIPPIDES, a Greek comic poet, son of Philocles. He flourished B C. 335. He was in great favour with Lysimachus, the general, and afterwards one of the successors of Alexander This intimacy was the cause of many benefits to the Athenians, bestowed by Lysimachus at the intercession of the patriotic poet. Philippides died at an advanced age, from excess of joy on obtaining the comic prize contrary to his expectations The number of his plays was forty-five; the titles of nine have been collected. Plut in Dem. Aul. Gell. 3, 15.

PHILIPPOPOLIS, a city in the interior of Thrace, on the south-east side of the Hebrus, and some distance to the north-west of Hadrianopolis. It was situate in a large plain on a mountain with three summits, and hence received also the appellation of Trimontium. It was founded by Philip of Macedon. Its modern name is Filibe or Philippopoli Tacit An. 3, 38. Polyb. 5, 100 —Plin. Nat. Hist. 4, 10

PHILIPPUS 1st, son of Argæus, succeeded his father on the throne of Macedonia, and reigned thirty eight years, B C. 640 ——The second of that name was the fourth son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. He was sent to Thebes as an hostage by his father, where he learned the art of war under Epaminondas, and studied with the greatest care the manners and the pursuits of the Greeks. He was recalled to Macedonia, and at the death of his brother Perdiccas, he ascended the throne as guardian and protector of the youthful years of his nephew His ambition, however, soon discovered itself, and he made himself independent. The valour of a prudent general, and the policy of an experienced statesman, seemed requisite to ensure his power. The neighbouring nations, ridiculing the youth and inexperience of the new king of Macedonia, appeared in arms, but Philip soon convinced them of their error Unable to meet them as yet in the field of battle, he suspended their fury by presents, and soon turned his arms against Amphipolis, a colony tributary to the Athenians. Amphipolis was conquered and added to the kingdom of Macedonia, and Philip meditated no less than the destruction of a republic which had rendered itself so formidable to the rest of Greece, and had even claimed submission from the princes of Macedonia. His designs, however, were as yet immature, and before he could make Athens an object of conquest, the Thracians and the Illyrians demanded his attention. He made himself master of a Thracian colony, to which he gave the name of Philippi, and from which he received the greatest advantages on account of the golden mines in the neighbourhood. In the midst of his political prosperity, Philip did not neglect the honour of his family. He married Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, king of the Molossi; and when some time after he became father of Alexander, the monarch, conscious of the inestimable advantages which arise from the lessons, the example, and the conversation of a learned and virtuous preceptor wrote a letter with his own hand to the philosopher Aristotle, and begged him to retire from his usual pursuits, and to dedicate his whole time to the instruction of the young prince. Every thing seemed now to conspire to his aggrandizement, and historians have observed, that Philip received in one day the intelligence of three things which could gratify the most unbounded ambition, and flatter the hopes of the most aspiring monarch: the birth of a son, an honourable crown at the Olympic games, and a victory over the barbarians of Illyricum. But all these increased rather than satiated his ambition he declared his inimical sentiments against the power of Athens, and the independence of all Greece, by laying siege to Olynthus, a place which, on account of its situation and consequence, would prove most injurious to the interests of the Athenians, and most advantageous to the intrigues and military operations of every Macedonian prince. The Athenians, roused by the eloquence of Demosthenes, sent seventeen vessels and 2,000 men to the assistance of Olynthus, but the money of Philip prevailed over all their efforts. The greatest part of the citizens suffered themselves to be bribed by the Macedonian gold, and Olynthus surrendered to the enemy, and was instantly reduced to ruins. His successes were as great in every part of Greece; he was declared head of the Amphictyonic council, and was entrusted with the care of the sacred temple of Apollo at Delphi. If he was recalled to Macedonia, it was only to add fresh laurels to his crown, by victories over his enemies in Illyricum and Thessaly. By assuming the mask of a moderator and peace maker he gained the confidence of his weak and too credulous neighbours, and in attempting to protect the Peloponnesians against the encroaching power of Sparta, he rendered his cause popular, and by ridiculing the insults that were offered to his person as he passed through Corinth, he displayed to the world his moderation and philosophic virtues. In his attempts to make himself master of Eubœa, Philip was unsuccessful, and Phocion, who despised his gold as well as his meanness, obliged him to evacuate an island whose inhabitants were as insensible to the charms of money, as they were unmoved at the horrors of war, and the bold efforts of a vigilant enemy. From Eubœa he turned his arms against the Scythians, but the advantages which he obtained over this indigent nation were inconsiderable, and he again made Greece an object of plunder and rapine. He advanced far into Bœotia, and a general engagement was fought at Chæronea. The fight was long and bloody, but Philip obtained the victory. His behaviour after the battle reflects great disgrace upon him as a man, and as a monarch. In the hour of festivity, and during the entertainment which he had given to celebrate the trophies which he had won, Philip sallied from his camp, and with the inhumanity of a brute, he insulted the bodies of the slain, and gloried in the calamities of the prisoners of war. His insolence, however, was checked when Demades, one of the Athenian captives, reminded him of the brutal indecency of his conduct by exclaiming, Why do you, O king! act the part of a Thersites, when you can represent with so much dignity the elevated character of an Agamemnon? The reproof was felt. Demades received his liberty, and Philip learned how to gain popularity even among his fallen enemies, by relieving their wants and easing their distresses. At the battle of Chæronea the independence of Greece was extinguished; and Philip, unable to find new enemies in Europe, formed new enterprises and meditated new conquests. He was by the influence of his conquests and the flattery of his slaves nominated general of the Greeks against the Persians, and was called upon as well from inclination as duty to revenge those injuries which Greece had suffered from the invasions of Darius and Xerxes. But he was stopped in the midst of his [illegible] preparations, he was stabbed by Pausanias as he entered the theatre, at the celebration of the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra. This murder has given rise to many reflections upon the causes which produced it; and many who consider the recent repudiation of Olympias, and the resentment of Alexander, are apt to trace the causes of his death into the bosom of his family. The ridiculous honours which Olympias paid to her husband's murderer strengthened the suspicion, yet Alexander declared that he invaded the kingdom of Persia to revenge his father's death upon the Persian satraps and princes, by whose immediate intrigues the assassination had been committed. The character of Philip is that of a sagacious, artful, prudent, and intriguing monarch: he was brave in the field of battle, eloquent and dissimulating at home; and he possessed the wonderful art of changing his conduct according to the disposition and caprice of mankind, without ever altering his purpose, or losing sight of his ambitious aims. He possessed much perseverance, and in the execution of his plans he was always vigorous. The hand of an assassin prevented him from achieving the boldest and the most extensive of his undertakings; and he might have acquired as many laurels, and conquered as many nations, as his son Alexander did in the succeeding reign, and the kingdom of Persia might have been added to the Macedonian empire, perhaps with greater moderation, with more glory, and with more lasting advantages. The private character of Philip lies open to censure, and raises indignation. The admirer of his virtues is disgusted to find him amongst the most abandoned prostitutes, and disgracing himself by the most unnatural crimes and lascivious indulgences, which can make even the most debauched and the most profligate to blush. He was murdered in the 47th year of his age and the 24th of his reign, about 336 years before the Christian era. His reign is become uncommonly interesting, and his administration a matter of instruction. He is not only the first monarch whose life and actions are described with peculiar accuracy and historical faithfulness, but the sagacious prince who elevated Macedonia to an eminent rank among nations, and laid the foundations of those victorious armies which a few years after changed the face of the world, by the destruction of an ancient monarchy, and the introduction of the arts, the language, the manners, and intrigues of Greece into Asia. Philip was the father of Alexander the Great and of Cleopatra, by Olympias; he had also by Audata, an Illyrian Cyna, who married Amyntas, the son of Perdiccas, Philip's elder brother; by Nicesipolis, a Thessalian, Nicesa, who married Cassander; by Philinna, a Larissean dancer, Aridæus, who reigned some time after Alexander's death; by Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus, Caranus and Europa, who were both murdered by Olym las, and Ptolemy, the first king of Egypt, by Arsinoe, who in the first month of her pregnancy was married to Lagus. Demosth. in Phil. et Olynth. Justin 7, &c.—Plut. in Alex. Dem. et Apoph.—The last king of Macedonia of that name, was son of Demetrius. His infancy, at the death of his father, was protected by Antigonus, one of his friends, who ascended the throne, and reigned for twelve years, with the title of independent monarch. When Antigonus died, Philip recovered his father's throne, though only fifteen years of age, and he early distinguished himself by his boldness and his ambitious views His cruelty, however, to Aratus, soon displayed his character in its true light; and to the gratification of every vice, and every extravagant propensity, he had the meanness to sacrifice the faithful and virtuous Athenian Not satisfied with the kingdom of Macedonia, Philip aspired to become the friend of Annibal, and wished to share with him the spoils which the distresses and long continued defeats of the Romans seemed soon to promise But his expectations were frustrated, the Romans discovered his intrigues, and though weakened by the valour and artifice of the Carthaginians, yet they were soon enabled to meet him in the field of battle. The consul Lævinus entered without delay his territories of Macedonia, and after he had obtained a victory over him near Apollonia, and reduced his fleet to ashes, he compelled him to sue for peace This peaceful disposition was not permanent, and when the Romans discovered that he had assisted their immortal enemy Annibal, with men and money, they appointed T Q. Flaminius to punish his perfidy, and the violation of the treaty. The Roman consul, with his usual expedition, invaded Macedonia; and in a general engagement which was fought near Cynocephalæ, the hostile army was totally defeated, and the monarch saved his life with difficulty by flying from the field of battle. Destitute of resources, without friends either at home or abroad, Philip was obliged to submit to the mercy of the conqueror, and to demand peace by his ambassadors. It was granted with difficulty, the terms were humiliating; but the poverty of Philip obliged him to accept the conditions, however disadvantageous and degrading to his dignity. In the midst of these public calamities, the peace of his family was disturbed; and Perses, the eldest of his sons by a concubine, raised seditions against his brother Demetrius, whose condescension and humanity had gained popularity among the Macedonians, and who, from his residence at Rome, as an hostage, had procured the good graces of the senate, and by the modesty and innocence of his manners, had obtained forgiveness from that venerable body for the hostilities of his father. Philip listened with too much avidity to the false accusation of Perses; and when he heard it asserted that Demetrius wished to rob him of his crown, he no longer hesitated to punish with death so unworthy and so ungrateful a son. No sooner was Demetrius sacrificed to credulity than Philip became convinced of his cruelty and rashness, and to punish the perfidy of Perses, he attempted to make Antigonus, another son, his successor on the Macedonian throne But he was prevented from executing his purpose by death, in the forty-second year of his reign, 179 years before the Christian era. The assassin of Demetrius succeeded his father; and with the same ambition, with the same rashness and oppression, renewed the war against the Romans till his empire was destroyed and Macedonia became a Roman province. Philip has been compared with his great ancestor of the same name, but though they possessed the same virtues, the same ambition, and were tainted with the same vices, yet the father of Alexander was more sagacious and more intriguing, and the son of Demetrius was more suspicious, more cruel, and more implacable; and according to the pretended prophecy of one of the Sibyls, Macedonia was indebted to one Philip for her rise and consequence among nations, and under another Philip she lamented the loss of her power, her empire, and her dignity. Polyb 16, &c.—Justin. 29, &c.—Plut. in Flam. Paus 7, 8.——M. Julius, a Roman emperor, of an obscure family in Arabia, from which he was surnamed Arabian. From the lowest rank in the army he gradually rose to the highest offices, and when he was made general of the prætorian guards he assassinated Gordian to make himself emperor. To establish himself with more certainty on the imperial throne, he left Mesopotamia a prey to the continual invasions of the Persians, and hurried to Rome, where his election was universally approved by the senate and the Roman people. Philip rendered his cause popular by his liberality and profusion; and it added much to his splendour and dignity that the Romans during his reign commemorated the foundation of their city, a solemnity which was observed but once every hundredth year, and which was celebrated with more pomp and more magnificence than under the preceding reigns The people were entertained with games and spectacles, the theatre of Pompey was successively crowded during three days and three nights, and 2000 gladiators bled in the circus at once, for the amusement and pleasure of a gazing populace. His usurpation, however, was short, Philip was defeated by Decius, who had proclaimed himself emperor in Pannonia, and he was assassinated by his own soldiers near Verona, in the forty-fifth year of his age, and the fifth of his reign, A. D. 249. His son who bore the same name, and who had shared with him the imperial dignity, was also massacred in the arms of his mother. Young Philip was then in the twelfth year of his age, and the Romans lamented in him the loss of rising talents, of natural humanity, and endearing virtues. Aurel Victor.—Zosim.——A native of Acarnania, physician to Alexander the Great. When the monarch had been suddenly taken ill, after bathing in the Cydnus, Philip undertook to remove the complaint, when the rest of the physicians believed that all medical assistance would be ineffectual. But as he was preparing his medicine, Alexander received a letter from Parmenio, in which he was advised to be aware of his physician Philip, as he had conspired against his life. The monarch was alarmed; and when Philip presented him his medicine, he gave him Parmenio's letter to peruse, and began to drink the potion. The serenity and composure of Philip's countenance, as he read the letter, removed every suspicion from Alexander's breast. He pursued the directions of his physician, and in a few days recovered. Plut. in Alex.——A son of Alexander the Great, murdered by order of Olympias.——A man who pretended to be the son of Perses, that he might lay claim to the kingdom of Macedonia. He found his master's body deserted on the sea-shore, in Egypt, and he gave it a decent burial, with the assistance of an old Roman soldier, who had fought under Pompey.

PHILISCUS, a famous sculptor, whose statues of Latona, Venus, Diana, the Muses, and a naked Apollo, were preserved in the portico belonging to Octavia.

PHILISTION, a comic poet of Nicæa, in the age of Socrates, who is said to have died from excessive laughter Martial. 2, 11.

PHILISTUS, a Syracusan, who, during his banishment from his native country, wrote a history of Sicily in twelve books, which was commended by some, though censured for inaccuracy by Pausanias. He was afterwards sent against the Syracusans by Dionysius the Younger, and he killed himself when overcome by the enemy, 356 B. C. Plut in Dion

PHILO, a learned Jewish writer who flourished in the first century, and under the reign of Caligula, was of the sacerdotal family, and brother to the chief magistrate of his race at Alexandria, where he was born. He received his education at his native place, and distinguished himself by his proficiency in eloquence, philosophy, and scriptural knowledge. Eusebius says of him, that "he was a man copious in speech, rich in sentiments, and eminent and sublime in his acquaintance with the holy scriptures." He was particularly versed in the Platonic philosophy. If we attend to the nature of Jewish learning at this period, and compare it with the spirit of the Alexandrian schools, we shall perceive the manner in which Plato studied philosophy. From the time of the Ptolemies, the use of allegories had been borrowed by the Jews from their Egyptian neighbours, and by the help of these, Platonic and Pythagorean learning was introduced among them, as the concealed and symbolical sense of their own law. In this manner they were enabled to make what use they pleased of their systems, without appearing to be indebted to heathen philosophers. These systems likewise were adulterated with many dogmas from the oriental philosophy, particularly on the subject of the divine nature. This philosophy, which had been well received in Alexandria, Philo embraced, and he appears to have interwoven the Platonic learning and opinions with the doctrines of the sacred oracles, and ascribed them to Moses. It is also probable that he was, in part, influenced by the example of the Essenes and Therapeutæ, whose method of philosophising he imitated, though he did not adopt their manner of living. for he always speaks of them in the highest terms of commendation. Philo was not so completely immersed in philosophical studies as to neglect the cultivation of eloquence, and to withdraw his attention from civil affairs. On the contrary, he seems to have acquired a high reputation as an orator, and as a man of wisdom and prudence in the conduct of important negotiations: hence we find him placed at the head of a deputation sent by his countrymen to Rome in the year 40, with the design of vindicating them from the calumnies with which they were loaded by the Alexandrians, and of defending their cause against Appian. Though his mission proved fruitless, he committed the substance of his apology for the Jews to writing, and in it gave a favourable specimen of his learning, talents, and integrity. Eusebius relates, that after the death of Caligula this apology was read in the Roman senate. The best edition of the works of Philo is that of Mangey, Lond. 1742, 2 vol. fol.

PHILOCLES, one of the admirals of the Athenian fleet, during the Peloponnesian war. He recommended to his countrymen to cut off the right hand of such of the enemies as were taken, that they might be rendered unfit for future service. His plan was adopted by all the ten admirals except one; but their expectations were frustrated, and instead of being conquerors, they were totally defeated at Ægospotamos by Lysander, and Philocles with 3000 of his countrymen were put to death, and refused the honours of sepulture. Plut in Lys —— A tragic poet of Athens, nephew to Æschylus. He was ugly in his person and morose in his temper. He had a son of the same name who cultivated the muses with equal success Suidas

PHILOCTETES, son of Pœan and Demonassa, was one of the Argonauts according to Hyginus and Hyginus, and the arm-bearer and particular friend of Hercules. He was present at the death of Hercules, and because he had erected the burning pile on which the hero was consumed, he received from him the arrows which had been dipped in the gall of the hydra, after he had bound himself by a solemn oath not to betray the place where his ashes were deposited. He had no sooner paid the last offices to Hercules, than he returned to Melibœa, where his father reigned. From thence he visited Sparta, where he became one of the numerous suitors of Helen, and soon after, like the rest of those princes who had courted the daughter of Tyndarus, and who had bound themselves to protect her from injury, he was called upon by Menelaus to accompany the Greeks to the Trojan war, and he immediately set sail from Melibœa with seven ships, and repaired to Aulis, the general rendezvous of the combined fleet. He was here prevented from joining his countrymen, and the offensive smell which arose from a wound in his foot, obliged the Greeks, at the instigation of Ulysses, to remove him from the camp, and he was accordingly carried to the island of Lemnos, or as others say to Chryse, where Phimachus, the son of Dolophion, was ordered to wait upon him. In this solitary retreat he was suffered to remain for some time, till the Greeks, on the tenth year of the Trojan war, were informed by the oracle that Troy could not be taken without the arrows of Hercules, which were then in the possession of Philoctetes. Upon this Ulysses, accompanied by Diomedes, or according to others, by Pyrrhus, was commissioned by the rest of the Grecian army to go to Lemnos, and to prevail upon Philoctetes to come and finish the tedious siege. Philoctetes recollected the ill treatment which he had received from the Greeks, and particularly from Ulysses, and therefore he not only refused to go to Troy, but he even persuaded Pyrrhus to conduct him to Melibœa,

As he embarked, the manes of Hercules forbade him to proceed, but immediately to repair to the Grecian camp, where he should be cured of his wounds, and put an end to the war. Philoctetes obeyed; and after he had been restored to his former health by Æsculapius, or, according to some, by Machaon, or Podalirus, he destroyed a great number of the Trojan enemy, among whom was Paris, the son of Priam, with the arrows of Hercules. When by his valour Troy had been ruined, he set sail from Asia, but as he was unwilling to visit his native country, he came to Italy, where, by the assistance of his Thessalian followers, he was enabled to build a town in Calabria, which he called Petilia. Authors disagree about the causes of the wound which Philoctetes received on the foot. The most ancient mythologists support, that it was the bite of the serpent which Juno had sent to torment him, because he had attended Hercules in his last moments, and had buried his ashes. According to another opinion, the princes of the Grecian army obliged him to discover where the ashes of Hercules were deposited, and as he had made an oath not to mention the place, he only with his foot struck the ground where they lay, and by this means concluded he had not violated his solemn engagement. For this, however, he was soon after punished, and the fall of one of the poisoned arrows from his quiver upon the foot which had struck the ground, occasioned so offensive a wound, that the Greeks were obliged to remove him from their camp. The sufferings and adventures of Philoctetes are the subject of one of the best tragedies of Sophocles. Virg Æn. 3. 46. - Dictys Cret 1, 14.—Senec in Herc—Sophocl Phil—*Quint. PHILOMBROTUS, an archon at Athens, in whose age the state was entrusted to Solon, when torn by factions Plut in Sol.

PHILOMELA, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens, and sister to Procne, who had married Tereus king of Thrace. Procne separated from Philomela, to whom she was particularly attached, spent her time in great melancholy till she prevailed upon her husband to go to Athens, and bring her sister to Thrace. Tereus obeyed his wife's injunctions, but he had no sooner obtained Pandion's permission to conduct Philomela to Thrace, than he became enamoured of her and resolved to gratify his passion. He dismissed the guards, whom the suspicions of Pandion had appointed to watch his conduct, and he offered violence to Philomela, and afterwards cut off her tongue, that she might not be able to discover his barbarity, and the indignities which she had suffered. He confined her also in a lonely castle, and after he had taken every precaution to prevent a discovery he returned to Thrace, and he told Procne that Philomela had died by the way, and that he had paid the last offices to her remains. Procne, at this sad intelligence put on mourning for the loss of Philomela; but a year had scarcely elapsed before she was secretly informed that her sister was not dead. Philomela, during her captivity, described on a piece of tapestry her misfortunes and the brutality of Tereus, and privately conveyed it to Procne. She was then going to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus when she received it; she disguised her resentment, and as during the festivals of the god of wine, she was permitted to rove about the country, she hastened to deliver her sister Philomela from her confinement, and she concerted with her on the best measures of punishing the cruelty of Tereus She murdered her son Itylus, who was in the sixth year of his age, and served him up as food before her husband during the festival Tereus, in the midst of his repast, called for Itylus, but Procne immediately informed him, that he was then feasting on his flesh, and that instant Philomela, by throwing on the table the head of Itylus, convinced the monarch of the cruelty of the scene. He drew his sword to punish Procne and Philomela, but as he was going to stab them to the heart, he was changed into a hoopoe, Philomela into a nightingale, Procne into a swallow, and Itylus into a pheasant. This tragical scene happened at Daulis in Phocis; but Pausanias and Strabo, who mention the whole of the story, are silent about the transformation; and the former observes, that Tereus, after this bloody repast, fled to Megara, where he destroyed himself. The inhabitants of the place raised a monument to his memory, where they offered yearly sacrifices, and placed small pebbles instead of barley It was on this monument that the birds called hoopoes were first seen, hence the fable of his metamorphosis. Procne and Philomela died through excess of grief and melancholy, and as the notes of the nightingale and of the swallow are peculiarly plaintive and mournful, the poets have embellished the fable by supposing that the two unfortunate sisters were changed into birds. Apollod. 3, 14.—Paus 1. 42. 10. 4. - Hygin. fab. 45 —Strab. 9.— *Ovid. He was tall in stature, but unpolished in mind, whence the proverb of Philonide indoctior Suidas.

PHILOPATOR, a surname of one of the Ptolemies, king of Egypt. Vid. Ptolemæus.

PHILOPŒMEN, a celebrated general of the Achæan league, born at Megalopolis. His father's name was Grangis. His education was begun and finished under Cassander, Ecdemus, and Demophanes, and he early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and appeared fond of agriculture and a country life. He proposed to himself Epaminondas for a model, and he was not unsuccessful in imitating the prudence and the simplicity, the disinterestedness and activity of this famous Theban. When Megalopolis was attacked by the Spartans, Philopœmen, then in the 30th year of his age, gave the most decisive proofs of his valour and intrepidity. He afterwards assisted Antigonus, and was present in the famous battle in which the Ætolians were defeated. Raised to the rank of chief commander, he showed his ability by the faithful discharge of that important trust, and his personal valour by killing with his own hand Mechanidas, the tyrant of Sparta; and if he was defeated in a naval battle by Nabis, he soon after repaired his losses by taking the capital of Laconia, B. C. 188, and by abolishing the laws of Lycurgus, which had flourished there for such a length of time. Sparta, after its conquest, became tributary to the Achæans, and Philopœmen enjoyed the triumph of having reduced to ruins one of the greatest and the most powerful of the cities of Greece. Some time after the Messenians revolted from the Achæan league, and Philopœmen, who headed the Achæans, unfortunately fell from his horse, and was dragged to the enemy's camp. Dinocrates, the general of the Messenians, treated him with great severity; he was thrown into a dungeon, and obliged to drink a dose of poison. When he received the cup from the hand of the executioner, Philopœmen asked him how his countrymen had behaved in the field of battle; and when he heard that they had obtained the victory, he drank the whole with pleasure, exclaiming, that this was comfortable news. The death of Philopœmen, which happened about 183 years before the Christian era, in his 70th year, was universally lamented, and the Achæans, to revenge his fate, immediately marched to Messenia, where Dinocrates, to avoid their resentment, killed himself. The rest of his murderers were dragged to his tomb, where they were sacrificed; and the people of Megalopolis, to show farther their great sense of his merit, ordered a bull to be yearly offered on his tomb, and hymns to be sung in his praise, and his actions to be celebrated in a panegyrical oration. He had also statues raised to his memory, which some of the Romans attempted to violate, and to destroy, to no purpose, when Mummius took Corinth. Philopœmen has been justly called by his countrymen the last of the Greeks. Plut. in Vita.—Justin. 32, 4.—Polyb.

PHILOSTRATUS, a famous sophist, born at Lemnos, or according to some, at Athens. He came to Rome, where he lived under the patronage of Julia, the wife of the emperor Severus, and he was entrusted by the empress with all the papers which contained some account, or anecdotes of Apollonius Thyaneus, and he was ordered to review them, and with them to compile an history. The life of Apollonius is written with elegance, but the improbable accounts, the fabulous stories, and exaggerated details which it gives, render it disgusting. There is, besides, another treatise remaining of his writings, &c. He died A. D. 244. The best edition of his writings is that of Olearius, fol. Lips. 1709.——His nephew, who lived in the reign of Heliogabalus, wrote an account of sophists.

PHILOTAS, a son of Parmenio, distinguished for bravery in the battles of Alexander, and at last accused of conspiring against his life. He was in consequence tortured and stoned to death, or, according to some, struck through with darts by the soldiers, B. C. 330. Curt. 6, 11.—Plut. in Alex.—Arrian.

PHILOTIS, a servant-maid at Rome, who saved her countrymen from destruction. After the siege of Rome by the Gauls, the Fidenates assembled an army under the command of Lucius Posthumius, and marched against the capital, demanding all the wives and daughters in the city, as the conditions of peace. This extraordinary demand astonished the senators, and when they refused to comply, Philotis advised them to send all their female slaves disguised in matrons' clothes, and she offered to march herself at the head. Her advice was followed, and when the Fidenates had feasted late in the evening, and were quite intoxicated, and fallen asleep, Philotis lighted a torch as a signal for her countrymen to attack the enemy. The whole was successful, the Fidenates were conquered, and the senate, to reward the fidelity of the female slaves, permitted them to appear in the dress of the Roman matrons. Plut. in Rom. —Varro de L. L 5.—Ovid de Art. Am. 2.

PHILOXENUS, an officer of Alexander, who received Cilicia, at the general division of the provinces.——A son of Ptolemy who was given to Polopidas as an hostage.——A native of Cythera, poet of Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily, for some time, till he offended him by seducing one of his female singers. During his confinement, Philoxenus composed an allegorical poem, called Cyclops, in which he had delineated the character of the tyrant under the name of Polyphemus, and represented his mistress under the name of Galatæa, and himself under that of Ulysses. The tyrant, who was fond of writing poetry, and of being applauded, removed Philoxenus from his dungeon, but the poet refused to purchase his liberty, by saying things unworthy of himself, and applauding the wretched verses of Dionysius, and therefore he was sent to the quarries. When he was asked his opinion at a feast about some verses which Dionysius had just repeated, and which the courtiers had received with the greatest applause, Philoxenus gave no answer, but he ordered the guards that surrounded the tyrant's table to take him back to the quarries. Dionysius was pleased with his pleasantry and with his firmness, and immediately forgave him. Philoxenus died at Ephesus, about 380 years before Christ. Cic. Att. 4, 6.—Plut. de Virt. Alex.——A painter of Eretria, who made for Cassander an excellent representation of the battle of Alexander with Darius. He was pupil to Nicomachus. Plin. 31, 10.

PHILYRA, one of the Oceanides, who was met by Saturn in Thrace. The god, to escape from the vigilance of Rhea, changed himself into a horse, to enjoy the company of Philyra, by whom he had a son, half a man and half a horse, called Chiron. Philyra was so ashamed of giving birth to such a monster, that she entreated the gods to change her nature. She was metamorphosed into the linden tree, called by her name among the Greeks. Hygin. fab. 183.

PHILYRIDES, a patronymic of Chiron, the son of Philyra. Ovid. Art. Am. Virg G. 3. 550.

PHINEUS, a son of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, or, according to some, of Neptune, who became king of Thrace, or, as the greater part of the mythologists support, of Bithynia. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Boreas, whom some call Cleobula, by whom he had Plexippus and Pandion. After the death of Cleopatra, he married Idæa, the daughter of Dardanus. Idæa, jealous of Cleopatra's children, accused them of attempts upon their father's life and crown, or, according to some, of attempts upon her virtue, and they were immediately condemned by Phineus to be deprived of their eyes. This cruelty was soon after punished by the gods, Phineus suddenly became blind, and the Harpies were sent by Jupiter to keep him under continual alarm, and to spoil the meats which were placed on his table. He was some time after delivered from these dangerous monsters by his brothers-in-law, Zetes and Calais, who pursued them as far as the Strophades He also recovered his sight by means of the Argonauts, whom he had received with great hospitality, and instructed in the easiest and speediest way by which they could arrive in Colchis. The causes of the blindness of Phineus are a matter of dispute among the ancients, some supposing that this was inflicted by Boreas, for his cruelty to his grandson, whilst others attribute it to the anger of Neptune, because he had directed the sons of Phrixus how to escape from Colchis to Greece. Many, however, think that it proceeded from his having rashly attempted to develope futurity, while others assert that Zetes and Calais put out his eyes on account of his cruelty to their nephews. The second wife of Phineus is called by some Dia, Eurytia, Danae, and Idothea Phineus was killed by Hercules Apollod. 1, 9 3, 15 —Hygin. fab 19.—The brother of Cepheus, king of Æthiopia. He was going to marry his niece Andromeda, when her father Cepheus was obliged to give her up to be devoured by a sea-monster, to appease the resentment of Neptune. She was, however, delivered by Perseus, who married her by the consent of her parents, for having destroyed the sea-monster. This marriage displeased Phineus; he interrupted the ceremony, and with a number of attendants, attacked Perseus and his friends. Perseus defended himself, and turned into stone Phineus, and his companions, by showing them the Gorgon's head. Apollod. 2, 1 et 4 — Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 1 et 2.—Hygin. fab. 64.

PHINTIAS, a city of Sicily, to the east of Gela, on the southern coast. It was founded by Phintias, tyrant of Agrigentum, who began to reign the next year after the death of Agathocles. Phintias transferred to his new city the inhabitants of Gela, which latter place from this time became deserted and ceased to exist. Diod. Sic. 22. 2. — Strab. 6. —A tyrant of Agrigentum, the year after the death of Agathocles.

PHLEGĔTHON, a river of hell, whose waters were burning, as the word φλεγέθω, from which the name is derived, seems to indicate. Virg. Æn. 6. 550.—Ovid. Met 15, 532. — Senec. in Hip. —Sil. 13, 564.

PHLEGON, a native of Tralles, in Lydia, one of the emperor Adrian's freedmen. He wrote different treatises on the long lived, on wonderful things, besides an historical account of Sicily, sixteen books on the Olympiads, an account of the principal places in Rome, three books of Fasti, &c. Of these some fragments remain. His style was not elegant, and he wrote without judgment or precision. His name is particularly noticed by the moderns, as he is said to have made mention of the darkness which prevailed during the crucifixion of our Saviour. The passage is now lost, though the substance is preserved by Eusebius. The works of Phlegon have been edited by Meursius, 4to. L. Bat. 1620.—One of the horses of the sun. The word signifies burning. Ovid. Met. 2, 154.

PHLEGRA, or PHLEGRÆUS CAMPUS, a place of Macedonia, afterwards called Pallene, where the giants attacked the gods and were defeated by Hercules, (φλέγω, uro) The combat was afterwards renewed in Italy, in a place of the same name near Cumæ. The territory of Italy, which is thus denominated, forms a district of Campania; and appears to have experienced in a great degree the destructive effects of subterraneous fires. Accordingly we here find mount Vesuvius; the Solfatara, still smoking, as the poets have pretended, from the effects of Jupiter's thunder; the Monte Nuovo, which was suddenly thrown up from the bowels of the earth on the day of St Michael's feast, in the year 1538, the Monte Barbaro, formerly Mons Gaurus; the grotto of the Sybil; the noxious and gloomy lakes of Avernus and Acheron; the green bowers of Elysium, &c. It is not improbable that these objects terrified the Greeks in their first voyages to the coast, and that they were afterwards embellished and exaggerated by the fancy and fiction of the poets.

PHLEGYÆ, a people of Thessaly. Some authors place them in Bœotia. They received their name from Phlegyas, the son of Mars, with whom they plundered and burned the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Few of them escaped to Phocis, where they settled. Paus 9, 36.

PHLEGYAS, a son of Mars by Chryse, daughter of Halmus, was king of the Lapithæ in Thessaly. He was father of Ixion and Coronis, to whom Apollo offered violence. When the father heard that his daughter had been so wantonly abused, he marched an army against Delphi, and reduced the temple of the god to ashes. This was highly resented Apollo killed Phlegyas and placed him in hell, where a huge stone hangs over his head, and keeps him in continual alarms, by its appearance of falling every moment. Paus. 9, 36. Apollod 3, 5 — Ovid. Met. 5, 87. — Servius ad Virg. Æn. 6, 618

PHLIASIA, a small independent state of the Peloponnesus, adjoining Corinth and Sicyon on the north, Arcadia on the west, and the Nemean and Cleonæan districts of Argolis on the south and south-east. Its chief city was Phlius, so called from Phlius, a son of Asopus, who was one of the Argonauts, but it was formerly known by the name of Arathyrea. It was at first dependent on the kingdom of Mycenæ, but in later times it espoused the Lacedæmonian cause, from which it suffered not a little. It joined the Achæan league soon after its organization, and met the common lot of that soci-federacy when it fell into the hands of the Romans. The city possessed, amongst many splendid edifices, a temple and grove of Hebe, where criminals found an inviolable asylum. The inhabitants were noted for their fidelity and bravery. —Strab. 8.—Homer. Il. 2, 572 et 604.

PHOBETOR, one of the sons of Somnus, and his principal minister. His office was to assume the shape of serpents and wild beasts, to inspire terror into the minds of men, as his name intimates, (φοβέτωρ, from φοβέω). The other two ministers of Somnus were Phantasia and Morpheus.—Ovid Met. 11, 640.

PHOCÆA, a city of Ionia, in Asia Minor, south-west of Cyme. It was founded by some emigrants of Phocis under the guidance of two Athenian chiefs named Philogenes and Damon. It was built, with the consent of the Cymæans, on part of their territory; nor was it included in the Ionian confederacy till its citizens had consented to place at the head of the government princes of the line of Codrus. Phocæa, from the excellence of its harbours, and the enterprising spirit of its inhabitants, soon obtained a distinguished name among the early maritime states of the world. Herodotus observes that the Phocæans were the first Greeks who undertook distant voyages, and made their countrymen acquainted with the Adriatic, and the coasts of Tyrrhenia and Spain. Tartessus, in the latter country, was the spot which they most frequented, and they so conciliated the favour of Arganthonius, sovereign of the country, that he sought to induce them to leave Ionia, and settle in his dominions. On their declining this offer he munificently presented them with a large sum of money, for the purpose of raising a strong line of fortifications round their city, a precaution which the growing power of the Median empire seemed to render necessary. The liberality of this Iberian sovereign was attested by the circuit of the walls, which were several stadia in length, and by the size and solid construction of the stones employed. Phocæa was one of the first Ionian cities besieged by the army of Cyrus under the command of Harpagus. Having invested the place, he summoned the inhabitants to surrender, declaring that it would be a sufficient token of submission, if they would pull down one battlement of their wall, and consecrate one dwelling in the city. The Phocæans, aware that to comply with this demand was to forfeit their independence, but conscious also of their inability to resist the overwhelming power of Cyrus, determined to abandon their native soil, and seek their fortune in another clime. Having formed this resolution, and obtained from the Persian general a truce of one day, under the pretence of a wish to deliberate on his proposal, they launched their ships, and embarking with their wives and children, and their most valuable effects, sailed to Chios. On their arrival in that island they sought to purchase the Œnussæ, a neighbouring group of islands belonging to the Chians; but as they refused to comply with their wishes, they resolved to sail for Corsica, where, twenty years prior to these events, they had founded a town named Alalia. On their way thither they touched at Phocæa, and having surprised the Persian garrison left there by Harpagus, put it to the sword. They then bound themselves by a solemn oath to continue the voyage on which they had determined: nevertheless one half of their number, overcome by the feelings which the sight of their native city recalled to their minds, could not be prevailed upon to forsake it a second time. The rest continued their voyage to Corsica, and were well received by their countrymen already settled in the island. During the five years in which they remained there, they rendered themselves formidable to the surrounding nations by their piracies and depredations, so that at length the Tuscans and Carthaginians united their forces to check these aggressions and destroy their power. The hostile fleets met in the Sardinian sea, and, after a most obstinate engagement, the Phocæans succeeded in beating off the enemy. They sustained however so great a loss in the conflict, and their ships were so crippled, that, despairing of being able to continue the contest against their powerful foes, they abandoned Corsica and retired to the coast of Gaul, where they founded Massilia. Phocæa, however, always remained a considerable city under the Persian dominion; and even at a later period, when the Romans became masters of Asia Minor, it continued to be a place of importance, as well from its size, as from its position and fortifications. The site of Phocæa retains the name of Phoggia. Herod. 1, 163–168. Liv. 37, 31 et 32.—Paus. 7, 3.—Strab. 14.—Hor. Epod. 16. Ovid. Met. 6, 9.

PHOCION, an Athenian, celebrated for his virtues, private as well as public. He was educated in the school of Plato, and of Xenocrates, and as soon as he appeared among the statesmen of Athens, he distinguished himself by his prudence and moderation, his zeal for the public good, and his military abilities. He often checked the violent and inconsiderate measures of Demosthenes, and when the Athenians seemed eager to make war against Philip, king of Macedonia, Phocion observed that war should never be undertaken without the strongest and most certain expectations of success and victory. When Philip endeavoured to make himself master of Eubœa, Phocion stopped his progress, and soon obliged him to relinquish his conquest. During the time of his administration he was always inclined to peace, though he never suffered his countrymen to become indolent, and to forget the jealousy and rivalship of their neighbours. He was forty-five times appointed governor of Athens, and no greater encomium can be passed upon his talents as a minister and statesman, than that he never solicited that high, though dangerous office. In his rural retreat, or at the head of the Athenian armies, he always appeared barefooted, and without a cloak, whence one of his soldiers had occasion to observe, when he saw him dressed more warmly than usual during a severe winter, that since Phocion wore his cloak it was a sign of the most inclement weather. If he was the friend of temperance and discipline, he was not a less brilliant example of true heroism. Philip, as well as his son Alexander, attempted to bribe him, but to no purpose; and Phocion boasted in being one of the poorest of the Athenians, and in deserving the appellation of the Good. It was through him that Greece was saved from an impending war, and he advised Alexander rather to turn his arms against Persia, than to shed the blood of the Greeks, who were either his allies or his subjects. Alexander was so sensible of his merit, and of his integrity, that he sent him a hundred talents from the spoils which he had obtained from the Persians, but Phocion was too great to suffer himself to be bribed; and when the conqueror had attempted a second time to oblige him, and to conciliate his favour, by offering him the government and possession of five cities, the Athenian rejected the presents with the same indifference, and with the same independent mind. But not totally to despise the favours of the monarch, he begged Alexander to restore to their liberty four slaves that were confined in the citadel of Sardis. Antipater, who succeeded in the government of Macedonia after the death of Alexander, also attempted to corrupt the virtuous Athenian, but with the same success as his royal predecessor; and when a friend had observed to Phocion, that if he could so refuse the generous offers of his patrons, yet he should consider the good of his children, and accept them for their sake, Phocion calmly replied, that if his children were like him they could maintain themselves as well as their father had done, but if they behaved otherwise he declared that he was unwilling to leave them any thing which might either supply their extravagances, or encourage their debaucheries. But virtues like these could not long stand against the insolence and fickleness of an Athenian assembly. When the Piræus was taken, Phocion was accused of treason, and therefore, to avoid the public indignation, he fled for safety to Polyperchon. Polyperchon sent him back to Athens, where he was immediately condemned to drink the fatal poison. He received the indignities of the people with uncommon composure; and when one of his friends lamented his fate, Phocion exclaimed, "This is no more than what I expected; this treatment the most illustrious citizens of Athens have received before me." He took the cup with the greatest serenity of mind, and as he drank the fatal draught, he prayed for the prosperity of Athens, and bade his friends to tell his son Phocus not to remember the indignities which his father had received from the Athenians. He died about 318 years before the Christian era. His body was deprived of a funeral by order of the ungrateful Athenians, and if it was at last interred, it was by stealth, under a hearth, by the hand of a woman, who placed this inscription over his bones: "Keep inviolate, O sacred hearth, the precious remains of a good man till a better day restores them to the monuments of their forefathers, when Athens shall be delivered of her phrensy and shall be more wise." It has been observed of Phocion, that he never appeared elated in prosperity, or dejected in adversity, he never betrayed pusillanimity by a tear, or joy by a smile. His countenance was stern and unpleasant, but he never behaved with severity, his expressions were mild, and his rebukes gentle. At the age of eighty he appeared at the head of the Athenian armies like the most active officer, and to his prudence and cool valour in every period of life his citizens acknowledged themselves much indebted. His merits were not buried in oblivion, the Athenians repented of their ingratitude, and honoured his memory by raising him statues, and putting to a cruel death his guilty accusers. Plut. et C. Nep. in Vita.

PHOCIS, a small tract of country in Greece proper, bounded on the east by Bœotia, on the north by the Locri Opuntii, on the west by Doris and the Locri Ozolæ, and on the south by the Corinthian gulf. Its appellation was said to be derived from Phocus the son of Æacus. The more ancient inhabitants of the country were probably of the race of the Leleges; but the name of Phocians already prevailed at the time of the siege of Troy, since we find them enumerated in Homer's catalogue of Grecian warriors. Phocis is rendered famous for a war which it maintained against some of the Grecian republics, and which has received the name of the Phocian war. This celebrated war originated in the following circumstances: When Philip, king of Macedonia, had, by his intrigues and well concerted policy, fomented divisions in Greece, and disturbed the peace of every republic, the Greeks universally became discontented in their situation, fickle in their resolutions, and jealous of the prosperity of the neighbouring states. The Amphictyons, who were the supreme rulers of Greece, and who, at that time were subservient to the views of the Thebans, the inveterate enemies of the Phocians, showed the same spirit of fickleness, and like the rest of their countrymen were actuated by the same fears, the same jealousy and ambition. As the supporters of religion, they accused the Phocians of impiety for ploughing a small portion of land which belonged to the god of Delphi. They immediately commanded, that the sacred field should be laid waste, and that the Phocians, to expiate their crime, should pay a heavy fine to the community. The inability of the Phocians to pay the fine, and that of the Amphictyons to enforce their commands by violence, gave rise to new events. The people of Phocis were roused by the eloquence and the popularity of Philomelus, one of their countrymen, and when this ambitious ringleader had liberally contributed the great riches he possessed for the good of his countrymen, they resolved to oppose the Amphictyonic council by force of arms. He seized the rich temple of Delphi, and employed the treasures which it contained to raise a mercenary army. During two years hostilities were carried on between the Phocians and their enemies, the Thebans and the people of Locris, but no decisive battles were fought; and it can only be observed, that the Phocian prisoners were always put to an ignominious death, as guilty of the most abominable sacrilege and impiety, a treatment which was liberally retaliated on such of the army of the Amphictyons as became the captives of the enemy. The defeat and death of Philomelus, however, for a while checked their successes; but the deceased general was soon succeeded in the command by his brother, called Onomarchus, his equal in boldness and ambition, and his superior in activity and enterprize. Onomarchus rendered his cause popular, the Thessalians joined his army, and the neighbouring states observed at least a strict neutrality, if they neither opposed nor favoured his arms. Philip of Macedonia, who had assisted the Thebans, was obliged to retire from the field with dishonour, but a more successful battle was fought near Magnesia, and the monarch, by crowning the head of his soldiers with auræ, and telling them that they fought in the cause of Delphi and heaven, obtained a complete victory. Onomarchus was slain, and his body exposed on a gibbet; 6000 shared his fate, and their bodies were thrown into the sea, as unworthy of funeral honours, and 3000 were taken alive. This fatal defeat, however, did not ruin the Phocians: Phayllus, the only surviving brother of Philomelus, took the command of their armies, and doubling the pay of his soldiers, he increased his forces by the addition of 2000 men from Athens, Lacedæmon, and Achaia. But all this numerous force at last proved ineffectual, the treasures of the temple of Delphi, which had long defrayed the expences of the war, began to fail, dissensions arose among the ringleaders of Phocis, and when Philip had crossed the straits of Thermopylæ, the Phocians relying on his generosity, claimed his protection, and implored him to plead their cause before the Amphictyonic council. His feeble intercession was not attended with success, and the Thebans, the Locrians, and the Thessalians, who then composed the Amphictyonic council, unanimously decreed, that the Phocians should be deprived of the privilege of sending members among the Amphictyons. Their arms and their horses were to be sold, for the benefit of Apollo, they were to pay the annual sum of 60,000 talents till the temple of Delphi had been restored to its ancient splendour and opulence; their cities were to be dismantled, and reduced to distinct villages, which were to contain no more than sixty houses each, at the distance of a furlong from one another, and all the privileges and the immunities of which they were stripped, were to be conferred on Philip, king of Macedonia, for his eminent services in the prosecution of the Phocian war. The Macedonians were ordered to put these cruel commands into execution. The Phocians were unable to make resistance, and ten years after they had undertaken the sacred war, they saw their country laid desolate, their walls demolished, and their cities in ruins, by the wanton jealousy of their enemies, and the inflexible cruelty of the Macedonian soldiers, B. C. 348. They were not, however, long under this disgraceful sentence, their well known valour and courage recommended them to favour, and they gradually regained their influence and consequence by the protection of the Athenians, and the favours of Philip. Liv 32. 18.—*Ovid. PHOCUS, son of Phocion, was dissolute in his manners and unworthy of the virtues of his great father. He was sent to Lacedæmon to imbibe there the principles of sobriety, of temperance, and frugality. He cruelly revenged the death of his father, whom the Athenians had put to death. Plut. in Phoc. et Apoph ——A son of Æacus by Psamathe, killed by Telamon, Apollod. 3, 12.

PHOCYLIDES, a Greek poet and philosopher, born at Miletus, flourished about B. C. 540, and was in high esteem for the purity of his style and of his sentiments. The Greek verses extant at this day under the name of Phocylides are falsely attributed to this writer, being manifestly of a later age, probably that of Adrian or Trajan, and apparently by a Christian, since they contain some of the forged Sibylline verses. They have been several times printed, separately or with others of the minor Greek poets. The best edition is that of Schier, Lips. 1751, 8vo.

PHŒNICE, or PHŒNICIA, a country of Asia, between mount Libanus and the sea, corresponding with the modern Pachalic of Acre, and the southern part of the Pachalic of Tripoli. It extended from the river Cherseus on the south, to beyond the island Aradus on the north, though its limits in the latter direction were subsequently formed by the river Eleutherus. To the north and east it touched upon Syria, to the south upon Palestine; it was nearly the same in size as the island of Cyprus, and contained 2000 square miles. The Phœnicians are said to have owed their appellation to the great number of palm-trees (φοινικες) which grew in their country, though there are other accounts, which deduce their name from Phœnix, one of their early kings. They were descendants of Canaan, and from their not having been driven out by the children of Israel, their country preserved the name of Canaan much longer than the other portions of it, which were better inhabited by the Israelites; the more inland part of Phœnicia, touching upon Syria, was termed Syro-Phœnicia. The Phœnicians were originally governed by their own laws, each great city choosing its particular ruler; such matters as concerned the whole nation being always debated at Tripolis. They were conquered by the Persians, and afterwards by Alexander, to whom and to the Romans they became tributary. Under the Persians they extended their boundaries on all sides, obtaining dominion over the northern part of Palestine, and along its coast as far as Joppa, and the limits of Egypt. They were the early merchants of the world, having sent out colonies to all parts of the Mediterranean, and ventured beyond the straits of Gibraltar to the Cassiterides, and to the western coasts of Africa; commerce and navigation were amongst them in the most flourishing state. They were the first who invented arithmetic, and steered their ships by the stars; and according to the Greeks, Cadmus, a Phœnician, was the inventor of letters. They were a most ingenious people, and excelled all the other nations of the earth, in their elegant and beautiful manufactures; so great indeed was their fame, that the temple of Solomon, the most magnificent building mentioned in the Holy Scriptures was raised under the direction of Tyrian artists. Herod. 4, 42. 5, 58.—*Homer. PHŒNICŪSA, now Feliculà, one of the Æolian islands at the north of Sicily.

PHŒNISSA, a patrynomic given to Dido as a native of Phœnicia. Virg Æn. 4. 529.

PHŒNIX, a fabulous bird, of which Herodotus gives the following account, in that part of his work which treats of Egypt "The Phœnix is another sacred bird which I have never seen except in effigy. He rarely appears in Egypt; once only in five hundred years, immediately after the death of his father, as the Heliopolitans affirm. If the painters describe him truly, his feathers represent a mixture of crimson and gold; and he resembles the eagle in outline and size. They affirm that he contrives the following thing, which to me is not credible. They say that he comes from Arabia, and, bringing the body of his father enclosed in myrrh, buries him in the temple of the sun; and that he brings him in the following manner. First he moulds as great a quantity of myrrh into the shape of an egg, as he is well able to carry; and, after having tried the weight, he hollows out the egg, and puts his parent into it, and stops up with some more myrrh the hole through which he had introduced the body, so that the weight is the same as before: he then carries the whole mass to the temple of the sun in Egypt. Such is the account they give of the Phœnix. Herod. 2, 73. —Son of Amyntor, king of Argos, by Cleobule, or Hippodamia, was preceptor to young Achilles. When his father proved faithless to his wife, on account of his fondness for a concubine called Clitia, Cleobule, jealous of her husband, persuaded her son Phœnix to ingratiate himself into the favours of his father's mistress. Phœnix easily succeeded, but when Amyntor discovered his intrigues, he drew a curse upon him, and the son was soon after deprived of his sight by divine vengeance. According to some, Amyntor himself put out the eyes of his son, which so cruelly provoked him, that he meditated the death of his father. Reason and piety, however, prevailed over passion, and Phœnix, not to become a parricide, fled from Argos to the court of Peleus, king of Phthia. Here he was treated with tenderness, Peleus carried him to Chiron, who restored him to his eye-sight, and soon after he was made preceptor to Achilles, his benefactor's son. He was also presented with the government of many cities, and made king of the Dolopes. He accompanied his pupil to the Trojan war, and Achilles was ever grateful for the instructions and precepts which he had received from Phœnix. After the death of Achilles, Phœnix, with others, was commissioned by the Greeks to return into Greece, to bring young Pyrrhus to the war. This commission he performed with success, and after the fall of Troy he returned with Pyrrhus, and died in Thessaly. He was buried at Æon, or according to Strabo, near Trachinia, where a small river in the neighbourhood received the name of Phœnix, and after joining the Asopus fell into the sea near Thermopylæ. Ovid. in Ib. 259. — Apollod. 2, 7. — Virg. Æn. 2, 762. —A son of Agenor, by a nymph who was called Telephassa, according to Apollodorus and Moschus, or, according to others, Epimeduse, Perimeda, or Agriope. He was, like his brothers Cadmus and Cilix, sent by his father in pursuit of his sister Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away under the form of a bull, and when his inquiries proved unsuccessful, he settled in a country, which according to some, was from him called Phœnicia. Hygin. fab 178.

PHOLOE, a mountain of Elis, at the base of which stood the city of Pylos, between the heads of the rivers Peneus and Selleis Strab. 8 — A female servant of Cretan origin, given with her two sons to Sergestus by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, 285.

PHOLUS, one of the Centaurs, son of Silenus and Melia, or, according to others, of Ixion and the cloud. He kindly entertained Hercules when he was going against the boar of Erymanthus, but he refused to give him wine, as that which he had, belonged to the rest of the Centaurs. Hercules, upon this, without ceremony, broke the cask and drank the wine. The smell of the liquor drew the Centaurs from the neighbourhood to the house of Pholus, but Hercules stopped them when they forcibly entered the habitation of his friend, and killed the greatest part of them. Pholus gave the dead a decent funeral, but he mortally wounded himself with one of the arrows which were poisoned with the venom of the hydra, and which he attempted to extract from the body of one of the Centaurs. Hercules, unable to cure him, buried him when dead, and called the mountain, where his remains were deposited, by the name of Pholoe. Virg. G. 2, 456. Æn 8, 294 — Lucan. 3, 6 et 7 — One of the friends of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, 341.

PHORBAS, a son of Priam and Epithesia, killed during the Trojan war, by Menelaus. The god Somnus borrowed his features when he deceived Palinurus, and threw him into the sea near the coast of Italy. Virg. Æn. 5, 843. —A son of Lapithus, who married Hyrmine, the daughter of Epeus, by whom he had Actor. Pelops, according to Diodorus, shared his kingdom with Phorbas, who also, says the same historian, established himself at Rhodes, at the head of a colony from Elis and Thessaly, by order of the oracle which promised, by his means only, deliverance from the numerous serpents which infested the island. Diod. 2. — Paus 5, 1. —A native of Syene, son of Methion, killed by Perseus. Ovid. Met 5, fab 3.

PHORCUS, or PHORCYS, a sea-deity son of Pontus and Terra, who married his sister Ceto, by whom he had the Gorgons, the dragon that kept the apples of the Hesperides, and other monsters. Heniod. Theogn 270 et 352. — Apollod. —One of the auxiliaries of Priam, killed by Ajax, during the Trojan war. — Homer. Il. 17. —A man whose seven sons assisted Turnus against Æneas. — Virg. Æn. 10, 338.

PHORMIO, an Athenian general, whose father's name was Asopicus. He impoverished himself to maintain and support the dignity of his army. His debts were some time after paid by the Athenians, who wished to make him their general, an office which he refused, while he had so many debts, observing that it was unbecoming an officer to be at the head of an army, when he knew that he was poorer than the meanest of his soldiers. —A Peripatetic philosopher of Ephesus, who once gave a lecture upon the duties of an officer, and a military profession. The philoso pher was himself ignorant of the subject which he treated, upon which Hannibal the Great, who was one of his auditors, exclaimed that he had seen many doating old men, but never one worse than Phormio. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 18.——A disciple of Plato, chosen by the people of Elis, to make a reformation in their government, and their jurisprudence.

PHORMIS, an Arcadian who acquired great riches at the court of Gelon and Hiero in Sicily. He dedicated the brazen statue of a mare to Jupiter Olympius in Peloponnesus, which so much resembled nature, that horses came near it, as if it had been alive. Paus. 5, 27.

PHORONEUS, the god of a river of Peloponnesus of the same name. He was son of the river Inachus, by Melissa, and he was the second king of Argos. He married a nymph called Cerdo, or Laodice, by whom he had Apis, from whom Argolis was called Apia, and Niobe, the first woman of whom Jupiter became enamoured. Phoroneus taught his subjects the utility of laws, and the advantages of a social life, and of friendly intercourse, whence the inhabitants of Argolis are often called Phoronæ. Pausanias relates that Phoroneus, with the Cephisus, Asterion, and Inachus, were appointed as umpires in a quarrel between Neptune and Juno, concerning their right of patronizing Argolis. Juno gained the preference, upon which Neptune, in a fit of resentment, dried up all the four rivers, whose decision he deemed partial. He afterwards restored them to their dignity and consequence. Phoroneus was the first who raised a temple to Juno. He received divine honours after death. His temple still existed at Argos, under Antoninus, the Roman emperor. Paus. 2, 15, &c.—Apollod 2, 1.—Hygin fab 143.

PHORONIS, a patronymic of Io as sister of Phoroneus. Ovid Met 1, 625.

PHOTINUS, an eunuch who was prime minister to Ptolemy, king of Egypt. When Pompey fled to the court of Ptolemy, after the battle of Pharsalia, Photinus advised his master not to receive him, but to put him to death. His advice was strictly followed. Julius Cæsar some time after visited Egypt, and Photinus raised seditions against him, for which he was put to death. When Cæsar triumphed over Egypt and Alexandria, the pictures of Photinus and of some of the Egyptians, were carried in the procession at Rome. Plut.——A heretic of the fourth century, was a native of Ancyra, and bishop of Sirmium, in Illyricum. He espoused the opinions of Paul of Samosata, and opposed the doctrine of the divinity of Christ with great zeal; for which he was banished in 351. He died in 377.

PHOTIUS, patriarch of Constantinople in the 9th century, was a native of that city. He rose to the highest offices of the state, before he entered into orders, which took place on the deposition of Ignatius in 858. Photius was deprived in his turn by Basilius in 867, but after living in exile eleven years, he forcibly regained his seat, which he kept till 886 and was then deprived by the emperor Leo, who sent him into Armenia, where he died. His Bibliotheca contains the substance of near three hundred ancient authors. It was printed at Vienna in 1601, but the best edition is that of Rouen in 1653, folio. The Nomoeanon of this author is a valuable digest of the canons of councils and imperial laws on ecclesiastical affairs. Photius's letters were printed in 1651, folio; and a Greek Lexicon by him was published at Leipsic, in 1808, from two inaccurate manuscripts. There is a very correct one, with a beautiful copy, in the library of Trinity college, Cambridge.

PHRAATES 1st, a king of Parthia, who succeeded Arsaces the 3d, called also Priapatius. He made war against Antiochus, king of Syria, and was defeated in three successive battles. He left many children behind him, but as they were all too young, and unable to succeed to the throne, he appointed his brother Mithridates king, of whose abilities, and military prudence, he had often been a spectator. Justin. 41, 5.—— The 2d, succeeded his father Mithridates as king of Parthia; and made war against the Scythians, whom he called to his assistance against Antiochus, king of Syria, and whom he refused to pay, on the pretence that they came too late. He was murdered by some Greek mercenaries, who had been once his captives, and who had enlisted in his army, B. C. 129. Justin. 42, 1.—Plut. in Pomp.——The 3d, succeeded his father Pacorus on the throne of Parthia, and gave one of his daughters in marriage to Tigranes, the son of Tigranes king of Armenia. Soon after he invaded the kingdom of Armenia, to make his son-in-law sit on the throne of his father. His expedition was attended with ill success. He renewed a treaty of alliance which his father had made with the Romans. At his return into Parthia, he was assassinated by his sons Orodes and Mithridates. Justin.—— The 4th, was nominated king of Parthia by his father Orodes, whom he soon after murdered, as also 30 of his own brothers, that he might the more securely possess the supreme power. He made war against M. Antony with great success, and obliged him to retire with much loss. Some time after he was dethroned by the Parthian nobility, but by the assistance of the Scythians, he soon regained his power, and drove away the usurper, called Tiridates. The usurper claimed the protection of Augustus, the Roman emperor, and Phraates sent ambassadors to Rome to plead his cause, and gain the favour of his powerful judge. He was successful in his embassy: he made a treaty of peace and alliance with the Roman emperor, restored the ensigns and standards which the Parthians had taken from Crassus and Antony, and gave up his four sons with their wives as hostages, till his engagements were performed. Some suppose that Phraates delivered his children into the hands of Augustus to be confined at Rome, that he might reign with greater security, as he knew his subjects would revolt, as soon as they found any one of his family inclined to countenance their rebellion, though, at the same time, they scorned to support the interest of any usurper, who was not of the royal house of the Arsacidæ. He was, however, at last murdered by one of his concubines, who placed her son called Phraatices on the throne. Vel. Max. 7, 6.—Justin. 42, 5.—Plut in Anton. &c.—Tacit. Ann. 6, 32.

PHRAATICES, a son of Phraates 4th. He, with his mother, murdered his father, and took possession of the vacant throne. His reign was short: he was deposed by his subjects, whom he had offended by his cruelty, avarice, and oppression.

PHRAMATES, the same as Phraates. Vid. Phraates.

PHRAORTES succeeded his father Deioces on the throne of Media. He made war against the neighbouring nations, and conquered the greatest part of Asia. He was defeated and killed in a battle by the Assyrians, after a reign of 22 years, B. C. 625. His son Cyaxares succeeded him. It is supposed that the Arphaxad mentioned in Judith is Phraortes. Herod. 1, 102.

PHRICÔNIS a more ancient name for Cumæ in Æolis. According to Strabo, the early settlers from Locris established themselves for a considerable space of time in the vicinity of mount Phricium. Hence they gave to the new state, when they had founded it, the name of Phriconis PHRIXA, a town of Elis, on the left bank of the Alpheus, and a little to the east of Olympia. It was founded by the Minyæ. Its site is now called Palaio Phanari. Herod. 4, 148.

PHRONIMA, a daughter of Etearchus, king of Crete. She was delivered to a servant to be thrown into the sea, by order of her father, at the instigation of his second wife. The servant was unwilling to murder the child, but as he was bound by an oath to throw her into the sea, he accordingly let her down into the water by a rope, and took her out again unhurt. Phronima was afterwards in the number of the concubines of Polymnestus, by whom she became mother of Battus, the founder of Cyrene. Herod. 4, 154.

PHRONTIS, son of Onetor, pilot of the ship of Menelaus, after the Trojan war, was killed by Apollo just as the ship reached Sunium. Hom Od. 3, 282.—Paus. 10, 25.——One of the Argonauts. Apollod. 1.

PHRYGIA, the second in size amongst the provinces of Asia Minor. Its limits were altogether undefined by nature, and so very irregular that they touched upon all the other provinces of the peninsula with the exception of Paphlagonia and Pontus. To the east it bordered on Galatia and Cappadocia; to the south on Cilicia, Pisidia, and Lycia; to the west on Caria, Lydia, and Mysia; and to the north on Bithynia and Galatia. These limits include the district of Lycaonia. Phrygia is supposed by some critics to have obtained its name from the Greek word φρύγω torreo, owing to the volcanic or burnt-up appearance presented by its surface. It was called Major in contradistinction to Phrygia Minor, which lay along the southern shore of the Propontis: prior to the irruptions of the Gauls it included the province of Galatia. During the confusion which ensued after the death of Alexander, the Bithynians seized upon that part of Phrygia, which was contiguous to their own territory, but it was subsequently regained from them by its original possessors, and hence obtained the epithet of Epictetus. The southern part of the province bordering upon mount Taurus was called from this circumstance Paroreios; but the Romans during the fourth century took it from Phrygia, and added it to their new province of Pisidia; about the same time too, they divided Phrygia into Salutaris and Pacatiana, the former lying between Galatia and Pisidia, the latter between Bithynia and Caria: the district of Lycaonia retained its name. The Phrygians are said by the profane writers to have wandered under the conduct of Midas, the pupil of Orpheus, from the southern part of Macedonia into the districts on the southern shores of the Propontis, many years before the Trojan war; it is likewise stated that they were called Briges in their original settlements, and that those of them who did not join in the great migration of their race, preserved the latter name through all subsequent ages. Their power and numbers are represented as having been exceedingly great, for they took possession of the whole interior of the peninsula; they are also mentioned as the first people dwelling there, and their own traditions, as well as those of the Egyptians, are said to have maintained that they were the most ancient race of men in the world. They were remarkable in an early age for the high state of civilization to which they had attained; they are said to have invented the pipe of reeds, and all sorts of needle-work, and to have brought music and dancing to such perfection that they were copied even by the Greeks. Their chief deity was Cybele, whose festivals they observed with the greatest solemnity. Mela, 1, 19 —Strab. 2, &c. —Ovid Met. 13, 629, &c. —Cic. ad Fam. 7, 16 —Flacc 27.—Dio. 1, 50. —Plin. 8, 48. —Horat. od. 2, 9, 16 —Paus. 5, 25. —Herod. 7, 73.

PHRYNE a celebrated prostitute who flourished at Athens about 328 years before the Christian era. She was mistress to Praxiteles, who drew her picture. [Vid. Praxiteles] This was one of his best pieces, and it was placed in the temple of Apollo at Delphi: It is said that Apelles painted his Venus Anadyomene after he had seen Phryne on the sea-shore naked, and with dishevelled hair. Phryne became so rich by the liberality of her lovers, that she offered to rebuild, at her own expence, Thebes, which Alexander had destroyed, provided this inscription was placed on the walls: Alexander diruit, sed meretrix Phryne refecit. This was refused. Plin. 34, 8.——There was also another of the same name who was accused of impiety, though some consider her to be the same person as the mistress of Praxiteles. When she saw that in spite of the eloquence of her defender Hyperides she was going to be condemned, she unveiled her bosom, which it is said so influenced her judges, that she was immediately acquitted. Quintil. 2, 15.

PHRYNICUS, a tragic poet of Athens, disciple to Thespis. He was the first who introduced a female character on the stage. The characters of females were always played by males on the ancient stage; it would have been more correct therefore to have said that Phrynichus was the first who introduced a female mask. In some of his pieces the chorus very probably was composed of female characters thus represented. The tragedies of this poet were remarkable for the frequent dances that were intermingled with them. He himself taught the art. Phrynichus composed among others a tragedy which Themistocles caused to be represented with great magnificence, and which bore away the prize. The memory of this action was perpetuated by an inscription. The tragedy was probably The Phœnicians or The Persians. His piece entitled The Taking of Miletus made such an impression upon the audience at Athens, that the Athenians actually condemned the poet to pay a fine for having opened anew so deep a national wound, and one so dishonourable to the Greeks. Suidas, however, attributes this piece to another Phrynichus, but Bentley has shown that only one poet of the name composed tragedies.——A comic poet anterior to Aristophanes.——A Greek sophist, a native of Bithynia, who flourished in the reign of Marcus Antoninus and Commodus. Two works are attributed to him, viz. "Apparatus Sophisticus," and "Lectiones Atticæ." There is extant an abridgment of the latter, which was first printed at Rome under the title of "Eclogæ nominum et verborum Atticorum," Gr. et Lat. 1517. The best edition of this work is that of Lobeck, Lips. 1820. 8vo.

PHRYNIS, a musician of Mitylene, the first who obtained a musical prize at the Panathenæa at Athens. He added two strings to the lyre, which had always been used with seven, by all his predecessors, B. C. 438. It is said that he was originally a cook at the house of Hiero, king of Sicily, who observed his musical genius and recommended him to the care of Aristoclitus. Suidas.——A writer in the reign of Commodus, who made a collection, in thirty-six books, of phrases and sentences from the best Greek authors, &c.

PHRYXUS, a son of Athamas, king of Thebes, by Nephele. After the repudiation of his mother, he was persecuted with the most inveterate fury by his step-mother Ino, because he was to sit on the throne of Athamas, in preference to the children of a second wife. He was apprized of Ino's intentions upon his life, by his mother Nephele, or, according to others, by his preceptor, and the better to make his escape, he secured part of his father's treasures, and privately left Bœotia with his sister Helle, to go to their friend and relation Æetes, king of Colchis. They embarked on board a ship, or according to the fabulous account of the poets and mythologists, they mounted on the back of a ram whose fleece was of gold, and proceeded on their journey through the air. The height to which they were carried made Helle giddy, and she fell into the sea. Phryxus gave her a decent burial on the sea-shore, and after he had called the place Hellespont from her name, he continued his flight, and arrived safe in the kingdom of Æetes, where he offered the ram on the altars of Mars. The king received him with great tenderness, and gave him his daughter Chalciope in marriage. She had by him Phrontis, Melias, Argos, Cylindrus, whom some call Cytorus, Catis, Lorus, and Hellen. Some time after he was murdered by his father-in-law, who envied him the possession of the golden fleece; and Chalciope, to prevent her children from sharing their father's fate, sent them privately from Colchis to Bœotia, as nothing was to be dreaded there from the jealousy or resentment of Ino, who was then dead. The fable of the flight of Phryxus to Colchis on a ram has been explained by some, who observe, that the ship on which he embarked was either called by that name, or carried on her prow the figure of that animal. The fleece of gold is explained by recollecting that Phryxus carried away immense treasures from Thebes. Phryxus was placed among the constellations of heaven after death. The ram which carried him to Asia, is said to have been the fruit of Neptune's amour with Theophane, the daughter of Altis. This ram had been given to Athamas by the gods, to reward his piety and religious life, and Nephele procured it for her children, just as they were going to be sacrificed to the jealousy of Ino. The murder of Phryxus was some time after amply revenged by the Greeks. It gave rise to a celebrated expedition which was achieved under Jason and many of the princes of Greece, and which had for its object the recovery of the golden fleece, and the punishment of the king of Colchis for his cruelty to the son of Athamas. Herod. 7, 197.—*Apollon. PHTHIA. Vid. Phthiotis.

PHTHIÔTIS, a district of Thessaly, comprehending the southern part of that country, from the Pelasgic gulf to the Pindus. It included the districts of Phthia and Hellas, mentioned by Homer, as well as the tract of country inhabited by the Dolopians. It was anciently called Achaia. Strab. 9.—Homer. Il. 2, 683. 9, 476.

PHYA, a tall and beautiful woman of Attica, whom Pisistratus, when he wished to re-establish himself a third time in his tyranny, dressed like the goddess Minerva, and led to the city on a chariot, making the populace believe that the goddess herself came to restore him to power. The artifice succeeded. Herod. 1, 59.—Polyæn. 1, 40.

PHYCUS, (untis,) a promontory near Cyrene, and east of Ptolemais, now called Rasat. Mela, 1, 8.—Plin. 4, 12.

PHYLACE, a town of Macedonia, in the interior of Pieria. Plin. 4, 10.——A town of Epirus, thought to correspond with the vestiges to be seen near the village of Velchista, on the western side of the lake of Joannina.——A town of Thessaly, in the Magnesian district, near Phthiotic Thebes, and on the river Sperchius. It was the native place of Protesilaus, who is hence sometimes called Phylacides. There was a temple here consecrated to him. The ruins of this town probably exist near the present village of Agios Theodoros. Homer. Il. 2, 698.—Pind. Isthm. 1, 83.

PHYLE, a place celebrated in the history of Athens, as the scene of Thrasybulus' first exploit in behalf of his oppressed country. It was situate about 100 stadia from Athens, to the north-west, according to Diodorus, but Demosthenes estimates the distance at more than 120 stadia. The fortress of Phyle is now Biglia Castro. Diod. 41.—Paspbin. Or. de Cor.

PHYLLIS, a daughter of Sithon, or, according to others, of Lycurgus, king of Thrace, who hospitably received Demophoon, the son of Theseus, who at his return from the Trojan war, had stopped on her coasts. She became enamoured of him, and did not find him insensible to her passion. After some months of mutual tenderness and affection, Demophoon set sail for Athens, where his domestic affairs recalled him. He promised faithfully to return as soon as a month was expired; but either his dislike for Phyllis, or the irreparable situation of his affairs, obliged him to violate his engagement; and the queen, grown desperate on account of his absence, hanged herself, or, according to others, threw herself down a precipice into the sea, and perished. Her friends raised a tomb over her body, where there grew up certain trees, whose leaves, at a particular season of the year, suddenly became wet, as if shedding tears for the death of Phyllis. According to an old tradition mentioned by Servius, Virgil's commentator, Phyllis was changed by the gods into an almond tree, which is called Phyllo by the Greeks. Some days after this metamorphosis, Demophoon revisited Thrace, and when he heard of the fate of Phyllis, he ran and clasped the tree, which, though at that time stripped of its leaves, suddenly shot forth and blossomed, as if still sensible of tenderness and love. The absence of Demophoon from the house of Phyllis has given rise to a beautiful epistle of Ovid, supposed to have been written by the Thracian queen, about the fourth month after her lover's departure. Ovid, Heroid. 2 *de Art. PHYLLUS, a general of Phocis during the Phocian or sacred war against the Thebans. He had assumed the command after the death of his brothers Philomelus and Onomarchus. He is called by some Phayllus. Vid. Phocis.

PHYSCON, a surname of one of the Ptolemies, king of Egypt, from the great prominency of his belly (φύσκων, "the paunch;" from φύσα, "the lower belly.")

PHYSCOS, a town of Caria, opposite Rhodes, and subject to that island. It contained a grove sacred to Latona. Its site is occupied by Castro Marmora. Strab. 14.

PIA, or PIALIA, festivals instituted in honour of Adrian, by the emperor Antoninus They were celebrated at Puteoli, on the second year of the Olympiads PICENI, or PICENTES, a people of Italy, occupying what was called Picenum. Vid Picenum.

PICENTIA, a city of Campania, about seven miles beyond Salernum, and once the capital of the Picentini. It is now called Vicenza. Strab. 5.—Mel. 2, 4.—Plin. 3, 5. - Flor. 3, 18.

PICENTINI, a people of Italy, south of Campania, occupying an inconsiderable extent of territory, from the promontory of Minerva to the mouth of the river Silarus. They were a colony from Picenum, whom the Romans, after their conquest of that province, compelled to settle here. The principal cities in their territory were Salernum and Picentia. Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, 5.

PICENUM, a district of Italy, bounded on the west by the Appennines, on the north by the Æsis, on the east by the Adriatic, and on the south by the Salnus, although its limits in this last direction are sometimes extended to the Aternus. To the north it bordered on the Senones, to the west on Umbria and the Sabini, and to the south on the Vestini. It included the southern part of Ancona in the Papal States, and northern Abruzzo Ulra in the kingdom of Naples. The Piceni were a branch of the Sabini, who settled here under the conduct of Picus; their territory was very fruitful, and noted for its apples. The Praetutii, who inhabited Picenum south of the Helvinus, were of a different race from the Piceni, probably of Liburnian origin; their country was famed for its wine. *Sil. PICTÆ, or PICTI, one of the nations inhabiting North Britain in the time of the Romans, and supposed to be a branch of the Caledonians, possessing the eastern and north-eastern coasts. The principal seat of the Pictish kings was at Abernethy. In the ninth century, they were totally subdued by the Scots under Kenneth II., and since that time, their name has been lost in that of their conquerors. Their name has been supposed to refer to the practice of painting their bodies; but, as the same custom prevailed among other nations, this has been questioned. The word Plochdach, the Gaelic for Piet, is used in the sense of plunderer.

PICTONES, or PICTAVI, a people of Aquitanic Gaul, a short distance below the Ligeris, or Loire. Their territory corresponds to the modern Poitou. Cæs B. G. 3, 7.—Plin. 4, 19.

PICUMNUS and PILUMNUS, two deities at Rome, who presided over the auspices, that were required before the celebration of nuptials. Pilumnus was supposed to patronize children, as his name seems in some manner to indicate, quod pellat mala infantia. The manuring of lands was first invented by Picumnus, for which reason he is called Sterquilinius. Pilumnus is also invoked as the god of bakers and millers, as he is said to have first invented how to grind corn. Turnus boasted of being one of his lineal descendants. Virg. Æn. 9, 4.—Varro de Vit. P. R. 2.

PICUS, a king of Latium, son of Saturn, who married Venilia, who is also called Canens, by whom he had Faunus. He was tenderly loved by the goddess Pomona, and he returned a mutual affection. As he was one day hunting in the woods, he was met by Circe, who became deeply enamoured of him, and who, upon finding her addresses treated with contempt, struck him with her wand, and changed him into a woodpecker, called by the name of picus among the Latins. His wife Venilia was so disconsolate when she was informed of his death, that she pined away. Some suppose that Picus was the son of Pilumnus, and that he gave out prophecies to his subjects, by means of a favourite woodpecker, from which circumstance originated the fable of his being metamorphosed into a bird. Virg. Æn. 7, 48, 171, &c.—Ovid. Met. 14, 320, &c.

PIERIA, a region of Macedonia, on the coast of the Thermaic gulf, bounded on the north by the Axius, and on the south by the Haliacmon; although other authorities extend its boundary to the Peneus. It formed one of the most interesting parts of Macedonia, both in consideration of the traditions to which it has given birth, as being the first seat of the Muses, and the birth-place of Orpheus; and also of the important events which occurred there at a later period, involving the destiny of the Macedonian empire, and many other parts of Greece. The name of Pieria was derived apparently from the Pieres, a Thracian people, who were subsequently expelled by the Temenidæ, the conquerors of Macedonia, and driven north beyond the Strymon and mount Pangæus, where they formed a new settlement. Homer. Il. 14, 226. —Thucyd. 2, 99.—Herod. 7, 112.—Strab. 7.—— An appellation given to the city of Seleucia in Syria, from its being situate at the foot of mount Pierus, which mountain was so called by the Macedonians after one in their native country.

PIERIDES, a name given to the Muses, either because they were born in Pieria, in Thessaly, or because they were supposed by some to be the daughters of Pierus, a king of Macedonia, who settled in Bœotia.——Also, the daughters of Pierus, who challenged the Muses to a trial in music, in which they were conquered, and changed into magpies. It may perhaps be supposed, that the victorious Muses assumed the name of the conquered daughters of Pierus and ordered themselves to be called Pierides, in the same manner as Minerva was called, Pallas, because she had killed the giant Pallas. Ovid. Met. 5, 300.

PIERUS, a rich man of Thessaly, whose nine daughters, called Pierides, challenged the Muses, and were changed into magpies when conquered.——A mountain in Macedonia, in the district of Pieria.——A mountain in Syria, near the city of Seleucia. Vid. Pieria.

PIETAS, a virtue which denotes veneration for the deity, and love and tenderness to our friends. It received divine honours among the Romans, and was made one of their gods. Acilius Glabrio first erected a temple to this new divinity, on the spot where a woman had fed with her own milk her aged father who had been imprisoned by the order of the senate, and deprived of all aliments. Ov. de Dv. 1. 42. *Val. PIMPLEA, a small town of Macedonia, not far from Dium and Libethra, where Orpheus was said by some to have been born. Strab. Epit. 7.—Apoll. Rhod. 1, 23. Lycophr. 273.

PINARA, a town of Lycia, at the foot of mount Cragus. It was colonized by the Xanthians Strab 14.

PINARIUS and POTITIUS, two old men of Arcadia, who came with Evander to Italy They were instructed by Hercules, who visited the court of Evander, how they were to offer sacrifices to his divinity, in the morning, and in the evening, immediately at sun-set. The morning sacrifice they punctually performed, but on the evening Potitius was obliged to offer the sacrifice alone, as Pinarius neglected to come till after the appointed time This negligence offended Hercules, and he ordered, that for the future, Pinarius and his descendants should preside over the sacrifices, but that Potitius, with his posterity, should wait upon the priests as servants, when the sacrifices were annually offered to him on mount Aventine. This was religiously observed till the age of Appius Claudius, who persuaded the Potiti, by a large bribe, to discontinue their sacred office, and to have the ceremony performed by slaves. For this negligence, as the Latin authors observe, the Potiti were deprived of sight, and the family became a little time after totally extinct. Liv. 1, 7.—Virg. Æn. 8, 269, &c.

PINARUS, a river of Cilicia Campestris, rising in mount Amanus, and falling into the Sinus Issicus, near Issus. It is now the Deli sou. Polyb 19. 17.—Plin. 5 27.

PINDARUS, the most celebrated of the lyric poets of Greece, was a native of Thebes, the metropolis of Bœotia, which country his name alone might well redeem from the stigma of dulness. His birth seems to have taken place about B. C. 520. According to some writers, the name of his father was Daiphantus, according to others, Scopelinus, and that of his mother Myrto, or Myrtis. It is related of him, that when he was an infant, a swarm of bees settled on his lips, and left their honey there; an omen of his future excellence in the arts of poetry and music The history of Pindar's early days seems to refute, in some degree, the opinions of those who think education has a tendency to repress originality of genius, and to tame it down into dexterous imitation or humble correctness. No poet, perhaps, ever dared so much as Pindar, and yet none was ever instructed in the finest arts with greater care. It is singular, that for much of his instruction he was indebted to the female sex, at a time when they were themselves in general excluded from the higher departments of knowledge, and regarded as scarcely endowed with intellectual faculties. According to Suidas, he was first taught to combine simplicity with elegance in the composition of his verses by Myrtis—probably his mother, who was herself the author of poems adapted to the lyre. At a subsequent period the beautiful and accomplished Corinna became his instructor. Not only poetry, but also the sister art of music, was carefully studied by Pindar. Athenæus informs us that Lasus of Hermione, an excellent musician, and dithyramble poet, imparted to him his skill in playing on the lyre. Certain it is, that he was prepared by no common attention for that high and glorious career in which he was about to leave every competitor behind him. Pindar seems to have been early received with great honour by Alexander, son of Amyntas, at the court of Macedon. He overcame his teacher Myrtis in a contest of musical skill; but was no less than five times defeated by Corinna in striving for the reward of poetry. It is intimated, indeed, by some, that the judges were inclined to favour the female candidate rather by the admiration of her personal charms, than of her poetical genius. Pindar must, however, have been very young at this time, as Diodorus Siculus asserts that he had only attained the age of forty at the time of the battle of Salamis. In the public assemblies of Greece, Pindar no sooner appeared than he attained a height of popular favour, which seems never to have left him; nor was his fame confined to the people. As he sung the praises of the conquerors in those games at which kings and the people strove for the prize, he naturally acquired the favour and patronage of the great. He particularly enjoyed the favour of Hiero, king of Syracuse, whose munificence he delighted to repay by his songs. His partiality to the Athenians, however, drew on him the resentment of his countrymen. Because he had celebrated Athens as the chief support of Greece, they laid on him a heavy fine on which the Athenians presented him with a sum of double the amount. Authors are divided respecting the time in which he died, some asserting that he only reached the age of fifty-six, while others maintain that he was eighty six at the time of his decease. His departure from life was gentle, for it took place while he was sitting in a public assembly, and, till the spectators retired, he was thought to be slumbering. As a prodigy is fixated of his birth, so attempts were made by the Greeks to surround his death by mystery, It is said, that having in one of his poems represented Agamedes and Trophonius as rewarded by sudden death, for having built the temple of Apollo, he was referred by the priestess, on his inquiring what was best for mankind, to his own verses. This reply he understood as an intimation of approaching and sudden dissolution, which soon after took place. Extraordinary honours were paid to Pindar, both during his life and after his decease. His odes and religious hymns were chanted in the temples of Greece before the most crowded assemblies and on the most solemn occasions. The priestess of Apollo, at Delphi, declared that it was the will of that divinity that he should receive half of the first fruits annually offered at his shrine. The Athenians erected a statue of brass in honour of him, representing him with a diadem, and a lyre, and a book folded on his knees, which was remaining in the time of Pausanias; and a portion of the sacrifices at the great festivals of Greece was, for a long time, set apart for his descendants. When the Lacedæmonians took Thebes, they spared the house and family of Pindar; and, when afterwards, the city was taken by Alexander, the same mark of veneration was shown to his memory. His works have been extolled in terms of the most ardent admiration by some of the first ancient writers. Quintilian says of him in his Institutes, "of the nine Greek lyric poets, Pindar is the chief, in spirit, in magnificence, in moral sentiment, and in metaphor; most happy both in the abundance of his matter and of his diction, and, as it were, with a certain torrent of eloquence, so that Horace says no man can imitate him." A yet higher authority, Horace himself, has thus expressed his admiration of our poet:

Pindarum quisquis studet æmulari,
Jule, ceratis ope Dædalea
Nititur pennis, vitreo daturus
Nomina ponto.
Monte decurrens velut amnis, imbres
Quem super notas aluere ripas,
Fervet immensusque ruit profundo
Pindarus ore

We cannot sufficiently regret the loss of the compositions which called forth these eulogies, because, though compared with the works of many other renowned authors, a considerable number of Pindar's odes have reached us, those which survive are not the most interesting in their subjects, nor probably the most felicitous in their execution. The works of Pindar consisted of hymns and paeans in honour of the gods; hyporchemata, songs accompanied by dances in honour of Apollo; dithyrambic verses to Bacchus; and some minor effusions; with the odes on the Olympic, Nemæan Isthmian, and Pythian games. Of these latter forty-five remain, which, with a few fragments, form the only ground on which we can now form any opinion of the extent, or peculiar character of Pindar's genius. No subjects, at first sight, could seem more unfitted for sublime poetry than those of the Pindaric remains: but the poet has, with characteristic impetuosity, overcome this difficulty by almost invariably abandoning the professed objects of his panegyric, and bursting into celebrations of the heroes of former days, the mighty exploits of demi-gods, and the gorgeous fables of oldest time. In the transition he uses little art; but seems to rely, as he safely might, on its being, in itself, most welcome. He is chiefly remarkable for the gigantic boldness of his conceptions and the daring sublimity of his metaphors; and may be called the Æschylus of lyric poetry. The flights of his imagination are not, however, like those of the great tragedian, mingled with the intensity of human passion, which, while they carry us beyond ourselves, still come home to the heart. He has the light without the heat; his splendours dazzle, but do not warm us. There is very little of human feeling in his works; they are little more than exhibitions which excite our surprise, but no our sympathy. His compositions have something hard and stony about them—the sublimity and the nakedness of the rock. The sunshine glitters on the top, but no verdure or foliage adorns the declivity. All the interest, such as it is, arises from the earnestness of the poet himself, and the intense ardour with which he is ever impelled in his lofty career. Hence we think more of him than of his work, while in Homer and the Greek tragedians the author is entirely forgotten. His conception is so ardent that he cannot wait to develope his metaphors; he often but half unfolds them, and suffers them to blend with the literal descriptions and form part of the subject; and hence, it appears to us, the obscurities so frequently complained of in Pindar have, in a great degree, arisen. In the mechanical composition of his odes, however, Pindar is by no means so irregular as some have been disposed to imagine. He commonly preserves the arrangement of strophe, antistrophe, and epode; and though the construction of these vary in different odes, all the strophes and antistrophes in the same ode are framed on the same principles, and all the epodes are composed in similar measures to each other. The imitators of Pindar, from the days of Horace to Cowley, have been numerous; but the judgment of Horace, that he can never, in his own peculiar excellencies, be equalled, has not been yet disproved. Gray, in his happiest passages, has, perhaps, most nearly approached him. West has done all that could be accomplished towards a translation; and Mr Pye and subsequent writers have attempted the same task. It is one in which to have failed is no disgrace; faithfully to translate Pindar into modern verse, without losing his spirit, appears to us impossible, even could it be undertaken by a congenial lyrist. The best editions of Pindar are, that of Heyne, Lips. 1817, 3 vols. 8vo., and that of Boeckh, Lips. 1811—21, 3 vols. 4to.

PINDENISSUS, a town of Cilicia, on a mountain that formed part of the range of Amanus. It was a strongly fortified place; and Cicero, when proconsul of Cilicia, could only take it after a siege of fifty-seven days. Cic Epist ad Fam. 15, 4. ad Att. 5, 20

PINDUS, a name applied by the Greeks to the elevated chain which separates Thessaly from Epirus, and the waters falling into the Ionian sea and Ambracian gulf, from those streams which discharge themselves into the Ægean. PIRÆUS, or PIRÆEUS, a celebrated and capacious harbour of Athens, at some distance from it, but joined to it by long walls, called μακρὰ τείχη. The northern wall was built by Pericles at a great expense, and contained 40 stadia. The southern was built by Themistocles, of huge square stones, not cemented together with mortar, but fastened on the outside by iron and leaden cramps. The height of it was 40 cubits, but Themistocles wished to have raised it to 80 cubits. Its length was 35 stadia. Upon both of the walls was erected a great number of turrets, which, after the Athenians became so numerous that the city could not contain them, were converted into dwelling-houses. The wall that encompassed the Munychia, and joined it to the Pirœus, contained 60 stadia, and the exterior wall on the other side of the city was 43 stadia in length. Athens had three harbours, of which the Pirœus was by far the largest. East of it was the second one, called Munychia; and still farther east, the third, called Phalerus, the least frequented of the three. The Pirœus contained three docks: the first was called Cantharus, from a hero of that name, the second, Aphrodisium, from Ἀφροδίτη, Venus, who had there two temples, one of which was consecrated by Themistocles, the other by Conon; and the third Zea, from ζέα, bread-corn. In this harbour were five porticoes, which being joined together formed a very large one, called on that account Macra Stoa. The Pirœus also contained two forums: one was near the long portico and the sea; the other farther distant, and, therefore, chiefly frequented by those who lived in the neighbourhood of the city. One of these forums was called Hippodameia, from the architect Hippodamus, who had been employed by Themistocles to fortify the Pirœus, and to lay out its streets as well as those of the capital. Here the productions of all countries were accumulated; and this was not the market of Athens only, but of all Greece. Hence originated the proverb, τὸν Πειραῖα σιταρχίαν μὴ φέρειν, that the Pirœus does not produce want and famine. In this harbour 300 galleys have sometimes been collected at once; and it was sufficiently capacious to contain 400. The advantages of this place were first observed by Themistocles, when he devised the plan of giving a navy to Athens. Markets and magazines were presently erected, and an arsenal capable of furnishing every thing necessary for the equipment of a great number of vessels. Hither the body of Themistocles was brought after his death, from the place of his exile; and a square stone, devoid of ornaments, resting on a simple base, and placed upon the neighbouring promontory, formed the sepulchral monument of that great and remarkable man. This harbour, which was once very populous and well inhabited was burnt by Sylla in the Mithridatic war, and reduced to a very few houses in the time of Strabo, who lived in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. Plut. in Per. et Them.—Appian. in Mithridat.—Thucyd. 1 et 2. —*Isocrat. PIRENE, a daughter of Danaus.—A daughter of Œbalus, or, according to others, of the Achelous. She had by Neptune two sons, called Leches and Cenchrius, who gave their names to two of the harbours of Corinth. Pirene was so disconsolate at the death of her son Cenchrius, who had been killed by Diana, that she pined away, and was dissolved by her continual weeping into a fountain of the same name, which was still seen at Corinth in the age of Pausanias. The fountain Pirene was sacred to the Muses, and, according to some, the horse Pegasus was then drinking some of its waters, when Bellerophon took it to go and conquer the Chimæra. Paus. 2, 3.—Ovid. Met. 2. 240.

PIRITHOUS, a son of Ixion and the cloud, or, according to others, of Dia, the daughter of Deioneus. Some make him son of Jupiter, who assumed the shape of a horse whenever he paid his addresses to his mistress. He was king of the Lapithæ, and, as an ambitious prince, he wished to become acquainted with Theseus, king of Athens, of whose fame and exploits he had heard so many reports. To see him, and at the same time to be a witness of his valour, he resolved to invade his territories with an army. Theseus immediately met him on the borders of Attica, yet at the sight of one another the two enemies did not begin the engagement, but struck with the appearance of each other, they stepped between the hostile armies. Their meeting was like that of the most cordial friends, and Pirithous, by giving Theseus his hand as a pledge of his sincerity, promised to repair all the damages which his hostilities in Attica might have occasioned. From that time, therefore, the two monarchs became the most intimate and the most attached of friends, so much so, that their friendship, like that of Orestes and Pyiades, is become proverbial. Pirithous some time after married Hippodamia, and invited not only the heroes of his age but also the gods themselves, and his neighbours the Centaurs, to celebrate his nuptials. Mars was the only one of the gods who was not invited, and to punish this neglect, the god of war was determined to raise a quarrel among the guests, and to disturb the festivity of the entertainment. Eurytion, captivated with the beauty of Hippodamia, and intoxicated with wine, attempted to offer violences to the bride, but he was prevented by Theseus, and immediately killed. This irritated the rest of the Centaurs: the contest became general, but the valour of Theseus, Pirithous, Hercules, and the rest of the Lapithæ triumphed over their enemies. Many of the Centaurs were slain, and the rest saved their lives by flight. [Vid. Lapithus.] The death of Hippodamia left Pirithous very disconsolate, and he resolved, with his friend Theseus, who had likewise lost his wife, never to marry again, except to a goddess, or one of the daughters of the gods. This determination occasioned the rape of Helen by the two friends: the lot was drawn, and it fell to the share of Theseus to have the beautiful prize. Pirithous upon this undertook with his friend to carry away Proserpine, and to marry her. They descended into the infernal regions: but Pluto, who was apprized of their machinations to disturb his conjugal peace, stopped the two friends, and confined them there. Pirithous was tied to his father's wheel, or according to Hyginus, he was delivered to the Furies to be continually tormented. His punishment, however, was short, and when Hercules visited the kingdom of Pluto, he obtained from Proserpine the pardon of Pirithous, and brought him back to his kingdom safe and unhurt. Some, however, assert that only Theseus was liberated by the intercession of Hercules, and that the punishment of Pirithous became more severe, while others suppose that he was torn to pieces by the dog Cerberus. PISA, an ancient city of Elis, giving name to the district of Pisatis, in which it was situated. Tradition assigned its foundation to Pisus, grandson of Æolus, but, as no trace of it remained, its very existence was questioned in later ages, some affirming it to have been only a fountain, whilst others maintained it to have been the ancient name of Olympia, or to have once stood close to it. It is generally agreed that the Pisatæ were in possession of the temple of Olympia, and presided at the celebration of the games from the earliest period of their institution, till their rights were usurped by the Eleans and Heraclidæ. They did not, however, tamely submit to this injury on the part of their more powerful neighbours, and, having procured the assistance of Phidon, tyrant of Argos, recovered Olympia, where, in the eighth Olympiad, they again celebrated the festival; but the Eleans in their turn, obtaining succour from Sparta, defeated Phidon, and once more expelled the Pisatæ from Olympia. These during the thirty-fourth Olympiad, being at that time under the authority of Pantaleon, who had possessed himself of the sovereign power, made another effort to regain their ancient prerogative, and, having succeeded in vanquishing their opponents, retained possession of the disputed ground for several years. The final struggle took place in the forty-eighth Olympiad, when the people of Pisa, supported by the Triphylians, and other neighbouring towns, which had revolted from Elis, made war upon that state. The Eleans, however, aided by Sparta, proved victorious, and put an end for ever to this contest by the destruction of Pisa and the other confederate towns. Paus 6, 22.—Strab. 8.—*Pind. PISÆ, or PISA, a city of Etruria, on the river Arnus, or Arno, about a league from its mouth. Its origin stretches far back into the fabulous age of history. According to a tradition recorded by Strabo, it owed its foundation to some of the followers of Nestor, in their wanderings after the fall of Troy. That it received its name from Greek colonists, can scarcely be doubted, nor is it improbable, that the ancient capital of Elis in the Olympian plain, was the mother city of the Etrurian Pisa. Both cities might, indeed, take their name from their situation; and Pisæ (as the name was generally written) may have simply denoted the meadows of the Arnus. The Portus Pisanus was at the mouth of that river. There it was that Scipio landed his army, when returning from the mouths of the Rhone, to oppose Hannibal in Italy; and its harbour was much frequented by the Romans in their intercourse with Sardinia, Gaul, and Spain. Pisa became a colony A. U. C. 572. Strabo speaks of it as having been in former times an important naval station in his day, it was still a flourishing commercial town, from which were exported large supplies of timber for ship building, costly marbles, wine, and wheat. The modern Pisa occupies the site of the ancient city. Strab 5.—Virg. Æn. 10, 179.—Polyb 2, 16 et 27.—Liv 21, 39. 41, 43.—Plin. 14, 3. 18, 9.—Rutil. Itin. 1 & 3.

PISANDER, a son of Bellerophon, killed by the Solymi.—A Trojan chief killed by Menelaus. Homer. Il 13, 601.—One of Penelope's suitors, son of Polyctor. Ovid Heroid. 1, 91.—*Hom. He had recourse to entreaties and promises, but in vain, as the Grecian wished to resent the advice of Antimachus, who opposed the restoration of Helen. Homer. Il. 11, 123.—An admiral of the Spartan fleet during the Peloponnesian war. He abolished the democracy at Athens and established the aristocratical government of the four hundred tyrants. He was killed in a naval battle by Conon, the Athenian general, near Cnidus, in which the Spartans lost 50 galleys, B. C 394. C. Nep. 9, 2.—Diod.—A poet of Rhodes, who composed a poem called Heraclea, in which he gave an account of all the labours and all the exploits of Hercules. He was the first who ever represented his hero armed with a club. Paus 8, 22.

PISATÆ, or PISÆI, the inhabitants of Pisa in the Peloponnesus.

PISAURUM, a city of Umbria, on the sea-coast, below Ariminum, and near the river Pisaurus. Its origin is uncertain. It became a Roman colony, A. U. C. 568, but whether it was colonized again by Julius Cæsar or Augustus is uncertain. Its present name is Pesaro. Liv. 39, 44.—Mela, 2, 4.—Plin. 3, 15.

PISAURUS, a river of Umbria, running into the Adriatic near Pisaurum. It is now called la Foglia.

PISEUS, a king of Etruria, about 260 years before the foundation of Rome. Plin. 7, 26.

PISIDIA, an inland country of Asia Minor, having around it Caria on the west, Lycia on the south-west, Phrygia on the north, Lycaonia and Isauria on the east and south-east, and Pamphylia on the south. The ancients seem to have known but little respecting the origin of the Pisidians. They generally, however, agreed as to the fact of their having succeeded to a portion of the territory once occupied by the Homeric Solymi. Strabo states that, according to some accounts, they were intermixed with the Leleges, which is not improbable, considering their proximity to the Carians. Occupying a wild and mountainous district around the highest summits of the chain of Taurus, their character and habits naturally partook of the rugged and untractable features of this highland region. As early as the epoch of the Peloponnesian war, we hear them spoken of as a marauding race, hostile to the Persian monarchs, and whom it was found necessary to curb and repress by force of arms. The younger Cyrus had more than once led expeditions into their country, and they furnished him with a pretext for collecting the troops intended to overthrow his brother. These turbulent and savage habits had undergone but little change even in the time of Strabo, since he assures us that, like the Cilicians and Pamphylians, they were governed by petty chiefs, and subsisted principally by plundering their more peaceful neighbours. The Romans endeavoured, by establishing colonies in the country, to civilize, or keep in check this rude and lawless people; Christianity, too, lent its softening influence, and many a church was erected throughout the country; but the wars with the Saracens and Turks, and the final ascendency of the latter, have plunged it once more into its original wild and barbarous state. — Plin. 5, 24. — Strab. 12.

PISISTRATIDÆ, the descendants of Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens. Vid. Pisistratus.

PISISTRATUS, an Athenian, son of Hippocrates, who early distinguished himself by his valour in the field, and by his address and eloquence at home. After he had rendered himself the favourite of the populace by his liberality, and by the intrepidity with which he had fought their battles, particularly near Salamis, he resolved to make himself master of his country. Every thing seemed favourable to his ambitious views; but Solon alone, who was then at the head of affairs and who had lately instituted his celebrated laws, opposed him, and discovered his duplicity and artful behaviour before the public assembly. Pisistratus was not disheartened by the measures of his relation Solon, but he had recourse to artifice. In returning from his country house, he cut himself in various places, and after he had exposed his mangled body to the eyes of the populace, deplored his misfortunes, and accused his enemies of attempts upon his life, because he was the friend of the people, the guardian of the poor, and the reliever of the oppressed; he claimed a chosen body of fifty men from the populace to defend his person in future from the malevolence and the cruelty of his enemies. The unsuspecting people unanimously granted his request, though Solon opposed it with all his influence; and Pisistratus had no sooner received an armed band on whose fidelity and attachment he could rely, than he seized the citadel of Athens, and made himself absolute. The people too late perceived their credulity, yet, though the tyrant was popular, two of the citizens, Megacles and Lycurgus, conspired together against him, and by their means he was forcibly ejected from the city. His house and all his effects were exposed to sale, but there was found in Athens only one man who would buy them. The private dissensions of the friends of liberty proved favourable to the expelled tyrant, and Megacles, who was jealous of Lycurgus, secretly promised to restore Pisistratus to all his rights and privileges in Athens, if he would marry his daughter. Pisistratus consented, and by the assistance of his father-in-law, he was soon enabled to expel Lycurgus, and to re-establish himself. By means of a woman called Phya, whose shape was tall, and whose features were noble and commanding, he imposed upon the people, and created himself adherents even among his enemies. Phya was conducted through the streets of the city, and showing herself subservient to the artifice of Pisistratus, she was announced as Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, and the patroness of Athens, who was come down from heaven to re establish her favourite Pisistratus, in a power which was sanctioned by the approbation of the gods, and favoured by the affection of the people. In the midst of his triumph, however, Pisistratus found himself unsupported; and some time after, when he repudiated the daughter of Megacles, he found that not only the citizens, but even his very troops were alienated from him by the influence, the intrigues, and the bribery of his father-in-law. He fled from Athens, where he could no longer maintain his power, and retired to Eubœa. Eleven years after, he was drawn from his obscure retreat, by means of his son Hippias, and he was a third time received by the people of Athens as their master and sovereign. Upon this he sacrificed to his resentment the friends of Megacles, but he did not lose sight of the public good; and while he sought the aggrandizement of his family, he did not neglect the dignity and the honour of the Athenian name. He died about 527 years before the Christian era, after he had enjoyed the sovereign power at Athens for thirty-three years, including the years of his banishment, and he was succeeded by his son Hipparchus. Pisistratus, though an usurper and a tyrant, claims our admiration for his justice, his liberality and his moderation. If he was dreaded and detested as a master, the Athenians loved and respected his private virtues and his patriotism as a fellow-citizen; and the opprobrium which generally falls on his head may be attributed not to the severity of his administration, but to the republican principles of the Athenians, who hated and exclaimed against the moderation and equity of the mildest sovereign, while they flattered the pride and gratified the guilty desires of the most tyrannical of their fellow subjects. Pisistratus often refused to punish the insolence of his enemies: and when he had one day been virulently accused of murder, rather than inflict immediate punishment upon the man who had criminated him, he went to the Areopagus, and there convinced the Athenians that the accusations of his enemies were groundless, and that his life was irreproachable. It is to his labours that we are indebted for the preservation of the poems of Homer, and he was the first, according to Cicero, who introduced them at Athens, in the order in which they now stand. He also established a public library at Athens; and the valuable works which he had diligently collected, were carried into Persia when Xerxes made himself master of the capital of Attica. Hipparchus and Hippias, the sons of Pisistratus, who have received the name of Pisistratidæ, rendered themselves as illustrious as their father; but the flames of liberty were too powerful to be extinguished. The Pisistratidæ governed with great moderation, yet the name of a master, whether softened by mildness of manners, or rendered odious by oppression, was insupportable to the Athenians. Two of the most respectable of the citizens, called Harmodius and Aristogiton, conspired against them, and Hipparchus was dispatched in a public assembly. This murder was not, however, attended with any advantages, and though the two leaders of the conspiracy, who have been celebrated through every age for their patriotism, were supported by the people, yet Hippias quelled the tumult by his uncommon firmness and prudence, and for a while preserved that peace in Athens which his father had often been unable to command. This was not long to continue, Hippias was at last expelled by the united efforts of the Athenians and of their allies of Peloponnesus, and he left Attica, when he found himself unable to maintain his power and preserve his independence. The rest of the family of Pisistratus followed him in his banishment, and after they had refused to accept the liberal offers of the princes of Thessaly, and of the king of Macedonia, who wished them to settle in their respective territories, the Pisistratidæ retired to Sigæum, which their father had in the zenith of his power conquered. And bequeathed to his posterity. After the banishment of the Pisistratidæ, the Athenians became more than commonly jealous of their liberty, and often sacrificed the most powerful of their citizens, apprehensive of the influence which popularity, and a well-directed liberality, might gain among a fickle and unsettled populace. The Pisistratidæ were banished from Athens about eighteen years after the death of Pisistratus, B. C. 510. Ælian. V. H. 13. 14. – Paus. 7, 26. – Herod. 1, 59, 6, 103. – Val. Max. 1, 2. ——A king of Oxhoroenes, who rendered himself odious by his cruelty towards the nobles. He was put to death by them; and they carried away his body from the public assembly, by hiding each a piece of his flesh under their garments, to prevent a discovery from the people, with whom he was a great favourite. Plut. in Par.

PISO, a celebrated family at Rome, which was a branch of the Calpurnii, descended from Calpus, the son of Numa. Before the death of Augustus, eleven of this family had obtained the consulship, and many had been honoured with triumphs, on account of their victories, in the different provinces of the Roman empire. Of this family the most famous were —— Lucius Calpurnius, who was tribune of the people, about 149 years before Christ, and afterwards consul. His frugality procured him the surname of Frugi, and he gained the greatest honours as an orator, a lawyer, a statesman, and an historian. He made a successful campaign in Sicily, and rewarded his son, who had behaved with great valour during the war, with a crown of gold, which weighed twenty pounds. He composed some annals and harangues, which were lost in the age of Cicero. His style was obscure and inelegant. ——Caius, a Roman consul, A. U. C. 687, who supported the consular dignity against the tumults of the tribunes, and the clamours of the people. He made a law to restrain the cabals which generally prevailed at the election of the chief magistrates. —— Cneius, another consul under Augustus. He was one of the favourites of Tiberius, by whom he was appointed governor of Syria, where he rendered himself odious by his cruelty. He was accused of having poisoned Germanicus, and when he saw, on his return to Rome, that he was shunned and despised by his friends, he destroyed himself, A. D. 20. ——Lucius, a governor of Spain, who was assassinated by a peasant, as he was travelling through the country. The murderer was seized and tortured, but he refused to confess the cause of the murder. —— Lucius, a private man, accused of having uttered seditious words against the emperor Tiberius. He was condemned, but a natural death saved him from the hands of the executioner. ——Lucius, a governor of Rome for twenty years, an office which he discharged with the greatest justice and credit. He was greatly honoured by the friendship of Augustus, as well as of his preceptor a distinction which he deserved, both as a faithful citizen and a man of learning. Some, however, say, that Tiberius made him governor of Rome, because he had continued drinking with him a night and two days, or two days and two nights, according to Pliny. Horace dedicated his poem de Arte Poetica, to his two sons whose partiality for literature had distinguished them among the rest of the Romans, and who were fond of cultivating poetry in their leisure hours. ——Cneius, a factious and turbulent youth, who conspired against his country with Catiline. He was among the friends of Julius Cæsar. ——Caius, a Roman, who was at the head of a celebrated conspiracy against the emperor Nero. He had rendered himself a favourite of the people by his private as well as public virtues, by the generosity of his behaviour, his fondness of pleasure with the voluptuous, and his austerity with the grave and the reserved. He had been marked by some as a proper person to succeed the emperor; but the discovery of the plot by a freedman, who was among the conspirators, soon put him off, with all his partizans. He refused to court the affections of the people and of the army, when the whole had been made public; and instead of taking proper measures for his preservation, either by proclaiming himself emperor, as his friends advised, or by seeking a retreat in the distant provinces of the empire, he retired to his own house, where he opened the veins of both his arms, and bled to death. ——Lucius, a senator who followed the emperor Valerian into Persia. He proclaimed himself emperor after the death of Valerian, but he was defeated and put to death a few weeks after, A. D. 261, by Valens, &c. —— Licinianus, a senator adopted by the emperor Galba. He was put to death by Otho's orders, though his many virtues deserved a better fate. Tacit. Hist. 1, 14, &c. – Suet. Galb. 17. —— Caius, a son-in law of Cicero, remarkable for his abilities as well as the mildness of his disposition and the goodness of his heart. He died before Cicero's return from banishment. Cic. Br. 78. – Ad Fam. 14, ep 1. – Ad Quæ. 3. Pis. 1. —— Lucius Cæsoninus, a patrician, whose daughter married Julius Cæsar. He supported Clodius in the banishment of Cicero, and disgraced himself in an embassy to Antony, who was engaged at the siege of Mutina. – Cic. Fam. 4, 4. Phil. 3, 9. 10, 5. – Horat. – *Tacit. PISÖNIS VILLA, a place near Baiæ in Campania, which the emperor Nero often frequented. Tacit. Ann. 1.

PISTOR, a surname given to Jupiter by the Romans, signifying baker, because when their city was taken by the Gauls, the god persuaded them to throw down loaves from the Tarpeian hill where they were besieged, that the enemy might from thence suppose, that they were not in want of provisions, though in reality they were near surrendering through famine. This deceived the Gauls, and they soon after raised the siege. Ovid. Fast. 6, 350, 394, &c.

PISTORIA, a town of Etruria, north-east of Lucca, and at the foot of the Apennines. It is memorable in the history of Rome, as having witnessed in its vicinity the close of Catiline's desperate but short career. Its modern name is Pistoia. Sallust. Bell. Cat. 62.

PITANE, a town of Æolis, in Asia Minor, to the north west of the river Caicus. It was the birthplace of Arcesilaus the philosopher, founder of the middle academy. It is supposed to occupy the site now called Tchandeli. Strab. 13.

PITHECUSA, an island off the coast of Campania, at the entrance of the bay of Naples. The appellation Pithecusa, according to Pliny, was not derived from the number of apes (πίθηκοι) which the island was supposed to contain, but from the earthen casks or barrels (πίθοιοι, dolia), which were made there. The Romans called the island Ænaria, probably from the copper which they found in it. The etymology assigned by some, that the island obtained this name from Æneas, who landed there on his way to Latium, is a mere fable. Pithecusa was a volcanic island, and Virgil gives it the name of Inarime, in accordance with the old traditions which made the body of Typhœus to have been placed under this island and the Phlegræan plain. Homer, however, describes Typhœus as lying in Arima (ἐν Ἀρίμοις). The modern name of Pithecusa is Ischia, and the island at the present day abounds in corn, wine, fruits, &c. Silk is manufactured here, and the inhabitants are about 32,000 in number. This island formed the marquisate of the celebrated sculptor Canova. Pun. 3, 6.—Virg. Æn. 9, 716.—Bowen, M. 2, 783

PITHO called also Suada, the goddess of persuasion among the Greeks and Romans, supposed to be the daughter of Mercury and Venus. She was represented with a diadem on her head, to intimate her influence over the hearts of men. One of her arms appears raised as in the attitude of an orator haranguing in a public assembly, and with the other she holds a thunderbolt and fetters, made with flowers to signify the powers of reasoning, and the attractions of eloquence. A caduceus, as a symbol of persuasion, appears at her feet, with the writings of Demosthenes and Cicero, the two most celebrated among the ancients, who understood how to command the attention of their audience, and to rouse and animate their various passions.

PITHOLEON, a foolish poet, the author of some silly epigrams, in which Greek and Latin expressions were intermingled together. Bentley thinks that the individual to whom Horace refers was the same of whom Suetonius makes mention, under the name Pitholaus, as having been the author of some defamatory verses against Julius Cæsar, and that Horace styles him Pitholeon, because Pitholaus would have been unmanageable in hexameter verse. Suet. Cæs. 75.—Horat. Sat. 1, 10, 21

PITTACUS, a native of Mitylene in Lesbos, was one of the seven wise men of Greece. His father, whose name was Caicus, or Cyrrhadius, was a native of Thrace, and his mother was a citizen of Lesbos. With the assistance of the brothers of Alcæus, he delivered his country from the oppression of the tyrant Melanchrus, and in the war which the Athenians waged against Lesbos he appeared at the head of his countrymen, and challenged to single combat Phrynon, the enemy's general. As the event of the war seemed to depend upon this combat, Pittacus had recourse to artifice, and when he engaged, he entangled his adversary in a net, which he had concealed under his shield, and easily dispatched him. He was amply rewarded for this victory; and his countrymen, sensible of his merit, unanimously appointed him governor of their city, with unlimited authority. In this capacity Pittacus behaved with great moderation and prudence; and after he had governed his fellow-citizens with the strictest justice, and after he had established and enforced the most salutary laws, he voluntarily resigned the sovereign power after he had enjoyed it for ten years, observing that the virtues and the reasons of private life were incompatible with the power and influence of a sovereign. His disinterestedness gained him many admirers; and when the Mitylenæans wished to reward his public services by presenting him with an immense tract of territory, he refused to accept more land than what should be contained within the distance to which he could throw a javelin. He died in the eighty-second year of his age, about 570 years before Christ, after he had spent the last ten years of his life in literary ease, and peaceful retirement. One of his favourite maxims was that man ought to provide against misfortunes, to avoid them; but that if they ever happened, he ought to support them with patience and resignation. In prosperity friends were to be acquired, and in the hour of adversity their faithfulness was to be tried. He also observed that in our actions it was imprudent to make others acquainted with our designs, for if we failed, we had exposed ourselves to censure and to ridicule. Many of his maxims were inscribed on the walls of Apollo's temple at Delphi, to show the world how great an opinion the Mitylenæans entertained of his abilities as a philosopher, a moralist, and a man. By one of his laws every fault committed by a man when intoxicated, deserved double punishment. Paus. 10, 24.—Ælian. V. H. 2, &c.—Val. Max. 6, 5. —A grandson of Porus, king of India.

PITTHEUS a king of Troezene in Argolis, son of Pelops and Hippodamia. He was universally admired for his learning, wisdom, and application, he publicly taught in a school at Troezene, and even composed a book, which was seen by Pausanias the geographer. He gave his daughter Æthra in marriage to Ægeus, king of Athens, and he himself took particular care of the youth and education of his grandson Theseus. He was buried at Troezene, which he had founded, and on his tomb were seen, for many ages, three seats of white marble, on which he sat, with two other judges, whenever he gave laws to his subjects or settled their disputes. Paus. 1 et 2. —Plut in Thes.—Strab. 8

PITYONESUS, a small island, off the coast of Argolis. It lay opposite to Epidaurus, and was situate six miles from the coast, and seventeen from Ægina. Plin. 4, 11.

PITYUS, (-untis,) now Pitchinde, a town of Colchis, on the Euxine Sea, to the west of Dioscurias or Sebastopolis. Plin 6, 5.

PITYUSA, a small island, off the coast of Argolis, near Aristera. The modern name is Tuica. Plin. 4, 12.

PITYUSÆ or pine islands, a group of small islands in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Spain, and lying to the south-west of the Baleares. They derived their name from the number of pine trees (pinus, pinea,) which grew in them. The largest is Ebusus or Ivisa, and next to it is Ophiusa, or Formentera Mela, 2, 7.—Plin. 3, 5.

PIUS, a surname given to the emperor Antoninus, on account of his piety and virtue.—A surname given to Metellus, because he interexted himself so warmly to have his father recalled from banishment.

PLACENTIA, a city of Gallia Cisalpina, near the junction of the Trebia and Padus. It was a colony formed by the Romans upon the apprehension of the expedition of Hannibal, whose attacks, as well as those of his brother Asdrubal, it withstood. It was taken and burned by the Gauls under Hamilcar, at the end of the second Punic war. Its modern name is Piacenza

PLACIDIA, a daughter of Theodosius the Great, sister to Honorius and Arcadius. She married Adolphus, king of the Goths, and afterwards Constantius, by whom she had Valentinian the 3d. She died A. D. 449.

PLANASIA, a small island between Corsica and Ilva, to which Posthumius Agrippa was banished by Augustus. It is now Pianosa. Tacit. Ann 1, 3 2, 39.

PLANCINA, a woman celebrated for her intrigues and her crimes, who married Piso, and was acquitted with him of having murdered Germanicus, in the reign of Tiberius. She was acquitted either by means of the empress Livia, or on account of the partiality of the emperor for her person. She had long supported the spirits of her husband, during his confinement, but, when she saw herself freed from the accusation, she totally abandoned him to his fate. Subservient in every thing to the will of Livia she, at her instigation, became guilty of the greatest crimes, to injure the character of Agrippina After the death of Agrippina, Plancina was accused of the most atrocious villanies, and, as she knew that she could not elude justice, she put herself to death, A. D. 33. Tacit. Ann 6, 26, &c.

PLANCUS, MUNATIUS, L. a Roman, who rendered himself ridiculous by his follies and his extravagance. He had been consul, and had presided over a province in the capacity of governor; but he forgot all his dignity, and became one of the most servile flatterers of Cleopatra and Antony. At the court of the Egyptian queen in Alexandria, he appeared in the character of the meanest stage dancer, and, in comedy, he personated Cratinus, and painted his body of a green colour, dancing on a public stage quite naked, only with a crown of green reeds on his head, while he had tied behind his back the tail of a large sea fish. This exposed him to the public derision, and, when Antony had joined the rest of his friends in censuring him for his unbecoming behaviour, he deserted to Octavius, who received him with great marks of friendship and attention. It was he who proposed, in the Roman senate, that the title of Augustus should be conferred on his friend Octavius, as expressive of the dignity and the reverence which the greatness of his exploits seemed to claim. Horace has dedicated 1 od. 7 to him; and he certainly deserved the honour, from the elegance of his letters, which are still extant, written to Cicero. Plut. in Anton.——A patrician, proscribed by the second triumvirate. His servants wished to save him from death, but he refused it, rather than expose their persons to danger PLANUDES, Maximus, a monk of Constantinople, in the thirteenth century. He wrote a romantic history of Æsop; several fables; and a collection of epigrams, in Greek, under the title of Anthologia, printed at Florence in 1491.

PLATEÆ, (anl Æ, arum) a city of Bœotia, of very ancient date, situate at the foot of mount Cithæron, and near the river Asopus, which divided its territory from that of Thebes. The Plateæans, animated by a spirit of independence, had early separated themselves from the Bœotian confederacy, conceiving the objects of this political union to be hostile to their real interests; and had, in consequence of the enmity of the latter city, been induced to place themselves under the protection of Athens. Grateful for the services which they received on this occasion from that power, they testified their zeal in its behalf, by sending a thousand soldiers to Marathon, who thus shared the glory of that memorable day. The Plateæans also manned some of the Athenian vessels at Artemisium, and fought in several battles which took place off that promontory, though not at Salamis, as they had returned to their homes after the Greeks withdrew from the Eurripus, in order to place their families and valuables in safety, and could not therefore arrive in time. They also fought most bravely in the great battle which took place near their city, against Mardonius the Persian general, and earned the thanks of Pausanias and the confederate Greek commanders for their gallant conduct on this as well as other occasions. But it is asserted by Demosthenes, that they afterwards incurred the hatred of the Lacedæmonians, and more especially of their kings, for having caused the inscription set up by Pausanias, in commemoration of the victory over the Persians, to be altered. Platæa, which was afterwards burnt by the army of Xerxes, was soon restored with the assistance of Athens and the alliance between the two cities was cemented more closely than before. The attack made upon Platæa by a party of Thebans at night, was the first act of aggression committed on the Peloponnesian side in the war which took place not long after The enterprise failed. The natural enmity of Thebes against this little republic was now raised to its height by this defeat, and pressing solicitations were made to the Spartan government to assist in taking signal vengeance on the Plateans for their adherence to the Athenian interests Accordingly in the third year of the war, a large Peloponnesian force, under Archidamus, king of Sparta, arrived under the walls of Platæa, and, having summoned the inhabitants to abandon their alliance with Athens, proceeded, on their refusal, to lay siege to the town. The narrative of these operations, and the heroic defence of the Plateans, the circumvallation and blockade of the city by the enemy, with the daring and successful escape of a part of the garrison, are given with the greatest detail by Thucydides, and certainly form one of the most interesting portions of his history. Worn out at length by hunger and fatigue, those Plateans who remained in the town were compelled to yield to their persevering and relentless foes, who, instigated by the implacable resentment of the Thebans, caused all who surrendered to be put to death, and razed the town to the ground, with the exception of one building, constructed out of the ruins of the city, which they consecrated to Juno, and employed as a house of reception for travellers. From Pausanias we learn, that Platæa was again restored after the peace of Antalcidas; but when the Spartans seized on the Cadmean citadel, the Thebans, suspecting that the Plateans were privy to the enterprise, took possession of the town by stratagem, and once more levelled its foundations to the ground. Though it seems to have been the intention of Philip, and also of Alexander, to restore Platæa, this was not carried into effect till the reign of Cassander, who is said to have rebuilt both Thebes and Platæa at the same time. The ruins of Platæa are situated upon a promontory projecting from the base of Cithæron. The place has now the usual appellation bestowed upon the ruins of Grecian citadels; it is called Palæo Castro. The walls are of the earliest kind of military structure, consisting of very considerable masses, evenly hewn, and well built. Homer Il. 2, 504.—Herod 6, 108. 8, 45 et 50. 9, 28.—Thucyd 2, 1, &c. 71, &c. 3, 20, &c. 53, &c.—Demosth. in Neær.—Diod, Sic 11.—Paus. 9, 1 et 3 —Arrian. 1, 9. —Plut. in Alex.

PLATO a celebrated philosopher at Athens, son of Ariston and Parectonia. His original name was Aristocles, and he received that of Plato from the largeness of his shoulders. As one of the descendants of Codrus, and as the offspring of a noble, illustrious, and opulent family, Plato was educated with care, his body was formed and invigorated with gymnastic exercises, and his mind was cultivated and enlightened by the study of poetry and of geometry, from which he derived that acuteness of judgment, and warmth of imagination, which have stamped his character as the most subtle and flowery writer of antiquity. He first began his literary career by writing poems and tragedies; but he was soon disgusted with his own productions, when at the age of twenty, he was introduced into the presence of Socrates, and when he was enabled to compare and examine, with critical accuracy, the merit of his compositions, with those of his poetical predecessors. He therefore committed to the flames these productions of his early years, which could not command the attention or gain the applause of a matured age. During eight years he continued to be one of the pupils of Socrates; and if he was prevented by a momentary indisposition from attending the philosopher's last moments, yet he collected from the conversation of those that were present, and from his own accurate observations, the minutest and most circumstantial accounts, which can exhibit, in its truest colours, the concern and sensibility of the pupil, and the firmness, virtues, and moral sentiments of the dying philosopher. After the death of Socrates, Plato retired from Athens, and, to acquire that information which the accurate observer can derive in foreign countries, he began to travel over Greece. He visited Megara, Thebes, and Elis, where he met with the kindest reception from his fellow-disciples, whom the violent death of their master had likewise removed from Attica. He afterwards visited Magna Græcia, attracted by the fame of the Pythagorean philosophy, and by the learning, abilities, and reputation of its professors, Philolaus, Archytas and Eurytus. He afterwards passed into Sicily, and examined the eruptions and fires of the volcano of that island. He also visited Egypt, where then the mathematician Theodorus flourished, and where he knew that the tenets of the Pythagorean philosophy and metempsychosis had been fostered and cherished. When he had finished his travels, Plato retired to the groves of Academus, in the neighbourhood of Athens, where his lectures were soon attended by a crowd of learned, noble, and illustrious pupils; and the philosopher, by refusing to have a share in the administration of affairs, rendered his name more famous and his school more frequented. During forty years he presided at the head of the academy, and there he devoted his time to the instruction of his pupils, and composed those dialogues which have been the admiration of every age and country. His studies however, were interrupted for a while while he obeyed the pressing calls and invitations of Dionysius, and whilst he persuaded the tyrant to become a man, the father of his people, and the friend of liberty. [Vid. Dionysius 2d.] In his dress the philosopher was not ostentatious; his manners were elegant but modest, simple, without affectation; and the great honours which his learning deserved were not paid to his appearance. When he came to the Olympian games, Plato resided, during the celebration, in a family who were totally strangers to him. He ate and drank with them, he partook of their innocent pleasures and amusements; but though he told them his name was Plato, yet he never spoke of the employment to which he pursued at Athens, and never introduced the name of that philosopher whose doctrines he followed, and whose death and virtues were favourite topics of conversation in every part of Greece. When he returned home, he was attended by the family which had so kindly entertained him; and, as being a native of Athens, he was desired to show them the great philosopher whose name he bore: their surprise was great when he told them that he himself was the Plato whom they wished to behold. In his diet he was moderate, and indeed, to sobriety and temperance in the use of food, and to the want of those pleasures which enfeeble the body and enervate the mind, some have attributed his preservation during the tremendous pestilence which raged at Athens with so much fury at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. Plato was never subject to any long or lingering indisposition, and though change of climate had enfeebled a constitution naturally strong and healthy, the philosopher lived to an advanced age, and was often heard to say, when his physicians advised him to leave his residence at Athens, where the air was impregnated by the pestilence, that he would not advance one single step to gain the top of mount Athos, were he assured to attain the great longevity which the inhabitants of that mountain were said to enjoy above the rest of mankind. Plato died on his birth-day, in the eighty-first year of his age about 348 years before the Christian era. His last moments were easy and without pain, and, according to some, he expired in the midst of an entertainment, or, according to Cicero, as he was writing The works of Plato are numerous; they are all written in the form of a dialogue, except twelve letters. He speaks always by the mouth of others, and the philosopher has no where made mention of himself except once in his dialogue intituled Phædon, and, another time in his apology for Socrates. His writings were so celebrated, and his opinion so respected, that he was called divine; and for the elegance, melody, and sweetness of his expressions, he was distinguished by the appellation of the Athenian bee. Cicero had such an esteem for him, that, in the warmth of panegyric, he exclaimed errare mehercule malo cum Platone, quam cum istis vera sentire; and Quintilian said, that, when he read Plato, he seemed to hear not a man but a divinity speaking. His style, however, though admired and commended by the best and most refined of critics among the ancients, has not escaped the censure of some of the moderns; and the philosopher has been blamed, who supports that fire is a pyramid tied to the earth by numbers, that the world is a figure consisting of twelve pentagons, and who, to prove the metempsychosis and the immortality of the soul, asserts that the dead are born from the living, and the living from the dead. The speculative mind of Plato was employed in examining things divine and human, and he attempted to fix and ascertain, not only the practical doctrine of morals and politics, but the more subtle and abstruse theory of mystical theogony. His philosophy was universally received and adopted, and it has not only governed the opinions of the speculative part of mankind, but it continues still to influence the reasoning and to divide the sentiments, of the moderns. In his system of philosophy, he followed the physics of Heraclitus, the metaphysical opinions of Pythagoras, and the morals of Socrates. He maintained the existence of two beings, one self-existent, and the other formed by the hand of a pre-existent creature, God and man. The world was created by that self-existent cause, from the rude indigested mass of matter which had existed from all eternity, and which had even been animated by an irregular principle of motion. The origin of evil could not be traced under the government of a deity, without admitting a stubborn intractability and wildness congenial to matter, and from these, consequently, could be demonstrated the deviations from the laws of nature, and from thence the extravagant passions and appetites of men. From materials like these were formed the four elements, and the beautiful structure of the heavens and the earth, and into the active, but irrational, principle of matter, the divinity infused a rational soul. The souls of men were formed from the remainder of the rational soul of the world, which had previously given existence to the invisible gods and demons. The philosopher, therefore, supported the doctrine of ideal forms, and the pre-existence of the human mind, which he considered as emanations of the Deity, which can never remain satisfied with objects or things unworthy of their divine original. Men could perceive, with their corporeal senses, the types of immutable things, and the fluctuating objects of the material world, but the sudden changes to which these are continually obnoxious, create innumerable disorders, and hence arise deception, and, in short, all the errors and miseries of human life. Yet, in whatever situation man may be, he is still an object of divine concern; and, to recommend himself to the favour of the pre-existent cause, he must comply with the purposes of his creation, and, by proper care and diligence, he can recover those immaculate powers with which he was naturally endowed. All science the philosopher made to consist in reminiscence, and in recalling the nature, forms, and proportions of those perfect and immutable essences, with which the human mind had been conversant. From observations like these, the summit of felicity might be attained by removing from the material, and approaching nearer to the intellectual world, by curbing and governing the passions which were ever agitated and inflamed by real or imaginary objects. The passions were divided into two classes: the first consisted of the irascible passions, which originated in pride or resentment, and were seated in the breast; the other, founded on the love of pleasure, was the concupiscible part of the soul, seated in the belly and inferior parts of the body. These different orders induced the philosopher to compare the soul to a small republic, of which the reasoning and judging powers were stationed in the head, as in a firm citadel, and of which the senses were its guards and servants. By the irascible part of the soul men asserted their dignity, repelled injuries, and scorned danger; and the concupiscible part provided for the support and the necessities of the body, and, when governed with propriety, it gave rise to temperance. Justice was produced by the regular dominion of reason, and by the submission of the passions; and prudence arose from the strength, acuteness, and perfection of the soul, without which all other virtues could not exist. But amidst all this, wisdom was not easily attained; as their creation all minds were not endowed with the same excellence, the bodies which they animated on earth were not always in harmony with the divine emanation; some might be too weak, others too strong, and on the first years of a man's life depended his future consequence; as an effeminate and licentious education seemed calculated to destroy the purposes of the divinity, while the contrary produced different effects, and tended to cultivate and improve the reasoning and judging faculty, and to produce wisdom and virtue. Plato was the first who supported the immortality of the soul upon arguments solid and permanent, deduced from truth and experience. He did not imagine that the diseases, and the death of the body, could injure the principle of life and destroy the soul, which, of itself, was of divine origin, and of an uncorrupted and immutable essence, which, though inherent for a while in matter, could not lose that power which was the emanation of God. From doctrines like these, the great founder of Platonism concluded that there might exist in the world a community of men, whose passions could be governed with moderation, and who, from knowing the evils and miseries which arise from ill conduct, might aspire to excellence, and attain that perfection which can be derived from the proper exercise of the rational and moral powers. To illustrate this more fully, the philosopher wrote a book, well known by the name of the republic of Plato, in which he explains with acuteness, judgment, and elegance, the rise and revolution of civil society; and so respected was his opinion as a legislator, that his scholars were employed in regulating the republics of Arcadia, Elis, and Cnidus, at the desire of those states, and Xenocrates gave political rules for good and impartial government to the conqueror of the east. The works of Plato were first published by Aldus Manutius, at Venice, in 1513, 2 vols. folio. The editions of Ficinus and Serranus are very valuable; but the notes and interpretations of both are to be read with caution, as not representing Plato's sentiments with fidelity The most useful editions of Plato, are, the Bipont edition, 12 vols. 8vo. 1781 - 7; that of Bekker, Berol. 10 vols. 8vo. 1816 8; and the London reprint of Bekker, with the annotations of Heindorff, Wyttenbach, and others Bekker's text is decidedly the best The editions of Ast, Lips. 1819—24, 7 vols. 8vo., and of Stallbaum, Lips. 1821—5, 8 vols. 8vo. are also deserving of high commendation English versions of several of Plato's dialogues have been published at different periods, by various hands, but the translators who have principally distinguished themselves, by giving the writings of this philosopher in our vernacular idiom, are Floyer Sydenham, and Thomas Taylor Plato Dial. &c.—Cic de Offic 1. De Div. 1, 36 *De Nat. He is said to have left twenty-eight comedies, of which the titles of many are to be found in Athenæus, Pollux, and other writers. Of his works, only a few fragments remain, some of which are of the epigrammatic kind.

PLAUTIA LEX, was enacted by M Plautius, the tribune, A. U. C 664. It required every tribe annually to choose fifteen persons of their body, to serve as judges, making the honour common to all the three orders, according to the majority of votes in every tribe.—Another, called also Plotia A U. C 675. It punished with the interdictio aqua et ignis, all persons who were found guilty of attempts upon the state, or the senators or magistrates, or such as appeared in public armed with an evil design, or such as forcibly expelled any person from his legal possessions.

PLAUTIANUS, FULVIUS, an African of mean birth, who was banished for his seditious behaviour in the years of his obscurity. In his banishment, Plautianus formed an acquaintance with Severus who, some years after, ascended the imperial throne. This was the beginning of his prosperity; Severus paid the greatest attention to him, and, if we believe some authors, their familiarity and intercourse were carried beyond the bounds of modesty and propriety. Plautianus shared the favours of Severus on the throne as well as in ob-curity. He was invested with as much power as his patron at Rome, and in the provinces; and, indeed, he wanted but the name of emperor to be his equal. His table was served with more delicate meats than that of the emperor; when he walked in the public streets he received the most distinguishing honours, and a number of orders ordered the most noble citizens, as well as the meanest beggars, to make way for the favourite of the emperor, and not to fix their eyes upon him. He was concerned in all the rapine and destruction which were committed through the empire, and he enriched himself with the possessions of those who had been sacrificed to the emperor's cruelty or avarice. To complete his triumph, and to make himself still greater, Plautianus married his favourite daughter Plautilla to Caracalla, the son of the emperor; and so eager was the emperor to indulge his inclinations in this and in every other respect, that he declared he loved Plautianus so much that he would even wish to die before him. The marriage of Caracalla with Plautilla was attended with serious consequences. The son of Severus had complied with great reluctance, and, though Plautilla was amiable to her manners, commanding in aspect, and of a beautiful countenance, yet the young prince often threatened to punish her haughty and imperious behaviour as soon as he succeeded to the throne. Plautilla reported the whole to her father, and to save his daughter from the vengeance of Caracalla, Plautianus conspired against the emperor and his son. The conspiracy was discovered, and Severus forgot his attachment to Plautianus, and the favours he had heaped upon him, when he heard of his perfidy. The wicked minister was immediately put to death, and Plautilla banished to the island of Lipari, with her brother Plautius, where, seven years after, she was put to death by order of Caracalla, A D. 211. Plautilla had two children, a son who died in his childhood, and a daughter, whom Caracalla murdered in the arms of her mother. Dio. Cass.

PLAUTIUS, a Roman, who became so disconsolate at the death of his wife, that he threw himself upon her burning pile. Val Max. 4, ii. —Aulus, a governor of Britain who obtained an ovation for the conquests he had gained there over the barbarians

PLAUTUS, M ACCIUS, a comic poet, born at Sarsina, in Umbria. Fortune proved unkind to him, and, from competence, he was reduced to the meanest poverty, by engaging in a commercial line. To maintain himself, he entered into the family of a baker as a common servant, and, while he was employed in grinding corn, he sometimes dedicated a few moments to the comic muse Some, however, reject this account as false, and support that Plautus was never obliged to the laborious employments of a bakehouse for his maintenance. He wrote twenty-five comedies, of which only twenty are extant; the Amphitruo, Aulularia, Asinaria, Captivi, Curculio, Casina, Cistellaria, Epidicus, Bacchides, Mostellaria, Menæchmi, Miles gloriosus, Mercator, Pseudolus, Pœnulus, Persa, Rudens, Stichus, Trinummus, and Truculentus. He died about 184 years before the Christian era; and Varro, his learned countryman, wrote this stanza, which deserved to be engraved on his tomb:

Postquam morte captus est Plautus,
Comœdia luget, scena est deserta;
Deinde risus, ludus, jocusque, et numeri
Innumeri simul omnes coll crymarunt.

The plays of Plautus were universally esteemed at Rome, and the purity, the energy, and the elegance of his language, were, by other writers, considered as objects of imitation; and Varro, whose judgment is great, and generally decisive, declares, that if the Muses were willing to speak Latin, they would speak in the language of Plautus. In the Augustan age, however, when the Roman language became more pure and refined, the comedies of Plautus did not appear free from inaccuracy. The poet, when compared to the more elegant expressions of a Terence, was censured for his negligence in versification, his low wit, execrable puns, and disgusting obscenities. Yet, however censured as to language or sentiments, Plautus continued to be a favourite on the stage. If his expressions were not shocks or delicate, it was universally admitted that he was more happy than other comic writers in his pictures; the incidents of his plays were more varied, the acts more interesting, the characters more truly displayed, and the catastrophe more natural. In the reign of the emperor Diocletian, his comedies were still acted on the public theatres; and no greater compliment can be paid to his abilities as a comic writer, and no greater censure can be passed upon his successors in dramatic composition, than to observe, that for 500 years, with all the disadvantages of obsolete language and diction, in spite of the change of manners, and the revolutions of government, he commanded and received that applause which no other writer dared to dispute with him. The best editions of Plautus are, that of Camerarius. Basil. 1558, 8vo., that of Lambinus. Lutet. 1577, fol., that of Taubmann, Witteb 1621, 4to., that of Ernesti, Lips. 1760, 8vo. 2 vols., that of Schmieder. Gott. 1804, 8vo. 2 vols., and that of Bothe. Berol. 1804—11, 8vo. 4 vols. The best translation of Plautus is, that of Thornton, Colman, and Warner. Varro. apud Gellium, 3, 10, 1.—Cic. de Offic. 1, 29. De Orat. 2, 12.—Horat. ep. 2, 1, 54 et 170. *De Art. PLEIADES, or VERGILIÆ, a name given to seven of the daughters of Atlas by Pleione or Æthra, one of the Oceanides. They were placed in the heavens after death, where they formed a constellation called Pleiades, near the back of the bull in the Zodiac. Their names were Alcyone, Merope, Maia, Electra, Taygeta, Sterope, and Celeno. They all, except Merope, who married Sisyphus, king of Corinth, had some of the immortal gods for their suitors. On that account, therefore, Merope's star is dim and obscure among the rest of her sisters, because she married a mortal; though some imagine that Electra's star above was dim, ever after the fall of Troy of which her son Dardanus had been the king and founder. The name of the Pleiades is derived from the Greek word πλεῖν, to sail, because that constellation shows the time most favourable to navigation, which is in the spring. The name of Vergiliæ they deprive from ver, the spring. They are sometimes called Atlantides, from their father, or Hesperides, from the gardens of that name, which belonged to Atlas. Hygin. fab. 192. P. A. 2, 21.—*Ovid. Their names were Lycophron, Theocritus, Aratus, Nicander, Apollonius, Philicus, and Homerus the younger.

PLEIONE, one of the Oceanides, who married Atlas, king of Mauritania, by whom she had twelve daughters, and a son called Hyas. Seven of the daughters were changed into a constellation called Pleiades, and the rest into another called Hyades. Ovid. Fast. 5, 84.

PLEMMYRIUM, a promontory of Sicily, in the immediate neighbourhood of Syracuse, and facing the island of Ortygia, forming with this island the entrance to the great harbour of that city. It seems to have been called Plemmyrium as being the place where the tide (πλημύρα) rose and beat, making what is called in Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire an eger. Its modern name is Massa d' Olivera. Thucyd. 7, 4 et 23.

PLINIUS, SECUNDUS, C. surnamed the Elder, was born at Verona, of a noble family. He distinguished himself in the field, and, after he had been made one of the augurs at Rome, he was appointed governor of Spain. In his public character he did not neglect the pleasures of literature, the day was employed in the administration of the affairs of his province, and the night was dedicated to study. Every moment of time was precious to him; at his meals one of his servants read to him books valuable for their information, and from them he immediately made copious extracts, in a memorandum book. Even while he dressed himself after bathing, his attention was called away from surrounding objects, and he was either employed in listening to another, or in dictating himself. To a mind so earnestly devoted to learning, nothing appeared too laborious, no undertaking too troublesome. He deemed every moment lost which was not dedicated to study, and, from these reasons he never appeared at Rome but in a chariot, and, wherever he went, he was always accompanied by his amanuensis. He even censured his nephew, Pliny, the Younger, because he had indulged himself with a walk, and sternly observed, that he might have employed those moments to better advantage. But, if his literary pursuits made him forget the public affairs, his prudence, his abilities, and the purity and innocence of his character, made him known and respected. He was courted and admired by the emperors Titus and Vespasian, and he received from them all the favours which a virtuous prince could offer, and an honest subject receive. As he was at Misenum, where he commanded the fleet, which was then stationed there, Pliny was surprised at the sudden appearance of a cloud of dust and ashes. He was then ignorant of the cause which produced it, and he immediately set sail in a small vessel for mount Vesuvius, which he at last discovered to have made a dreadful eruption. The sight of a number of boats that fled from the coast to avoid the danger, might have deterred another, but the curiosity of Pliny excited him to advance with more boldness, and, though his vessel was often covered with stones and ashes, that were continually thrown up by the mountain, yet he landed on the coast. The place was deserted by the inhabitants, but Pliny remained there during the night, the better to observe the mountain, which, during the obscurity, appeared to be one continued blaze. He was soon disturbed by a dreadful earthquake, and the contrary wind on the morrow, prevented him from returning to Misenum. The eruption of the volcano increased, and, at last, the fire approached the place where the philosopher made his observations. Pliny endeavoured to fly before it, but though he was supported by two of his servant, he was unable to escape. He soon fell down, suffocated by the thick vapours that surrounded him, and the insupportable stench of sulphureous matter. His body was found three days after, and decently buried by his nephew, who was then at Misenum with the fleet. This memorable event happened in the 79th year of the Christian era, and the philosopher who perished by the eruptions of the volcano, has been called by some the martyr of nature. He was then in the 56th year of his age. Of the works which he composed, none are extant but his natural history in 37 books. It is a work as Pliny the Younger says, full of erudition, and as varied as nature itself. It treats of the stars, the heavens, wind, rain, hail, minerals, trees, flowers, and plants besides an account of all living animals, birds fishes, and beasts, a geographical description of every place on the globe, and an history of every art and science, of commerce and navigation with their rise, progress, and several improvements. He is happy in his descriptions as a naturalist, he writes with force and energy, and though many of his ideas and conjectures are sometimes ill founded yet he possesses that fecundity of imagination and vivacity of expression, which are requisite to treat a subject with propriety, and to render a history of nature pleasing, interesting and above all instructive. His style possesses not the graces of the Augustan age, it has neither its purity, and elegance, nor its simplicity, but is rather cramped, obscure, and sometimes unintelligible. Yet for all this it has ever been admired, and esteemed, and it may be called a compilation of every thing which had been written before his age on the various subjects which he treats, and a judicious collection from the most excellent treatises which had been composed on the various productions of nature. Pliny was not ashamed to mention the authors which he quoted he speaks of them with admiration, and while he pays the greatest compliment to their abilities, his encomiums show, in the strongest light, the goodness, the sensibility, and the ingenuousness of his own mind. He had written 160 volumes of remarks and annotations on the various authors which he had read, and so great was the opinion in which contemporaries, of his erudition and abilities, that a man called Lartius Lutinus offered to buy his notes and observations for the enormous sum of about 2 242l English money. The philosopher, who was himself rich and independent, rejected the offer, and his compilations, after his death, came into the hands of his nephew Pliny. The best editions of Pliny are that of Hardouin, 5 vols. fol. Paris. 1723; that of Francius, 10 vols. 8vo. Lips 1778-91; that of Brotier, 6 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1779; and the Variorum 8vo. in 6 vols. Lips. 1778-89. Tacit. Ann. 1. 69. 13, 20 15, 53.—Plin. ep. &c.——C. Cæcilius Secundus, surnamed the Younger, was son of L. Cæcilius by the sister of Pliny the elder. He was adopted by his uncle whose name he assumed, and whose estates and effects he inherited. He received the greatest part of his education under Quintilian, and at the age of 19 he appeared at the bar, where he distinguished himself so much by his eloquence, that he and Tacitus were reckoned the two strongest orators of their age. He did not, make his profession an object of gain like the rest of the Roman orators, but he refused fees from the rich as well as from the poorest of his clients, and declared that he cheerfully employed himself for the protection of innocence, the relief of the indigent, and the detection of vice. He published many of his harangues and orations, which have been lost. When Trajan was invested with the imperial purple, Pliny was created consul by the emperor. This honour the consul acknowledged in a celebrated panegyric, which, at the request of the Roman senate, and in the name of the whole empire, he pronounced on Trajan. Some time after he presided over Pontus and Bithynia, in the office and with the power of pro-consul and by his humanity and philanthropy the subject was freed from the burden of partial taxes, and the persecution which had been begun against the Christians of his province was stopped, when Pliny solemnly declared to the emperor that the followers of Christ were a meek and inoffensive sect of men, that their morals were pure and innocent, that they were free from all crimes, and that they voluntarily bound themselves by the most solemn oaths to abstain from vice, and to relinquish every sinful pursuit. If he rendered himself popular in his province, he was not less respected at Rome. He was there the friend of the poor, the patron of learning, great without arrogance, affable in his behaviour, and an example of good breeding, sobriety, temperance, and modesty. As a father and a husband his character was amiable; as a subject he was faithful to his prince; and as a magistrate he was candid, open, and compassionate. His native country shared among the rest, his unbounded benevolence, and Comum, a small town of Insubria, which gave him birth, boasted of his liberality in the valuable and choice library of books which he collected there. He also contributed towards the expences which attended the education of his countrymen, and liberally spent part of his estate for the advancement of literature, and for the instruction of those whom poverty otherwise deprived of the advantages of a public education. He made his preceptor Quintilian, and the poet Martial, objects of his benevolence, and when the daughter of the former was married, Pliny wrote to the father with the greatest civility; and while he observed that he was rich in the possession of learning, though poor in the goods of fortune, he begged of him to accept, as a dowry for his beloved daughter, 50,000 sesterces, about 300l. I would not, continued he, be so moderate, were I not assured from your modesty, and disinterestedness, that the smallness of the present will render it acceptable. He died in the 52 year of his age A. D. 113. He had written a history of his own times, which is lost. It is said that Tacitus did not begin his history till he had found it impossible to persuade Pliny to undertake that laborious task, and indeed what could not have been expected from the panegyrist of Trajan, if Tacitus acknowledged himself inferior to him in delineating the character of the times. Some suppose, but falsely, that Pliny wrote the lives of illustrious men, universally ascribed to Cornelius Nepos. He also wrote poetry, but his verses have all perished, and nothing of his learned works remains, but his panegyric on the emperor Trajan, and 10 books of letters, which he himself collected and prepared for the public, from a numerous and respectable correspondence. These letters contain many curious and interesting facts, they abound with many anecdotes of the generosity and the humane sentiments of the writer. They are written with elegance and great purity, and the reader every where discovers that affability, that condescension and philanthropy, which so egregiously marked the advocate of the Christians. These letters are esteemed by some, equal to the voluminous epistles of Cicero. In his panegyric, Pliny's style is florid and brilliant; he has used to the greatest advantage, the liberties of the panegyrist, and the eloquence of the courtier. His ideas are new and refined, but his diction is distinguished by that affectation and pomposity which marked the reign of Trajan. The best editions of Pliny, are those of Gesner, improved by Schaefer, Lips 1805, in 8vo and of Lallemand, Primo Paris apud Barbou, and of the panegyric separate, that of Schwarzius, 4to., 1746, and of the epistles, the Variorum L. Bat. 1669, 8vo. His epistles have been translated into English by lord Orrery and Mr Melmoth; the vers on of the latter is singularly elegant. Plin. Ep.—Vossius.—Salmasius.

PLISTARCHUS son of Leonidas, of the family of the Eurysthenidæ, succeeded on the Spartan throne at the death of Cleombrotus. Herod. 9, 10.

PLISTHÈNES, a son of Atreus, king of Argos, father of Menelaus and Agamemnon, according to Hesiod and others. Homer, however, calls Menelaus and Agamemnon sons of Atreus, though they were in reality the children of Pisthenes. The father died very young, and the two children were left in the house of their grandfather, who took care of them and instructed them. From his attention to them, therefore, it seems probable that Atreus was universally acknowledged their protector and father, and thence their surname of Atrides. *Ovid Rem. PLISTOANAX and PLISTONAX, son of Pausanias, was general of the Lacedæmonian armies in the Peloponnesian war. He was banished from his kingdom of Sparta for 19 years, and was afterwards recalled by order of the oracle of Delphi. He reigned 55 years. He had succeeded Pleistarchus. Thucyd.

PLOTINA POMPEIA, a Roman lady who married Trajan while he was yet a private man. She entered Rome in the procession with her husband when he was saluted emperor, and distinguished herself by the affability of her behaviour, her humanity, and liberal offices to the poor and friendless. She accompanied Trajan in the east, and at his death she brought back his ashes to Rome, and still enjoyed all the honours and titles of a Roman empress under Adrian, who, by her means, had succeeded to the vacant throne. At her death, A. D 122, she was ranked among the gods, and received divine honours, which, according to the superstition of the times, she seemed to deserve, from her regard for the good and the prosperity of the Roman empire, and for her private virtues. Dion.

PLOTINOPŌLIS, a city of Thrace, to the south of Hadrianopolis, founded and named in honour of the empress Plotina. On its site, at a later period, appeared the city of Didymotichos, now Demotica.

PLOTINUS, a Platonic philosopher of Lycopolis in Egypt. He was for eleven years a pupil of Ammonius the philosopher, and after he had profited by all the instructions of his learned preceptor, he determined to improve his knowledge, and to visit the territories of India and Persia to receive information. He accompanied Gordian in his expedition into the east, but the day which proved fatal to the emperor, nearly terminated the life of the philosopher. He saved himself by flight, and the following year he retired to Rome, where he publicly taught philosophy. His school was frequented by people of every sex, age, and quality; by senators, as well as by plebeians, and so great was the opinion of the public of his honesty and candour, that many, on their death bed, left all their possessions to his care, and entrusted their children to him, as to a superior being. He was the favourite of all the Romans; and while he charmed the populace by the force of his eloquence, and the senate by his doctrines, the emperor Gallienus courted his friendship, and admired and valued the extent of his learning. It is even said, that the emperor and the empress Salonina intended to rebuild a decayed city of Campania, and to appoint the philosopher over it, that there he might experimentally know, while he presided over a colony of philosophers, the validity and the use of the ideal laws of the republic of Plato. This plan was not executed, through the envy and malice of the enemies of Plotinus. The philosopher at last, become helpless and infirm, returned to Campania, where the liberality of his friends for a while maintained him. He died A. D. 270, in the 66th year of his age, and as he expired, he declared that he made his last and most violent efforts to give up what there was most divine in him to that Divine Being, which fills the whole universe. Amidst the great qualities of the philosopher, we discover some ridiculous singularities. Plotinus never permitted his picture to be taken, and he observed, that to see a painting of himself in the following age was beneath the notice of an enlightened mind. These reasons also induced him to conceal the day, the hour, and the place of his birth. He never made use of medicines, and though his body was often debilitated by abstinence or too much study, he despised to have recourse to a physician, and thought that it would degrade the gravity of a philosopher. His writings have been collected by his pupil Porphyry. They consist of 54 different treatises divided into six equal parts, written with great spirit and vivacity; but the reasonings are abstruse, and the subjects metaphysical. The best edition is that of Picinus, fol. Basil, 1580.

PLUTARCHUS, a native of Chæronea, descended of a respectable family. His father, whose name is unknown, was distinguished for his learning and virtues, and his grandfather, called Lamprias, was also as conspicuous for his eloquence and the fecundity of his genius. Under Ammonius, a reputable teacher at Delphi, Plutarch was made acquainted with philosophy and mathematics, and so well established was his character, that he was appointed by his countrymen, while yet very young, to go to the Roman pro consul, in their name, upon an affair of the most important nature. This commission he executed with honour to himself, and with success for his country. He afterwards travelled in quest of knowledge, and after he had visited, like a philosopher and historian, the territories of Egypt and Greece, he returned to Rome, where he opened a school. His reputation made his school frequented. The emperor Trajan admired his abilities, and honoured him with the office of consul, and appointed him governor of Illyricum. After the death of his imperial benefactor, Plutarch removed from Rome to Chæronea, where he lived in the greatest tranquillity, respected by his fellow citizens, and raised to all the honours which his native town could bestow. In this peaceful and solitary retreat, Plutarch closely applied himself to study, and wrote the greatest part of his works, and particularly his lives. He died in an advanced old age at Chæronea, about the 140th year of the Christian era. Plutarch had five children by his wife, called Timoxena, four sons and one daughter. Two of the sons and the daughter died when young, and those that survived were called Plutarch and Lamprias, and the latter did honour to his father's memory, by giving to the world an accurate catalogue of his writings. In his private and public character, the historian of Chæronea was the friend of discipline. He boldly asserted the natural right of mankind, liberty; but he recommended obedience and deference to magistrates, to preserve the peace and security of the community. He supported, that the most violent and dangerous public factions arose too often from private disputes and from misunderstanding. To render himself more intelligent, he always carried a common-place book with him, and he preserved with the greatest care whatever judicious observations fell in the course of conversation. The most esteemed of his works are his lives of illustrious men of whom he examines and delineates the different characters with wonderful skill and impartiality. He neither misrepresents the virtues nor hides the foibles of his heroes. He writes with precision and with fidelity, and though his diction is neither pure nor elegant, yet there is energy and animation, and in many descriptions he is inferior to no historian. In some of his narrations, however, he is often too circumstantial, his remarks are often injudicious; and when he compares the heroes of Greece with those of Rome, the candid reader can easily remember which side of the Adriatic gave the historian birth. Some have accused him of not knowing the genealogy of his heroes, and have censured him for his superstition; yet for all this, he is the most entertaining, the most instructive, and interesting of all the writers of ancient history; and were a man of true taste and judgment asked what book he wished to save from destruction, of all the profane compositions of antiquity, he would perhaps without hesitation reply, the Lives of Plutarch. In his moral treatises, Plutarch appears in a different character, and his misguided philosophy, and erroneous doctrines, render some of these inferior compositions puerile and disgusting. They however contain many useful lessons and curious facts, and though they are composed without connection, compiled without judgment, and often abound with improbable stories, and false reasonings, yet they contain much information, and many useful reflections. The best editions of the whole works of Plutarch are, that of Stephens, 13 vols. 8vo Paris, 1572; that of Reiske, 12 vols. 8vo. Lipz 1774—82; and that of Hutten, 14 vols. 8vo. Tubing. 1791—1804. The best edition of the Lives alone, is that of Coray, 6 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1809 15; and the best edition of the Moral works is that of Wyttenbach, 6 vols. 4to. and 12 vols. 8vo. Oxon. 1795. The Lives have been well translated by the Langhornes; and the Morals by various hands, in 5 vols. 8vo.

PLUTO, a son of Saturn and Ops, inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers Jupiter and Neptune. He received as his lot the kingdom of hell, and whatever lies under the earth, and as such he became the god of the infernal regions, of death and funerals. From his functions, and the place he inhabited, he received different names. He was called Dis, Hades or Ades, Clytopolon, Agelastus, Orcus, Eubulus, Isodotes, Leptirius, Clymenon, Anapompus, &c. As the place of his residence was obscure and gloomy, all the goddesses refused to marry him; but he determined to obtain by force what was denied to his solicitations. As he once visited the island of Sicily, after a violent earthquake, he saw Proserpine, the daughter of Ceres, gathering flowers in the plains of Enna, with a crowd of female attendants. He became enamoured of her, and immediately carried her away upon his chariot, drawn by four horses. To make his retreat more unknown, he opened himself a passage through the earth, by striking it with his sceptre, in the lake of Cyane in Sicily, or according to others, on the borders of the Cephisus in Attica. Proserpine called upon her attendants for help, but in vain, and she became the wife of her ravisher, and the queen of hell. Pluto is generally represented as holding a sceptre with two teeth; he has also keys in his hand, to intimate that whoever enters his kingdom can never return. He is looked upon as a hard-hearted and inexorable god, with a grim and dismal countenance, and for that reason no temples were raised to his honour as to the rest of the superior gods. Black victims, and particularly a bull, were the only sacrifices which were offered to him, and their blood was not sprinkled on the altars, or received in vessels, as all other sacrifices, but it was permitted to run down into the earth, as if it were to penetrate as far as the realms of the god. The Syracusans yearly sacrificed to him black bulls, near the fountain of Cyane, where, according to the received traditions, he had disappeared with Proserpine. Among plants, the cypress, the narcissus, and the maiden-hair, were sacred to him, as also every thing which was deemed inauspicious, particularly the number two. According to some of the ancients, Pluto sat on a throne of sulphur, from which issued the rivers Lethe, Cocytus, Phlegethon, and Acheron. The dog Cerberus watched at his feet, the Harpies hovered around him, Proserpine sat on his left hand, and near to the goddess stood the Eumenides, with their heads covered with snakes. The Parcæ occupied the right, and they each held in their hands the symbols of their office, the distaff, the spindle, and the scissors. Pluto is called by some the father of the Eumenides. During the war of the gods and the Titans, the Cyclops made a helmet, which rendered the bearer invisible, and gave it to Pluto. Perseus was armed with it when he conquered the Gorgons. Hygin. fab. 155. — Ovid. Met. 5, fab 6 — Paus. 2. 36. — *Cic. de Nat. PLUTONIUM, a temple of Pluto in Lydia. Cic de Div. 1, 36.

PLUTUS, a son of Jason or Jasius, by Ceres, the goddess of corn, has been confounded by many of the mythologists with Pluto, though plainly distinguished from him as being the god of riches. He was born at Tripolis in Crete, where his mother was employed in bestowing cultivation on the earth, and he was brought up by the goddess of peace, and on that account, Pax was represented at Athens, as holding the god of wealth in her lap. The Greeks spoke of him as of a fickle divinity. They represented him as blind, because he distributed riches indiscriminately: he was lame, because he came slow and gradually; but had wings, to intimate that he flew away with more velocity than he approached mankind Paus. 9, 16 et 26.— Hygin. P. A. Aristoph. in Plut.

PLUVIUS, a surname of Jupiter as god of rain. His worship was established at Athens, where, on mount Hymettus, an altar and a statue were erected, and sacrifices regularly offered in the times of drought. He was also invoked by that name among the Romans, whenever the earth was parched up by continual heat, and was in want of refreshing showers. He had an altar in the temple on the capitol, and the Romans had reason to be grateful to a divinity who sent a plentiful shower of rain to the prayers of the thirsty army of Trajan. In consequence of this event the statue of the god was placed on Trajan's column, representing him as an old man with a long beard, and extended arms while at his feet the soldiers spread their shields to receive the showers which dropped from his beard and his hands. Tibull. 1, 7, 25. — Sueton. in Tr. Paus. 2, 19

PLYNTERIA, a festival among the Greeks, in honour of Aglauros, or rather of Minerva, who received from the daughter of Cecrops the name of Aglauros. The word seems to be derived from πλύνειν, lavare, because, during the solemnity, they undressed the statue of the goddess and washed it. The day on which it was observed was universally looked upon as unfortunate and inauspicious, and on that account, no person was permitted to appear in the temples, as they were purposely surrounded with ropes. The arrival of Alcibiades in Athens that day, was deemed very unfortunate; but, however, the success that ever after attended him, proved it to be otherwise. It was customary at this festival to bear in procession a cluster of figs, which intimated the progress of civilization among the first inhabitants of the earth, as figs served them for food after they had found a dislike for acorns. Pollux.

PNYX, a place of Athens, set apart by Solon for holding assemblies. It was so called ἀπὸ τοῦ πυκνοῦσθαι αὐ τὸν τοὺς βουλευτὰς, from the crowding together of the people in it The Pnyx was near the citadel. In later times the theatre of Bacchus was the usual place for public assemblies.

PODALIRIUS, a son of Æsculapius and Epione. He was one of the pupils of the Centaur Chiron, and he made himself under him such a master of medicine, that during the Trojan war, the Greeks invited him to their camp, to stop a pestilence which had baffled the skill of all their physicians. Some however suppose, that he went to the Trojan war not in the capacity of a physician in the Grecian army, but as a warrior attended by his brother Machaon, in thirty ships, with soldiers from Œchalia, Ithome, and Trica. At his return from the Trojan war, Podalirius was shipwrecked on the coast of Caria, where he cured of the falling sickness and married a daughter of Damœtas the king of the place. He fixed his habitation there, and built two towns, one of which he called Syrna, by the name of his wife. The Carians, after his death, built him a temple, and paid him divine honours. Dictys Cret. — Q Smyrn. 6 et 9 — Ovid de Art. Am 2. Trist. et. 6. — A Rutulian engaged in the wars of Æneas and Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12. 304.

PODARCES, a son of Iphiclus of Thessaly, who went to the Trojan war, with his brother Protesilaus, at the head of 40 ships. He succeeded to the command of the army after his brother's death. — The first name of Priam. When Troy was taken by Hercules, he was carried away in the number of the captives, but his sister Hesione, to whom the hero had given the power of choosing any one she pleased, redeemed him from slavery, by giving the golden ornaments of her head to the conqueror, and from that circumstance he received the name of Priam. Vid. Priamus.

PODARGE, one of the Harpies, mother of two of the horses of Achilles, by the Zephyrs. The word intimates the swiftness of her feet. Hygin.

PŒAS, the father of Philoctetes. The son is often called Peantia proles, on account of his father. Ovid. Met. 13, 45.

PŒCILE, a celebrated portico at Athens, which received its name from the variety (ποικίλη) of paintings which it contained It was there that Zeno kept his school, and the Stoics also received their lessons there, whence their name (from στοὰ, a porch). The Pœcile was adorned with pictures of gods and benefactors, and among many others were those of the siege and sacking of Troy, the battle of Theseus against the Amazons, the fight between the Lacedæmonians and Athenians at Œnoe in Argolis, and of Atticus, the great friend of Athens. The only reward which Miltiades obtained after the battle of Marathon, was to have his picture drawn in the fore-ground and more conspicuous than that of the rest of the officers that fought with him, in the representation which was made of the engagement, which was hung up in the Pœcile, in commemoration of that celebrated victory. C. Nep. in Milt. et in Attic. 3

PŒNI, a name given to the Carthaginians. It seems to be a corruption of the word Phœni or Phœnices, as the Carthaginians were of Phœnician origin Servius ad Virg 1, 302.

POGON, a name given to the harbour of Troezene from its shape, being formed by a curved strip of land which resembled a beard (πώγων). Hence arose the proverbial pun, γλαῦκες ἐν Τροιζῆνι, which was addressed to those whose chins were but scantily provided. This port was formerly so capacious as to contain a large fleet: we are told by Herodotus that the Greek ships were ordered to assemble there prior to the battle of Salamis. At present it is shallow, obstructed by sand, and accessible only to small boats Herod. 8 42 — Strab 8

POLA, a town of Istria, on the western coast, near the southern extremity, or Promontorium Polaticum. It is said to have been founded by the Colchians, whom Æetes sent in pursuit of Medea and the Argonauts It became afterwards a noble Roman colony, with the surname Pietas Julia It still preserves its name unchanged Plin 3 19. - Mela, 2, 4

POLEMARCHUS. Vid. Archontes.

POLEMON, a youth of Athens, son of Philostratus. He was much given to debauchery and extravagance, and spent the greatest part of his life in riot and drunkenness He once, when intoxicated, entered the school of Xenocrates, and with an air of insolence derided the remarks and stifled indignation of the spectators Xenocrates did not notice the conduct of his former pupil with pointed severity, but changing the discourse in which he was engaged, he mildly enlarged on the virtues of modesty and the horrors of intemperance. The rebuke was gradually felt, and Polemon was so struck with the eloquence of the academician, and the force of his arguments, that from that moment he renounced the dissipated life he had led, and applied himself totally to the study of philosophy. He was then in the 30th year of his age, and from that time he never drank any other liquor but water, and after the death of Xenocrates he succeeded in the school where his reformation had been effected. He died about 270 years before Christ, in an extreme old age. Diog in Vita. Horat. Sat 2, 3, 254.—A son of Zeno the rhetorician, made king of Pontus by Antony. He attended his patron in his expedition against Parthia. After the battle of Actium, he was received into favour by Augustus, though he had fought in the cause of Antony. He was killed some time after by the barbarians near the Palus Mœotis, against whom he had made war — His son, of the same name, was confirmed on his father's throne by the Roman emperors, and the province of Cilicia was also added to his kingdom by Claudius.— An officer in the army of Alexander, intimate with Philotas, &c. Curt 7, 1, &c. — A rhetorician at Rome, who wrote a poem on weights and measures still extant. He was master to Persius, the celebrated satirist, and died in the age of Nero.— A sophist of Laodicea in Asia Minor, in the reign of Adrian. He was often sent to the emperor with an embassy by his countrymen, which he executed with great success. He was greatly favoured by Adrian, from whom he obtained much money In the 56th year of his age he buried himself alive, as he laboured with the gout. He wrote declamations in Greek.

POLEMONIUM, a city on the coast of Pontus, situate according to Pliny, eighty miles to the west of Phasnacia It was founded by king Polemon and named after him Its site was occupied by an earlier place called Side. Strab 12.—Plin 6, 4.

POLIAS, a surname of Minerva, as protectress of cities. She was particularly worshipped under that name at Troezene, where her statue of gold and ivory was one of the best pieces of Phidias. She was also worshipped at Tegea in Arcadia, where her temple, served by one priest, was entered only once a year The locks of Medusa's head were said to be preserved there, which had the power to render such as possessed them more than a match for their enemies. Apollod. 2.— Strab. 9.—Paus. 2, 30. 3, 17. 8, 47.

POLIETA, a festival at Thebes in honour of Apollo, who was represented there with grey hair (πολιός,) contrary to the practice of all other places The victim was a bull, but when it happened once that no bull could be found, an ox was taken from the cart and sacrificed From that time the sacrifice of labouring oxen was deemed lawful, though before it was looked upon as a capital crime.

POLIORCETES, (besieger of cities,) a surname given to Demetrius, son of Antigonus Plut. in Demetr

POLISTRATUS, an Epicurean philosopher, born the same day as Hippocrates, with whom he always lived in the greatest intimacy. They both died at the same hour. Diog. - Val. Max. 1, 8.

POLITES, a son of Priam and Hecuba, remarkable for his swiftness, and therefore frequently engaged to watch the motions of the Grecian army. Iris once assumed his form to inform the Trojans of the unexpected approach of the Grecian forces. Polites was killed by Pyrrhus in his father's presence Virg. Æn. 2, 526, &c.—Homer. Il 2, 298 13, 533 24, 250.— His son, who bore the same name, followed Æneas into Italy, and was one of the friends of young Asanius. Virg Æn. 5, 564.

POLLA ARGENTARIA, the wife of the poet Lucan She assisted her husband in correcting the three first books of his Pharsalia. Stat Sylv. 1 et 2.

POLLENTIA, a town of Liguria, south-east of Alba Pompeia. It was a municipium, and is chiefly celebrated for its wool. A battle was fought in its vicinity between Stilico and the Goths, the success of which appears to have been very doubtful But Claudian speaks of it as the greatest triumph of his hero The modern village of Polenza stands near the site of the ancient city Plin 8, 48.—Sil Ital 8, 599

POLLIO, C. ASINIUS, a Roman consul, under the reign of Augustus who distinguished himself as much by his eloquence and writings as by his exploits in the field. He defeated the Dalmatians, and favoured the cause of Antony against Augustus. He patronized with great liberality, the poets Virgil and Horace, who have immortalized him in their writings. He was the first who raised a public library at Rome, and indeed his example was afterwards followed by many of the emperors In his library were placed the statues of all the learned men of every age, and Varro was the only person who was honoured there during his life-time. He was with Julius Cæsar when he crossed the Rubicon. He was greatly esteemed by Augustus, whose choice he espoused upon the disgraceful alliance of Antony with Cleopatra, and he did not offend him by refusing to share his dangers at the battle of Actium. Pollio wrote some tragedies, orations, and a history of the civil wars of Pompey and Cæsar, which was divided into seventeen books. All these compositions are lost, and nothing remains of his writings except a few letters to Cicero. He died in the eightieth year of his age, A. D. 4. He is the person in whose honour Virgil has inscribed his fourth eclogue, Pollio, as a reconciliation was effected between Augustus and Antony during his consulship Horat. Od. 2. 1. Sat. 1, 10.—Appian. de B. Civ. 5.—Vell. Pat. 2, 44 et 86.—Virg. Ecl. 3, 8. 4, 12.—

Vedius, one of the friends of Augustus, who used to feed his fishes with human flesh. This cruelty was discovered when one of his servants broke a vase in the presence of Augustus, who had been invited to a feast. The master ordered the servant to be seized, but he threw himself at the feet of the emperor and begged him to interfere, and not to suffer him to be devoured by fishes. [Vid. Pausilypus.]—A man who poisoned Britannicus, at the instigation of Nero.

POLLUX, a son of Jupiter by Leda, the wife of Tyndarus. He was brother to Castor. [Vid. Castor.]—Julius, a grammarian, who was born at Naucratis in Egypt, and flourished in the reign of Commodus, about A. D. 175. He wrote an epithalamium for that emperor, and opened a school for rhetoric at Athens. He was author of a dictionary, or "Onomasticon," which is extant, and is a valuable aid to the study of the Greek language, and the elucidation of its writers. The best edition of this work is that of Hemsterhusius, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1706.—There was another of the same name, but much posterior. He wrote a "Chronicon" in Greek, which commences at the creation, and comes down to the reign of the emperor Valens. Of this an edition was given by Hardt, 8vo. Monach. 1792.

POLUSCA, a town of Latium, formerly the capital of the Volsci. The inhabitants were called Pollustani. Liv. 2, 39.

POLYÆNUS, a native of Lampsacus, and one of the friends of Epicurus. He had attended previously to mathematical studies. Cic. de Fin. 1, 6.—A native of Sardis, a sophist in the time of Julius Cæsar, and who is thought to have taken his prænomen (Julius) from the family that protected him. We have four epigrams by him remaining.—A native of Macedonia, flourished about the middle of the second century of our era and wrote a work entitled Στρατηγημάτων ("Military Stratagems"), which he dedicated to the emperors M. Antoninus and Verus. It is an entertaining performance, in an easy and elegant style, and though in many respects trifling, it contains some curious information. It was first published by Casaubon, in 1589; but the best edition is that of Mursinna, 12mo. Berol. 1756. There is an English translation by Shepherd.—A native of Athens an historical writer.

POLYBIUS, or POLYBUS, a king of Corinth, who married Periboea, whom some have called Merope. He was son of Mercury by Cythonephyle, the daughter of Sicyon, king of Sicyon. He permitted his wife, who had no children, to adopt and educate as her own son, Œdipus, who had been found by his shepherds exposed in the woods. He had a daughter called Lysianassa, whom he gave in marriage to Talaus, son of Bias, king of Argos. As he had no male child, he left his kingdom to Adrastus who had been banished from his throne, and who had fled to Corinth for protection. Hygin. fab. 66.—Paus. 2, 6.—Apollod. 3, 5.

POLYBIUS, an eminent Greek historian, was born at Megalopolis, in Arcadia, about 203 B. C. His father, Lycortas, was prætor of the Achæan republic, and an intimate friend of Philopœmen. He was brought up to arms and public affairs, and at the age of twenty-four, he was one of the deputies sent by the state to negotiate with Ptolemy Epiphanes. After this he was employed in various other embassies, and at length, when the Romans found it necessary no longer to preserve appearances with the Greeks, he was one of the thousand suspicious persons demanded of the Achæans as hostages to be detained under custody in Italy. Polybius was kept in close custody at Rome, and not suffered to plead before the senate in favour of his countrymen. By his learning, virtue, and talents, he ingratiated himself with many of the most eminent senators, especially with the two sons of Paulus Æmilius. Through the interest of the latter, the exiles, after seventeen years absence from their country, were permitted to return to Greece, but only three hundred survived to enjoy that liberty. Polybius himself not wishing to see his native land in its humiliated state, chose to remain at Rome, and attach himself to the service of Scipio Æmilianus, who he accompanied into Africa, and materially aided by his counsel. After this he was witness to the sack and destruction of Corinth, a act the reduction of Achaia to the condition Roman province. Amidst these dreadful nes he displayed noble traits of patriotism a disinterestedness, which obtained for him so much credit, that he was entrusted with the care of settling the new form of government in the cities of Greece, which office he performed to the satisfaction both of the Romans and the Greeks. The people of Achaia erected several statues to his honour. He accompanied Scipio to the siege of Numantia, and, upon the subsequent death of his great friend and benefactor, he retired to his native country, where he died, in consequence of a fall from his horse, at the age of eighty-two. During a long period of his life he employed his leisure and opportunities in composing a history from the beginning of the second Punic war, to the subversion of the Macedonian kingdom, a period of fifty three years. It was comprized in thirty eight books, besides two introductory ones, containing an abridgment of the Roman history from the taking of Rome by the Gauls. The history of Polybius, though principally devoted to Roman affairs, yet relates to the contemporary transactions in several other countries, whence he entitled it Catholic or universal. Only a very small part of this work remains, viz., the five first books, which are entire, and considerable fragments of the twelve following. No historian of antiquity is more valuable for the accuracy and fidelity of his narrations, and the abundance of his information. His style is not to be commended, and he is one of those authors who are read exclusively for their matter. He has been closely copied in many parts by Livy, who does not acknowledge his obligations, and only mentions him as "a writer by no means to be despised." Marcus Brutus was fully sensible of his value, and studied him even in the midst of his most anxious engagements. The best edition of Polybius is that of Schweighæuser, 9 vols 8vo. Lips. 1789—95. Orellius published in 1818, from the Leipsic press, the commentary of Æneas Tacitus, in one volume 8vo, as a supplement to this edition. Polybius has been translated into English by Hampton. Plut. in Phil. in prær - Liv. 30, 45. - Paus. 8, 30 ——A freedman of Augustus Suet ——A physician, disciple and successor of Hippocrates ——A sooth-sayer of Corinth, who foretold to his sons the fate that attended them in the Trojan war.

POLYBŒTES, one of the giants who made war against Jupiter. He was killed by Neptune, who crushed him under a part of the island of Cos, as he was walking across the Ægean, and thus, with his body and the broken fragment, formed, as the mythologists relate, the island of Nisyros. Paus. 1 2 — Hygin in præf. fab.

POLYBUS, a king of Thebes in Egypt in the time of the Trojan war. He kindly received Menelaus and Helen on their return to Greece from Troy, and loaded them with rich presents. Hom. Od. 4, 126.—— One of Penelope's suitors. Ovid. Heroid. 1.—Hom. Od 22. 284.——A king of Sicyon.——A king of Corinth. Vid. Polybius.

POLYCARPUS, a Christian father and martyr, probably born at Smyrna, in the reign of Nero. He is said to have been a disciple of St John the Evangelist, who consecrated him bishop of Smyrna, and addressed him in his apocalyptical epistle. Ignatius also held Polycarp in high estimation, and recommended to his care the church of Antioch. He visited Rome to confer with Anicetus about the time of celebrating Easter, and during his stay there, opposed the heresies of Marcion and Valentinus. The former, meeting him one day in the street, said, "Polycarp, acknowledge us;" to which he replied, "Yes, I acknowledge thee to be the first-born of Satan!" He governed the church of Smyrna till A D. 167, when he was sentenced to be burnt; but the flames passing over him like an arch, one of the soldiers ran him through with a sword, on which such a quantity of blood issued forth as extinguished the fire; and, at the same time, a dove was seen to fly from the wound. His "Epistle to the Philippians," the only one of his pieces which has been preserved, is contained in archbishop Wake's "Genuine Epistles." The best edition of the original is that by Aldrich, 8vo. Oxon. 1708.

POLYCASTE, the youngest of the daughters of Nestor. According to some authors she married Telemachus, when he visited her father's court in quest of Ulysses, and by him had a son called Perseptolis. Hom. Od. 3, 464.

POLYCLES, an Athenian in the time of Demetrius, &c. Polyæn 5 ——A famous athlete, often crowned at the four solemn games of the Greeks. He had a statue in Jupiter's grove at Olympia. Paus. 6, 1.

POLYCLETUS, a celebrated statuary of Sicyon, about 232 years before Christ. He was universally reckoned the most skilful artist of his profession among the ancients, and the second rank was given to Phidias. One of his pieces, in which he had represented a body guard of the king of Persia, was so happily executed, and so nice and exact in all its proportions, that it was looked upon as a most perfect model, and accordingly called the Rule. He was also acquainted with architecture, and was therefore employed to finish the beautiful temple and the elegant theatre of Æsculapius at Epidaurus. Paus. 2, 17 et 27. 6, 6.—Plut. in Per.—Stat. Sylv. 4, 6. 28. —Juv. 3, 217.—Martial. 8, ep. 51. 10, ep. 89.—Quintil. 12, 10.

POLYCRATES, a tyrant of Samos, well known for the continual flow of good fortune which attended him. He became very powerful, and made himself master, not only of the neighbouring islands, but also of some cities on the coast of Asia. He had a fleet of a hundred ships of war, and he was so universally respected, that Amasis, the king of Egypt, made a treaty of alliance with him. The Egyptian monarch, however, terrified by his continued prosperity, advised him to chequer his enjoyments, by relinquishing some of his most favourite objects. Polycrates complied, and threw into the sea a beautiful seal, the most valuable of his jewels. The voluntary loss of so precious a seal afflicted him for some time, but a few days after, he received as a present a large fish, in whose belly the jewel was found. Amasis no sooner heard this, than he rejected all alliance with the tyrant of Samos, and observed, that sooner or later his good fortune would vanish. Some time after, Polycrates visited Magnesia on the Meander, where he had been invited by Orœtes, the governor. He was shamefully put to death, 522 years before Christ, merely because the governor wished to terminate the prosperity of Polycrates. The daughter of Polycrates had dissuaded her father from going to the house of Orœtes, on account of the bad dreams which she had had, but her advice was disregarded. Paus. 8, 14.—Strab. 14 — Herod. 3, 39, &c.——A sophist of Athens, who, to engage the public attention, wrote a panegyric on Busiris and Clytemnestra. Quintil. 2, 17.

POLYCTOR, the father of Pisander, one of Penelope's suitors. He was killed by Philœtius. Hom. Odyss. 22 243 et 269.

POLYDÆMON, an Assyrian prince killed by Perseus. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 3.

POLYDAMAS, a Trojan, son of Antenor by Theano, the sister of Hecuba. He married Lycaste, a natural daughter of Priam. He is accused by some of having betrayed his country to the Greeks. Dares Phryg.——A son of Panthous, born the same night as Hector. He was inferior in valour to none of the Trojans, except Hector; and his prudence, the wisdom of his counsels, and the firmness of his mind, claimed equal admiration, and proved most salutary to his unfortunate and often misguided countrymen. He was at last killed by Ajax, after he had slaughtered a great number of the enemy. Dictys Cret. 1, &c.—Homer. Il 18, &c.——A celebrated athlete, son of Nicias, who imitated Hercules in whatever he did. He killed a lion with his fist, and it is said that he could stop with his hand a chariot in its most rapid course. He was one day with some of his friends in a cave, when on a sudden a large piece of rock came tumbling down; and while all fled away, he attempted to receive the falling fragment in his arms. His prodigious strength, however, was insufficient, and he was instantly crushed to pieces under the rock. Paus. 6, 5.——One of Alexander's officers, intimate with Parmenio. Curt. 4, 15.

POLYDAMNA, the wife of Thonis, king of Egypt. It is said that she gave Helen a certain powder, which had the wonderful power of driving away the most poignant cares and the most rooted melancholy. Homer Od. 4, 228.

POLYDECTES, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was son of Eunomus. Paus 3, 7.——A son of Magnes and Nais, king of the island of Seriphos. He received with great kindness Danae and her son Perseus, who had been exposed on the sea by Acrisius. [Vid. Perseus.] He took particular care of the education of Perseus, but when he became enamoured of Danae, he removed him from his kingdom, apprehensive of his resentment. Some time after, he paid his addresses to Danae, and when she rejected him, he prepared to offer her violence. Danae fled to the altar of Minerva for protection, and Dictys, the brother of Polydectes, who had himself saved her from the sea-waters, opposed her ravisher and armed himself in her defence. At this critical moment, Perseus arrived, and with Medusa's head he turned into stones Polydectes, with the associates of his guilt. The crown of Seriphos was given to Dictys, who had shown himself so active in the cause of innocence. Ovid. Met. 5, 242.—Hygin fab. 63, &c.

POLYDŌRA, a daughter of Peleus, king of Thessaly, by Antigone, the daughter of Eurytion. She married the river Sperchius, by whom she had Mnesthens. Hom. Il. 16, 175.—Apollod. 3.——One of the Oceanides. Hesiod.——A daughter of Meleager, king of Calydon, who married Protesilaus. She killed herself when she heard that her husband was dead. The wife of Protesilaus is more commonly called Laodamia. [Vid. Protesilaus.] Paus. 4, 2.

POLYDŌRUS, a son of Alcamenes, king of Sparta. He put an end to the war which had been carried on during twenty years, between Messenia and his subjects; and during his reign, the Dæcidæmonians planted two colonies, one at Cnosus, and the other at Locri. He was universally respected. He was assassinated by a nobleman, called Polemarchus, but his memory was honoured by the gratitude and the tears of his countrymen. His son Eurycrates succeeded him 734 years before Christ. Paus 3.—Herod. 7 204.——A celebrated carver of Rhodes, who with one stone made the famous statue of Laocoon and his children. Plin. 34, 8.——A son of Hippomedon, who went with the Epigoni to the second Theban war. Paus. 2, 20.——A son of Cadmus and Hermione, who married Nycteis, by whom he had Labdacus, the father of Laius. He had succeeded to the throne of Thebes, when his father had gone to Illyricum. Apollod. 3.——A son of Priam by Hecuba, or, according to others, by Laothoe, the daughter of Altes, king of Pedasus. As he was young and inexperienced when Troy was besieged by the Greeks, his father forbade him to appear in the field, but his valour and his swiftness made him disregard the parental admonitions, and he was, according to Homer, killed by Achilles. Succeeding poets and historians have related a different account, and mentioned, that instead of appearing in the war, Polydorus was sent by his father to the court of Polymnestor, king of Thrace, and that with him also was intrusted to the care of the monarch a large sum of money, and the greatest part of the treasures of Troy, till the country was freed from foreign invasion. No sooner was the death of Priam known in Thrace, than Polymnestor made himself master of the riches which were in his possession; and to ensure them the better, he assassinated young Polydorus, and threw his body into the sea, where it was found by Hecuba. [Vid. Hecuba.] According to Virgil, the body of Polydorus was buried near the shore by his assassin, and there grew on his grave a myrtle, whose boughs dropped blood, when Æneas, going to Italy, attempted to tear them from the tree. [Vid. Polymnestor.] Virg. Æn. 3, 21, &c. Apollod. 3, 12.—Ovid. Met 13, 432.—Homer. Il 20, 407. 21, 85.—Dictys. Cret 2, 18.

POLYGNŌTUS, a celebrated painter of Thasos, about 422 years before the Christian era. His father's name was Aglaophon. He adorned the public porticos of Greece with his paintings; but those which claimed the highest admiration were the two that were preserved at Delphi, the one of which represented the most striking events of the Trojan war, and the other the descent of Ulysses to the infernal regions. The subjects of these pieces are interwoven with the history and mythology of ancient times, and it is a happy reflection to know that a very minute description of them is preserved and embellished by Pausanias in a manner which, in showing his taste and judgment, presents to our view the actions and characters of the heroic ages. Polygnotus was said particularly to excel in giving grace, liveliness, and expression to his pieces. He rose superior to his predecessors, and instead of employing, like them, only the various shades of black and white, he improved his art by the introduction of new materials, and applied to his pieces with delicacy and taste the different powers of four colours. The Athenians were so pleased with him, that they offered to reward his labours with whatever he chose to accept. He declined this generous offer, and the Amphictyonic council, which was composed of the representatives of the principal cities of the country of Greece, ordered that Polygnotus should be honoured with the thanks of universal Greece, and that for his services and his merits he should be maintained at the public expence wherever he went. Quintil 12, 10. Plin. 33, 12. 34, 8. 35, 6, 9 et 11. Plut. in Cim.—Paus. 10, 25, &c.——A statuary. Plin. 34.

POLYHYMNIA, and POLYMNIA, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over singing and rhetoric, and was deemed the inventress of harmony, and of theatrical gestures. She was represented veiled in white, holding a sceptre in her left hand, and with her right raised up, as if ready to harangue. She had a crown of jewels on her head. Hesiod. Theog 75 et 915.—Plut. in Symp. 9 et 53.—Horat. Od. 1, 1. 34. Ovid Fast. 5, 9.

POLYIDUS, a physician who brought back to nor Glaucus, the son of Minos, by applying to his body a certain herb, with which he had seen a serpent restore life to another which was dead. [Vid. Glaucus.] Apollod. 3, 3.——A son of Eurydamas skilful in the interpretation of dreams. He was killed by the Greeks during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 5, 150.

POLYMELA, one of Diana's companions. She was daughter of Phylas, and had by Mercury a son called Eudorus who signalized himself during the Trojan war. She afterwards married Echeleus, whose origin is not known, but whose riches are celebrated. Homer. Il. 16, 179.

POLYMELUS, a Trojan killed before Troy by Patroclus. Homer. Il. 16, 417.

POLYMNESTES, a Greek poet of Colophon son of Meles or Miletus. He used a particular sort of metre which from him was called Polymnestian. Some of his compositions were extant still in the age of Pausanias. Paus. 1, 14.——A native of Thera, father of Battus or Aristoeles, by Phronima, the daughter of Etearchus, king of Oaxus. Herod 4, 150.—Pind. Pyth. 4, 104.

POLYMNESTOR, a king of the Thracian Chersonesus, who married Ilione the eldest of Priam's daughters. When the Greeks besieged Troy, Priam sent the greatest part of his treasures, together with Polydorus, the youngest of his sons, to Thrace where they were intrusted to the care of Polymnestor. The Thracian monarch paid every attention to his brother-in-law; but when he was informed that Priam was dead, he murdered him to become master of the riches which were in his possession. At that time the Greeks were returning victorious from Troy followed by all the captives, among whom was Hecuba, the mother of Polydorus. The fleet stopped on the coast of Thrace, where one of the female captives discovered on the shore the body of Polydorus, whom Polymnestor had thrown into the sea. The dreadful intelligence was immediately communicated to the mother, and Hecuba, who recollected the frightful dreams which she had had on the preceding night, did not doubt but Polymnestor was the cruel assassin. She resolved to revenge her son's death, and immediately she called out Polymnestor, as if wishing to impart to him a matter of the most important nature. The tyrant was drawn into the snare, and was no sooner introduced into the apartments of the Trojan princess, than the female captives rushed upon him and put out his eyes with their pins, while Hecuba murdered his two children who had accompanied him. According to Euripides, the Greeks condemned Polymnestor to be banished into a distant island for his perfidy. Hyginus, however, relates the whole differently, and observes, that when Polydorus was sent to Thrace Ilione, his sister took him instead of her son Deiphilus, who was of the same age, apprehensive of her husband's cruelty. The monarch was unacquainted with the imposition, he looked upon Polydorus as his own son, and treated Deiphilus as the brother of Ilione. After the destruction of Troy, the conquerors, who wished the house and family of Priam to be totally extirpated, offered Electra the daughter of Agamemnon, to Polymnestor, if he would destroy Ilione and Polydorus. The monarch accepted the offer, and immediately dispatched his own son Deiphilus whom he had been taught to regard as Polydorus. Polydorus, who passed as the son of Polymnestor, consulted the oracle after the murder of Deiphilus, and when he was informed that his father was dead his mother a captive in the hands of the Greeks, and his country in ruins, he communicated the answer of the god to Ilione, whom he had always regarded as his mother. Ilione told him the measure she had pursued to save his life, and upon this he avenged the perfidy of Polymnestor, by putting out his eyes. Eurip. in Hecub.—Hygin. fab. 109.—Virg. Æn. 3, 45, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, 430, &c.

POLYNICES, a son of Œdipus, king of Thebes, by Jocasta. He inherited his father's throne with his brother Eteocles, and it was mutually agreed between the two brothers, that they should reign each a year alternately. Eteocles first ascended the throne by right of seniority; but when the year was expired, he refused to resign the crown to his brother. Polynices, upon this, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, the daughter of Adrastus, the king of the country, and levied a large army, at the head of which he marched against Thebes. The command of this army was divided among seven celebrated chiefs, who were to attack the seven gates of the city of Thebes. The battle was decided by a single combat between the two brothers, who both killed one another. [Vid. Eteocles.] Æschyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Eurip. Phœnis.—Senec. in Theb. Prod. 4.—Hygin fab. 68, &c.—Paus. 2, 20. 9, 5.—Apollod. 3, 5.

POLYPEMON, a famous thief, called also Procrustes, who plundered all the travellers about the Cephisus, and near Eleusis in Attica. He was killed by Theseus. Ovid calls him father of Procrustes, and Apollodorus, of Sinis. [Vid. Procrustes.] Paus. 1, 38.—Ovid. in Ib. 409.—Prol. in Thes.

POLYPERCHON, or POLYSPERCHON, one of the officers of Alexander Antipater, at his death, appointed him governor of the kingdom of Macedonia, in preference to his own son Cassander. Polyperchon, though old, and a man of experience, showed great ignorance in the administration of the government. He became cruel, not only to the Greeks, or such as opposed his ambitious views, but even to the helpless and innocent children and friends of Alexander, to whom he was indebted for his rise and military reputation. He was killed in a battle 309 B. C. Curt Diod. 17, &c - Justin 13.

POLYPHEMUS, a celebrated Cyclops king of all the Cyclopes in Sicily, and son of Neptune and Thoosa, the daughter of Phorcys. He is represented as a monster of strength, of a tall stature, and with one eye only in the middle of the forehead. He fed upon human flesh, and kept his flocks on the coasts of Sicily, when Ulysses, at his return from the Trojan war, was driven there. The Grecian prince, with twelve of his companions, visited the coast, and were seized by the Cyclops who confined them in his cave, and daily devoured two of them. Ulysses would have shared the fate of his companions, had he not intoxicated the Cyclops, and put out his eye with a firebrand while he was asleep. Polyphemus was awakened by the sudden pain, he stopped the entrance of his cave, but Ulysses made his escape by creeping between the legs of the rams of the Cyclops, as they were led out to feed on the mountains. Polyphemus became enamoured of Galatæa, but his addresses were disregarded, and the nymph shunned his presence. The Cyclops was more earnest, and when he saw Galatea surrender herself to the pleasures of Acis, he crushed his rival with a piece of a broken rock. Ovid. Met. 13, 772. — Homer. Od. 19. — Eurip. in Cyclop. — Hygin. fab. 125. — Virg. Æn. 3, 619, &c.

POLYPŒTES, a son of Pirithous and Hippodamia, at the Trojan war. Homer Il. 2 Paus 10, 25. — One of the Trojans whom Æneas saw when he visited the infernal regions. Virg. Æn. 6, 484.

POLYSPERCHON. Vid. Polyperchon.

POLYSTRÀTUS, a Macedonian soldier, who found Darius after he had been stabbed by Bessus, and who gave him water to drink, and carried the last injunctions of the dying monarch to Alexander. Curt. 5, 13.

POLYXENA, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, celebrated for her beauty and accomplishments. Achilles became enamoured of her, and solicited her hand, and their marriage would have been consummated, had not Hector her brother opposed it. Polyxena, according to some authors, accompanied her father when he went to the tent of Achilles to redeem the body of his son Hector. Some time after the Grecian hero came into the temple of Apollo to obtain a sight of the Trojan princess, but he was murdered there by Paris; and Polyxena, who had returned his affection, was so afflicted at his death, that she went and sacrificed herself on his tomb. Some, however, suppose that that sacrifice was not voluntary, but that the manes of Achilles appeared to the Greeks as they were going to embark, and demanded of them the sacrifice of Polyxena. The princess, who was in the number of the captives, was upon this dragged to her lover's tomb, and there immolated by Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles. Ovid. Met. 13, fab. 5, &c. — Dictys Cret. 3 et 5. — Virg. Æn. 3, 321. — Catull. ep. 65. — Hygin. fab. 90.

POLYXENUS, one of the Greek princes who went to the Trojan war at the head of the Ætolians, in 10, or, according to Hyginus, in 40 ships. His father's name was Agasthenes. Homer. Il. 2, 180. — Paus. 5, 3.

POLYXO, a priestess of Apollo's temple in Lemnos. She was also nurse to queen Hypsipyle. It was by her advice that the Lemnian women murdered all their husbands. Apollon 1, 664. — Flacc. 2, 218. — Hygin. fab. 15. — One of the Atlantides. — A native of Argos, who married Tlepolemus, son of Hercules. She followed him to Rhodes, after the murder of her uncle Licymnius, and when he departed for the Trojan war with the rest of the Greek princes, she became the sole mistress of the kingdom. After the Trojan war, Helen fled from Peloponnesus to Rhodes, where Polyxo reigned. Polyxo detained her, and to punish her as being the cause of a war, in which Tlepolemus had perished, she ordered her to be hanged on a tree by her female servants, disguised in the habit of Furies. [Vid. Helena.] Paus 3, 19.

POLYZELUS, a Greek poet of Rhodes. He had written a poem on the origin and birth of Bacchus, Venus, the Muses, &c. Some of his verses are quoted by Athenæus. Hygin. P. A. 2, 14. — An Athenian archon.

POMETIA. Vid. Suessa Pometia.

POMONA, a nymph at Rome who was supposed to preside over gardens, and to be the goddess of all sorts of fruit-trees. She had a temple at Rome, and a regular priest called Flamen Pomonalis, who offered sacrifices to her divinity, for the preservation of fruit. She was generally represented as sitting on a basket full of flowers and fruit, and holding a bough in one hand, and apples in the other. Pomona was particularly delighted with the cultivation of the earth; she disdained the toils of the field, and the fatigues of hunting. Many of the gods of the country endeavoured to gain her affection, but she received their addresses with coldness. Vertumnus was the only one, who, by assuming different shapes, and introducing himself into her company, under the form of an old woman, prevailed upon her to break her vow of celibacy, and to marry him. This deity was unknown among the Greeks. Ovid. Met. 14, 623, &c.

POMPEIA, a daughter of Sextus Pompey, by Scribonia. She was promised to Marcellus, as a means of procuring a reconciliation between her father and the triumvirs, but she married Scribonius Libo. — A daughter of Pompey the Great, Julius Cæsar's third wife. She was accused of incontinence, because Clodius had introduced himself in woman's clothes into the room where she was celebrating the mysteries of Cybele. Cæsar repudiated her upon this accusation. Plut. — The wife of Annæus Seneca, was the daughter of Pompeius Paulinus. — There was a portico at Rome, called Pompeia, much frequented by all orders of people. Ovid. Art. Am. 67. — Martial. 11, 48.

POMPEIA LEX, by Pompey the Great, de ambitu, A. U. C. 701. It was directed against bribery and corruption at elections, with the infliction of new and severer punishments. Dio. 39, 37. 40. 52. — Another by the same, A. U. C. 701, which forbade the use of laudatores in trials, or persons who gave a good character of the prisoner then impeached. — Another by the same, A. U. C. 683. It restored to the tribunes their original power and authority, of which they had been deprived by the Cornelian law. — Another by the same, A. U. C. 701. It shortened the forms of trials, and enacted that the three first days of a trial should be employed in examining witnesses, and it allowed only one day to the parties to make their accusation and defence. The plaintiff was confined to two hours, and the defendant to three. This law had for its object the riots, which happened from the quarrels of Clodius and Milo. — Another by the same, A. U. C. 698. It required, that the judges should be the richest of every century, contrary to the usual form. It was however requisite that they should be such as the Aurelian law prescribed. — Another of the same, A. U. C. 701. Pompey was by this empowered to continue in the government of Spain five years longer.

POMPEIÀNUS, a Roman knight of Antioch, raised to offices of the greatest trust, under the emperor Aurelius, whose daughter Lucilla he married. He lived in great popularity at Rome, and retired from the court when Commodus succeeded to the imperial crown. He ought, according to Julian's opinion, to have been chosen and adopted as successor by M. Aurelius.

POMPEII, or POMPEIA, a city of Campania in the immediate vicinity of mount Vesuvius. Of this city it may be truly said, that it has become more celebrated in modern times than it ever could have been in the most flourishing period of its existence. Tradition ascribed the origin of Pompeii, as well as that of Herculaneum, to Hercules, and like that city it was in turn occupied by the Oscans, Etruscans, Samnites, and Romans. At the instigation of the Samnites Pompeii and Herculaneum took an active part in the social war, but were finally reduced by Sylla. In the general peace which followed, Pompeii obtained the rights of a municipal town, and became also a military colony, at the head of which was Publius Sylla, nephew of the dictator. This officer being accused before the senate of having excited some tumult at Pompeii, was ably defended by Cicero. Other colonies appear to have been subsequently sent here under Augustus and Nero In the reign of the latter, a bloody affray occurred at Pompeii during the exhibition of a fight of gladiators, between the inhabitants of that place and those of Nuceria, in which many lives were lost. The Pompeiani were, in consequence, deprived of these shows for ten years, and several individuals were banished Shortly after, we hear of the destruction of a considerable portion of the city by an earthquake. Of the more complete catastrophe which buried Pompeii under the ashes of Vesuvius, we have no positive account; but it is reasonably conjectured that it was caused by the famous eruption under the reign of Titus. [Vid Herculaneum.] The opinion generally maintained that the people of this city were surprised and overwhelmed by the volcanic storm while in the theatre is not a very probable one. The number of skeletons discovered in Pompeii does not amount to sixty; and ten times this number would be inconsiderable, when compared with the extent and population of the city. Besides, the first agitation and threatening aspect of the mountain, must have banished all mirth and amusement, and filled every breast with terror. No doubt the previous intimations were of such a nature as to have fully apprized the inhabitants of their danger, and induced the great mass of them to save themselves by flight. The discovery of Pompeii [Vid Herculaneum,] after having lain so long buried and unknown, has furnished us with many curious and valuable remains of antiquity. Dion Hal. 1, 44.—*Vell. POMPEIOPŌLIS, a city of Paphlagonia, situate on the banks of the river Amnias, and founded by Pompey the Great Its site has been fixed near the modern Tash Kupri. Strab. 12 ——A city of Cilicia Campestris. Vid. Soloe.

POMPEIUS, Q. a consul who carried on war against the Numantines, and made a shameful treaty He is the first of that noble family, of whom mention is made. Flor. 2, 18.——Cneius, a Roman general, who made war against the Marsi, and triumphed over the Picenti. He declared himself against Cinna and Marius, and supported the interest of the republic. He was surnamed Strabo, because he squinted. While he was marching against Marius, a plague broke out in his army, and raged with such violence, that it carried away 11,000 men in a few days. He was killed by a flash of lightning, and as he had behaved with cruelty while in power, the people dragged his body through the streets of Rome with an iron hook, and threw it into the Tiber. Plut. in Pomp.——Rufus, a Roman consul with Sylla. He was sent to finish the Marsian war, but the army mutinied at the instigation of Pompeius Strabo, whom he was to succeed in command, and he was assassinated by some of the soldiers. Appian. Civ. 1.——A tribune of the soldiers in Nero's reign, deprived of his office when Piso's conspiracy was discovered. Tacit.——A consul praised for his learning and abilities. Ovid. ex Pont 4, 1.——A son of Theophanes of Mitylene, famous for his intimacy with Pompey the Great, and for his writings. Tacit. Ann. 6.——A Roman knight put to death by the emperor Claudius for his adultery with Messalina. Tacit. Ann. 11.——Cneius, surnamed Magnus, from the greatness of his exploits, was son of Pompeius Strabo and Lucilia. He early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and fought with success and bravery under his father, whose courage and military prudence he imitated. He began his career with great popularity, the beauty and elegance of his person gained him admirers, and by pleading at the bar he displayed his eloquence, and received the most unbounded applause. In the disturbances which agitated Rome, by the ambition and avarice of Marius and Sylla, Pompey followed the interest of the latter, and by levying three legions for his service he gained his friendship and his protection. In the twenty-sixth year of his age, he conquered Sicily, which was in the power of Marius and his adherents, and in forty days he regained all the territories of Africa, which had forsaken the interest of Sylla. This rapid success astonished the Romans, and Sylla, who admired and dreaded the rising power of Pompey, recalled him to Rome. Pompey immediately obeyed, and the dictator, by saluting him with the appellation of the Great, showed to the world what expectations he formed from the maturer age of his victorious lieutenant. This sounding title was not sufficient to gratify the ambition of Pompey, he demanded a triumph, and when Sylla refused to grant it, he emphatically exclaimed, that the sun shone with more ardour at his rising than at his setting. His assuming gained what petitions and entreaties could not obtain, and he was the first Roman knight who, without an office under the appointment of the senate, marched in triumphal procession through the streets of Rome. He now appeared, not as a dependant, but as a rival, of the dictator, and his opposition to his measures totally excluded him from his will. After the death of Sylla, Pompey supported himself against the remains of the Marian faction, which were headed by Lepidus. He defeated them, put an end to the war which the revolt of Sertorius in Spain had occasioned, and obtained a second triumph, though still a private citizen, about seventy-three years before the Christian era. He was soon after made consul, and in that office he restored the tribunitial power to its original dignity, and in forty days removed the pirates from the Mediterranean, where they had reigned for many years, and by their continual plunder and audacity, almost destroyed the whole naval power of Rome. While he prosecuted the piratical war, and extirpated these maritime robbers in their obscure retreat in Cilicia, Pompey was called to greater undertakings, and by the influence of his friends at Rome, and of the tribune Manilius, he was empowered to finish the war against two of the most powerful monarchs of Asia, Mithridates king of Pontus, and Tigranes king of Armenia. In this expedition Pompey shewed himself no ways inferior to Lucullus, who was then at the head of the Roman armies and who resigned with reluctance an office which would have made him the conqueror of Mithridates and the master of all Asia. His operations against the king of Pontus were bold and vigorous, and in a general engagement, the Romans so totally defeated the enemy, that the Asiatic monarch escaped with difficulty from the field of battle. [Vid. Mithridaticum bellum.] Pompey did not lose sight of the advantages which dispatch would ensure; he entered Armenia, received the submission of king Tigranes, and after he had conquered the Albanians and Iberians, visited countries which were scarce known to the Romans, and, like a master of the world, disposed of kingdoms and provinces, and received homage from twelve crowned heads at once; he entered Syria, and pushed his conquests as far as the Red Sea. Part of Arabia was subdued, Judea became a Roman province, and when he had now nothing to fear from Mithridates, who had voluntarily destroyed himself, Pompey returned to Italy with all the pomp and majesty of an eastern conqueror. The Romans dreaded his approach, they knew his power, and his influence among his troops, and they feared the return of another tyrannical Sylla. Pompey, however, banished their fears, he disbanded his army at Brundusium, and the conqueror of Asia entered Rome like a private citizen. This modest and prudent behaviour gained him more friends and adherents than the most unbounded power aided with profusion and liberality could have done. He was honoured with a triumph, and the Romans, for three successive days, gazed with astonishment on the riches and the spoils which their conquests had acquired to the east, and expressed their raptures at the sight of the different nations, habits, and treasures, which preceded the conqueror's chariot. But it was not this alone which gratified the ambition, and flattered the pride of the Romans; the advantages of their conquests were more lasting than an empty show, and when 20,000 talents were brought into the public treasury, and when the revenues of the republic were raised from fifty to eighty-five millions of drachmas, Pompey became more powerful, more flattered, and more envied. To strengthen himself, and to triumph over his enemies, Pompey soon after united his interest with that of Cæsar and Crassus, and formed the first triumvirate, by solemnly swearing, that their attachment should be mutual, their cause common, and their union permanent. The agreement was completed by the marriage of Pompey with Julia, the daughter of Cæsar, and the provinces of the republic were arbitrarily divided among the triumvirs. Pompey was allotted Africa and the two Spains, while Crassus repaired to Syria, to add Parthia to the empire of Rome, and Cæsar remained satisfied with the rest, and the confirmation of his power as governor of Gaul for five additional years. But this powerful confederacy was soon broken; the sudden death of Julia, and the total defeat of Crassus in Syria, shattered the political bands which held the jarring interest of Cæsar and Pompey united. Pompey dreaded his father-in-law, and yet he affected to despise him; and by suffering anarchy to prevail in Rome, he convinced his fellow-citizens of the necessity of investing him with dictatorial power. But while the conqueror of Mithridates was as a sovereign at Rome, the adherents of Cæsar were not silent. They demanded that either the consulship should be given to him, or that he should be continued in the government of Gaul. This just demand would perhaps have been granted, but Cato opposed it, and when Pompey sent for the two legions which he had lent to Cæsar, the breach became more wide, and a civil war inevitable. Cæsar was privately preparing to meet his enemies, while Pompey remained indolent, and gratified his pride in seeing all Italy celebrate his recovery from an indisposition by universal rejoicings. But he was soon roused from his inactivity, and it was now time to find his friends, if anything could be obtained from the caprice and the fickleness of a people which he had once delighted and amused by the exhibition of games and spectacles in a theatre which could contain 20 000 spectators. Cæsar was now near Rome, he had crossed the Rubicon, which was a declaration of hostilities, and Pompey, who had once boasted that he could raise legions to his assistance by stamping on the ground with his foot, fled from the city with precipitation, and retired to Brundusium with the consuls and part of the senators. His cause, indeed, was popular, he had been invested with discretionary power, the senate had entreated him to protect the republic against the usurpation and tyranny of Cæsar, and Cato, by embracing his cause, and appearing in his camp, seemed to indicate that he was the friend of the republic and the assertor of Roman liberty and independence. But Cæsar was now master of Rome, and in sixty days all Italy acknowledged his power, and the conqueror hastened to Spain, there to defeat the interest of Pompey, and to alienate the hearts of his soldiers. He was too successful, and when he had gained to his cause the western parts of the Roman empire, Cæsar crossed Italy and arrived in Greece, where Pompey had retired, supported by all the power of the east, the wishes of the republican Romans, and by a numerous and well-disciplined army. Though superior in numbers, he refused to give the enemy battle, while Cæsar continually harassed him, and even attacked his camp. Pompey repelled him with great success, and he might have decided the war, if he had continued to pursue the enemy, while their confusion was great, and their escape almost inevitable. Want of provisions obliged Cæsar to advance towards Thessaly; Pompey pursued him, and in the plains of Pharsalia the two armies engaged. The whole was conducted against the advice and approbation of Pompey; and by suffering his troops to wait for the approach of the enemy, he deprived his soldiers of that advantage which the army of Cæsar obtained by running to the charge with spirit, vigour, and animation. The cavalry of Pompey soon gave way, and the general retired to his camp, overwhelmed with grief and shame. But here there was no safety the conqueror pushed on every side, and Pompey disguised himself, and fled to the sea-coast, whence he passed to Egypt, where he hoped to find a safe asylum, till better and more favourable moments returned, in the cours of Ptolemy, a prince whom he had once protected and ensured on his throne. When Ptolemy was told that Pompey claimed his protection, he consulted his ministers, and by their advice he had the baseness to betray and deceive him. A boat was sent to fetch him on shore, and the Roman general left his galley, after an affectionate and tender parting with his wife Cornelia. The Egyptian sailors sat in sullen silence in the boat, and before Pompey disembarked, Achillas an Egyptian, and Septimius a Roman, who had served under the banners of the unhappy exile, assassinated him. His wife, who had followed him with her eyes to the shore, was a spectator of the bloody scene, and she hastened away from the bay of Alexandria, not to share his miserable fate. Pompey died B. C. 48, in the 58th or 59th year of his age, the day after his birth-day. His head was cut off, and after being embalmed was sent to Cæsar, who turned away from it with horror, and shed a flood of tears. The body was left for some time naked on the sea-shore, till the humanity of Philip, one of his freedmen, and an old soldier, who had often followed his standard to victory, raised a burning pile, and deposited his ashes under a mound of earth. Cæsar erected a monument on his remains, and the emperor Adrian, two centuries after, when he visited Egypt, ordered it to be repaired at his own expense, and paid particular honour to the memory of a great and good man. The character of Pompey is that of an intriguing and artful general, and the oris probi animo inverecundo of Sallust; short and laconic as it may appear, is the best and most descriptive picture of his character. He wished it to appear that he obtained all his honours and dignity from merit alone, and as the free and unprejudiced favours of the Romans, while he secretly claimed them by faction and intrigue; and he who wished to appear the patron, and an example of true discipline and ancient simplicity, was not ashamed publicly to bribe the populace to gain an election or to support his favourites. His great misfortunes interest indeed the heart, and his character, compared to that of his successful rival, who at last overthrew the liberties of Rome, appears with more splendid lustre, and more strongly claims our respect, but had Pompey obtained the victory, he might have become a more tyrannical master than Cæsar. The same thirst after power, the same ambition, and the same overbearing consequence formed the character of the two rivals, and it was not unknown to the friends of Pompey, of those who shared his retirement, his pleasures, and his confidence, that he meditated subjection for his country, and had frequently threatened to forge for the Romans those chains of slavery, which, with more dissimulation and dexterity, Cæsar gradually imposed. Yet amidst all these proofs of public ambition and private intrigue, which were perhaps but too congenial with the age, we perceive many other striking features; Pompey was kind and clement to the conquered, and generous to his captives, and he buried at his own expense Mithridates, with all the pomp and the solemnity which the greatness of his power, and the extent of his dominions seemed to claim. He was an enemy to flattery, and when his character was impeached by the malevolence of party, he condescended, though accused, to appear before the censorial tribunal, and to show that his actions and measures were not subversive of the public peace or the independence of the people. In his private character he was as remarkable; he lived with great temperance and moderation, and his house was small and not ostentatiously furnished. He destroyed with great prudence the papers which were found in the camp of Sertorius, lest mischievous curiosity should find cause to accuse the innocent, or jealousy meditate their destruction. With great disinterestedness he refused the presents which princes and monarchs offered to him, and he ordered them to be added to the public revenue. He might have seen a better fate, and terminated his days with more glory, if he had not mixed with such imprudence when the flames of civil war were first kindled; and he reflected with remorse, after the battle of Pharsalia, upon his want of usual sagacity and military prudence, in fighting at such a distance from the sea, and in leaving the fortified places of Dyrrachium, to meet in the open plain an enemy, without provisions, without friends, and without resources. The misfortunes which attended him after the conquest of Mithridates, are attributed by Christian writers to his impiety in profaning the temple of the Jews, and in entering with the insolence of a conqueror the Holy of Holies, where even the sacred person of the high priest of the nation was not admitted but upon the most solemn occasions. His duplicity of behaviour in regard to Cicero is deservedly censured, and he should not have violently sacrificed to party and sedition, a Roman, whom he had ever found his firmest friend and adherent. In his meeting with Lucullus he cannot but be taxed with pride, and he might have paid more deference and more honour to a general, who was an able and more entitled than himself to finish the Mithridatic war. Pompey married four different times. His first matrimonial connection was with Antistia, the daughter of the prætor Antistius, whom he divorced with great reluctance to marry Æmylia, the daughter-in-law of Sylla. Æmylia died in child-bed, and Pompey's marriage with Julia, the daughter of Cæsar, was a step more of policy than affection. Yet Julia loved Pompey with great tenderness, and her death in child-bed was the signal of war between her husband and her father. He afterwards married Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, a woman commended for her virtues, beauty, and accomplishments. — Plut. in Vita. — Flor. 4. — Patere. 2. 29. — *Dio. They prepared to oppose the conqueror, but Cæsar pursued them with his usual vigour and success, and at the battle of Munda they were defeated, and Cneus was left among the slain. Sextus fled to Sicily, where he for some time supported himself; but the murder of Cæsar gave rise to new events, and if Pompey had been as prudent and as sagacious as his father, he might have become, perhaps, as great and as formidable. He treated with the triumvirs as an equal, and when Augustus and Antony had the imprudence to trust themselves without arms and without attendance in his ship, Pompey by following the advice of his friend Menas, who wished him to cut off the illustrious persons who were masters of the world, and now in his power, might have made himself as absolute as Cæsar; but he refused, and observed it was unbecoming the son of Pompey to act with such duplicity. This friendly meeting of Pompey with two of the triumvirs was not productive of lasting advantages to him, he wished to have no superior, and hostilities soon after began. Pompey was at the head of 350 ships, and appeared so formidable to his enemies, and so confident of success in himself, that he called himself the son of Neptune, and the lord of the sea. He was however, soon defeated in a naval engagement by Octavius and Lepidus, and of all his numerous fleet, only 17 sail accompanied his flight into Asia. Here for a moment he raised seditions, but Antony ordered him to be seized, and he was put to death by Titius at Miletus, about 35 years before the Christian era, in his 46th year. Plut. in Anton. &c. — Paterc. 2, 55, &c. — Flor. 4, 2, &c — Trogus. Vid Trogus.

POMPILIUS NUMA, the second king of Rome [Vid Numa] The descendants of the monarch were called Pompilius Sanguis, an expression applied by Horace to the Pisos. Art. Poet. 292.

POMPONIA, the wife of Q. Cicero, sister to Pomponius Atticus. She punished with the greatest cruelty Philologus, the slave who had betrayed her husband to Antony, and she ordered him to cut his flesh by piece-meal and afterwards to boil it and eat it in her presence. Cic. Att. 1, 5 — A daughter of Pomponius Græcinus, in the age of Augustus, &c.

POMPONIUS, the father of Numa, advised his son to accept the regal dignity which the Roman ambassadors offered to him. — A celebrated Roman intimate with Cicero. He was surnamed Atticus from his long residence at Athens, by which name he is best known. [Vid. Atticus.] — Labeo, a governor of Mœsia, accused of ill management in his province. He destroyed himself by opening his veins. Tacit. Ann. 6, 29. — Mela, a Spaniard, who wrote a book on geography. [Vid. Mela.] — A Roman tribune who accused Manlius the dictator of cruelty, but did not prosecute his purpose through the threats of the son of the accused. He triumphed over Sardinia, of which he was made governor. He escaped from Rome, and the tyranny of the triumvirs, by assuming the habit of a prætor, and by travelling with his servants disguised in the dress of lictors with their faces. Liv. 7, 4 et 5. — A friend of C. Gracchus. He was killed in attempting to defend him. Plut. in Graccho

PONS, ÆLIUS, was built by the emperor Adrian at Rome It was the second bridge of Rome in following the current of the Tiber. It is still to be seen, the largest and most beautiful in Rome. — Æmilius, an ancient bridge at Rome, originally called Sublicius, because built with wood (sublices). It was raised by Ancus Martius, and dedicated with great pomp and solemnity by the Roman priests. It was rebuilt with stones by Æmilius Lepidus, whose name it assumed. It was much injured by the overflowing of the river, and the emperor Antoninus, who repaired it, made it all with white marble It was the last of all the bridges of Rome, in following the course of the river, and some vestiges of it may still be seen. — Anienis was built across the river Anio, about three miles from Rome. It was rebuilt by the eunuch Narses, and called after him, when destroyed by the Goths. — Cestus was built in the reign of Tiberius by a Roman called Cestius Gallus, from whom it received its name and carried back from an island of the Tiber, to which the Fabricius conducted. — Janicularis received its name from its vicinity to mount Janiculum. It is still standing. — Milvius was about two miles from Rome. Vid Milvius. — Fabricius was built by Fabricius, and carried to an island of the Tiber. — Palatinus, near mount Palatine, was also called Senatorius, because the senators walked over it in procession when they went to consult the Sibylline books. It was begun by M. Fulvius, and finished in the censorship of L. Mummius, and some remains of it are still visible. — Trajani was built by Trajan across the Danube, celebrated for its size and magnificence. The emperor built it to assist more expeditiously the provinces against the barbarians, but his successor destroyed it, as he supposed that it would be rather an inducement for the barbarians to invade the empire. It was raised on 20 piers of hewn stones, 150 feet from the foundation, 60 feet broad, and 170 feet distant one from the other, extending in length above a mile Some of the pillars are still standing. — Another was built by Trajan over the Tagus, part of which still remains. Of temporary bridges, that of Cæsar over the Rhine was the most famous. — Suffragiorum was built in the Campus Martius, and received its name from the populace being obliged to pass over it whenever they delivered their suffrages at the elections of magistrates and officers of the state. — Triumphalis was on the way to the capitol, and passed over by those who triumphed. — Narniensis joined two mountains near Narnia, built by Augustus, of stupendous height, 60 miles from Rome; one arch of it remains about 100 feet high.

PONTIA, a woman condemned by Nero as guilty of a conspiracy She killed herself by opening her veins. She was daughter of Petronius, and wife of Bolanus. Juv 6, 637. — An island off the coast of Latium, and south of the promontory of Circeii. It received a Roman colony, A. U. C. 441, and it obtained the thanks of the Roman senate in the second Punic war. It became afterwards the spot to which the victims of Tiberius and Caligula were secretly conveyed, to be afterwards despatched, or doomed to a perpetual exile. Its modern name is Ponsa. Liv 9, 38. — Suet Tib. 64. — Cal. 15.

PONTICUS, a poet of Rome, contemporary with Propertius, by whom he is compared to Homer. He wrote an account of the Theban war in heroic verse. Propert. 1, 7.

PONTINÆ PALUDES, or POMPTINÆ PALUDES, a marshy tract of country in the territory of the Volsci, obtaining its name from the city of Suessa Pometia, in whose vicinity it was situate. These fens are occasioned by the quantity of water carried into the plain by numerous streams which rise at the foot of the neighbouring mountains and for want of a sufficient declivity creep sluggishly over the level space, and sometimes stagnate in pools, or lose themselves in the sands. Two rivers principally contributed to the formation of these marshes, the Ufens or Uffente, and the Amasenus or Amasene. The flat and swampy tract spread to the foot of the Volscian mountains, and covered an extent of eight miles in breadth, and thirty in length with mud and infection. It is not easy to fix the date of the origin of these marshes. Homer describes the abode of Circe as an island; and Virgil agrees with him in this description. Pliny not only notices this opinion of Homer, but corroborates it by the testimony of Theophrastus, who give the island a circumference of about eighty stadia, or ten miles; and that, too, as late as the year 440 of Rome. But whatever may have been the condition of this tract in times prior to the records of history, Pliny tells us, on the authority of a more ancient writer, that, at an early period of the republic, it comprised within its limits no less than thirty-three cities: all of which gradually disappeared before the ravages of war, or the still more fatal effects of malaria. Few, perhaps, will be disposed to credit this assertion of Pliny, even admitting that the Volsci were a populous nation, and the marshes once healthy and dry. But healthy they never were; nor does any authentic record prove that, from the first attempt to drain them to the last, one half of them was ever habitably dry. Virgil found them "a black bog;" and Silius, filling up as usual the sketch of his master, describes them exactly as they now are. A few square miles of meadow, and some arable land, have been drained on the left; but, towards the sea, the marshes present one unpenetrable thicket of reeds and saplings, which screen every object except the Circean promontory. The first attempt to drain these marshes was made about 300 years before the Christian era, by Appius Claudius, while employed in carrying his celebrated road across them; and his example was followed though at considerable intervals, by consuls, emperors, and kings, down to the time of Theodoric. Julius Cæsar is said to have conceived the design of turning the course of the Tiber, and carrying it through the marshes into the sea at Terracina; but this vast project died with him, his successors having adopted the more practicable one of endeavouring to carry off the redundant waters by opening a canal from one end of the marsh to the other. Many of the inconveniences of the marshes, however, still continued to be felt, as appears from Horace's catalogue of the annoyances he met with on this road, as well as from the epithet applied to it by Lucan:
